

3 1761 04924202 7

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

<http://www.archive.org/details/academyliteratur59londuoft>

CHINA AND THE FAR EAST.—BOOKS TO READ.

JUST READY.

THE "OVERLAND" TO CHINA.

BY

ARCHIBALD W. COLQUHOUN, F.R.G.S.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS AND MAPS.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street.

EUROPEAN SETTLEMENTS IN THE FAR EAST:

China, Japan, Corea, Indo-China, Straits Settlements, Malay States, Siam, Netherlands, India, Borneo, The Philippines, &c. With Map and 32 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready next week.]

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.—"The frequent occurrence in the Press, on both sides of the Atlantic, of the phrases 'Spheres of Influence' and 'The Open Door,' the great prominence given to the Far East, both politically and commercially, and the prominent part it seems destined to play in European politics in the near future, leads the compiler to believe that this brief account of the European Settlements in the Far East will not be without interest to the political student, the merchant, and the public generally."

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd.,
St. Dunstons House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE HISTORY of CHINA.

By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, Author of "Chinese Gordon," "Sir Stamford Raffles" &c., &c. A New and Revised Edition. Illustrated with Portraits and Maps. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 24s.

"The Second Volume contains a full History of China and her connection with European Nations, and detailed accounts of all events, including the Sino-Japan War, and its Diplomatic consequences."

"Mr. Boulger is a thoughtful writer, and his facts may be relied on. He has, too, the true inwardness of the historian.... For the purpose of information it would be difficult to point to a more handy and trustworthy book."—Morning Post.

"Regarded as a history pure and simple, indeed, Mr. Boulger's latest effort is all that such a work should be."—Full Mail Gazette.

"One cannot read this admirable history without feeling how much Mr. Boulger's sympathies have been enlisted by the wonderful record of Chinese achievement and Chinese character which he has collected with so much charm and ability."—Saturday Review.

W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN.

By Arthur May Knapp.

2 vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations,
small fcap. 8vo, 8s. net.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Contain the most complete exposition of Japan, past and present, that has hitherto been given to British readers, and their material is as well arranged as it is rich and informative."

SPECTATOR.—"An attractive account of the 'Island Realm.' A number of good full-page illustrations help one to realise the aspect of Japanese life."

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

The Latest Book on China.

VILLAGE LIFE IN CHINA.

By Arthur H. Smith,

D.D. With 31 Illustrations from Photographs. SECOND EDITION. 7s. 6d.

The Athenaeum says: "From the first page to the last it is full of suggestive matter, and gives a most faithful representation of village life in China than any that has ever yet been attempted."

A CYCLE of CATHAY; or, China, South and North.

With Personal Recollections. By W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D., LL.D. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d.

The Scotsman says: "The work is a real and substantial addition to our knowledge of modern China."

THE GIST of JAPAN: the Islands, their People, and Missions. By Rev. R. E. PEERY, A.M. With 8 Full-Page Illustrations. 5s.

The Athenaeum says: "Mr. Peery's volume portrays with admirable truth and justice the Japanese people."

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER,

21, Paternoster Square, London, E.C.; and Edinburgh.

THE BOOK FOR THE DAY ON CHINA.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 3s. 6d.

CHINA and its FUTURE.

In the Light of the Antecedents of the Empire, its People, and their Institutions.

By JAMES JOHNSTON, Author of "China and Formosa."

"Mr. Johnston is entitled to speak, for he has lived for several years in the country, and these pages show by crisp and well-informed exposition of the facts and forces of the national life that he has studied to some purpose not merely the legends, but the present aspects of this new Eastern question which confronts the modern world."—Speaker.

"The volume gives an interesting and well-informed sketch of its history, its institutions, its people, its religion, and its political prospects, and is well worthy of the attention of readers interested in the immediate development of the Chinese question."—Sedgemoor.

"An excellent little book in every way, and specially valuable just now, in China's present crisis."—Rock.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

An American Transport

in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

Elliot Stock's New Publications.

In crown 8vo, tastefully printed and bound, with 37 Illustrations, price 10s. 6d.

THE PARISH and CHURCH of GODALMING, in the COUNTY of SURREY.

By SAMUEL WELMAN.

"Mr. Welman has made a valuable addition to the rapidly increasing list of parochial histories."—Spectator.

"The account of Godalming Church could hardly be better done, for Mr. Welman is both scientific and popular."—Literature.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

REVENGEFUL FANGS: a Tale of Anglo-Indian Life. By F. W. HAMFORD.

"The story is written with considerable skill, and there is no want of excitement."—Daily Free Press.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

SOMERLEY: Schoolboy and Undergraduate. By GILBERT SWIFT.

"Written with the brightness and good spirits of youth, and its irresponsible playfulness will scarcely fail to please any one who can appreciate its hits at undergraduate nature."—Scotsman.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

Crown 8vo, illustrated, price 2s. 6d. post free.

CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of

John Penry, Martyr, 1559-1593. By HERBERT

M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H. Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."

Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist

Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

London: ALEXANDER & SUTHERLAND, Limited,
21 and 22, Farnival Street, H. BORD, W.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOTICE.—A CHEAP EDITION will be READY in a FEW DAYS, price 6s., of

THE NEW FAR EAST.

By ARTHUR DIÖSY,

Vice-Chairman of Council of the Japan Society,
London.

With 12 Illustrations from Special Designs by Kubota Beisen, of Tokio, and a Reproduction of a Cartoon designed by H.M. the German Emperor, and a specially drawn Map.

IMPORTANT NEW WORK BY DEAN FARRAR.

(Forming a Companion Volume to his "Life of Christ.")
JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 15s.

THE LIFE of LIVES: Further Studies in the Life of Christ. By the Very Rev.
Dean FARRAR, D.D., F.R.S., Author of "The Life of Christ," "The Life of St. Paul," &c.

"Admirers of the Dean's eloquence will welcome a book which exemplifies with undiminished force all its peculiarities."—Times.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Price 7s. 6d.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

By H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS.

"Of all the reminiscences which have lately threatened the supremacy of the novel, by far the best are these 'Personal Recollections' of Mr. Sutherland Edwards. Not only do they not contain a dull page; they do not contain a single page to which we can object on the ground either of bad taste or of indiscretion."—Daily Mail.

READY SHORTLY.—Price 5s.

A COURSE OF LANDSCAPE

PAINTING in WATER-COLOURS. By J. MAC-
WHIRTER, R.A. With 23 Coloured Plates.

NOW READY.—Price 5s.

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE HALF

YEARLY VOLUME. Containing a Complete
Novel by R. W. CHAMBERS, entitled "A Gay Conspiracy," Stories by Leading Writers of Fiction, Topical Articles, &c. Profusely illustrated.

NOW READY.—Boards, price 3s. 6d.; cloth, 5s.

LITTLE FOLKS MIDSUMMER

VOLUME. With several Coloured Plates, numerous Pictures in Colour, Complete Stories, &c.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Paper covers, price 6d.;
cloth, 1s.

CASSELL'S GUIDE to PARIS

Profusely Illustrated. With Plan and Guide to the Exhibition.

"The contents offer thoroughly useful and accurate information. This illustrated handbook can be recommended."—Morning Post

JUST READY.—Paper covers, price 6d.;
cloth, 1s.

CASSELL'S PICTORIAL GUIDE

to the CLYDE. Illustrated throughout, and containing numerous Coloured Plates and Maps

JUST PUBLISHED.

A SIXPENNY EDITION OF THE BLACK ARROW. By R. L. STEVENSON.

NOTICE.—The COMPLETE VOLUME of MESSRS. CASSELL & COM-PANY'S Fine-Art Publication
ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES,
1900, is NOW READY, price
7s. 6d.

The Westminster Gazette says: "The most perfect representation of the Academy ever placed within reach of the public."

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., London, Paris,
New York, and Melbourne.

COMPLETION OF THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

"A 'Dictionary of National Biography' of which the country may be justly proud."—QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"Absolutely indispensable to every well-furnished library."—TIMES.

"The best dictionary of home biography possessed by any nation."—
PALL MALL GAZETTE.

PUBLICATION OF THE LAST VOLUME.

Now ready. Royal 8vo, price 15s. net in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 20s. net.

VOLUME 63 (WORDSWORTH—ZUYLESTEIN) OF THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

"The magnum opus of our generation."—TRUTH.

"Without any compeer in English or perhaps any other language."—LANCET.

"The greatest literary undertaking that has ever been carried out in England."—The Rev. Dr. JESSOPP in the NINETEENTH CENTURY

 To this Volume is prefixed a "STATISTICAL ACCOUNT" of the Dictionary, which supplies a number of facts and figures connected with the history of the undertaking.

NOTE.—A Full Prospectus of "The Dictionary of National Biography," with Specimen Pages, may be had upon application.

 Volume I. was published on January 1st, 1885, and a Volume has been issued every three months since that date.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

MR. CROCKETT'S NEW NOVEL.

At all Booksellers' and Libraries. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LITTLE ANNA MARK

By S. R. CROCKETT,

AUTHOR OF "CLEG KELLY," "THE RED AXE," "THE BLACK DOUGLAS," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Cheap Editions of Standard Works.

Handy Volumes, printed in clear, bold type, on good paper. Each Work complete in One Volume.

Fcap. 8vo, picture boards, 2s. each; or limp red cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.

WITH EDGED TOOLS. FROM ONE GENERA-TION TO ANOTHER.

By the Author of "MOLLY BAWN."

MOLLY BAWN. PHYLLIS.
MRS. GEOFFREY. PORTIA.
AIRY FAIRY LILIAN. ROSSMOYNE.
DORIS. BEAUTY'S DAUGHTERS
GREEN PLEASURE AND GREY GRIEF.
FAITH AND UNFAITH. LADY BRANKSMERE.
LOYS. LORD BERRESFORD, and Other Tales.
UNDERCURRENTS.

By GEORGE GISSING.

DEMOS: Socialist Life in England.
A LIFE'S MORNING. THYRZA.
THE NETHER WORLD. NEW GRUB STREET.

By the Author of "MEHALAH."

MEHALAH: A Story of the Salt Marshes.
COURT ROYAL. THE GAVEROCKS.
JOHN HERRING. RICHARD CABLE.

By W. E. NORRIS.

HEAPS OF MONEY. MATRIMONY.
MADEMOISELLE DE MERSAC.
ADRIAN VIDAL. NO NEW THING

By HAMILTON AIDÉ.

IN THAT STATE OF LIFE. PENRUDDOCKE.
MORA'S AND MYSTERIES.
MR. AND MRS. FAULCONBRIDGE.

By the Author of

"JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."
ROMANTIC TALES. DOMESTIC STORIES.

BOOKS FOR SEA-SIDE AND HOLIDAY READING.

 Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & Co. will be happy to send, post free on application, a Copy of their CATALOGUE, containing a List of 2s., 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 5s., and 6s. Popular Novels, together with a large number of Miscellaneous Works.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1470. Established 1869.

7 July, 1900.

Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. JOHN MORLEY'S Life of Cromwell, now appearing serially in the Century Magazine, will be published in book form in the autumn by Messrs. Macmillan.

AMONG Mr. G. W. Stevens's effects, which have been returned from Ladysmith, were six unpublished articles, called "War and Mud" (an account of his arrival at Ladysmith), "The Fight that Failed" (Lombard's Kop), "The Investment," "The Thirty Light Horsemen," "The Conies are a Feeble Folk," and "The Raid on Gun Hill." These are the type-written copies of articles which were sent out from Ladysmith, and lost. The first of them was published in the Daily Mail on Thursday. Here is his first acquaintance with Ladysmith:

Through the rain-blubbered window I saw a soppy-sanded platform and little red-roofed station buildings streaked with water and mud. A few skimpy trees hung their leaves limply. When I got out they were tumbling the luggage into shallow puddles. My skin was stale with the sleep you take in your clothes, and the air of dawn clung darkly to it like wet linen. Ladysmith—good Lord! . . .

As I slid and staggered up a bank and round a corner, there appeared half a dozen Indian camp-followers—sopping khaki putties and wringing turbans, shrunken with cold, ambling miserably through the mire, skating vaguely over the slime with bowed backs and dead toes and fingers. Gloom, drip, shiver, mud—and this was Ladysmith and this was glorious war!

MANY friends of the City of London School have felt and expressed the desire that the career of Mr. G. W. Stevens should be suitably commemorated in the place where he was educated. A committee has accordingly been formed, and arrangements have been made to present to the school a replica of the well-known portrait by the Hon. John Collier. It is also intended, if sufficient contributions are received, to found an annual prize.

THUS they honour their literary men in Poland. The people of Warsaw have decided to signalise Henry Sienkiewicz's jubilee by a gift to him of landed property. A committee has been formed to collect subscriptions, and has already succeeded in raising a large sum, with which it is proposed to purchase an estate for the author in the province. The celebration of his jubilee and the presentation of the estate are to take place next November.

OWING to the printers having gone to press with the last signature of Mrs. Craigie's novel, Robert Orange, without receiving the press-proof, a sentence has been missed out on page 408. It is in Disraeli's last letter, and should go in between the words, "cause of the quarrel" and "Orange applied." It runs as follows: "The passion of love invariably drives men and women to an extreme step in one direction or another. It will send some to the Cloisters, some to the Tribune, some to the stage, some to heroism, some to crime, and all to their natural calling."

PROF. WALTER RALEIGH, of Liverpool, the author of The English Novel, and of a brilliant, but wilful, book on Style, has been appointed successor to Prof. Bradley in the Chair of English Literature at Glasgow.

MR. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS contributes to Scribner's Magazine a characteristic account of the Relief of Ladysmith. It is marked by good observation and sympathy. When Mr. Davis rode into Ladysmith he met two officers. One of them handed him a list of the prices that had been paid during the siege for food and tobacco. The price of cigars struck him as specially pathetic—no wonder; they cost over three shillings a piece. Mr. Davis produced a handful of cigars from his pocket and offered them to the officers. We must give this "Thing Seen" in his own words:

They each took one, but they refused to put the rest of the cigars in their pockets. Then a beautiful thing happened. They lit the cigars, and at the first taste of the smoke—and they were not good cigars—an almost human expression of peace and goodwill and utter abandonment of joy spread over their yellow skins and cracked lips and fever-lit eyes. The first man dropped his reins and put his hands on his hips and threw back his head and shoulders and closed his eyelids. I felt that I had intruded at a moment which should have been left sacred. Another boy officer in stainless khaki and beautifully turned out, polished and burnished and varnished, but with the same yellow skin and sharpened cheek-bones and protruding teeth, a skeleton on horseback, rode slowly toward us down the hill. As he reached us he glanced up and then swayed in his saddle, gazing at my companions fearfully. "Good God," he cried. His brother officers seemed to understand, but made no answer, except to jerk their heads toward me. They were too occupied to speak. I handed the skeleton a cigar, and he took it in great embarrassment, laughing and stammering and blushing. Then I began to understand; I began to appreciate the heroic self-sacrifice of the first two, who when they had been given the chance had refused to fill their pockets. I knew then that it was an effort worthy of the V.C.

THE Ladies' Magazine, the not very attractive title of the new periodical to be issued by Messrs. Pearson next January, will contain the opening chapters of Mr. Hall Caine's new novel, "The Eternal City." It is said that Mr. Hall Caine received £1,500 for the serial rights. Apropos of the subject of prices, we call the information, from "C. K. S.'s" letter in the Sphere, that Miss Marie Corelli has received £5,000 on account of the royalty for her new novel, The Master Christian.

MR. HENRY LAWSON, the Australian poet and author, who arrived in London last week, intends making his home in this country.

A BOOK of immediate topical interest is announced by Messrs. Sampson Low: European Settlements in the Far East. The compiler has aimed to supply information to the political student, the merchant, and the public generally.

FROM Mr. George Smith's remarks at the Mansion House celebration of The Dictionary of National Biography it may be gathered that the production of this great work has cost something like £150,000. Mr. Smith added that he must consider himself fairly fortunate if the return equals half this expenditure. No literary enterprise of such magnitude has been carried out in this country at the cost and initiative of a single individual. Mr. Morley, who proposed the toast of "The Dictionary of National Biography," made a sunny little speech, in the course of which he said (we quote the Daily News report):

Everybody knew that beautiful picture, not meant to be a picture, that Gibbon drew—how he walked under the acacias when he had finished his great work. Those who had produced this Dictionary did not walk under acacias, they lunched with the Lord Mayor. He believed, however, that they shared some of the regrets with which Gibbon parted from his immortal work. He himself had contributed only one article to this titanic Dictionary—the biography of a statesman who, he was told, though he did not accept it, was more dead than any other in the whole catalogue, and that was Cobden. As to scale and proportion, from Mr. Lee's famous study of Shakespeare—Mr. Firth's masterly article on Cromwell, Mr. Stephen's contributions—Burke and Swift, for example—to any others of the 30,000 subjects, the distribution of space must always be a matter open to argument. With regard to omissions, he was told that someone who was the possessor of "Boxiana" thought the prize ring had been very inadequately dealt with. Mr. Lee had adopted the principle that malefactors—and the character of a malefactor must always be very much a question of degree—because of the permanent interest they excited in the human mind, deserved a space scarcely inferior to that given to benefactors. He regretted that in this gallery they did not have Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Franklin. These were all British subjects. When the Dictionary was commenced, he could have wished that Mr. Smith had made it a dictionary of universal biography, but he saw now that Mr. Smith had been right in confining the task to national biography, and he was glad the work was "national," and was not called by some other words that were more in fashion at the present day.

THE Statistical Account of The Dictionary of National Biography appended to the last volume contains some curious information. The table of memoirs arranged century by century may be summarised as follows:

Memoirs.		Memoirs.
Fifth century ...	36	Thirteenth century ...	515
Sixth century ...	81	Fourteenth century ...	678
Seventh century ...	134	Fifteenth century ...	659
Eighth century ...	96	Sixteenth century ...	2,138
Ninth century ...	57	Seventeenth century ...	5,674
Tenth century ...	76	Eighteenth century ...	5,789
Eleventh century ...	186	Nineteenth century ...	12,608
Twelfth century ...	377
		Total ...	29,104

The deductions which may be drawn from these figures are interesting, especially if the estimated population of the country in each century be taken into consideration. The distribution of the names over the alphabet is also shown, but here it would take a wise man to draw conclusions. The largest number of names appears under the letter B; and this letter is followed by C, S, H, M, P, W, G, &c. The figures for these letters are:

B ...	3,978	M ...	2,310
C ...	2,512	P ...	1,807
S ...	2,420	W ...	1,797
H ...	2,420	G ...	1,490

The fewest names naturally appear under Z, which furnishes 21. X has no name at all to its credit. Q has only 31, and U 75.

THE longest article in the Dictionary is Mr. Sidney Lee's Shakespeare, filling forty-nine pages. It is followed at a distance by the biography of the Duke of Wellington, by Col. E. M. Lloyd, R.G., with thirty-four pages. The next longest biographies are those of Francis Bacon, Oliver Cromwell, Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Walpole, the Duke of Marlborough, Sir Walter Scott, Edward I., Byron, Charles II., Newton, Swift, Edward III., Sterne, and Wycliffe. A list of the thirty-four contributors who have written the largest number of pages in the Dictionary starts as follows:

Name.	Amount of Contributions in pages.	Amount of Contributions reckoned in volumes.	No. of Articles.
Mr. Sidney Lee.....	1,370	Three volumes	820
Prof. J. K. Laughton...	1,000	Two and a quarter	904
Mr. Leslie Stephen	1,000	Two and a quarter	378
Mr. T. F. Henderson ...	900	Two	918
Mr. Thompson Cooper..	900	Two	1,422
Rev. William Hunt.....	830	Two	595

Perhaps the proudest fact in the statistics is that the number of biographies in the Dictionary is far in excess of the number in the National Biography of any other country.

THE new Anglo-Saxon Review is an average number, in a cover of more than average gorgeousness. Best among its contents we like Mr. John Davidson's "Eclogue of the Downs." There are three speakers: Lucian, Urban, and Eustace; and they walk over the Downs and talk, as men will, about fate and the meaning of life. Their walk takes them

Under Erringham,
By Thundersbarrow Hill, through Mossy Bottom,
Past Crooked Moon and over Thorleigh Top,
Behind the tree-shorn Downs, by Small Dole, Beeding, Bramber, and on to Steyning, where we dine.

The more serious passages, which are full of vitality, are relieved by delightful descriptions of the sights and sounds of the walk. The friends come to a hamlet, which consists of "a forge, a store, Three dwelling-houses, and a wayside inn." They taste the Sussex ale, and with it drink the silence.

EUSTACE.

The wind has fallen; not a whisper stirs
The brimming silence; earth, enchanted, waits
A counter-spell.

URBAN.

I love that litter, strewn
About the stithy yard; machines and ploughs;
Old toothless harrows; rollers, rusty, cracked,
And clogged o'er with tell-tale soil; wheel-tyres
Of sorts in bunches on the gable: all
Reposeful, genial, and luxurious.

EUSTACE.

A prying woman opens a door and peeps—
But not at us, she makes believe. She turns;
She hesitates; she saunters purposeless,
Then grasps her gown foothold across the way,
And punctuates the silence so.

URBAN.

A smothered, gurgling sound; a scarf of smoke
Hangs out upon the chimney-stalk! The bellows
Coughs and rumbles, sooty cobwebs blown
To tatters in its throat.

The assembled starlings seold
In budding tree-tops; and the brazen catch
And madrigal of fifty chanticleers
In fifty farms responds and dwindles wide
From knoll to knoll round Chanetonbury Ring,
That copes with sable crest the silvery air.

AN American poet, Mr. Robert Loveman, very sensibly calls his poems A Book of Verses. That is the ideal title for the volume of a "minor" poet, and there is no reason why every "minor" poet should not use it, the author's name being thus made the sufficient and appropriate distinction. The title—or description, for it is really no more—has derived dignity from its adoption by Mr. Henley.

A WORK of great importance to those who are interested in the art and history of typography has just been issued by the Clarendon Press. This is Notes on a Century of Typography at the University Press, Oxford, 1693-1794, with annotations and appendixes by Mr. Horace Hart, printer to the University. Only one hundred and fifty copies have been issued. The book, which we shall notice hereafter, is a large square quarto, and is nobly equipped in all respects. It displays all the various types which, between the above dates, were in use at Oxford, and of which specimen imprints were issued to authors in order that they might select the type in which their works were to be printed.

In the new Cornhill Mr. Bernard Capes generously gives away—we presume he gives them away—nine plots of novels which he has not had the time or will to work out. They are mostly of the fantastic order. "The Plot of the Abhorred Couple" and "The Plot of the Fearful Head" are effective in the gruesome line. There are three Plots of Lost and Recovered Treasures and two Plots of Mysterious Deaths, and there is "The Plot of the Phenomenal Calculator and the Quantity Surveyor." Perhaps the most amusingly tragic plot is that of "The Dead Cook Under the Coal Shoot," which we will quote:

One morning is found, lying under the open circular shoot of a coal cellar beneath the pavement, the dead body of the general servant to a family living in a quiet street of a quiet suburb. She had evidently gone in the early morning to fetch coals. . . . Her scalp is abraded, her neck dislocated. The pavement in the immediate neighbourhood of the orifice is slightly spattered with blood. . . . It would seem that the crown of the victim's head was, when assailed, actually projected, sprouting like a red tulip bud from the pavement. Now, it is the very character of the injuries that baffles inquisition; for the damage to the scalp is superficial, and insufficient to account for the spilt blood, as in evidence. Moreover, even a red-haired cook will not allow her neck to be broken without a struggle, and here there was no sign of the occurrence of any. So again we set our illuminati to work; and this is the solution of the mystery as they interpret it: a circus company is leaving the neighbourhood in the early morning. A young elephant—one of certain animals conducted through the empty streets—becoming either scared or skittish breaks from the ranks and scuttles along the side-walk. Mary Jane . . . hearing strange sounds, essays to project her inquisitive knowledge-box through the aperture, and has only got so far as to bung the latter, when the elephant shuffles up, and, unthinking, puts a foot upon the sprouting bulb, as upon a mere eccentricity of the pavement. Down goes Mary Jane, shutting upon herself, between the elephant and the coal, with a scratched scalp and a dislocated neck; and down also goes the animal's foot, wedging itself in the hole. And here it is, in the beast's frantic struggles to withdraw its limb, that the skin thereof is frayed and the blood scattered. (Note by illuminati: diameter of blood corpuscle in man, 3,300th of an inch; of an elephant, 2,745th of an inch.)

This story, well worked out, would have sped a railway journey.

"Does anyone now read Mrs. Radcliffe?" asks Mr. Andrew Lang in an article on this novelist in the same magazine. Apparently people do, or did until recently, for Mr. Lang says:

The thick double-columned volume in which I peruse the works of the Enchantress belongs to a public library. It is quite the dirtiest, greasiest, most dog's-eared, and most bescribbled tome in the collection. Many of the books have remained during the last hundred years uncut even to this day, and I have had to apply the paper knife to many an author, from Alciphron (1790) to Mr. Max Müller, and Dr. Birkbeck Hill's edition of Bozzy's Life of Dr. Johnson. But Mrs. Radcliffe has been read diligently, and copiously annotated.

Concerning Mrs. Radcliffe's novel, The Sicilian Romance, Mr. Lang has this suggestive and, we think, perfectly correct note:

The Sicilian Romance appeared in 1790, when the author's age was twenty-six. The book has a treble attraction, for it contains the germ of Northanger Abbey and the germ of Jane Eyre and—the germ of Byron! Like Joseph Andrews, Northanger Abbey began as a parody (of Mrs. Radcliffe), and developed into a real novel of character. So, too, Byron's gloomy scowling adventurers, with their darkling past, are mere repetitions in rhyme of Mrs. Radcliffe's Schedoni. This is so obvious that, when discussing Mrs. Radcliffe's Schedoni, Scott adds in a note parallel passages from Byron's Ginour. Sir Walter did not mean to mock, he merely compared two kindred spirits. "The noble poet" "kept on the business still," and broke into octosyllabics, borrowed from Scott, his descriptions of miscreants borrowed from Mrs. Radcliffe.

MR. A. H. MILLAR'S recent attack on the Omar Khayyám craze has its Transatlantic counterpart in an article by Mr. Edgar Fawcett in the New York Journal. This writer contends that the Omar Khayyám "fad" takes its place in a long line of English fads and fevers connected with Turgenev, Browning, Maeterlinck, and others. All these fads, says Mr. Fawcett, are dead or dying, and the Omar fad will die too, and the sooner the better; it has shown up "the hypocrisy of English ethics." Mr. Fawcett describes Omar's philosophy as follows:

Omar was not only a religious infidel, but he was a sensualist at whom Epicurus, not to mention Horace, would have shuddered. Yet he has been made the fashion, and that is enough for people to bow before him in silliest reverence. The professed lovers of Omar include Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, Christians of almost every type. Ingalls, that noble and honest thinker, never dreamed of such ruffian heterodoxy as this Persian bon vivant has literally reeled off by the yard, nor did the great dead agnostic whom I have just named ever once descend to the shallowness of Omar's utterance. It is all, when regarded seriously, the most pitiable stuff. Communion is no word for it, since it merely decorates the obvious in wine-drenched garlands and tawdry spangles. "Eat and drink, for to-morrow you die," does not express its dull grossness. "Get drunk as often as you can, and stay so as long as you can, for there's nothing in life half so profitable," sounds its true note.

It is to be observed here, as in Mr. Millar's case, that no distinction appears to be made between the half-legendary Omar and the very real FitzGerald. To say of FitzGerald's rendering that "commonplace is no word for it" would be crass stupidity; and yet the "fad" denounced in such unmeasured terms has grown up precisely round that rendering, which, to all intents and purposes, is a modern self-existing poem. We agree that the term "fad" is not misplaced: the Omar cult has been in many respects a ridiculous episode; and there is little doubt that before long FitzGerald's poem will once more be read by the fit and few. But to lash oneself into a fury over its philosophy is to establish one's unfitness to read it at all. Omar's "jug of wine" is not the same thing as the public-house round the corner.

St. Nicholas's examination papers for children have often a literary flavour. This month the young people are asked the following questions—the prize for the best answers being a year's subscription to the magazine:

- Who wrote "Goody Two Shoes"?
 Where was Robinson Crusoe's island?
 Which is stronger, a lion or a tiger? Which is the braver animal?
 What book was first printed in England?
 What is the origin of the expression, "N. or M.," in the Catechism?
 What is the meaning of "viz."? What is its origin?
 Who was "A. L. O. E."? Who was "The Country Parson"?

THE American Bookman of July has these remarks on scenery and weather in fiction:

We are quite convinced that in ninety-nine out of every one hundred novels, when the author turns from narrative or dialogue to a description of the surrounding forest, or of the nearby pool, or of the "tall Corinthian pillars of the stately old southern home," or of the hazy blue mountains in the distance, he or she is simply making so many lines of utterly meaningless words. This sort of padding is the most convenient and the easiest in the whole repertory of the third-rate craftsman or craftswoman.

Comparing elaborate with simple effects in this kind of writing, the critic goes on to say:

Dickens, in Martin Chuzzlewit, devotes several pages to the description of autumn leaves being driven before the wind. It is a wonderful bit of word-painting; Taine has quoted it as an example of the poetic qualities of the great English writer; and still we venture to say that one might read over Martin Chuzzlewit for the tenth time, and yet we do not think that anyone ever read and loved The History of Henry Esmond, and did not always remember that when Henry went back to Castletwood, after his first bitter experience with the great world, and walked by his Lady's side the night of that 29th of December, that "the moon was up and glittering clear in the frosty sky." It is the simplest and briefest touch . . . and yet it is that touch which makes the picture so effective and complete.

There is truth in these remarks; but the subject is complex. An article on "Scenery in Fiction" would have to go much deeper to be of value.

Bibliographical.

WILL Mr. Lang's magazine article on Mrs. Radcliffe's novels do anything towards creating a demand for them, I wonder? I believe I am correct in saying that the latest occasion on which one of that lady's romances was reprinted was in 1891, when a London firm brought out a cheap edition of The Mysteries of Udolpho. Previously to that we had had, in 1887, a cheap reprint of The Romance of the Forest, and in 1884 a cheap reproduction of The Italian. Evidently, therefore, there are still people who read Mrs. Radcliffe, although it is many a year since Haynes Bayly had the effrontery to say of her that "past were her terrible touches"—she who had once been the charmer

Of girls who sat reading all night.

Of one thing we may be tolerably sure, and that is, that we are not likely to have a reprint, cheap or otherwise, of Mrs. Radcliffe's Poems, which seem to have seen the light for the first time in 1834. And yet the good lady prided herself upon her verses, and introduced sundry of them into her stories—notably into The Romance of the Forest—which contains a quite pretty little song (albeit exceeding sentimental), beginning:

The rose that weeps with morning dew, and so forth.

Attention may be drawn to the paper in the new Anglo-Saxon Review in which that versatile lady, the Countess of Warwick, discourses of "Some Minor Miseries of a Book-Lover." Lady Warwick's warnings against the borrower and the marginal commentator are, of course, familiar; but there is suggestiveness in her remarks on methods of cataloguing, and her proposal for a vertical instead of horizontal arrangement of different-sized tomes on the same subject has something to recommend it. Her protests against inadequate binding, uncut leaves, and the inclusion in a book of its publisher's trade catalogue, will no doubt have sympathisers. There is, however, much to be said for, as well as against, uncut leaves and the publisher's catalogue. The latter is often of great value bibliographically. As for her ladyship's hint that some of the attendants in the British Museum Reading-room might well be women, I fear that this passage in her paper will shake the Museum to its foundations. The lady attendants would need to be over fifty years of age, at the very least. Some ladies under fifty are "distinctly comely," and one goes to the Reading-room to read—at least, some do. And about the regulation concerning "no conversation": is there such a thing as "a silent woman"?

Mr. Frederick Hawkins, of the Times, whose death has just been announced, will live in library catalogues, and also in the minds of those who are interested in theatrical history, as the author of A Life of Edmund Kean, published in 1869, and of four volumes on the French theatre, entitled respectively Annals of the French Stage (2 vols., 1884) and The French Stage in the Eighteenth Century (2 vols., 1888). The two latter works are accurate in their information and pleasing in their style. They are likely to remain standard authorities for some time to come. On the other hand, the definitive Life of Edmund Kean has yet to be written, despite the attempts made, not only by Mr. Hawkins, but by Sheridan Knowles, Barry Cornwall, and, in these present days, Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy. It is worth noting that Mr. Hawkins wrote a good deal in the Theatre magazine (which he edited at two different periods of its career), often anonymously, and often pseudonymously, masquerading most frequently as "Frédéric O'Keene."

The new Professor of English Literature at Glasgow, Mr. Walter Raleigh, has not yet contributed very much to that literature himself. He first came to the fore in 1894 with a little manual on The English Novel. Then he gave us, in 1896, a small brochure on Robert Louis Stevenson, and, in 1897, a booklet on Style and an introduction to some poems of Keats. At Glasgow, as at Edinburgh, there is a truly long vacation, and Mr. Raleigh should have leisure by and by to add to the number of his publications.

I see that one of the critics, reviewing Mrs. Jeremie Didelere, by H. J. Jennings, refers to its author as "she." Now, this particular H. J. Jennings may be a "she"; but I should think it more likely that the author of Mrs. Jeremie Didelere is identical with the Mr. H. J. Jennings, journalist, of Birmingham, who wrote a little book on the Curiosities of Criticism (1881) and monographs on Tennyson and Manning. If I am right, Mr. Jennings now has another curiosity of criticism to add to his store.

Talking of Mr. Lang, one is reminded that a certain ballad of his is likely, before very long, to get out of date. "I am not in Men of the Time," sang Mr. Lang some years ago, in accents of humorous regret; and now one hears that Men of the Time is to be incorporated in its more youthful and more "modern" rival, Who's Who, in which, of course, Mr. Lang has duly found a place.

The title of Mr. Churton Collins's forthcoming book—Plain Truths about Current Literature—recalls that of the Modern Men of Letters Honestly Criticised of the late Mr. Hain Friswell. That work landed Mr. Friswell in a well-remembered action for libel. Let us hope that, with that fact before him, Mr. Collins will not make his "Truths" too "plain."

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

An Ancient Literature.

A History of Sanskrit Literature. By Arthur A. Macdonnell. (Heinemann.)

THIS handy volume (one of the "Short Histories of the Literature of the World," edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse) is intended by its author to supply, and undoubtedly does supply, a conspicuous want. There is no history of Indian literature to which the general reader can turn. There was, indeed, lately published a Literary History of India; but that included in its scope Indian history in its bearing upon literature, and involved, therefore, a mass of information with which the purely literary inquirer could well dispense. As a further distinction, the present volume is confined to Sanskrit literature, while that embraced the literature of Southern India down to Tamil and the vernacular literatures generally. Mr. Macdonnell has produced a handbook which will be indispensable to readers unacquainted with the Sanskrit tongue, and valuable also to the less advanced student of that language for its scholarly qualities, its clearness, precision, and accurate knowledge. We have just one cavil to make—a cavil with regard to proportion. The book is fullest just where we might have expected it pardonably to have been somewhat condensed—with regard to the Vedic literature of early India; it is rather regrettably condensed where we should have looked for it to be, if anywhere, over-full—in respect of classical Sanskrit literature. It is a quite modern failing. Fifty years ago a history of our own literature would have slipped gaily over early English letters to Tennyson. Now it is odds your author will so zealously cram his readers with the latest research on Cædmon and Beowulf that the writers from Burns onward are of necessity packed like sardines in layers. It was well that the Vedas, and specially the Rig-Veda, should have the emphasis due to their poetic quality and literary importance. But it may be matter for question whether the Brahmanas should have received such intimate analysis; and surely to extend equally intimate treatment even to the Sûtras, leaving classical Sanskrit for summary (though careful) handling in about the final third of the book is an error of proportion. Doubtless to the scholar such treatment commends itself; he has presumably a certain familiarity with classical Sanskrit, and can be content with outline, leaving the fuller treatment for the more recently explored Vedic literature. But the general reader (to whom this book is largely addressed) knows no more of Sakuntalâ than of the Rig-Veda. To meet his necessities, the handling should be strictly proportioned to the artistic quality and literary greatness of the works handled. Such, at least, is our preconception.

Sanskrit, as Mr. Macdonnell explains, was always very much of a literary tongue—at least as used in literature—the peculiar property of the Brahmins or priestly caste; sown with archaisms and in classical times with lengthy compound-words. At the present day it holds much the position of Latin in the Middle Ages—a learned language, spoken and written by learned Brahmins. It has a rich and scientific phonetic alphabet, of no less than forty-six letters. It was formerly written on birch-bark or palm-leaves—northern India using ink, southern India the stylus. Its most ancient monuments are the Vedas, of which we need only here concern ourselves with the first, or Rig-Veda—the others being successive adaptations of it to the purpose of the sacrificial ritual. The Rig-Veda is a mighty collection of hymns to the early gods of Brahmanism. The pseudo-Orphic hymns of Greece furnish a certain parallel. But the Rig-Veda extends to no less than 1,028 hymns, arranged in ten books. And, apart from its literary merit (which is very considerable), it is a treasury of information concerning the religion and customs of the early Hindus. This, be it remembered, was over three thousand years ago—a uniquely early literary record. The poetic value of the Rig-Veda (which alone concerns the ACADEMY) reaches often a high point, though we may discount considerably the raptures of scholars. The Indian fancy is fertile, and notably in the Rig-Veda. The Indian sense of form is almost nil, and notably in the Rig-Veda. Fancy runs riot without rein or proportion. Passion in the higher senses is not pre-eminently an Indian gift, and it is notably absent in the Rig-Veda. At the same time those hymns have a directness lacking in later poetry. They display in profusion the myth-making faculty applied to Nature which is the characteristic of early poets and of Shelley, who had drunk deep at the fountain of Hellenism. Of Shelley we constantly think in turning these opening pages of Mr. Macdonnell. Natural facts are tissue into a hundred forms of imagery and personification, pass through transformation upon transformation. But it is a Shelley of less beauty, without the radiant loveliness, more often merely ingenious, more often (it must be said) merely commonplace or trivial, too often uglyly fantastic.

Passing to classical Sanskrit literature, we are in a later era, beginning about 500 B.C. The gods of the Rig-Veda have become lesser deities; Brahma, Vishnu, Lakshmi (the Hindoo Aphrodite), Siva and his spouse Kali Durga, are the chief of the new hierarchy. Legendary epic succeeds religious hymns in the shape of the Mahâbhârata. We can but briefly mention here this portentous and truly Hindu epic. It has not, nor can ever be, translated in any true sense. For it is an epic for the days of Hilpa and Shalun, a poem such as only the suns of India could breed to its "strange overgrowth." It reaches over two hundred thousand lines, and over one hundred thousand slokas or stanzas. The kernel is the exterminating battle between the Kurus and Pandus; but around this has accumulated a monstrous accretion of didactic matter and episodes interminable. When the hero Arjuna hesitates to fight, a sage, by way of telling him a hortatory and encouraging story, relates a whole philosophic poem in eighteen cantos, the Bhagavadgîtâ. Imagine an epic on the plan of the Arabian Nights, and you have something like an idea of this great, but impossible, Hindu poem. More manageable, but still of great length, is the Râmâyana of Valmiki, which relates the wanderings, love, and adventures of the deified hero Râma, and his final restoration to the throne whence he had been exiled. More polished and literary in style than the older epic, it anticipates the purely literary epics which followed, under the name of Kavyas. It is the most popular of Hindoo epics, and has undoubted beauty. With the Kavyas blossomed also Sanskrit drama and lyric poetry. The greatest name in all three is that of Kalidasa. His Megadûta or "Cloud-Messenger" is a lyric which Goethe loved, addressed by an exiled lover to the cloud sailing north towards the land where his mistress dwells.

But the fame of Kalidasa is highest as the foremost of Indian dramatists—above all, as the author of "Sakuntalâ"—or "Çakuntalâ," as Mr. Macdonnell writes it. "Çakuntalâ" is the one great Sanskrit poem which has penetrated all over Europe. Goethe, the impeccable, admired it as a masterpiece; it has been once, if not twice, acted in Paris of late years. It deserves its fame, yet it is not possible, by description or quotation, to give any idea of it to English readers. The plot is nothing, and very Indian—the loves of a warrior king and a nymph, forest-trained; thwarted for a time through the curse of an extremely holy ascetic with an extremely unholy temper, whom Çakuntalâ offended, because, thinking of her lover, she did not bestir herself promptly to afford him hospitality. Loss of memory falls on the king, owing to Çakuntalâ's loss of her spousal-ring (magic is rife in the play), and he turns her away unrecognised. But the ring is found in a fish's belly and brought to the king, who at once regains memory; sets out to seek Çakuntalā; and, after a little adventure, is reunited to her. There is scarce more than this in the play, which is, consequently, undramatic enough as regards action. The charm lies in the tender, voluptuous passion, the subdued melancholy, the rich lyric fancy, and descriptive setting. The breath of the Indian forest, the odour of lotus, the glow of tropical blossoms, pervade the drama, and make it haunting to the reader, however little he may care for the abundant supernatural machinery; and the Hindu deities have nothing of Greek charm and imposingness. Mr. Macdonnell is not happy in the few selections of verse scattered through this book, and he is specially inadequate as regards Çakuntalā. Therefore, we quote from another source a very free rendering of a passage which, if not representative, has, nevertheless, its own grace of fancy. It should be explained that the king has forbidden the celebration of the spring festival; and some girls are found by his chamberlain culling garlands in despite of the prohibition. They plead their ignorance of the edict:

MAIDENS.

Pardon, good sir, we have heard nought of it.

CHAMBERLAIN.

You have heard nought of it? Why, all the trees,
The vernal hedgerows, yea, the very birds
That have therein their leafy tenement,
The king's behest attend more heedfully.
Yon mango-blossoms, though long since at full,
Gather no down upon their tender tops;
The duteous amaranth hesitates to bud;
The cuckoo, though frere winter's rains are past,
Falters in act of dewy utterance.
Nay, to his quiver intimidated Love
Thrusts back the half-drawn shaft.

To pursue further Kalidasa's plays, or the rich Indian theatre in general, is impossible within our limits. It has many curious affinities to the Elizabethan drama—the mixture of prose and verse, of serious and comic, even the conventional presence of the court-jester who always accompanies the hero. Nor is Kalidasa's undramatic quality common to the drama as a whole. Let us, by way of conclusion, quote a lovely image from a play ascribed (probably falsely) to King Çrinarsha. It describes the pale light before the rising of the moon:

Behold, the east proclaims the god of night,
Still hidden by the mountain where he rises,
Even as a maiden by her pale face shows
That in her inmost heart a lover dwells.

The philosophic and prose portion of Sanskrit literature we have not touched. But from our quite cursory survey of the poetic portion, it will be gathered how wide and rich is the material we have perforce left unnoted.

Under the Wing of Maeterlinck.

The Cave of Illusion: a Play in Four Acts. By Alfred Sutro. With an Introduction by Maurice Maeterlinck. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

In the brilliant and beautiful essay which precedes Mr. Sutro's play in this volume, M. Maeterlinck tries to account for the present decadence of dramatic poetry. He attributes it to science, which, he says in effect, while offering a few definitive certitudes, has rendered impracticable certain incertitudes, and precisely those in which the loftiest thought flourished. Great poetry, he decides, has three principal elements: first, verbal beauty; second, the contemplation and passionate painting of nature and our feelings; third (and most important), the poet's "idea of the unknown, in which float the beings and the things evoked, of the mystery which dominates and judges these beings and these things, and presides over their destinies."

It is this last element which science has so fatally disturbed, and which only time can reconstitute. The theory is worked out with considerable ingenuity and penetration; but M. Maeterlinck appears to us to have failed in his endeavour to explain why dramatic poetry has been taken and other kinds of poetry left.

We have not perceived any close connexion between the preface and Mr. Sutro's play, which, by the way, the essayist praises very highly. The Cave of Illusion seems to M. Maeterlinck to be "from many points of view the almost perfect type of the best modern drama." We have the greatest respect for M. Maeterlinck's critical powers, but we are bound to disagree with him in this pronouncement. The Cave of Illusion is an interesting play, a carefully-written play, a clever play; but the despised dramatists of our West-end theatres have assuredly written better. In fact, except that it ends unhappily—or, rather, does not end at all, but merely leaves off—Mr. Sutro's play would make quite a marketable product, and might run a couple of hundred nights. It decidedly has four of the essentials of a popular stage success—verbal smartness, a luxurious setting, footmen, and an absence of new, disconcerting ideas.

Mr. Sutro takes a theme, long since antique and trite in fiction—that of the author with a dowdy wife who finds his inspiration in the misunderstood spouse of an opulent Philistine. David Hollisdaile, the hero, figures already in a hundred novels. Mr. Sutro surely has not observed him at first hand. Mr. Sutro would have us believe that Hollisdaile is a literary artist of genuine and striking talent, yet the fellow must needs read his work chapter by chapter to his Gabrielle under pain of not being able to continue it. Imagine a real distinguished author in that plight! Imagine a real distinguished author talking like this:

DAVID.

Of course you are glad! I have been wandering about since I left you, perplexed and disconsolate; I couldn't go home. And I lay on the grass, and half closed my eyes, and it came! And I couldn't resist the desire to come back here and tell you. Such a trifle, you know—a mere touch—but it makes all the difference! And do you know where the great flaw is? Just listen—it's wonderful—it—

[He pulls out a notebook and opens it.]

And like this:

DAVID.

Hear me too! Of myself I say nothing—but there is my work, which is your work too! . . . For you have awakened a force in me—a power—without you I am nothing; I fall to the ground.

GABRIELLE.

You imagine all this. . . .

DAVID.

Till I met you I worked as other men work; but now—I feel—I feel—oh, do not regard me as merely a braggart or fool—but since you have let me come here, day by day, and see you, and hear you, I have been conscious of—I have had thoughts—oh, I tell you, give me time, give me courage, your sympathy, the light that shines from you, I will do such work that men who know of us both shall fall on their knees for shame of their villainous slanders!

Distinguished authors don't do these things. They pursue their labours in a businesslike manner, so many hundred or thousand words a day, and discuss it as little as possible while it is in progress.

Nor do society women, however noble their spiritual struggles, employ language like the following:

GABRIELLE.

We have much in common. We are both a little bruised by life—we both are sensitive—perhaps we both dream dreams. . . . And I—have you ever gone out after a storm, and seen a flower that has almost been wrenched from its stem—but the sun comes out, and the warmth and gladness revive it, and it once more struggles to live. . . . I am like that. I am beginning to forget, beginning to hope. Oh be glad of this friend of mine!

Both hero and heroine are unoriginal, not directly derived from life. Hopkinson the publisher is neither more nor less than a stage-publisher. He is so much a stage puppet that one is tempted to ask whether Mr. Sutro has ever seen a publisher, except, perchance, through the spectacles of Sir Walter Besant. Mrs. Mellissent, who supplies the "comic relief," is one of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's women; she might have emerged from "The Liars." Her style runs thus:

MRS. MELLISSENT.

[Holding out her hand.] My dear General—what a delightful surprise! You are usually invisible in the afternoon—they say you devote it to being manicured and having your fortune told. Where is Gabrielle?

[The FOOTMAN returns from the boudoir.

We have already said that the play has no proper ending. Mr. Sutro states a problem, but he does not solve it. Moreover, he has a tendency to achieve his "curtains" by means of surprises which are far more theatrical than dramatic. This applies to every act, but especially to the last. Gabrielle's cry, at the final moment, that she is expecting a child, comes with a shock; it crudely administers a shudder; it does not, however, simplify or amend the situation; on the contrary, it complicates every difficulty, and calls for at least another act. In making an impasse for himself, and then ringing down the curtain, Mr. Sutro has followed a precedent more facile than justifiable.

We have, perhaps, dwelt a little hardly on the defects of The Cave of Illusion. It has good qualities. It is interesting and often effective, and it contains one admirably-drawn character—that of Clara Hollisdaile. The second act, in which Clara Hollisdaile rules the scene, is distinctly better than the other three. But the play, as a whole, has an air of being "superior." It is not superior: we repeat that it is almost marketable.

Mr. Steevens's Early Work.

Things Seen. By G. W. Steevens. (Blackwood & Sons.)

WE cannot consider Mr. Street well inspired when he chose his title for this volume. So much of the late G. W. Steevens's work comes under the heading "Things Seen" that, when a book is made up largely of his more subjective papers, it seems a pity to furnish it with so objective a label. The first paper is a satirical analysis of the New Humanitarianism, the second paper a clever political adaptation of Gibbon, the fifth a review of Mr. Balfour's philosophy, the sixth a criticism of "Little Eyolf," the seventh a eulogy of Zola, and so forth. The appendix contains some extracts from "that pathetic trophy of indomitable cheerfulness," the Ladysmith Lyre, probably the last words that George Steevens wrote. Towards the end of the volume come some Daily Mail descriptive sketches, and there is also a good article on the Greek and Turkish war. A better title than "Things Seen" should not have been hard to find.

But the book is more important than the title; and the book is interesting. It was right that these fugitive papers should be collected for the Memorial Edition, of which this is the first volume, for they show the range of his intellectual experiments, and the growth of his mind. The dominant note of this early work is cleverness. It emphasises Steevens's cleverness far more than his later travel sketches did. Contrasting the two, we should say that the distinguishing quality of his later work was intelligence, which is, of course, much better than cleverness.

For one man who could write With Kitchener to Khartum or From Capetown to Ladysmith or The Land of the Dollar, you could find fifty to do such work as the reflective portion of this volume. Not so well, perhaps; not so incisively, so brilliantly; but well enough.

This book, indeed, proves how powerful a factor in Steevens's development was Mr. Alfred Harmsworth. It seems to have been Mr. Harmsworth who taught him to feel, or, at any rate, to permit his feeling to get into his work. Before Mr. Harmsworth's democratic influence was cast upon him Steevens was still an undergraduate: of his earlier editors neither Mr. Henley nor Mr. Cust could alter that, although both drew from him occasional articles indicating a wider, more human outlook. Yet it was left for Mr. Harmsworth finally to play the exorcist.

To our mind the best thing in this book—the best thing, that is, of the kind that will be new to the majority of Steevens's readers—is the essay on Zola. Written as long ago as 1893, it contains some of the most understanding criticism that Zola has received in this country. Here is a passage:

There is always the consciousness of abstract truth struggling to assert itself through every one of Zola's men and machines and institutions. It gives all his work a strange kind of perfection, not wholly artistic, but more like the perfection of a system whose fitted parts are all squared and jointed flawlessly. If the system is right, all is right. To come back to La Débâcle, what could be more triumphantly relevant and triumphantly true than the figure of the peasant stolidly working his fields among the shells of Sedan? Without the idea it is melodrama—perverse and objectless melodrama. But the idea comes to rescue it—the idea of recuperation in the face of destruction, the indomitable perpetuity of life, the implicit statement of the law that becomes outspoken with Le Docteur Pascal. It is this symmetry and coherence—the constant sense of massive agencies working through all casual actions to which they lend purport and explanation—that gives us leave to call Zola the most ideal of the idealists. The real subject of the Rougon-Macquart is eternal truth, its real hero indestructible force.

It is the scientific spirit aflame with poetry. In place of the hopeless struggle to grapple with the monstrous tangle of interests that make up a man to-day, Zola puts the device of taking him by sections at a time and referring him under each section to one of the primitive forces that struggle in the complexity of his nature. He seems to be singing the war-song, not of man but of the impalpable agencies of philosophy. But to tell of philosophies and agencies is none the less to tell of man, whom they form. It is the passion of science, who for once has caught the look of her sister art. That is why Zola is for this one age of science—a wonderful sport in the line of artistic evolution. For if art could only once be science she would die happy. But she would die all the same.

In the same year, and for the same paper, the National Observer, Steevens made an experiment in character writing and produced "The Futile Don," of which these are the opening sentences:

He squares his elbows at high-table to the most marvellous of entrées; he rolls his eyes in common-room as he gulps the most precious of ports. And the entrées twist him with indigestion; the wine laps him in drowsiness. He crouches over his fender in May and catches cold. He guts Mommsen's "Staatsrecht" for his lectures, and cannot decipher his notes. He reads Tennyson, and forgets him in the very crisis of quotation. He talks of this and that, but pre-eminently of this. He walks round Godstow or Trumpington, panting and snatching short steps like a girl. He kneels down in chapel, covering his face with his hands to shut out the undergraduates, and prays God to be delivered from all heresy and schism. You would docket him as the pattern of important futility. And all the while he is dead.

It was that kind of thing which the demands of the Daily Mail was to stamp out. Not that such a study was not clever; but it was possibly not worth doing.

We have from time to time written so much about Steevens's special correspondence, that we say no more on this occasion; but his gifts in this direction are well represented in Things Seen. Many people will probably be glad to have the volume if only for his record of the Diamond Jubilee.

To Mr. Henley's biographical sketch of Steevens we have already referred. It is a warm-hearted, generous piece of writing, such as only Mr. Henley could have done.

"The Light that Never Was."

Pausanias, and Other Greek Sketches. By J. G. Frazer. (Macmillan. 5s.)

THIS is the promised and welcome offshoot of Mr. Frazer's great commentary on Pausanias, who was the topographer of Greece when Greece was disrobing herself of her last vestments of glory and beauty. The preservation of his Description of Greece, written in the second century of our era, is one of the most felicitous facts in all literature, and Mr. Frazer's commentary is a work of which our own age may be proud. Indeed, the word commentary seems inadequate to describe a work which does not merely criticise and annotate Pausanias, but envelops it, so to speak, in modern thought, and by a supreme effort throws it into a perspective that starts from our own day. Pausanias looked back many centuries as he trod the Sacred Way, and lingered on the banks of Ilyssus. We are taught in these pages to look back not only on these, but on Pausanias the melancholy antiquarian—the Howitt of his day. Like Howitt, Pausanias was an ordinary writer. Mr. Frazer tells us he was "a man made of common stuff and cast in a common mould." He had the antiquarian nose. His beliefs and doubts were those calculated to give to his narrative sympathy and piquancy. The gods and the oracles were accepted by him, but not the hundred heads of the hydra, and not the transformation of Zeus into a cuckoo to win the love of Hera. His whole standpoint and mental equipment are worked out by Mr. Frazer in his biographical sketch, which, with Mr. Frazer's own travel notes in the footsteps of Pausanias, forms the substance of this book. Pausanias' pages distil unconscious poetry; Mr. Frazer collects it. The pure colours of the ancient world, the music of undying names, the sparkle of seas that roll for ever in the light of history and legend—Pausanias sees these things, and writes of them in an average, placid, topographical strain; but like jewels in the hand of a dull dealer, they assert their liquidity of everlasting light. Like an antiquary, he is pre-occupied with the Past; but his Past was one of immortal interest. Illustrating his method, Mr. Frazer says;

If he looks up at the mountains, it is not to mark the snowy peaks in the sunlight against the blue, or the sombre pine-forests that fringe their crests and are mirrored in the dark lake below; it is to tell you that Zeus or Apollo or the Sun-god is worshipped on their tops, that the Thyiad women rave on them above the clouds, or that Pan has been heard piping in their lonely coombs. The gloomy caverns, where the sunbeams hardly penetrate, with their fantastic stalactites and dripping roofs, are to him the haunts of Pan and the nymphs. The awful precipices of the Aroanian mountains, in the sunless crevices of which the snow-drifts never melt, would have been passed by him in silence were it not that the water that trickles down their dark glistening face is the water of Styx. If he describes the smooth, glassy pool which, bordered by reeds and tall grasses, still sleeps under the shadow of the shivering poplars in the Lernean swamp, it is because the way to hell goes down through its black unfathomed water. If he stops by murmuring stream or brimming river, it is to relate how from the banks of the Ilyssus, where she was at play, the North Wind carried off Orithyia to be his bride; how the Selenus had been of old a shepherd who loved a sea-nymph and died forlorn how the amorous Alpheus still flows across the wide and stormy Adriatic to join his love at Syracuse. If in summer he crosses a parched river-bed, where not a dribble of water is oozing, where the stones burn under foot and dazzle the eye by their white glare, he will tell you that this is the punishment the river suffers for having offended the sea-god. Distant prospects, again, are hardly remarked by him, except for the sake of some historical or legendary association. The high knoll which juts out from the rugged side of Mount Maenalus into the dead flat of the Mantinean plain was called the Look, he tells us, because here the dying Epaminondas, with his hand pressed hard on the wound from which his life was ebbing fast, took his long last look at the fight. The view of the sea from the Acropolis at Athens is noticed by him, not for its gleam of molten sapphire, but because from this height the aged Ægeus scanned the blue expanse for the white sails of his returning son, then cast himself headlong from the rock when he descried the bark with sable sails steering for the port of Athens.

The man who has no Greek, but who longs to know the old Greek world, and bathe his heart in its pieties and laughter, should place this book on his shelves. Keats had but Lemprière's Dictionary.

Country Humours.

Village Notes. By Pamela Tennant. (Heinemann.)

WE have here the kind of book which every leisurely observer in the country should attempt to write—a book setting forth the little peculiarities and humours, quaintnesses and beauties of one's simpler neighbours. We do not mean to suggest that the task is easy; indeed, it is very hard; but the effort is worth making, even if Mrs. Tennant's sympathetic vision and literary skill are never attained to. It is impossible to know too much about human nature—especially, perhaps, on its tenderer side—and little books of this class add to our knowledge very pleasantly. Old Anthony, the Wiltshire cowman, for example, is a real "find." This is old Anthony on humaneness:

"Noa! I says them as can be onkind to the creaturs, well! I can't understand 'em. Po'r dumb animals! With the way they get to know who's friends. Ha! Knowing? Why, look at old Mary there; so soon as ever she hear me outside the shed if she doesn't begin to coo and chatter! And knew who it was afore ever I come in at the door!" Then, in a voice of unutterable tenderness, "Dormed old 'oman!"

And this was his comment on the morning after a fox had been in the chickens' run:

"Oh! nothing'll do for 'ee till the bounds come. That's what he wants—comen and killen my fowls, and not so much as taking 'em away wi' 'un. Brazen creatur! If I didn't hear him a-yoppin' round the fowl-house all last night, and the fowls to-day all skeered and humpy. Ha! There'll nothing do for 'ee till the bounds come. Brazen everlastin' nuisance!"

Mrs. Tennant tells us also of a gardener who described chaffinches as "they little chinks"—a very pretty poetical nickname.

Here is another glimpse of countryside comedy:

A few friends had assembled at the small house with the beautiful garden, and the midday meal had reached its second course, when Miss Tripp's voice was raised in querulous tone, speaking to her niece. "Mary," it said, "I've a feelin' o' cold pudden' about me. I've a feelin' o' cold pudden' about me, Mary."

The niece, rising from her chair, began a search among the ample folds of the black silk dress. And in some crease the errant scrap was discovered and removed. All those present breathed more freely. But they were not to be let off so easily. Miss Tripp, comfortable once more and smiling, drew her chair nearer to the table, adding, with the air of one alluding to a common experience of humanity: "Hewsoever, it's ne so bad as a spuinful o' jam behind the brook!"

Mrs. Tennant's pages remind us very agreeably of a little book which we think it extremely unlikely that she has ever seen. Indeed, very few persons have seen it, for it was privately printed, in a minute edition, many years ago, and the existing copies must be exceedingly rare. The title is Country Conversations, and the book records the humours of a Derbyshire (or Shropshire?) village as they came under the notice of the author—an invalid lady who was able to do a little visiting, and who, on returning home, set down as closely as might be the things that she had heard. This lady was not only a humorist, but a literary artist, and the little book was a treasure. We wish that permission to quote from it were obtainable.

Mrs. Tennant's Village Notes is not all quaint sayings. There are reflective chapters, too, and a few admirable descriptive passages. Best of these is, perhaps, the following account of a calf and its mother:

When I went into the cowshed the red calf was being leosed for his evening meal. "You see, I lets him go first; then I takes what's left," said the cowman. And the calf dived into his mother, and became an excited and skittling tail. He gazed back at me with a large soft eye set round with astounding eyelashes; then returned to his meal, his mild mouth in an innocent lather of milky froth. The stable was warm, quiet, and sweet-smelling; a store of summer in the hay. I heard the deep, contented breaths of the cows, the drop of the wooden ball and halter through the ring. And the cheerful and melodious spurt of the milk rang out in the clean pails.

We commend the book heartily, and we trust that it may have the effect of bringing into the light of day some of the many other village records which, we doubt not, are at this moment reposing in the security of MS.

A word must be said for the very charming photo-gravures with which Mrs. Tennant's book is embellished.

Russia's Road to Peking.

The "Overland" to China. By Archibald R. Colquhoun. (Harper & Brothers. 16s.)

AMONG those who know the Far East Mr. Archibald Colquhoun is pre-eminent. He has already travelled in, and written on, the Middle Kingdom, and his new volume, which appears at the psychological moment, is a proof of his intelligent anticipation of the course of events. In 1898 the collapse of China before Japan, the near completion of the Siberian Railway, and the appearance of the United States as a colonising power in the Western Pacific, convinced Mr. Colquhoun that great things were brewing in China, and that the time had arrived for him to furbish up his knowledge of the Far East. He therefore started from St. Petersburg, and traversed European Russia and Siberia by rail as far as the temporary terminus on Lake Baikal. Thence he struck south-east by tarantass and camel cart across the Great Desert of Gobi to Peking; then from Peking to Tientsin by the road which Admiral Seymour has just failed to force, and so by sea to Shanghai, up the Yang-tse to Chung-King, and thence across country via Yunnan to the French colony and the Gulf of Tongking. Having done all this he naturally wrote a book about it.

There is an immense amount of political information in Mr. Colquhoun's new work which will be eagerly studied by those who wish to obtain an intelligent understanding of the present crisis. The author, as is well known, is a skilled writer, and not a mere compiler of notes taken on a journey, and his descriptions of the long railway passage across Siberia, and of the places and peoples, are wonderfully vivid. Therefore Mr. Colquhoun's chapters on "Life in Peking—Past and Present," are of absorbing interest. His account of the approach to the capital from the Gobi Desert is worth quoting:

As we near the capital the stream of life becomes continuous. Mule-litters and sedan-chairs, though less frequent, add their touch of quaintness to the scene; and strings of solemn, silent-footed camels occasionally block the roads—each tied by a string through the nose to the tail of its foregoer. From the shaggy neck of the leader jangles a deep-toned, not unmelodious bell; and on its back a Mongol nods and sways half asleep, his purple robe and yellow sash adding a note of colour to the dingy humps he bestrides. The scene is a fascinating one for the new arrival, whether from over seas or over land: the tinkle and clang of mule and camel-bells; the cries of the drivers; the grunting sing-song of the barrow coolies; the strange blue-coated, bronze-featured throng, all working out their existence unconscious of any world beyond the radius of a few li. And yet so civilised!

And so the road continues over the broken causeway, on whose gray flagstones so many Imperial pageants have passed in a by-gone age.

Although there is neither steeple nor minaret to guide us, and the country is still open, we feel that Peking must be close at hand. Even the weary mules seem to know instinctively that their long journey is finished, and, of their own accord, quicken the pace. The excitement increases with each turn of the road, with each obscuring clump of trees; and the suspense has become so tense as to be almost unpleasant, when, quite suddenly, the huge walls stand before us. Revealed at once from base to parapet, they dwarf all else to insignificance and fill the entire landscape. In the last rays of the afternoon sun the weather-beaten masonry is suffused with rose tints, the sands glow, and the moat beyond becomes a stream of molten gold. . . . Before us, springing straight from the sand, tower the monuments of the conquering Manchū, so lofty that men are dwarfed by them to pygmies, so broad that three chariots might race abreast along their jungle-covered tops, and solid as the walls of Jericho before the trumpet blast! In that pure air the crenellated parapets stand out clear-cut, distance is practically annihilated, and the eye can follow bastion after bastion stretching away in a long line, from which, like giant sentinels, the many-storied towers, marking the nine great gates, look out across the plain. The walls themselves are of earth faced with huge bricks, and are built at an inward slope from base to parapet. In the interstices cling many a bush, and even trees, while from the gate-towers frown tier upon tier of painted representations of cannon. As our cart clatters under the echoing arch of the vast gateway the sun sets, and, in a dusty stream of camels, horsemen, and strange vehicles, we enter the Middle Ages.

In the old days, before the Franco-Russian alliance made the French Minister the obedient servant of the Russians, society in Peking seems to have been very pleasant. Then the tone was set by the British Legation, whether in diplomatic or in social matters. Every function bore a cosmopolitan character, and the geniality of good fellowship was agreeably controlled within tactful diplomatic forms. The community amounted to about one hundred, of whom fifteen were ladies, and if any stranger was in doubt as to his exact status, it was only necessary to send for the old Peking barber and see what position he was given in that functionary's rigid scale of charges. This was one dollar for cutting the hair of a plenipotentiary and envoy-extraordinary, eighty cents for a chargé d'affaires, thirty cents for an attaché, twenty cents for a student, and ten cents for a missionary, with intermediate charges for a customs commissioner, a secretary of Legation, and so forth. With the Chinese officials the diplomatists had little personal intercourse. First calls were paid to and returned by the Yamèn, and at New Year the Chinese Ministers came in a body to call. But beyond this there was no personal intercourse, as no Chinaman would risk being ill-thought of at Court by visiting a Legation on his own account. A few years ago the Chinese Minister in St. Petersburg became very intimate with Count Cassini, driving with him and lunching with him without ceremony. A year or two later the Chinaman returned to Peking as a member of the Tsung-li Yamén, and Count Cassini became Minister at Peking. But the Chinaman carefully avoided the Count, and gave no sign of remembering the old days on the Neva. When the Russo-French alliance began the old happy family circle of Ministers was broken up into cliques, and intrigues of all sorts bred bitterness and jealousy. Every annoyance, petty or otherwise, that the Russian and French Ministers could contrive to spite the British was indulged in, and no scruples of good taste or good manners withheld them. The Tsung-li Yamén were bullied and threatened, and as they looked in vain for help from England, were at last completely cowed.

The chapters on the Yang-tse Valley and South-western China are mournful reading, for they are a chronicle of lost opportunities and wasted chances. But they should be carefully studied. The book is well illustrated, and has several useful maps, but its value would be greatly increased if it had a better index. It seems hard for authors and publishers to understand that a book of this sort loses half its utility if it is not provided with a full and intelligently compiled index.

Other New Books.

HURRAH FOR THE LIFE OF A SAILOR.

BY VICE-ADMIRAL
SIR WILLIAM KENNEDY.

This is a wind and salt-water book. Expanded from a series of articles in the Boy's Own Paper, it is full of boyish spirits as well as mature experience; the title, indeed, gives the keynote to one of the most joyous books of naval reminiscences that has come in our way. The author's story begins on December 10, 1851, when the Rodney, a 90-gun sailing line-of-battle ship, was lying in Portsmouth waiting for her crew. "This operation often took six months at that time instead of as many hours as at present. The crews were picked up anyhow—longshore loafers, jail-birds, and such-like, with a sprinkling of good seamen among them—and it took the first year of their commission to knock them into shape." The rough humours of those days are laughingly sketched. Tyrannical midshipmen made the cadets kneel on their lockers and pray aloud for their persecutors' success in examinations, the signal to begin being usually a blow on the back with a hammer. We are grateful for the boatswain who said to the cabin boy: "Here, boy, we'll hexpense with your services, you disgustable young blackguard." Also for the story of the two drunken sailors at the opera at Malta: one of them was so far gone in liquor that he fell over the railing into the pit. His comrade, under the impression that it was a case of man overboard, promptly dived after him. Neither was killed; one broke his leg, the other was unharmed. The author knows some amusing cases in which tyrannical flogging officers had the tables turned on them:

A small craft was paid off at Devonport many years ago on her return from the West Coast of Africa. Nearly all the ship's company had been flogged during the commission. The captain was taking a walk up one of the streets of Devonport when an old woman came up to him and said, "Be you Captain —?"

"Yes, my good woman. What can I do for you?"

"Take that! for flogging my son," said she, at the same time whipping out a hake-fish and "letting him have it" across the face.

A certain frigate captain, a notorious bully, was thus served by his long-suffering clerk:

The captain was a small man, the clerk a big, powerful fellow; so one day he went into the captain's cabin, knocked him down, and gave him a good thrashing. The skipper yelled for help, and the sentry rushed in; but the clerk threw himself on the deck, and dragged the captain on the top of him, at the same time shouting for assistance. The only evidence was the sentry's, and he said that all he saw was the captain on the top of the clerk, apparently striking him.

The clerk, therefore, went scot free. The author was himself twice thoroughly flogged—"once for a most innocent remark: when our master's wife presented her husband with a son I asked if the babe had a stiff leg like his father."

Sir William Kennedy's reminiscences wander through the Crimean war, the war with China (1856), slave-chasing off Zanzibar, revolution in South America, and naval operations off Newfoundland, Hayti, Trinidad, Madagascar, the Andamans, &c., &c., with sport and shore adventure thrown in. A manlier, merrier book of naval reminiscences could not be desired. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d.)

SOUTH AFRICA, PAST AND PRESENT. BY V. R. MARKHAM.

The author of this book having travelled in South Africa, and having met and conversed with all sorts and conditions of men, both English and Dutch, has been moved to write a book. One advantage Miss Markham's book has over its hundred and one rivals, or, at least, over most of them, is that it is better written. It seldom lapses into slipshod on the one hand, or into would-be fine writing on the other, and those of us who are jealous for the English tongue will be relieved to be able to read a book on the great question of the day without a ceaseless feeling of irritation and annoyance. V. R. Markham is English in her sympathies, and has no fellow-feeling for the "men belonging to a class who have never benefited this country by word or deed"; and she is clear-headed enough to see that the Jameson Raid was a result, and not a cause, of the misrule and corruption in the Transvaal. But she is rather too much inclined to float with the tide, and to make a scapegoat of Mr. Rhodes. But it is difficult to be judicial, and easy to gain a reputation for impartiality, when dealing with matters which have aroused so much controversy, and have led to such mighty issues. The book is divided into three parts: first, a sketch of South African history; secondly, a study of native affairs; and, thirdly, notes from a travelling diary. There is a useful historical chart, and an index just full enough to make one wish it were more comprehensive. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

TWENTY FAMOUS NAVAL BATTLES. BY E. K. RAWSON.

Half a century ago Sir Edward Creasy wrote Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World, a book which keeps its value to this day. That which Sir Edward Creasy did for battles on land (saving the Armada) we have long waited for a chronicler to do for battles on the sea. There are plenty of sea-fights which have influenced the course of history, and which are even more inspiring than land wars, but so far the vates sacer has not arisen to sing them. Mr. Edward Kirk Rawson, "Professor United States Navy, Superintendent Naval War Records," has had his chance and missed it. He has compiled two fine volumes on twenty famous naval battles, from Salamis to Santiago; but with all the world of history before him he has not known how to select with discrimination. In a work like this some connecting idea should run through the whole, and link the great combats one to another, but Mr. Rawson's battles are all detached and isolated. However, he could hardly connect them historically, for some of them are the veriest small beer. Salamis and Actium are well enough; vast issues hung on Lepanto; the Revenge made a struggle that will never die; and the Armada, the Nile, and Trafalgar take their place as of right in any volume of this sort. But what is absolutely astonishing is Mr. Rawson's lack of any sense of proportion. What place has a duel with the pirate Paul Jones in such company, or the various American fights, such as that on Lake Erie in 1813, and those between the Monitor and the Merrimac and the Alabama and the Kearsage later on? Even the engagements in Manila Bay and at Santiago are of little value, as the opposing forces were so unequal, and the affairs were not so much battles as battues. (Isbister. 2 vols. 21s. net.)

THE REIGN OF TERROR. BY Mlle. DES ECHEROLLES.

Nothing so brings home to one the sordid horrors of the French Revolution as personal narratives by the ladies of good family who underwent all the miseries of the time and yet survived to write their memoirs. These sidelights on the Reign of Terror were written long ago by Mlle. des Echerolles, but have only just been Englished—and, it may be noted, have been most excellently translated—by Miss Marie Clotilde Balfour. Mlle. des Echerolles was the daughter of an officer of the King, and, when only thirteen years old, in 1791, fled with her father and aunt to Lyons, where they hoped to lose themselves in the huge population of the city. But M. des Echerolles was asked to command the Lyonnais who rose against the revolutionaries, and, as a consequence, after the defeat of the loyalists, was hunted from place to place by the Government. Happily, he escaped their clutches; but his sister was not so fortunate, for she was guillotined, and Mlle. des Echerolles was left alone in a great city, without money and far from her home. She describes most strikingly the way in which they lived, the domiciliary visits, the interrogations and the requisitions of all kinds, and the life in the prison, where the women were herded together denuded of everything, even of necessities. The little girl managed to get an interview with Citizen Parcine to beg for her aunt's life:

He only answered me by a conventional phrase: "As a private man I pity you; as a public man I can do nothing." And then he turned his back on me without the least sign of compassion. Yet this man to whom I prayed, this man who had sat at my father's table, this man whom I had approached without fear—this man it was who had had my aunt arrested, who had replied, "Let her perish!" to those who had said to him, "We find nothing against her, and she is your fellow-citizen."

The book is simply written, and has a personal touch which gives it life, though a hundred years and more have elapsed since the events it records took place. (John Lane.)

Fiction.

Talent Undisciplined.

Voices in the Night. By Flora Annie Steel. (Heinemann. 6s.)

The Minx. By "Iota." (Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

WE have conscientiously read through both these books. Such a phrase, used in connexion with a work of imagination, implies disparagement; nay, so far as concerns the utterer, it is a final and unanswerable reproach. Nevertheless, we use it, both in sorrow and in anger—sorrow at the thought of what these books might have been, anger at the spectacle of what they are. Here are two authors of quite surprising and exceptional gifts. Differing in their themes, they have many points in common. Each possesses insight, imaginative power, sympathy, and a fine individuality. Each is thoroughly aware of her world. Mrs. Mannington Caffyn among English society, and Mrs. Steel in the wider and prodigious field of India—they are at home; they know; they have summed up human nature in their ways, and what they may care to say about life is worth hearing. We hold a very high opinion of Mrs. Caffyn's talent. As for Mrs. Steel upon India, Mr. Rudyard Kipling might go to school to her and begin in the first form. When we consider the three chief characters in The Minx, Joyce and her two lovers; when we consider the vast crowd of strongly-conceived people in Voices in the Night, and especially that astonishing and daring creation, Chris Davenant; when we remember isolated scenes in both books, such as the talk between Elinor and Joyce over the burnt child, and the immense drama of the railway bridge at the end of Mrs. Steel's novel—we feel that these authors should surely belong to the elect of authors. . . . And yet it was only by the aid of conscience that we conquered their books. The plain fact is, that Mrs. Steel and Mrs. Caffyn would be distinguished writers, no less—if they could write. They cannot write. The complaint has been made before, but we must make it again, and continue to make it, more and more energetically: these authors have never taken the trouble to learn one essential part of their business. That is the simple English of the affair, and we offer no apology for stating it.

It is not the mere occasional bad grammar and verbal vulgarity that offend us, though there is sufficient offence in locutions like "loaned," "fussing about," "boss the show," and sentences like the following:

She realised swiftly that with purpose, opinion, and principles to uphold, therein lies tragedy.

It would no more have occurred to James Coates to pass Mrs. Therpe's door without going in to see her, than it would have done to pass Elinor Moore's.

Great writers have sinned as deep. A much graver offence lies in the complete absence of any feeling for style, for even the outward dignity of sentences; in that constant ignoring of literary good form which by its persistence irritates far more than any outrageous solecism. One can recall public dinners at which it would have been a relief to cry out to one's neighbour: "For Heaven's sake, eat your peas with a knife and have done." There are those who sneer at the nicety of good form in writing. With cheerful contempt they ejaculate: "What does it matter?" But it does matter. It does count. Without acquiring it, no author ever did or ever will reach the high levels.

And even more important than literary good form is the broad general technique of story writing, which neither Mrs. Steel nor Mrs. Caffyn seems in the least to trouble about. A vast trackless, tangled jungle of words—that is The Minx and that is Voices in the Night. A series of tremendous shapeless slabs of minute observation, each labelled and each crushing the life out of some tiny fragment of actual tale—that also is The Minx and Voices in the Night. One finds no selective austerity, no effort after contours and symmetry, no dramatic directness of movement. All is confused, enormous, forbidding. The reader must constitute himself an explorer or an excavator; he must be prepared for deserts, glaciers, strata of solid, useless rock.

If Mrs. Steel and Mrs. Caffyn, with all their brilliant attributes, would only be at the inconvenience of learning— But they will not. What is, must be. And as we are confronted by novel after novel of these esteemed writers, who can do everything but write, we feel ourselves assuming a sort of Oriental resignation before the inexplicabilities of existence.

The Second Lady Delcombe. By the Hon. Mrs. Kennard.
(Hutchinson.)

IN this excellent first novel Mrs. Kennard has used the Divorce Court as a background. The divorce of the first Lady Delcombe is ten years old when the story opens, and it is understood at once that the plot has no connexion with the sordid, common details which lead up to the State-aided liberation of unhappy couples. The incidents of divorce and the re-marriage of divorced persons are such ordinary affairs in the society with which the book is concerned that they are, as it were, taken for granted. The author does indeed introduce a clergyman who holds the opinion that he ought to conform to the law of his Church and not recognise Lord Delcombe's second venture in holy matrimony; but, on the other hand, the first Lady Delcombe is a member of an ancient Roman Catholic family, and seems to find no inconvenience attached to her marriage with Mr. Ratelyffe.

One of the unalterable laws of fiction is that neither shot nor shell, earthquakes nor volcanic eruptions, can seriously injure a hero or heroine; while certain other clearly-defined characters succumb to the slightest accident. To this latter class belongs, as we all know, the boy: the more charming the boy the more certain his doom. It was, then, no surprise when Tony, Lord Delcombe's only son, was laid upon his deathbed. We knew that deathbed was inevitable from the moment Tony met his father at Eton; but, for all that we bowed to an inexorable fate, we rebelled. Tony is so natural, so refreshing, that we grudged the parting. But the reader's sorrow is, of course, Mrs. Kennard's opportunity. The two Lady Delcombes met at Tony's side, and the result—is a triumph for the author. She treats the situation with such simplicity, such quiet reserve, that it is only before the meeting—and after—that we realise that an "impossible" moment has been faced and passed.

In many ways, The Second Lady Delcombe is unconventional. We are allowed to make the acquaintance of the heroine, an American girl, quietly. Her character is not ushered in with a blare of trumpets, and we are left to learn her innocence, her generosity, her charm through her words and actions. The book also contains some clever character-studies of women.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE AVENGING OF RUTHANNA.

By MRS. COULSON KERNAHAN.

Infidelity in marriage is the theme of this story by the author of Trewinnot of Guy's, and though the story is handled discreetly the upshot is of an advanced order. A curious feature in the book is a full-page facsimile of the Death Certificate of one of the characters, the cause of death being given as: Primary, Poisoning by Prussic Acid; Secondary, Syncope. This observation catches our eye: "It is one of life's ironies that the wrong things always get overheard, and the right ones rarely." (John Long. 6s.)

THE MARRIED MISS BINKS. By JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

This is a sequel to The Binks Family, in which was set forth the rise in the world of an enterprising milkman, with all the mistakes and adventures rising out of his social ascent. Here we study the later fortunes of the family, with special reference to Polly Knipp, née Binks, who thus instructs a younger sister on her forthcoming wedding: "I wouldn't be married down here, if I were you, unless you could rake up a bishop to perform the ceremony. Oh, that's easy enough to manage if you would like it! I'll get Lord Robert to arrange it for you. . . . It's all as simple as daylight when you know the ropes." (F. V. White & Co. 3s. 6d.)

THE LADYSMITH TREASURY. ED. BY J. EVELEIGH NASH.

We have already explained the genesis and aims of this collection of stories by well-known writers. The profits on the sale of the book will be sent to the Mayor of Ladysmith, and will be devoted to relieving distress in that town. All the stories, save three, are printed for the first time. The place of honour is filled by Mr. Anstey's "The Game of Adverbs," which appeared in Punch. (Sands. 6s.)

BY THE AUTHOR OF
MERCILESS LOVE. "FOR A GOD DISHONoured."

A readable and original story turning on vivisection. The heroine renounces her lover and her life's happiness in order to prevent £40,000 going to the founding of a Pasteur Institute—the predicament being created for her by the will of a former lover who jealously wished, on his deathbed, to prevent her marrying, and used his knowledge of her character to that end. (John Long. 6s.)

A MILLIONAIRE OF YESTERDAY.

By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

The hero, Scarlett Trent, is a millionaire with a past. He describes life in the City thus: "It's an ugly fascination. You are in the swim, and you must hold your own. You gamble with other men, and when you win you chuckle. All the time you're whittling your conscience away—if you ever had any. You're never quite dishonest, and you're never quite honest. You come out on top, and afterwards you hate yourself. It's a dirty little life." (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE CRIMSON WEED.

By CHRISTOPHER ST. JOHN.

It is not easy to indicate the plot of this novel, the hero of which is a kind of modern Hamlet consumed with the desire to avenge a great wrong done to his mother and to himself. The motto of the story is Bacon's: "Revenge is a kind of wild justice which the more man's nature runs to the more ought law to weed it out." The style is good, and the story is full of intellectuality. (Duckworth. 6s.)

A DIPLOMATIC WOMAN.

By HUAN MEE.

Six readable short stories of diplomatic melodrama. The first tells how a clever woman detected the wife of a Russian ambassador in the act of communicating a secret cypher, which is written in the paper of a cigarette. (Sands.)

NATIVE BORN.

By WILLIAM SYLVESTER WALKER.

Mr. Walker, who loves also to call himself "Coo-ee," made something of a hit with his story, When the Mopoke Calls. Here, as there, he revels in Australian bush lore, "station" work, pioneering, and the open-air life of the Colonies. This story is all movement and variety; there is the less reason, therefore, for its passages of rather obvious philosophy eked out with italics that sometimes come so frequently as to suggest a mosquito attack on the reader. (John Long. 6s.)

THE VANISHING OF TERA.

By FERGUS HUME.

"Suddenly a warm clasp was laid upon her wrist, and Tera awoke from her ecstasy to find a fair Saxon face close to her own. With a quiet little sigh of pleasure she nestled into the breast of the man. 'Jack,' she murmured softly, 'O'ia fe gwa te ofal.'" You see Tera was a Kanaka girl, and a convert, who had been brought to England and was the shining light of the Grimleigh Bethosda, and pious, and beautiful, and possessed of £3,000 worth of pearls, not to mention monarchical prospects on a Pacific island. (White & Co. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Writer's Trade.

THE late Mr. Grant Allen was a hard-working writer, if he was nothing else. Mr. Clodd gives a list of seventy-two books to which he put his name or pseudonym. He wrote seventy-two books, and in a sense regretted them all. He believed that science was his calling, and now and then he wreaked that belief on a book to which, as he must have deeply felt, he had given only the leavings of energies devoted to the less ambitious work of writing stories and essays for the market. Whatever his aspirations and whatever his accomplishments in science, the fact remains that in the catalogue Grant Allen passes as a writer. It is a common thing for writers to ply their trade under protest, to nurse big regrets and vain desires. For a writer is a thinker, and whatever overplus of thought and energy are left when he has supplied the market is sure to be adventurous. In Grant Allen this overplus was a large and turbulent quantity, and it insisted on expression. Hence, at almost periodic intervals, he wrote special books to carry it off, books into which he believed he had put his best. In his last illness he said: "I want no memorial over my remains; tell those who care for anything that I may have done to buy a copy of Force and Energy." It was a human message; but the world pays its own tributes to a man, and it is possible to care for what Grant Allen did, and not buy this all but forgotten book. Hazlitt said that the only one of his works he cared anything about was his work on The Principles of Human Actions. It is almost the only writing of his which the world has agreed to neglect. To us it seems that Grant Allen's true work was the work that rejoiced him least—the work of the efficient, though ephemeral, writer. Are we therefore to dismiss his achievement as a common thing? It is on this point that we wish to say a word. The man who writes to live is not to be trusted to comment on his own performance, which he too often sees as a tissue of compromises. Full of compromises it must be, but these are often of a noble sort. A man is to be judged by the conditions under which he works; it is only when these are found and defined that Justice takes her seat. To Allen came the familiar struggles, cross-purposes, and regrets. When his first novel, Philistia, disappointed his expectations, he wrote:

I have put into it my very best, and it's quite clear that the best isn't good enough. I didn't write hastily, I satisfied utterly my critical faculty, and I can't do any better. Indeed, I can never again do so well. Now, this hasn't at all cast me down or disappointed me. I haven't so much ambition for myself as you are kind enough to have for me. I never cared for the chance of literary reputation except as a means of making a livelihood for Nellie and the boy. I can now make a livelihood easily; and I ought to turn to whatever will make it best. . . . I am trying with each new novel to go a step lower to catch the market.

Mr. Clodd is right when he says that such expressions of a black mood must be taken with qualification. They are incidental and inevitable. Much sentiment has been expended on the worn bread-winning writer. It is time to define the work, the goal, and the legitimate consolations of those who engage in the writing trade—that trade which has, in late years, increased at such a rate that its religion seems to be still to seek. We have mentioned Hazlitt—how soon in any discussion of the writer's craft one thinks of Hazlitt! To him, with all his steely good sense, came the black cui bono mood of the Little Writer. He had seen an Indian juggler keep four balls in the air, and Mr. Richer walking the tight-rope at Sadler's Wells. These sights threw him into regrets.

What have I been doing all my life? Have I been idle, or have I nothing to show for all my labour and pains? Or have I passed my time in pouring words like water into empty sieves, rolling a stone up hill and then down again, trying to prove an argument in the teeth of facts, and looking for causes in the dark and finding them? Is there no one thing in which I can challenge competition, that I can bring as an instance of exact perfection, in which others cannot find a flaw? The utmost I can pretend to is to write a description of what this fellow [the Indian Juggler] can do. I can write a book: so can many others who have not learned even to spell. What abortions are these E-says! What errors, what ill-pieced transitions, what crooked reasons, what lame conclusions! How little is made out, and that little how ill! Yet they are the best I can do.

A most useful confession to quote! It comes from one of the greatest of the Little Writers. It sounds, with silvery clearness and coldness, that tragic note in a writer's life—his sense of the vagueness, the dubiety, the sorry incalculableness of all his service to men. How many times have we heard a clever writer exclaim in weariness that he wished he were a shoemaker producing shoes in which men might stand upright and walk about their business. "As proper men as ever trod on neat's leather have gone upon my handiwork," says the cobbler in "Julius Caesar." What a boast was that, uttered in a Roman mob, and in a dangerous moment. It was irrelevant to the occasion; say rather it was relevant to all occasions—this producible smiling fact, this assertion of the man's helpfulness in a capacity which no upheaval could impair, no logic confound. Tribunes, rebels, merchants, assassins, all must be shod. Alas, it is in the same play that the feebleness of authors is incarnated. The wretched Cinna who was not Cinna the poet, and screamingly protested as much, was borne down. "Tear him in pieces for his bad verses!"

Now, such arguments and instances beset every writer, as they did Hazlitt, but we contend that they are moody and delusive. We will say nothing about the transitoriness of all juggling and rope-dancing fame. The point is this—and to no one is it clearer than to the Hazlitts when they choose to be themselves: it is in the nature of shoe-making and rope-dancing to produce visible and computable results, whereas it is not in the nature of writing to do so. This is one of those things which the mind can accept, but not the heart. The writer may grasp it whenever he will, but the man rejects it in every open or human mood. The comfort it brings can be seized only by a process of thought, by ratiocination, by instances, or by a constructive hope. But to hope when you want to see, to ratiocinate when you want to know—this is hard. One may discharge the work of an hour, a day, on such a basis, but a lifetime, with all its temperamental sinkings, its backwaters and obstacles, is not so easily sustained on these difficult renewals of self-satisfaction. The work of the writer (again we exclude the immortals, who, however, rarely know their luck) is perhaps the most inconclusive of all work. There is no clear task to be finished. A writer may choose his mark and hit it; and, when he has done so, the wise declare that the mark was ill-chosen, was, in fact, not worth hitting. But, indeed, we are rather considering the case of the writer who, confessedly, has not even chosen a mark, but is a writer at large, a public excogitator, and a wandering voice. What of him when the window "slowly grows a glimmering square"? What of his pains—for he took pains—and of his achievement—for surely he had a gatherable achievement? Grant Allen may not have been—he was not—the precisest type of such a writer, and yet his death at the age of fifty-two fills us with these melancholy questions.

We shall not call the answers to them melancholy. Away with these cui bono reflections that strike at life. The age which has multiplied the literary journalist beyond all precedent must have evolved, with the man, a gospel. Undoubtedly this is an age of ephemeral writers. It may be that, two hundred years hence, not a single writer now living will be accounted a classic save only Mr. Meredith. The rest of us are doomed; some of us will be forgotten as writers before we perish as men; others will attain to obituaries, others to a decade of memories; a few will be quoted until 1950 ("a clever writer of forty years ago remarked"), and a little band will be known and quoted by name all the way to the year 2000. But in intention, in ambition, and in fact, we all are travelling the one highway of letters as surely as he who walks to Finchley is on the same Great North Road with him who toils to York. From this community of purpose spring the pride and discouragement of the Little Writer. He toils as hard as any; he has wit, fancy, penetration, and has the meanings and music of words in his mind; there is no pains that he spares himself to seize the truths in his path and to adorn them; he re-writes his writings and launches them in books on the same waters that bore Milton and Dryden and Hazlitt to their desired havens; but his voyage ends at the harbour bar; he is not washed down to the happy valley of Avilion.

We have scores of such writers to-day. They call themselves hacks in dark moods; but they are not hacks, and know it. The root of the matter is in them, but soil, climate, opportunity, and their original force prevent them rising to the height of a great tree in which the birds may build. They declare with Hazlitt, "These Essays are the best I can do"; they are tempted to explain themselves like Allen: "I never cared for the chance of literary reputation except as a means of making a livelihood for Nellie and the boy." But in these moods the saving fact is lost—the fact that they are on the true old highway of letters. It is more important to be really on that highway than to reach any point in its length. How much greater is the difference between the seeking of that road and the having found it, than between a near or a distant goal along its august track. May not the Little Writer, reasoning for himself, and groping for a hopeful theory of his writing, begin, once for all, to separate the ideas of success and a continuing name? Has time really so much to do with the matter? For in literature three years are a "boom," and thirty are fame, and three hundred are immortality, and three thousand are Homer, and then the counting is done. Is it then such a little thing to have struck a bliss upon a day; to have spread little feasts of reason on successive Mondays or Wednesdays in an appointed column; to have tried, sometimes with known success, to illuminate a subject on which the talk is running; to have defined a tendency; to have lanced an error; or in any way to have stimulated the minds of tired men whose lives will cease with your own? Surely this is no shadowy harvest that a Little Writer may reap before he meets the Reaper. If its quantity be a vague thing, let him think in what a wide field he sowed, in what good company, with what large ecstasies, with what hints of acceptance, and with what germinations not yet revealed. He will rejoice, too, in his unpaid toil, his insane solitudes of thought and phrase, his corrections pencilled against stone walls, in the rain, while Fleet-street roared for his "copy." How sweet those pains which he need not have taken!

Things Seen.

Panic.

I HAD been vaguely conscious that the train was waiting longer than usual at the station, but the book I read was interesting, and I let the moments slip by. Suddenly the stranger laid down his paper. "Why are we waiting?" he asked. I leaned out of the carriage window. The fireman was standing by the side of the engine. The doors were opening. Anxious passengers were asking questions of the guard, who, his hand shading his eyes, was staring backwards along the line. "It's nothing," I muttered; nevertheless I alighted, and as I stepped on to the gravel a score of passengers were doing likewise. They asked each other the same question—"What's the matter? Why are we waiting?" A man, carrying a fishing-rod, jumped from the train and climbed over the paling into the roadway. "What's the matter?" I said to him. "Oh, it's best to be on the safe side," he answered. "What's the matter, guard?" I asked. "We're late, and I guess we've got to let the express go by!" He spoke in a loud voice, and, at his words, a panic of fear seemed to seize the people. They tumbled from the carriages. Parcels, packages, baskets were thrown upon the platform. "Get back, get back," shouted the guard; but nobody obeyed him. I looked back along the track. We were on a side line of rails. Behind us gleamed the main line, the bright metals curving away from us. Suddenly there was a roar and a rattle. It was the express. Somebody screamed. A child clutched my arm, and, at the same moment, the express curled away like a snake, and rushed past on its own bright metals.

We resumed our seats. My companion fanned himself with his hat. "It's all owing to Slough," he said. "Phew! But suppose—suppose—the points hadn't acted." As we steamed from the station we passed the fisherman plodding along the road.

"L'Empereur."

THE eye-filling fact in Cherbourg is that the town is the great northern military and naval port of France. The wide sweep of the harbour, dotted with ships of war and set with forts at intervals on its long circumference; the greater fortress, high above the roofs, staring watchfully over the sea; the lines of barracks; the troops in companies, the officers in groups, scattered everywhere throughout the streets; these, and these alone, make the character of the town.

I had set out after breakfast to stroll through the narrow streets, and to see what the place had to offer me; I had watched the men at their work, the recruits at their drill, when, returning to my hotel and pondering upon all I had seen, I found myself in the Place Napoléon, the statue of the great Emperor before me. Mounted on his charger, with arm outstretched over the harbour, his eyes fixed on the distance that alone hid England from his gaze, there sat Napoleon; and plain beneath the figure was the inscription which told of his resolve, his promise to the people of France, that "the glories of the East" should be outshone by the wonders of the future!

My mind, following the gesture of the outstretched arm, went back over the water to my country beyond, I thought of Acre and of Alexandria, of Salamanca and of Vittoria, of Trafalgar and of Waterloo; I thought of Egypt and of the Soudan, of Dreyfus and of Fashoda; I remembered tales of the madness that at times will rush upon a nation, tales of dishonour at home gilded over with glory abroad. An empty glorification of the past, I asked myself, or a standing, pregnant menace of the future? What was the significance of this thing, standing there in Cherbourg before the eyes of all, at the close of the nineteenth century?

The Art of Writing for Children.

It was a child who said of a neglected heap of latter-day nursery-books—which to the grown-up mind looked attractive enough to please any child's fancy—"They are very nice, only I don't want to read them. Everything is all right, except the story." And then, struck with a sudden inspiration, added: "Couldn't you make up a proper story about the pictures?"

Child-like, she had gone straight to the point, and had put her finger on the spot of failure when she said "Everything is all right but the story." It is the story that fails. It has lost the art of holding the children's attention, because it is, for the most part, above their heads. The truth is, that the author of to-day, however clever he may be, and however good his intention of amusing the youngsters, will never gain their affections until he has lost the trick he has fallen into of keeping his eye on the grown-up audience while he is telling the children stories. They must have his whole attention or he will lose theirs. If he would succeed in his task he must give himself up unreservedly to his legitimate audience, and enter into their world and their moods. By doing so he will find that his task becomes far easier of accomplishment. He will not be handicapped by all those many things which prevented him letting his imagination have full play while his eyes rested upon the critical grown-up audience.

Think what Alice in Wonderland and Alice Through the Looking-Glass would have lost had their author kept his eye upon the grown-up audience, instead of giving himself to a world peopled by little folk, who saw nothing strange in rabbits talking, mock-turtles weeping, and pigs turning into babies, and who accepted strange creatures like the Jabberwock as calmly as they did the imperiousness of a Queen who ordered massacres with Royal indifference as to whether they were carried out or not. It was an ideal audience and one to inspire an author. For, even if the children saw nothing of the whimsical adherence to the forms of logic in the stories of Alice's Adventures, they nevertheless revelled in the quaint mixture of sense and nonsense which so exactly hit their childish level and caught their fancy, holding them entranced with its dreamlike unity. The stories possess very much the same attraction that the old fairy stories have always had for children. For all their topsyturvydom they are simple, and deal with life as they themselves view it.

And simplicity has always attracted children. It was no gorgeous description that attracted them to the household tales of the Brothers Grimm, and afterwards to Andersen's legends. It is the simplicity of the tales that charms them, they feel that they are the real thing and they instinctively know that there is nothing stagey or affected about them. They are intelligible and easy of comprehension by the child-mind. The stories enter on no wild flights of romance, but run easily and smoothly among everyday paths of life, so that it requires no great imagination to follow them. They are the tales of the common folk, handed down from a period long before the dawn of history, easily understood by man and child alike. Moreover, they are not extravagant or out of proportion, and this is a point that children appreciate, for they have a larger sense of proportion than "children's writers" suppose.

Most children infinitely prefer Grimm's stories of the Geese Maidens and the shepherd lads set in their native surroundings to all the glories of gilded palaces and the Eastern gorgeousness of the Arabian Nights: in very much the same way that we prefer the Mab and Puck of Shakespeare in their woodland homes to Herrick's fairies, for all the glories of Oberon's palace, or his Temple "enchased with glass and beads."

For children lack imagination pure and simple. They can elaborate anything they have seen or heard minutely described until it is well-nigh unrecognisable, but the power of creation or grasping anything to which they possess no former clue is a slight to which they do not easily rise. The wonderment of the new idea stupefies them. They prefer to play their stories among the scenes with which they are familiar, to groping in their half-furnished minds after those strange mis-shapen ideas, high and fantastical with which the grown mind amuses itself.

If a topic or conception be in essence above a child's range, no amount of simplicity in the treatment will make it interesting to him. Children also like plenty of action in their stories. They are such restless beings, they must ever be up and doing; they love to hear of fighting dragons, rescuing princesses, and—with the exception of high-strung nervous children—they revel in "bluggy stories," as did the little hero in Helen's Babies. Stories of giants who would make their meals off the favourite hero (who, in spite of his undoubted superiority of wit and wisdom, his manly beauty, and his somewhat ostentatious virtues, is invariably despised by his family, and sent to seek his fortune as best he can), have always and will always attract the infant mind; while of Biblical stories nothing appeals as strongly to the juvenile taste and imagination as the story of David and Goliath, except, perhaps, the slaying of Abel by his brother Cain. How many times these scenes have been acted in nursery theatricals will never be known.

Perhaps one of the strongest tests of popularity that can be applied to a story-book is whether it is considered sufficiently interesting to be acted in the nursery. "A good acting book is worth all the others put together," was the verdict of a schoolroom critic who had views upon the subject of juvenile fiction. Certainly, this love of mimicry in children should not be overlooked by the stormers of the nursery library. And here, again, the grown-up audience will have to be entirely put aside, and the author be prepared to give explicit details as to how everything is done.

Half the popularity of Robinson Crusoe is due to the fact that there is so much doing in the book, and such minute details are given as to how everything was accomplished. Had the author kept his eye on the grown-up audience while he wrote, he might, and very probably would, have left out the greater part of the book—the very part that makes it intelligible to children—leaving it to the imagination of his readers. But, fortunately, he realised that the child's experience was too incomplete to supply the information, and that it was beyond the scope of childhood to imagine all the resources open to Crusoe. It is this art of getting in touch with children that writers of to-day lack. The adults will keep coming between the story-teller and his audience and spoiling the tale for both.

Let him who would write for Youth go to the old authors, and try and discover their secret of holding the child's fancy. Else, for all the attention of the best authors of to-day, the art of simple story-telling, which is the attraction of men and children alike, will soon be lost.

THERE are men and women who regard the weaving of stories calculated to influence the impressionable mind of a child as a branch of the literary calling as honourable as that of the sensational novelist or newspaper hack. To write successfully for the young is an art requiring special gifts and methods; an art which, though at present ignored, will in time receive due recognition and reward.

"A Writer for Boys" in "The Author" (July).

Correspondence.

Ernest Dowson.

SIR,—Mr. Harold Lush's letter decides me never again to indulge in unlabelled pleasantry—lest it fall into the hands of a professional humorist and be misconstrued.—I am, &c.,
YOUR CORRESPONDENT.

“Two Stage Plays.”

SIR,—Will you allow me a few lines to correct a statement which appeared in the ACADEMY of June 30, over the signature “The Bookworm”?

Two Stage Plays, by Lucy Snowe, will not have the advantage of being published by Mr. Heinemann, but is the first volume which will be issued, in a few days, with my imprint.—I am, &c.,

R. BINGLEY JOHNSON.

8, York-buildings, Adelphi, W.C.: July 2, 1900.

A Disclaimer.

SIR,—IN the ACADEMY of June 23 there is, on page 537, the following statement:

The author of A Peep into “Punch,” by the way, is Mr. J. Holt Schooling, the ingenious statistician, who, month after month, instructs the readers of the popular magazines in such curious and valuable matters as the distance which would be covered by all the cigarettes smoked by Mr. Labouchere in a year, were they placed together in a line.

I think that your reviewer must have confused my work with the many imitations of my work, when he classed my writings with the utterly silly articles to which he alludes. I have never written articles of that sort. My method, in my statistical articles, being to select a subject of interest and importance, and to show clearly the incidence of the facts connected with my subject. But for one article by me I suppose there are published ten or twelve articles by my imitators, and the most of these fully deserve the contemptuous words of your reviewer.

I see that during 1899-1900 I have published only four articles of a statistical nature, and all of them were on important subjects; also, my writings prior to 1899 have all been quite free from the senseless statistical stupidities to which your reviewer alludes. I am, in fact, no more connected with these foolish articles than Mr. Phil May is connected with the numerous bad imitations of his black-and-white work, to which is purposely given a superficial likeness to drawings by Mr. Phil May.

Permit me, Sir, to repudiate wholly the paternity of the foolish things with which your reviewer has credited me, all of which owe their existence to the not too scrupulous activity of my imitators.—I am, &c.,

J. HOLT SCHOOLING.

Twickenham: June 28, 1900.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 41 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best reply to the following letter received by us:

“DEAR SIR,—I am most anxious, as one having literary aspirations, to cultivate style. Would you favour me with a few hints, or tell me where I could get the hints?—Yours truly, —”

The answers in this competition have been both numerous and excellent. Although we purposely fixed no limit as to length, we think that many of the reply-letters are weakened by being overlong. We award the prize to Mr. A. C. Armstrong, 25, Edgar street, Hampstead-road, N.W., for the following:

DEAR SIR,—Without having the least wish to infer that you are deficient in general intelligence, will you allow me to point out, with all due respect, that your letter certainly exhibits a present lack of that literary intelligence—I had almost said intuition—which is, or should be, the chief possession of every writer. Had you this special intelligence—it may come to you with years, or it may be latent and require development—I am certain you had not asked me such a question. As it is, I can offer you no advice without appearing somewhat rude; but I sincerely assure you that it is offered in all kindness and respect. It is the old, old Biblical tag: “Get wisdom, get understanding”—advice I would also offer to a great many fairly well-known authors who are not so honest as you are about their shortcomings.

Style, per se, does not exist: it is but synonymous with literary intellect, brain, thought. You cannot be a good stylist if you have no brains: silk and broadcloth will never sit well upon a skeleton. You are like a builder who wants to know all about the upper parts of a house before he has mastered the principles of foundation. Get something great to write about, and you may be sure that your method of putting it into words will also be great. Your very ability to conceive an interesting subject will ensure your telling it in an interesting manner. And the ability to conceive requires great development, whether the germ be latent or acquired. What is called style is but the expression of intellect; individual style is the outcome of a strong mental individuality.

In conclusion, I can do no better than to quote for your benefit a few words by Robert Buchanan, from an old article I have been re-reading only this last week. You will find that they endorse every word I say. He writes: “I know of no instance in literature where consummate mastery of verbal expression is associated with deficient intellectual power. Even Keats, the least meditative and most passionate of all the poets, and the nearest in power of verbal magic to Shakespeare, was intellectually prescient to the inmost fibres of his poetical being—pure absolute thinking and conceiving power being at the very root of his unexampled sensuous instinct, and leading him to those miracles of phrasing in which, I conceive, he has no modern rival.”

I may add that I shall keep an eye open for your development; for, like that of the gentleman who asked “What is truth?” your honest innocence is distinctly interesting—and refreshing.

Other replies are as follows:

DEAR SIR,—This is not, alas, a matter for “hints.” The truth must be spoken brutally, or at least “brutelement.” Have you anything to say or to write that the world in the least desires to hear, or would be the better for hearing? If so, you will find yourself able to say it without any manufactured style. It may be that we ought to help lame dogs over stiles, but we want to know if they and their surroundings will be better off on the other side. To get rid of an impediment is not enough. Words, phrases, happy turns of language may be the clothes of thought, and sometimes they are garments becoming and ornamental; but to be this they must clothe something worth clothing. No sane man selects fine clothes for a scarecrow. “Poeta nascitur, non fit”: it is not so with style. That subtle thing grows as you grow, develops as you, I would fain hope, may develop. Your present style resembles your handwriting, which is—pardon me—somewhat immature. Read your Bible, my dear young friend. Read Bunyan—his is a better Pilgrim's Progress for you than that of Mark Twain. Read Ruskin, Stevenson. Macaulay—they will all give you something that you have not got already if you read them for the vital matter that is in them; but, for pity's sake, don't read anything, anyone, “to improve your style.” You will only become a prig by so doing; you will gain many a trick, you will increase your self-consciousness, but very little else that is worth getting.

You ask me how you may secure a very elaborately decorated Corinthian capitol: begin at the base and build up. But “Non curis homini contingit adire Corinthum,” and very likely you may exchange this style for the simpler Doric.—Yours, &c.,

T. C., Buxted.

DEAR SIR,—Simple, careful, and consecutive thought, combined with a daily study of Shakespeare's Works, the Bible, and Charles Lamb's Essays, should enable any man to attain style, approximately good according to his innate ability. Good style, like human growth, must come naturally.—Yours, &c., W. S., Weymouth.

DEAR SIR,—Make sure you possess literary “powers,” not only “aspirations,” then you may safely trust to developing a natural and easy style without cultivating an article sure to have a false ring in it, easily detected, not only by the critic, but by the ordinary reader.—Yours, &c.,

DEAR SIR,—“Style is the vehicle of the spirit,” says Sydney Smith. To acquire it you must converse with the old sages and philosophers. Weigh well their counsels. Read much, but choose the good for your mind as you would for your body, taking everything of the best. Read slowly, that you may digest it the more conveniently. To write aptly is a question of practice. The wisest reader makes the best author. Therefore study the style and manner of all those who by their works have kept the past alive, whose books are our friends and companions, and whose writings keep fresh scenes which, but for them, would be blank. Do not be disheartened by failures, but give of your best, and lay it humbly at the shrine of the great goddess Literature, remembering that Authors are judged by strange, capricious rules,

The great ones are thought mad: the small ones fools.

—Yours, &c.,

G. E. P., London.

DEAR SIR,—Read the best that has been written both in prose and poetry, which will show you how others have mastered the difficult art of expression. When you have felt something of the value of words, conveniently forget each individual style you have studied, and, taking pen in hand, commence to forge your own. Let it be the unforced, natural expression of the literary individuality within you disciplined by culture. Dress your thoughts as you would have them dressed, careful only that they are intelligible and defy no canons of good English. Imitate no author, however great his name or wide his influence. A good style is simply self-possessed personality that by nature has chosen, and by cultivation has perfectly adapted itself to, the use of the literary medium.—Yours, &c.,

H. J., London.

DEAR SIR,—Like yourself, I was at one time very anxious to solve the mysteries of style; I ended by acknowledging the absolute truth of M. de Buffon's axiom: "Le style c'est de l'homme." If you cannot find style in your own brain and temperament, be sure you will find it nowhere else. R. L. Stevenson tells us he acquired style by playing "the sedulous ape" to the well-known writers who had been before him; but I doubt if he owed as much to them as he did to himself.—Yours, &c.,

E. L. C., Redhill.

DEAR SIR,—You ask for advice on the cultivation of a literary style. "People think that I can teach them style. What stuff it all is! Have something to say, and say it as clearly as you can. That is the only secret of style." So said Matthew Arnold, and you can have no better master. Style is, of course, innate. You may, however, bring yourself under the influence of the genius that has inspired the greatest masters of English prose. Take your degree at Oxford.—Yours, &c.,

A. G., Malvern.

DEAR SIR,—Have something to say. Say it as well and as shortly as possible. Then try to say it again better and more shortly.—Yours, &c.,

E. S. S., Nottingham.

MY DEAR YOUNG LADY,—Style cannot be learnt, nor do I know any "handy guide" to it. It may, though, be encouraged by a process of absorption, and to that end you should accustom yourself to examples of the finest writing. But do not labour unduly for the feminine mind is more delicate than a man's, and the fine flower of it is more quickly spoilt by the close air of the study. Read your Bible diligently. For the rest, read whatever you think good. In fiction be careful. Let Jane Austen be your heroine, with Thackeray as hero, for in them you will find the whole art of novel writing. Avoid magazines and almost all modern novelists, especially those accounted brilliant, who cover shallowness with epigram. In writing be yourself. Choose always the simplest form of expression. Have an affection for short words, and do not worry about handsome adjectives. Keep your colours in your box until you know how to use them, and shun "purple patches" as you would the black death. Finally, remember this wholesome piece of advice: "Whenever you have written anything which you think particularly fine—strike it out."—Yours, &c.,

E. D., Chelsea.

DEAR MADAM.—This in reply to your flattering letter. As "brevity is the soul of wit," so originality is the soul of literature; and, unless you possess a spark of this "divine quantity," which will readily enable you to cultivate a style of your own, the only hint I can offer is, aspire to some other height than literature.—Yours, &c.,

A. S. H., Dalkeith, N.B.

Other replies received from: E. H., London; N. A., Bækenham; G. H., Didsbury; S. S. M., Edinburgh; J. D. W., London; L. R., London; H. W. D., London; H. W., London; A. W. D., London; A. W., London; A. F., Sutton; R. W. D. N., London; Z. McC., Whitby; J. B. N., Edinburgh; E. L. C., London; W. A. F., Bromley; A. G., Reigate; E. A., Wangford; E. J. N., Porthcawl; J. G., London; L. F., Manchester; F. L. A., London; J. C. S., Bristol; M. T., London; J. R. L., Belfast; L. L., Ramsgate; P. E., Bradford; A. R., London; J. J. P., Oswestry; E. H. H., London; C. C. H., Bristol; A. M., Maida Vale; L. C. J., North Berwick.

Competition No. 42 (New Series).

In our "Literary Week" columns, page 5, will be found the plot of a gruesome-grotesque novel, framed by Mr. Bernard Capes, and introduced by him into his article on "Plots," in the current Cornhill Magazine. We ask our readers to send us plots of the same type, and the usual prize of One Guinea will be awarded. We ask only for a clear matter-of-fact statement, the length of which should not exceed 350 words

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THE BIRDS OF MY PARISH. BY EVELYN H. POLLARD.

This book belongs to the popular class of literary natural history. The identity of the parish does not appear to be revealed; its land is poor and marshy, and the home of a thousand birds, with which the author seems to be on absolutely conversational terms. (Lane. 5s. net.)

A HISTORY OF THE BARONETAGE. BY FRANCIS W. PIXLEY.

Since James I. created the first Baronet, no history of this hereditary dignity has been attempted. Deprived of the help of other historians, Mr. Pixley has gone to original documents wherever he could find them. Several popular beliefs concerning the Baronetage are attacked by Mr. Pixley, notably the idea that the first Baronetcies were sold to persons of no social standing, in order to put money into the King's purse. He also tilts at the notion, fostered by the Kings of Arms and Heralds, that the Baronetage is an Order ("whereas it is a Degree of Dignity Hereditary"), and at the popular habit of abbreviating Baronet to "Bart." The book is handsomely produced by the publishers. (Duckworth. 10s. 6d. net.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Haweis (Rev. H. R.), The Picture of Jesus (Burnet & Isbister) 6s

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Baillie (Major F. D.), Mifeking: a Diary of the Siege (Constable & Co.) 6s
Gelden (Alfred S.), Studies in Eastern Religions (Kelly) 3s 6d
Khan (N. N.), The Ruling Chiefs of Western India (Thacker)
Albert (Maurice), Les Théâtres de la Foire (1669-1789) (Librairie Hachette)
Sears (E. H.), An Outline of Political Growth in the Nineteenth Century (Macmillan) net 12s 6d
Brown (H.), War with the Boers (Virtue)
Yesterday and To-day in Kruger's Land (Stock) net 10s

EDUCATIONAL.

Blythe (W. H.), Geometrical Drawing (Camb. Univ. Press)
Peskett (A. G.), Cai Julii Cæsaris (Camb. Univ. Press)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Allen (Phoebe) and Godfrey (Dr. H. W.), The Sun-Children's Budget. Vol. II., July, 1899, to April, 1900 (Wells, Gardner)
Collings (T. C.), Cricketer (Tunwin) 2s 6d
Whybrow (A. N.), The Day-by-Day Cookery Book (Sands & Co.)
The Geographical Journal. Vol. XV. (Stanford)

NEW EDITIONS.

Dickens (Charles), Dombey and Son (Nelson) 1s 6d
Dickens (Charles), Barnaby Rudge (Nelson) 1s 6d
Temple Shakespeare: Vol. XI. (Dent) net 4s 6d

* * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES—The JULY CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SONS, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 2 may be had on application, price 2s. 6d., at

1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

15th and 16th CENTURY BOOKS; AMERICANA;
85 LOST or UNKNOWN BOOKS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

BOOKS, OUT-OF-PRINT, SUPPLIED.—State wants. Catalogues free. Wanted, Jorrocks's "Jaunts," 1843; serjeant's "Salmon Fishing," 1843; Jesse's "Richard III.," 1862. 2s. each offered.—HOLLAND CO., Book Merchants, Birmingham.

WHY most MSS. are DECLINED. How acceptance may be generally ensured. Hope for every MS. (however frequently it has been rejected). If no success, no fee.—For full particulars (gratis) send stamped envelope to A. H. DeLamere Road, Raynes Park, S.W.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSEN, 28, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITER.—AUTHORS' MSS. COPIED with accuracy and despatch. Carlow Publishers. Circulars, Examination Papers, &c.—Miss E. TIGRA, 23, Maitland Park Villas, Haverstock Hill, N.W.—Established 1884.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeking Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCIDENTS caused by Collision, the Edling, Bolting, or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles. Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE, STOCK and GENERAL INSURANCE Co., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2 1/2%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 7, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SOUTH WALES and MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The Council invites APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in HISTORY and ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE.

Applications, with testimonials, must be received by the undersigned not later than September 9th, 1900.

Particulars may be obtained on application to

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,

Secretary and Registrar.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for filling up about SIXTEEN VACANCIES on the Foundation will be held on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 10th SEPTEMBER NEXT.—For information apply to the Bursar of St. Paul's School, West Kensington.

GOVERNESSES FOR PRIVATE FAMILIES—MISS LOUISA BROTHILL can RECOMMEND several highly-qualified English and Foreign Governesses for Resident and Daily Engagements.—CENTRAL REGISTRY FOR TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

CHÂLET CAUDE COTE, DIEPPE.—An English lady RECEIVES EIGHT GIRLS of 16 and upwards in her Châlet near Dieppe. Conversational French rapidly acquired. Special facilities for Music, Sketching, German. Opportunities for every form of healthy enjoyment. Direct Service twice daily with England.—Full details will be supplied on applying to Miss CESSICK, Dieppe.

"Miss Rossi writes with grace, humour, and vivacity."

The Speaker.

LESSONS by CORRESPONDENCE.—The art of Literary Composition, like other arts, cannot be acquired, because it is the expression of the artist's personality.

But, like every other art, it rests on a basis of knowledge, and of principles which may easily be acquired.

The system of instruction is adapted to meet the requirements of each correspondent. A subject is set for a composition of a given length, which is returned with marginal comments and corrections, and, in addition, a couple of sheets giving reasons for each correction, and practical advice.

MSS. already written may be substituted for the subject set, and will be carefully criticised.

Fee, payable in advance. Twelve lessons, Three Guineas; or a trial course of three, One Guinea.

Miss Rossi, 32, Monmouth Road, Bayswater, London, W.

TO AUTHORS.—MR. FREDERICK ROUTLEDGE, Literary Agent, has REMOVED to ROSEBURY HOUSE, 8, BREAM'S BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, W.C. MSS. received with a view to placing them with Publishers. Terms on application.

ALL EXAMINATIONS.

PREPARATION by CORRESPONDENCE on a THOROUGHLY INDIVIDUAL SYSTEM. The STAFF includes Graduates of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Royal Universities.

SINGLE SUBJECTS TAKEN: Latin, Greek, French, German, Mathematics, Science, Logic, Political Economy, &c.

Address Mr. J. CHARLESTON, B.A. (London and Oxon.), 47, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION

FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF

SCIENCE, ARTS, AND EDUCATION.FIRST INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY, PARIS EXHIBITION, 1900.

The Assembly recruits Members for the Official Congresses, and gives Information to those interested about Congresses, Exhibition and University Arrangements.

For Visitors to the Exhibition a Guidance Scheme, comprising Lectures, Visits to the Galleries of the Exhibition, Excursions in and around Paris, Entertainments, &c., has been arranged, and is now in working order.

Membership, including Five Tickets for Exhibition and copy of Special Guide, with full participation in Paris arrangements, for one week, £1 ls.; additional weeks, 12s. 6d. each.

Full Information, Prospectuses, Programmes, List of Lecturers, &c., from the Secretaries,

Professor PATRICK GEDDES,

Mr. T. R. MARR.

5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

Selections from Alexander & Shephard's Publications.WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."—Methodist Times.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."—New York Observer.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."—North British Daily Mail.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.
ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 600 beautiful and suggestive illustrations. With a Textual Index and Alphabetical List of Subjects.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.
"THINGS THAT ARE MADE." Devotional Meditations in the Haunts of Nature. By Rev. A. J. BAMFORD, B.A., of Royton. The Freeman says: "Preachers and teachers will find in them many helpful suggestions." The Glasgow Herald says: "They will probably interest and instruct many who would an ordinary sermon flee."

Now Ready, Second Edition, crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH. Lectures on the Scriptural Principle of Noneconformity. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D.

"Explains the position of religious dissent with great force and eloquence."—Manchester Guardian.
"Nothing could be more timely than these learned and suggestive lectures."—Christian World.

Fcap. 8vo, price 1s. 6d., post free.
THE AMBITIONS of ST. PAUL. By Rev. W. GARRETT HORDER. CONTENTS: Concerning Ambition—Three, not One—The First Ambition—The Second Ambition—The Third Ambition.

Post 8vo, cloth, with Portraits, price 6s., post free.
WELSHMEN in ENGLISH PULPITS; or, Sermons by English Congregational Ministers from Wales. With Introduction by Rev. CHARLES A. BERRY, D.D. Edited by Rev. DANIEL WATERS.

The Expository Times says: "And here we have thirty excellent portraits of prominent and eloquent Congregational preachers, with their thirty sermons, and the price is but a few shillings."

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD., 21 and 22, Fumival Street, Holborn, W.C.

CHINA AND THE FAR EAST.—BOOKS TO READ.

THE BOOK FOR THE DAY ON CHINA.

In crown 8vo, cloth, illustrated, price 3s. 6d.

CHINA and its FUTURE. In the Light of the Antecedents of the Empire, its People, and their Institutions.

By JAMES JOHNSTON, Author of "China and Formosa."

"Mr. Johnston is entitled to speak, for he has lived for several years in the country, and these pages show by crisp and well-informed exposition of the facts and forces of the national life that he has studied to some purpose not merely the genesis, but the present aspects of this new Eastern question which confronts the modern world."—Speaker.

"The volume gives an interesting and well-informed sketch of its history, its institutions, its people, its religion, and its political prospects, and is well worthy of the attention of readers interested in the immediate development of the Chinese question."—Scotsman.

"An excellent little book in every way, and specially valuable just now, in China's present crisis."—Rock.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

THE HISTORY of CHINA. By

DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, Author of "Chinese Gordon," "Sir Stamford Raffles" &c., &c. A New and Revised Edition. Illustrated with Portraits and Maps. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s.

"*The Second Volume contains a full History of China and her connection with European Nations, and detailed accounts of all events, including the Sino-Japan War, and its Diplomatic consequences."

"Mr. Boulger is a thoughtful writer, and his facts may be relied on. He has, too, the true inwardness of the historian.... For the purpose of information it would be difficult to point to a more handy and trustworthy book."—Morning Post.

"Regarded as a history pure and simple, indeed, Mr. Boulger's latest effort is all that such a work should be."—Full Mall Gazette.

"One cannot read this admirable history without feeling how much Mr. Boulger's sympathies have been enlisted by the wonderful record of Chinese achievement and Chinese character which he has collected with so much charm and ability."—Saturday Review.

W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN.

By Arthur May Knapp.

2 vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations,
small fcap. 8vo, 8s. net.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Contain the most complete exposition of Japan, past and present, that has hitherto been given to British readers, and their material is as well arranged as it is rich and informative."

SPECTATOR.—"An attractive account of the 'Island Realm.' A number of good full-page illustrations help one to realise the aspect of Japanese life."

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE "OVERLAND" TO CHINA.

BY

ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN, F.R.G.S.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS AND MAPS.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street.

EUROPEAN SETTLEMENTS IN THE FAR EAST:

China, Japan, Corea, Indo-China, Straits Settlements, Malay States, Siam, Netherlands, India, Borneo, The Philippines, &c. With Map and 32 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready next week.]

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.—"The frequent occurrence in the Press, on both sides of the Atlantic, of the phrases 'Spheres of Influence' and 'The Open Door,' the great prominence given to the Far East, both politically and commercially, and the prominent part it seems destined to play in European politics in the near future, leads the compiler to believe that this brief account of the European Settlements in the Far East will not be without interest to the political student, the merchant, and the public generally."

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER HAVE JUST PUBLISHED A SECOND EDITION OF

VILLAGE LIFE IN CHINA. By Arthur H. Smith, D.D. With 21 Illustrations from Photographs. 7s. 6d.

CHINESE CHARACTERISTICS. By the same Author.

FIFTH EDITION. With 16 Illustrations. 5s.

The Morning Post.—"Read together, the two works present a most complete and valuable picture of the least known phase of the little understood subject of Chinese life."

A CYCLE OF CATHAY; or, China, South and North

With Personal Recollections. By W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D., LL.D., Imperial Tongwen College, Peking. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d.

The Scotsman.—"A real and substantial addition to our knowledge of modern China."

THE GIST of JAPAN: the Islands, their People, and Missions. By R. B. PEERY, A.M. With 8 Full-Page Illustrations. 5s.

The Athenaeum.—"Portrays with admirable truth and justice the Japanese people."

21, Paternoster Square, London, E.C.; and Edinburgh; or of any Bookseller.

FOX RUSSELL'S NEW NOVEL,

Now Ready at the Booksellers', Bookstalls, and Libraries.

OUTRIDDEN.

By the Author of "Colonel Botcherby."

A Charming Story for Summer Reading.

320 pp., 2s. and 2s. 6d.

Field.—"A book to while away an hour in the train."

Scotsman.—"The interest never hangs fire from beginning to end."

R. A. EVERETT & CO., 42, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

LONDON LIBRARY,

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P., the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room Open from 10 till half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 1888, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAOBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION.

Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road; and

48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

In cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d. each.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL, THE MARRIED MISS BINKS,

By the Author of "The Truth Tellers," "The Links Family,"

BY HUME NISBET.

A STORY OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR, ENTITLED

FOR RIGHT AND ENGLAND.

By the Author of "Bail Up," "The Empire Makers," &c.

ALETTA:

A Tale of the Boer Invasion.

By BERTRAM MITFORD,

Author of "The Ruby Sward," "The Induana's Wife," &c.

The Literary World says: "A really interesting story."

New Six-Shilling Novels.

AN EYE for an EYE: a Mystery.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX, Author of "Wiles of the Wicked."

TOWN LADY and COUNTRY

LASS. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh."

THE FOOTFALL of FATE. By

Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL, Author of "George Geith," &c.

THE VANISHING of TERA. By

FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c.

VANITY'S PRICE. By E. Yolland, Author of "Saratia's Verdict," &c.

F. V. WHITE & Co., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA. CHINA:

The Long-Lived Empire

By ELIZA R. SCIDMORE.

With a Portrait of the Empress Dowager and over 50 other Illustrations.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME NOW READY.

MACMILLAN'S LIBRARY OF ENGLISH CLASSICS

Edited by A. W. POLLARD.

Demy 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d. net.

WHITE'S NATURAL HISTORY of SELBORNE. One Vol.

50,000 Copies have been sold in England and America.

JAMES LANE ALLEN'S NEW NOVEL.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

The Increasing Purpose.

A TALE OF THE KENTUCKY
HEMP-FIELDS.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Will be read with keen and unusual pleasure."

Daily Telegraph.—"A pretty story, graphically told."

THE BORDER EDITION OF

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

Edited by ANDREW LANG.

With 250 Original Illustrations from Drawings and Paintings specially executed by eminent Artists.

In 21 vols. Crown 8vo, green cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each.
Also in Special Cloth binding, flat backs, gilt tops, supplied in sets only, £4 1s.

Times.—"The 'Border Edition' bids fair to become the classical edition of the great Scottish classic."

New and Cheaper Re-Issues.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

THE DEWY MORN: a Novel.

By RICHARD JEFFERIES.

Vanity Fair.—"The Dewy Morn' is written from end to end in a kind of English which cannot be imitated, and has rarely been equalled for beauty.
The descriptions of scenery and of the aspects of sky and atmosphere are so vitally true as to produce a sense of illusion like that produced by a painting."

HISTORICAL CHARACTERS

(MACKINTOSH, TALLEYRAND, CANNING, CORBETT, PEELE.)

By SIR HENRY LYTTON BULWER
Lord DALLING.

BY PROFESSOR J. B. BURY.

With Maps and Plans. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF GREECE to the DEATH of ALEXANDER the GREAT. By J. B. BURY, M.A., Hon. Litt D. Furburn, Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Dublin.

FIFTH EDITION NOW READY.

THE LIFE OF

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

Translated by J. A. SYMONDS. With Mezzotint
Portrait and 16 Illustrations of Cellini's Works.
Extra crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. net.

Athenæum.—"Among the best translations in the English language."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

VOLUME V. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Anglo-Saxon Review:

A QUARTERLY MISCELLANY.

Edited by

LADY RANDOLPH SPENCER CHURCHILL.

Small folio, bound in leather, with a design in gold from an historic binding.

Price 21s. net per quarter.

LETTERS FROM A HOSPITAL SHIP.

BY

LADY RANDOLPH SPENCER CHURCHILL.

Heroic Poetry.

Sir ALFRED C. LYALL, K.C.B., G.C.E.

Federal Constitution Within the Empire.

R. B. HALDANE, Q.C., M.P.

Robert Stewart Viscount Castlereagh.

The Marchioness of LONDONDERRY.

The Logic of Events.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

ALSO CONTRIBUTIONS BY

HAMILTON AIDÉ.

LORD BURGHLERE.

LIONEL CUST.

CYRIL DAVENPORT.

JOHN DAVIDSON.

JULIEN GORDON.

EDMUND GOSSE.

MARCUS B. HUISSA.

W. H. MALLOCK.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR HERBERT

MAXWELL, M.P.

THE HON. HAROLD PARSONS.

THE COUNTESS OF WARWICK.

With Four Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations.

Books of the Spring Season.

NEW BOOK BY F. V. B.

SEVEN GARDENS and a PALACE.

By F. V. B. (the Hon. Mrs. Boyle). Author of "Days and Hours in a Garden." With Illustrations.
Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

BIRDS of MY PARISH. By E.

POLLARD. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MEMOIRS OF

MDLLE. DES ECHEROLLES.

Side-Lights on the Reign of Terror. Translated from the French by M. C. BALFOUR. With 3
Photogravures. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

ALL ABOUT DOGS: a Book for

Doggy People. By CHARLES HENRY LANE,
Breeder, Exhibitor, and Judge. With 55 Full-Page Illustrations (including nearly 70 Champions), drawn from life by R. H. MOORE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FOURTH EDITION Now Ready.

THE CARDINAL'S SNUFF-BOX.

By HENRY HARLAND, Author of "Comedies and Errors," "Grey Roses," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SECOND EDITION now on Sale.

THE TRIALS of the BANTOCKS.

By G. S. STREET, Author of "The Autobiography of a Boy," "The Wise and the Wayward," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

URSULA: a Novel. By K. Douglas

KING, Author of "The Scripture Reader of St.
Mark's," "The Child Who Will Never Grow Old,"
&c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RHODESIANS: Sketches of

English Life in South Africa. By SPRACEY
CHAMBERS. Bound in Khaki. Crown 8vo,
3s. 6d.

JOHN LANE, Publisher, London & New York.

THE NOVEL OF THE SEASON

IS

Robert Orange

BY

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

(In Unwin's Green Cloth Library.)

At 6s.

SOME EARLY REVIEWS OF ROBERT ORANGE

The STAR says:

"'The School for Saints' was good, but 'Robert Orange,' unlike most sequels, is better.....In sheer cunning of style Mrs. Craigie has surpassed herself in this exquisitely-wrought romance.....She is not far behind Mrs. Henry James in her delicate interpretation of intangible moods and dim transitions of feeling. It is not easy to assess and appraise with frigid justice in the midst of the emotional gratitude aroused by a novel of genius, but this, at least, I know: few classics have touched and tested me more profoundly than the history of 'Robert Orange.'"

The GLOBE says:

"It compels attention.....Mrs. Craigie gains yearly in mastery of narrative and portrayal.....it (the style) is agreeably clear and incisive, setting forth some trenchant comments and some suggestive reflections. Once more Disraeli appears on the canvas, and his figure has a remarkable measure of vraisemblance. The bold experiment again succeeds, and its success is a thing upon which Mrs. Craigie may be especially congratulated."

The SCOTSMAN says of it:

"A story constructed with uncommon ingenuity, steadily rising in interest, and abounding in studies of what goes on in the hearts of men and women who occupy leading places in Society.....its literary accomplishment is remarkable; and the book, showing its author at her best, cannot fail to be widely and eagerly read."

ROBERT ORANGE

Being a Continuation of the History of Robert Orange, M.P., and the Sequel to
"The School for Saints."

BY

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

(UNWIN'S GREEN CLOTH LIBRARY.)

6s.

THE NOVEL OF THE SEASON.

THE NOVEL OF THE SEASON.

THE NOVEL OF THE SEASON.

The Sequel to "The School for Saints."

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

JUST PUBLISHED. 6s.

JUST PUBLISHED. 6s.

JUST PUBLISHED. 6s.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN,
Paternoster Square, E.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1471. Established 1869.

14 July, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER has completed a revised and final edition of his First Principles. This is the book which was attacked, by Prof. Ward, in Naturalism and Agnosticism, and which has had to pass through the ordeal of more criticism than any other philosophical work since Hume's writings, metaphorically speaking, "set the heather on fire." Mr. Spencer has made numerous replies to his critics; but in the new edition of First Principles he will put his views into final shape, and endeavour to remove misapprehensions. Though all the cardinal views of the work remain unchanged, numerous minor alterations have been made. According to rumour, Lord Kelvin is busily engaged writing his autobiography, and in making a kind of authoritative pronouncement on the points at issue between his friend Prof. Tait and Mr. Herbert Spencer. We have, however, the best authority for stating that rumour, in this instance, is entirely unfounded; for Lord Kelvin is not only not replying to Mr. Spencer's philosophico-scientific formulæ, but he is not even writing his autobiography.

AMONG the Civil List pensions granted during the year ending June 20, 1900, we find the following entries:

Mr. Alfred Austin, as Poet Laureate	£200	0	0
Mr. Herman Charles Merivale, in consideration of his literary work and of his straitened circumstances	125	0	0
Mr. Robert Drew Hicks, in consideration of his services to classical scholarship and of the failure of his sight	125	0	0
Dr. John Mackintosh, in consideration of his historical writings and research.....	50	0	0
Mr. Thomas Whittaker, in consideration of his philosophical writings	50	0	0
Mr. Robert Tucker, in consideration of his services in promoting the study of mathematics	10	0	0
Mr. Benjamin Harrison, in consideration of his researches in the subject of prehistoric flint implements.....	26	0	0

SPECIAL probate to the will of Mr. Stephen Crane has been granted at Somerset House. The gross estate in Great Britain is sworn at £160. Mr. Crane appointed his brother, William Howe Crane, Fort Jervis, New York, his executor, so far as his American property is concerned.

MR. PETT RIDGE's A Son of the State, which may be described as a companion volume to Mord Em'ly, is being received with considerable favour. A Son of the State, it will be remembered, was issued first as a sixpenny book, but not till the story was republished at six shillings did it receive the recognition it certainly deserves. The inference is plain.

ANOTHER young American girl, says the Book-buyer of New York, scarcely twenty years of age, has written a brilliant romance of sword-and-plume. It is her first book, and has won her the distinction of immediate publication, as a serial, in the Century. Miss Bertha Runkle, whose literary beginnings are so auspicious, is the daughter of Mrs. L. G. Runkle, of New York. The story is called "The Helmet of Navarre," the scene is laid in Paris during the investment of the city by Henry of Navarre, and the whole action of the story occupies but four days of the week preceding Henry's entry to give his formal adherence to the Catholic Church.

FROM the same source we learn that among the eccentricities of recent publishing in America is to be reckoned the plan of having an edition—say of one thousand copies of an author's new book—signed by him on a fly-leaf. Several instances might be mentioned of such "author's autograph editions," as they are called, which have proved entirely successful commercially.

WE learn from an article in M. A. P. that Mr. Conan Doyle has strong views upon Criticism:

"I want the boy critic," he said, "the boy who will start a story and then chuck it down and say 'Rot,' or who will read a book straight through and say 'Ripping.' That's the person I want to criticise my work." "It's strange, too," he said one day, while snatching a few minutes' rest, "the older I get the less I read and the more I think. As a child the book that appealed to me most was one of Charles Reade's, and, curiously enough, it is the book I enjoy the most now." He talked of the way he wrote his stories. He said: "Of course, I know the end of my story before I begin it. I don't create characters, and then allow them to work out their careers in their own way. I always fix the end clearly before I begin to write."

Mr. Doyle, who is now on his way to England from South Africa, is making progress with his history of the War.

THE sixtieth birthday of Mr. Edward Clodd was signalled by the gift of a carved oak table from his friends. The names of the subscribers which were engraved upon the table included Mr. Herbert Spencer, Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Thomas Hardy, "Anthony Hope," Mr. George Gissing, Mr. Holman Hunt, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Clement Shorter, and others.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Mr. Basil Worsfold, in the list of reference works appended to his newly published Judgment of Literature, states that Cousin's The True, The Beautiful, and The Good is not translated into English. I picked up an English translation of Cousin's lectures about five years ago, and I have since seen copies of the same edition in the second-hand shops."

A NEW issue of the Review of the Week will begin with the next number. The paper will be enlarged, and the price will be raised to sixpence.

THE Religious Tract Society have undertaken, at the request of the Publication Committee of the Ecumenical Conference of Foreign Missions, to publish the Official Report of the great meetings held in New York from April 21 to May 2, 1900. A strong committee of literary experts have combined to produce the book.

PUBLIC school English will soon have its own dictionary. Mr. John S. Farmer, its lexicographer, has issued the prospectus of his long-expected work, of which the full title is: The Public School Word-Book, A Contribution to a Historical Glossary of Words, Phrases, and Terms of Expression, Obsolete and in Present Use, Peculiar to Our Great Public Schools, Together with Some that Have Been or Are "Modish" at the Universities. This Word-Book is for subscribers only, and the price is One Guinea. The dictionary is not a slang dictionary, pure and simple; its scope is accurately defined by its title. Twenty-four public schools and the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, Aberdeen, Dublin, &c., have been trawled for peculiar words. Mr. Farmer exclaims with enthusiasm: "No wonder our Mother-tongue is so vigorous, adaptable, and expansive—reaching out in its creative energy to all the forms and necessities of modern life—when even Young England shows such aptitude in coining new expressions, and adapting older forms to its ever-changing (and, shall I say, ever-increasing) needs." A few specimen definitions will show better than any explanation, the character of this interesting work:

Let-out, subs. (Tonbridge).—Any less extensive holiday than a half holiday.

Levite, subs. (Tonbridge).—A boy leaving the school.

Levy, subs. (Rugby).—See quot.

1856. HUGHES, Tom Brown's School days, viii. In fact, the solemn assembly, a LEVY of the school, had been held, at which the captain of the school had got up, and, after premising that several instances had occurred of matters having been reported to the masters; that this was against public morality and School tradition; that a LEVY of the sixth had been held on the subject, and they had resolved that the practice must be stopped at once.

Lib, subs. (Charterhouse).—The Library. Whence LIB. COLL. = a collection of library books.

Speg, adj. (Winchester: obsolete).—Smart.

Spending-house, subs. (Rugby).—A pastry cook's: the custom, until Dr. Arnold abolished it, had been for the boys to take their morning and evening buttery commons of bread and cold milk to one of these establishments, and with "extras," such as tea, coffee, butter, &c., to obtain a more decent meal than was otherwise possible.

1893. Great Public Schools, p. 150. Every boy had a SPENDING-HOUSE, as it was called, at one of the confectioners' in High Street, where he left his books, bat, fishing-rod, &c.—to save a journey to his boarding-house—and spent his spare cash. It was in the back-yards of these houses that dogs and guns were kept.

Spess, subs. (Felsted).—A specimen: a term of contempt.

1889. Felstedian, July, 66. Others . . . calling out . . . frightful SPEESES, which word is in our language "specimens"; but as this is too long for their memories, they have shortened it.

Spink, subs. (Royal Military Academy).—Milk: specifically, cold-used milk.

In the July Atlantic Monthly there is an article on "Impressionism and Appreciation," which will be enjoyed by those who have problems of criticism at heart, and do not object to a stiffish argument. The writer, Mr. Lewis E. Gates, defends impressionist criticism warmly, but discreetly:

Regarded as literature about literature, impressionism may seem an over-refined product—two degrees removed from actual life, fantastically unreal; but regarded as the intimate record of what a few happy moments have meant to an alert mind and heart, impressionism is transcendently close to fact. The popularity of impressionism is only one sign more that we are learning to prize, above most things else, richness of spiritual experience. The sincere and significant mood—this is what we have come to care for, whether the mood be suggested by life, by nature, or by art and literature. False moods expressed maladroitly will doubtless try to get themselves accepted, just as artificial poems about nature have multiplied endlessly since Wordsworth's day. The counterfeit merely proves the worth of the original. In an age that has learned to look on art with conscious sincerity, and to recognise that the experience offered in art rivals religious experience in renovating and stimulating power, there must more and more come to be an imaginative literature that takes its inspiration direct from art; of such imaginative literature critical impressionistic writing is one of the most vital forms.

Mr. Gates proceeds to deal with larger issues, and the article may be commended to those who think that Criticism is easy.

In the same magazine a Contributors' Club philosopher discourses pleasantly on "Accidental Literature"—"the fortuitous charm of dictionaries, directories, concordances, gazetteers, and such lore." He finds the names of unknown folk on sign-boards and in reports and advertisements peculiarly suggestive:

The lists of real estate transfers and recorded mortgages are a very anthology of poesy. Of course, there is the eternal speculation as to the causes for the transfer, and the very word "mortgage" is as redolent of romance as an Italian salad is of garlic. There is the banality of such records as the mortgaging of O'Beirne's property to Ehret and of Finnerty's to Weinstein; but the unexpected enthralls you now and then with such a reversion of the natural order of things as a transfer from Goldberg to Dooley. It is picturesque, too, just to know that such people exist, even in the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, as Flank and Marinus, Panish and McCauslan, Miss Moth and Mr. Weeks, Lang and Langbein, Feletti and Kehoe, Mordecui and Dramien.

Most people know these casual enjoyments. To the present writer, who never saw a horse-race, and never betted on one, the names of horses and owners, as given in the sporting columns of the newspapers, are a perpetual minor joy. Who can read without interest such names as these from a recent Daily News:

Mr. Doggett's Galloping Boy.
Mr. M. Pizzey's Moneyspinner.
Mr. Watts's Coral Sea.
Mr. P. Lorillard's Tantalus.
Mr. J. Musker's The General.
Lord Cowley's Pirate Queen.
Sir R. Waldie-Griffith's Vain Duchess.
Mr. M. Gurry's Anxious Moments.
Mr. Southall's Lictor.
Mr. T. Kincaid's Oradora.
Lord Farquhar's St. Gall.
Mr. Murray Griffith's Little Curley.

The Turf can hardly be decried for its nomenclature.

ONE or two "shady second-hand booksellers" seem to be playing an ingenious, but highly dangerous, game of theft at book-sales. Messrs. Puttick & Simpson have just been victimised in the following way. A thief abstracted from a copy of Thornton's Don Juan, which was lying on view in their sale-room, the coloured plate of the "Descent of Madame Saguie," and also pp. 493-4. To a Daily Mail reporter the motive for the theft was thus explained by a representative of the firm:

"This is not the first time that this sort of thing has happened to us. There are one or two shady second-hand booksellers who haunt important book sales and mutilate books in this way. They do this hoping that the books will be put up for auction in spite of their mutilated state, in which case they are enabled to buy them at a greatly reduced price. They afterwards deftly insert the stolen plate or leaves and dispose of the book privately for a largely increased amount. In the present case," he observed, "the value of the book is probably affected by something like £10. Of course, we have to compensate the owners, and, in addition, we are offering a reward for the discovery of the thief."

In the July Macmillan is a curiously censorious article on Gilbert White's recent editors, by Prof. Alfred Newton. The late Mr. Grant Allen wrote of White's natural history studies as his fad. The word could have been bettered, but so could the temper with which Prof. Newton writes:

If a word could be found to raise a feeling of disgust among the thousands of admirers of Gilbert White, it is that which is above italicised. Who but a vulgarian could conceive of White's life-long devotion to the study of natural history being designated a "fad"? And yet Mr. Allen wrote himself a naturalist!

Mr. Allen was a naturalist, but Prof. Newton will not stay his tomahawk:

How much he knew of the methods of observing naturalists in general, and of White's in particular, is shown by another passage in the same Introduction (p. xxxiii.). Describing the lawn and garden at Selborne, this editor is pleased to say: "Here the easy-minded Fellow of Oriel and curate of Faringdon could sit in his rustic chair all day long, and observe the birds and beasts as they dropped in to visit him." What the fellowship and curacy have to do with the matter is not apparent, but had Mr. Allen any experience of observational natural history, he would have known that beasts and birds do not "drop in" to visit people sitting all day long in chairs, rustic or otherwise.

Hoity toity! Grant Allen was writing an easy-going Introduction. He never meant to suggest that White's enormous mass of observations was accumulated only by sitting in an armchair. Yet that bird life can be studied from an armchair, placed on a lawn like White's, is very certain. We note that Messrs. Macmillan's new edition of White's book, which has just been added to their "Library of English Classics," consists of White's text as he left it himself, with only the "bibliographical note" which is a feature of the series.

THE Board of Education has prepared a syllabus of instruction in English Literature for Continuation Schools. It is intended as an indication to teachers who are dealing with young people who "earn their living by 'the sweat of the face.'" The following general hints given to such teachers strike us as judicious:

It is impossible to teach English literature in a course of lectures; your object must therefore be to awake interest in it. Keep in mind the continuity and development of literature: but dwell mainly on the greatest writers. Do not give lists of minor folk. It is not worth while merely naming any writer if you have not time to do more. Read out good passages, and at the end (but not in the middle) explain why they are good. Encourage the students to read widely for themselves, in unannotated texts and the better anthologies, and, if they like it, to learn lyrics or short passages by heart. On the whole, it is, perhaps, best not to put a primer into their hands until the course is finished; then one may be used for revision.

Literature does not lend itself much to an appeal to the eye, but the exhibition of portraits, rare editions, and facsimiles of handwriting serves to stimulate interest. Do not forget local associations. Where such exist the rule of exclusion of minor writers should be modified. Chatterton is not Shakespeare, but if you are teaching at Bristol you will visit St. Mary's, Redcliffe, just as at Stratford you will visit the birthplace and Anne Hathaway's cottage.

The lives of authors should be told only so far as they affected their work. A man's surroundings, such as the landscape of his home, give him local colour. Episodes which bring out character (e.g., Sidney at Zutphen) are valuable. But avoid accidentals; an enumeration of the posts at court held by Chaucer is useless.

Do not be precise about dates; there are no dates of importance in English literature; it is sufficient to remember what great writers were roughly contemporary, and the larger chronological periods, centuries and reigns, in which they fall.

THE Bookman says: "There is to be yet another great edition of Shakespeare under the editorial charge of a literary man who has recently won his spurs in the Shakespearean field." We note also that a Life of Shakespeare is to be written by Mr. Israel Gollancz for the "Temple" Shakespeare.

ADVERTISING as she is advertised, in America: "Elbert Hubbard says that a book cannot be boomed by advertising. We know better. Enormous sales are created by advertising. People can be and are influenced into buying books by the very force of the advertising—books that they would never otherwise have thought of purchasing—books in many instances that they will never read; but it is better to have a book that has 'go' in it. We are doing more and more publishers' advertising, and we still want more of it to do."

"MR. WILLIAM LE QUEUX," says the Author for July, "calls his forthcoming story An Eye for an Eye, and the publisher of Anthony Trollope's works (which, by the way, continue to find a good sale) have formally permitted the use of this title." In this connexion it is interesting to recall the fact that in 1891 the late Mr. Andrew Tuer published a short novel without a title. Each purchaser of this tale was entitled to make a guess on a coupon as to its name, and the winner was to receive a large money prize, to be awarded the middle of 1892. But no one was successful. The story dealt with the case of a schoolboy who had gouged out a companion's eye, and afterwards, in retaliation, had one of his own knocked on to the lawn of a tennis-court by a singularly expert player, his former victim's bosom friend. Naturally scores of competitors suggested An Eye for an Eye as the title of this romance, but it was written in the first person singular, and Mr. Tuer had styled it An I and an Eye. No one hit on this.

It is, of course, in the essence of appropriateness that Dr. Thomas Hodgkin should review Prof. Bury's Gibbon. He did so in last week's Pilot, and we are glad that he sets the weight of his opinion against that view of history, already attacked by Mr. Andrew Lang, which would separate it from literature and reduce its expression to cold scientific statement. Discussing this depressing theory, enunciated about a year ago by MM. Langlois and Seignobos, Dr. Hodgkin says:

Notwithstanding the depressing conclusion suggested by this paragraph, I venture to express a belief that the writing of history will still continue to be recognised as a branch of literature, and that, precisely because they are works of art, Macaulay's History of England, Carlyle's French Revolution, and pre-eminently the book that we are now about to consider, Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, will continue to be read even by students who are perfectly aware that some of the conclusions at which those authors arrived require to be modified in order to bring them into accordance with the results of more recent research.

A great history is, after all, like a great Epic, and has the Epic's right to live, though a date here and there may require correction, or even (as many of us think to be the case with Macaulay) though the author may not have held the balance true when weighing the characters of statesmen and warriors. Are we mistaken in thinking that the epoch when history began to be written "as a branch of literature" was an important era in the intellectual development of mankind? All those long monotonous annals of Assyrian and Egyptian kings, all the presumably dull works of Greek logographers lay behind him, doomed to oblivion: Herodotus arose and wrote the nine books which all Greece could listen to and remember, and History was born.

THE Statistical Account of the Dictionary of National Biography was very complete, but it does not fill up the measure of curiosity felt by Dr. Garnett in this great enterprise. The statistical research, he thinks, might have been carried further. In the Londoner he remarks:

The weight of a single column of type multiplied by the total number would give the aggregate weight of metal used in producing the Dictionary. In the same manner, the measurement of a single line of type would show how far the Dictionary would extend in linear space northward from London, and, when the Supplement was complete, it might be computed at what period the fame of British worthies would "turn its back upon itself" at John o' Groats.

THE supply of advice on reading and the choice of books never gives out. Addressing the girl students of Burlington School the other day, the Bishop of London advised them to occupy their leisure in taking up some particular study and pursuing it to the end. One great difficulty which young ladies in society experienced was, he said, how to spend their time properly. Girls were too fond of the books whose date of writing was usually indicated by a yellow label on the cover. The happiest years of his life were the ten during which he kept a resolution that he would read no books which were written after the year 1600. He would not have them adopt so stringent a course, but if they were to read three books written before 1800 for each one written after that date he was confident they would be better employed.

WE do not know how familiar the following story may be, but it has been revived this week. M. Brunetière, the editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, who is an authority on Bossuet, often styled the "Eagle of Meaux," once received the following letter from an American showman:

I have just heard that a Meaux Eagle, very celebrated, it appears, in your own country, has become your exclusive property. As proprietor of one of the largest museums in the States, I may say that this Meaux Eagle, whose reputation has been enhanced by your eloquence, would be valuable to me. If you will let me have this rare bird, and tell me how you feed him, you can quote your own figure.

M. Brunetière, of course, explained that this "rare bird" had been dead for two hundred years, and had never even been stuffed!

Bibliographical.

SAYS "S. G.," in the Pall Mall Gazette, on the subject of capital letters: "Has anyone ever formulated the law which guided writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in their employment of this typographical device? It cannot have been purely arbitrary, but it is not easy to discover a method." I wonder if "S. G." has ever come across certain reprints of plays by Shakespeare, edited by Mr. Allan Park Paton, of Greenock. In each case the text is given with the capital letters as they appear in the early editions, and Mr. Paton's belief is that these capitals were deliberately employed to indicate the emphasis which should be placed on certain words—"emphasis-capitals" he calls them. Mr. Paton urges his view with much persistency and ingenuity, but, personally, I am not convinced. On the whole, it would seem as if capital letters were used by the old writers and printers according to their "taste and fancy." It is hardly credible that "emphasis" was intended in each instance.

There is nothing new under the sun. The editor of Moonshine's notion of a library specially adapted for life on a desert island was anticipated by Lowell in his "Fable for Critics," though not, it may be, in quite the spirit of which the editor of Moonshine would approve. Said Lowell:

I've thought very often 't would be a good thing,
In all public collections of books, if a wing
Were set off by itself, like the seas from the dry lands,

Marked "Literature suited to desolate islands,"

And filled with such books as could never be read
Save by readers of proofs, forced to do it for bread—
Such books as one's wrecked on in small country taverns,
Such as hermits might mortify over in caverns,
Such as Satan, if printing had then been invented,
As a climax of woe would to Job have presented,
Such as Crusoe might dip in, although there are few so Outrageously cornered by fate as poor Crusoe.

Messrs. Putnam advertise A New Study of the Sonnets of Shakespeare, and yet it seems to have been only the other day that we were studying the very latest theory about the said Sonnets—that of Mr. Samuel Butler. There are signs that the Shakespeare Sonnets will become, in a sense, as great a nuisance as is "Junius." Last year there were not only two new editions of them, but two new books about them—Mr. Cuming Walters's Mystery of Shakespeare's Sonnets and Mr. Jesse Johnson's Testimony of the Sonnets as to the Authors of Shakespeare's Plays and Poems. In 1898 we had Mr. T. Tyler on The Fitted Theory of the Sonnets, and in 1896 a collection of "Scriptural Harmonies" with fifty of them. I suppose every student of the Sonnets has his own theory about them, but there is no reason why he should give it to the world.

The catholicity of the public taste is seen in the simultaneous appearance of sixpenny editions of Tess of the D'Urbervilles and Cometh Up as a Flower—two works which are not, artistically, quite on the same plane. Cometh Up appeared last year in a two-shilling form; so that its issue at sixpence does not cause surprise. It is really a feather in Miss Broughton's cap that her first story—and such a story!—should be found not only readable, but apparently popular, in 1900. It is positively thirty-three years old! Those of us who remember its original publication remember also how "shocking" it seemed to the reading public of that day. Now, of course, its most audacious passages are tame, even to the young lady of fifteen.

I see that we are to have from Mrs. Lathrop The Autobiography of a Charwoman. Why not? Jeames de la Pluche has written his own memoirs, and we have had on the stage the apotheosis of the "lady slavey." There can be few types of humanity and society which have not had their expositor in fiction. Even the animal creation has been allowed to recount its reminiscences, and I remember meeting some years ago with The Confessions of a Door-Mat, recounted by a young writer of poetic plays. The line, of course, will have to be drawn somewhere.

Great is the vitality of the Lives of the Poets which we owe to Samuel Johnson. They are constantly being edited, separately or in groups, for the use of youthful students, and one remembers that Matthew Arnold even did not disdain to do that sort of work for them. That was in 1886. In 1890 came the annotated edition of Messrs. Bell. This, however, was destined to be surpassed (me judice) in 1896, when we had from Messrs. Methuen their three-volume edition in the "English Classics" series, and from Messrs. Kegan Paul their six-volume edition, supervised and annotated by Mr. Arthur Waugh. Now we are promised an edition undertaken by Dr. Birkbeck Hill, whose absolute competency for the task is obvious.

Now that Mr. Brimley Johnson has issued his first book as publisher, it may be interesting to recall some of the work he has done as man of letters. One recollects his four-volume collection of Popular British Ballads (1894), followed in 1896 by a little monograph on Leigh Hunt and two little selections from De Quincey (Lyrics in Prose) and Carlyle (Pen-Portraits). In 1897 came a booklet of Aphorisms from Lander. All of these have indicated a genuine knowledge and love of English literature.

Matilde Serao, of whose works Mr. Heinemann promises us a uniform edition in England, is not entirely unknown to English readers. Mr. Heinemann himself published, in 1891, a translation of this writer's Fantasy, which he followed up in 1894 with a version of Farewell, Love.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Lucretius and Omar.

Lucretius on Life and Death. In the Metre of Omar Khayyám. To which are appended Parallel Passages from the Original. By W. H. Mallock. (A. & C. Black.)

"LUCRETIVS," writes Mr. Sellar in his admirable chapters upon the poet, "contemplates human life with a profound feeling like that of Pascal, and with a speculative elevation like that of Spinoza. The loftier tones of his poetry, and the sustained effort of mind which bears him through his long argument, remind us of Milton." These are just comparisons. We might add Dante; he also could vaunt, with a primus ego, that he, first of Italian poets, had handled mightily a most majestic theme. But between him who, in Mrs. Browning's phrase, denied

Divinely the divine, and died
Chief poet by the Tiber side, and the Persian with his roses and vines, nightingales and winecups, how vast the distance and the difference! Mr. Mallock is aware of it; but he finds a certain piquancy in the comparing and contrasting of the two Epicurean poets, and has paraphrased some five hundred lines of the Roman in the famous stanza devised by FitzGerald for the paraphrase of the Persian. The result is fascinating, and a failure: to paraphrase Bentley upon Pope's Homer—"a very pretty poem, Mr. Mallock, but you must not call it Lucretius." Imagine Omar rendered into Miltonic blank verse, and you have some notion of the aspect of Lucretius in the Omarian quatrain. The tripping, discontinuous, epigrammatic quatrains have nothing in common with the slow-labouring, lingering thunders of the Lucretian periods, each line a triumph of tremendous music, and the complete period their concerted harmony. Mr. Mallock's bold venture is an excellent illustration of the interdependence of matter and form: translated into a poem absolutely unlike his own, even the thought of Lucretius, the genius of his mind, almost wholly disappears. Thus translated, he is not himself; he is any one of the countless poets who sing of the eternity of death and the sorrow of life: we might almost be reading Horace. The essential quality of the Rubáiyát, in point of form, is a swift brevity. The poet lets fall a stanza now, a stanza then, each isolated, self-sufficient, perfect; strung together, they are but a chain of variations upon the same theme. There is no laborious argument, no philosophic plan, no systematic unfolding of a scheme of thought. It is philosophy in snatches of song, doctrine by epigram, dropped casually with a charming nonchalance from the lips of a semi-serious epicurean mystic, unconscious of responsibility, incapable of huge toil. Lucretius is as profoundly and passionately an apostle and evangelist as Saint Paul; his is no light-hearted pessimism, no carolling agnosticism, but an elemental message to the sons of men. Open Omar at any page, and you will light upon some immediately intelligible stanza about the Why and the Whither and the Wherefore of things: open Lucretius at random, and you will find yourself in the midst of some long and wrestling argument or exposition. Before Lucretius can chaunt that transcendent chaunt to the glory of deathless death, "Nil igitur mors est," and do so in a prolonged strain of sublimity unsurpassed, he must patiently adduce some score of reasons, worked out with enormous effort, in which beauty of form is sacrificed to accuracy of matter. No poem in the world so impresses us as accomplished with groans and sweat of the brow, with the agony and strong crying of birth-pangs, as the De Natura Rerum—which, truly interpreted, means the Universe. Little—no, to be accurate, nothing—as we know of Lucretius with absolute certainty from external sources, we can with some confidence conjecture much concerning his character from his poem; and we may feel sure that he did not write to please himself. He might have enjoyed his solitary broodings and contemplations in a somewhat grim silence; but, thanks to Epicurus, he possessed the pearl of great price, the verity of verities, and he was bound to communicate it to a world lying in the darkness of superstitious dread, of unnecessary sorrow, of calamitous ignorance. We do not feel that about Omar; he, says FitzGerald, "only diverted himself with speculative problems of Deity, Destiny, Matter and Spirit, Good and Evil, and other such questions, easier to start than to run down, and the pursuit of which becomes a very weary sport at last!" Omar jests: there is no jesting in Lucretius. M. Martha, author of perhaps the best work upon Lucretius, concludes his volume thus: "La véritable réfutation de la doctrine de la volupté est la tristesse de son plus grand interprète."

Mr. Mallock's interesting experiment is, then, more curious than valuable—a valorous attempt to bridle Behemoth, to put a hook in the nostrils of Leviathan. Passing over, as is but natural, the scientific and technical portions of the poem, and merely culling from it its "beauties," he has given us an ingenious pastiche indeed, but done a fanciful injustice to the Son of Thunder. Mr. Pater has spoken of the thunder and lightning of Lucretius as being "like thunder and lightning some distance off, which one might recline to enjoy in a garden of roses." For once we venture to question the felicity of a phrase from Mr. Pater; but Mr. Mallock seems to have accepted it, and in his version we read Lucretius in the rose garden of Naishápur, beside the rose-bespinkled tomb of Omar. Little is here of the Lucretius who, as illustrious men of modern science are agreed, marvellously and by intuition anticipated important doctrines and discoveries of modern science; of the poet, who rivals Goethe in the combination of scientific with poetic imagination. Here is a Roman Omar, strenuous and impassioned; no minstrel of smiling nihilism, but the deliverer of a vast evangel, the prophet of the peace of eternal death; a preacher akin to Thackeray's "weary King Ecclesiast," "the sad and splendid." All is vanity, but kindly death ends all, says Lucretius: Death ends all, says Omar, therefore let us enjoy life to the uttermost. Omar is the truer Epicurean: Lucretius has more than a little of the Stoic in his temperament, and his devotion to Epicurus was less upon the moral or practical side than upon the speculative. Clearly, he hungered after an interpretation of the universe, of "all this unintelligible world"; he found it in the atomic theory, as accepted by Epicurus from Democritus. It is hard to say whether it be right to call him atheist. "Un grand poète athée," exclaims Villemain, "voilà sans doute un singulier phénomène." Certainly few conceptions can be more strikingly strange than his picture of gods who reign, perhaps, but assuredly do not govern: idle beings, divine drones extraneous to the workings of the world, fixed in a dreamy immobility, neither beneficent nor malevolent, not worthy of man's consideration. Such gods Lucretius contemptuously condescends to let exist; but the ruler of the universe is a blind necessity, the material law. The religious sense, as we understand it now, was no part of his nature; his devotion, his most exalted feeling, is called forth by the contemplation of the reign of physical law and order, suaviter fortiterque disponens omnia. "I venerate the earnestness of the man," writes FitzGerald, who loved him, "and the power with which he makes some music even from his hardest Atoms." Can we say of Omar that we "venerate his earnestness"? Melodiously to dwell upon the melancholy of things is no hard occupation, and the philosophy of "gather ye roses while ye may" is somewhat obvious. Critics have differed upon the quality of the faith that was in Omar: a frank materialist and sensualist, say some; a mystic veiling the ineffable truths in terms of earth, say others. It matters little, and both views may be right; certain it is that Omar was a true Epicurean, loving life and its brief pleasures, the sole tangible realities in a mysterious universe. Unlike, indeed, is he to that earlier tentmaker who "died daily" to this present world and thirsted for that other, which alone was real to him. And it is sure that Lucretius would have felt slight sympathy with the prevailing moods of Omar, the dreamy sadness, indolent wishfulness, luxurious brooding upon the nature of things. Sad as Lucretius is, he has the air of boldly and stoutly denying it, having found peace and joy in believing the atomic gospel, and trampled the terrors of religion beneath his feet: "felix qui potuit causas cognoscere rerum!"

Mr. Mallock manages with much dexterity the famous quatrain: for example:

What though no statued youths from wall and wall
Strew light along your midnight festival

With golden hands, nor beams from Lebanon
Keep the lyre's langour lingering through the hall,

Yours is the table 'neath the high whispering trees;
Yours is the lyre of leaf and stream and breeze;

The golden flagon, and the echoing dome—
Lapped in the Spring, what care you then for these?

Yet, we repeat it, this is no measure for the organ music of Lucretius: he would sound more like himself in the blank verse of Milton, the heroics of Ben Jonson, Chapman, Dryden, the Alexandrians of Hugo or Leconte de Lisle. Mr. Mallock's poem is pretty: there is infinite beauty in Lucretius, but no dancing prettiness. The terrible intensity of his marching music demands, for its transference into another tongue, the weightiest possible equivalent to the gravitas, the auctoritas of the noble Latin: who would translate Paradise Lost in the rhythms of Emaux et Camées, or the Légende des Siècles in the measures of "Hesperides"? The furor arduus Lucreti, as Statius has it, has nothing in common with the polished or chiselled elegance of Omar. Lucretius is the Michael Angelo of verse, a Titanic workman, compelling language to obey his sovereign will and fall into majestic cadence, thunderous, oceanic. Saint Jerome, in a sentence which has distracted every Lucretian critic, states that Lucretius composed his poem in the lucid intervals of insanity: it is impossible. The quatrains of Omar might have been so written; the colossal structure of the De Natura Rerum could not have been so designed and executed. But neither the classic Roman nor the mediæval Persian was mad; both kept a steady vision upon the world and life, both knew well what they were doing. Lucretius, like that later glory of Italy, the lamenting Leopardi, had sanity in the depths of his strange soul, and the mind which soared and ranged beyond the flammaria monia mundi, and saw worlds in the making, and the torrent of atoms, knew no delusion. "Life and Death" appeared in no fantastic guise to this great iconoclast of superstition, this harrower of hell. Reason itself inspired the poem, thus justly appraised by the exquisite and worthless Ovid:

Carmina sublimis tunc sunt peritura Lucreti,
Exitio terras cum dabit una dies.

Gradely—Greement.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Vol. IV.: Gradely—Greement. Clarendon Press. 2s. 6d.)

"A GRADELY plague it's bin to me, It's been a gradely blessin' too;" probably this will be Dr. Murray's confession when he has done with this marvellous Dictionary. The quotation occurs on the first page of this new part, prepared by Mr. Henry Bradley. It is a particularly interesting part—full of old and storied words like Gradely, Graft, Grail, Grain, Graumar, Grand, Grave, and Gravy. Gravy is the curiosity of the part. What should you suppose is the etymology of gravy? It is "of obscure origin" in speech, as in cookery, but Dr. Murray thinks it comes from the Old French grané and that its v is just a mistake.

For the O.F. word the reading grané seems certain (though in printed texts gravé usually appears); it is probably cognate with O.F. grain "anything used in cooking," and with GRENADÉ; GRENADINE; cf. also fans grenon = "gravy bastard." But in the English MSS. the word has nearly always either a v or a letter which looks more like u than n (the only exception being in the "table" to Liber Cocorum, which has thrice granc, while the text has grauē). As the Middle English word was therefore identical in form with the modern word, it seems difficult, in spite of the difference in sense, to regard them as unconnected. In the present state of the evidence, the most probable conclusion is that the O.F. grané was early misread as gravé, and in that form became current as a term of English cookery.

With its origin the interest of the word ceases; except for the familiar phrase "to stew in one's own gravy," which Mr. Bradley finds in Ned Ward's London Spy (1699), and for the phrase "gravey-eyed," which Grose records with the meaning of bleary-eyed. Mr. Bradley gives no quotation for the last term, but small boys and girls still apply the unfeeling nickname "Gravy-Eyes" to anyone so afflicted.

We have served the gravy before the joint, and must e'en go back. Gradely is a fine old word that is still doing duty in Lancashire. A gradely lass is a big comely lass; a gradely fool is an out-and-out fool; and the word means real or proper in such a sentence as "My gradely name is Harry Shareall." Most frequently the word is equivalent to very—"a gradely fine day"; but it has still another shade of meaning in "I cannaw tell thee greedly"—i.e., exactly. Gradely is one of several words in this section of the Dictionary owning a Scandinavian origin. The obsolete substantive, Grain, meaning, in the plural, the fork of the human body, the lower limbs, is of this family. In some dialects grain still means the branch of a tree, or a fork between boughs. A seventeenth century writer said of Absalom: "his head was caught fast within the graines of a spreading oak." A prong of a fork is called a grain, and the plural was often spelt grainse, so that a magazine writer had: "The sailmaker . . . personated Neptune . . . and . . . flourished a three-pronged grainse." The other and greater Grain—i.e., a seed, is, of course, of French-Latin derivation. The sense-development of grain is very interesting. There is, for instance, a perfect connexion between its two meanings of a seed or particle, and a dye. A red dye was made from "the Scarlet Grain . . . which cometh of the Ilex" (Holland's Pliny); hence in technical and mercantile speech this scarlet dye itself was called grain, and afterwards the word was applied to dye in general. Milton's "All in a robe of darkest grain" must be read in this light. And when we say "ingrained" it is in this special sense that the word is properly used—i.e., indelible, fast-dyed: "My father, as I told you, was a philosopher in grain," says Tristram Shandy; and Keble says of Bishop Wilson—"He was an antiquarian in grain, and delighted in exact observation." Another Old Norse word still heard in the north of England is Graith, a verb meaning to prepare, get ready, procure. "Get the table graithed"—i.e., dressed, is given in a Whitby glossary. Chaucer found the word useful, and so did Burns.

Only one Celtic word lifts up its hand between Gradely and Greement. This is the verb Gralloch, to disembowel (a deer)—a well-known sporting term. In her novel, Held in Bondage, Ouida writes: "We think no toil or trouble too great to hear the ping of the bullet, and see the deer gralloched at last." The viscera of a dead deer form the gralloch, which must be distinguished from the umbles (the heart, liver, &c.), contemplated in the expression "humble pie."

Gramercy is an interesting word, if only because its use is the foundation of so many feeble historical novels. It is the compound of O.F. grant and merci:

The primary sense of merci was "reward, favour gained by merit"; hence grant merci originally meant "may God reward you greatly": cf. GOD-A-MERCY. Both grant merci and merci without the adjective came to be used interjectionally = "thanks," in which use the shorter form survives in modern French.

Gramercy, therefore, came to mean Thank you; and Thanks to. Gramercy horse! meant "Thanks to my good horse." It seems doubtful whether the use of the word by historical novelists as an exclamation, the equivalent of "Mercy on us," has much justification. It was apparently so used by Heywood and Ross. This use seems to be derived from Dr. Johnson, who from his desk in Gough-square expounded the word as a corruption of "grant me mercy." Coleridge uses it so in The Ancient Mariner: "Gramercy! they for joy did grin"; and Lord Lytton, in his Last of the Barons, has: "Gramercy, it seems that there is nothing which better stirs a man's appetite than a sick bed." He might have added: "Historical novelists please copy," but he had no need to do so; they have copied. Gramarye and Grammar are words of which the histories and meanings are full of interest. The same, of course, is true of Grand. We notice, by the way, that the ACADEMY is the only authority given for the compound, Grand-aired. In the issue of March 5, 1881, a reviewer, who was dealing with one of Dr. George Macdonald's novels, wrote: "Worried by a severe aunt and a grand-aired cousin, what wonder if the silly child consented one night to a stolen interview with Tom." As showing how continuous has been the search for illustrative quotations, we may mention that an ACADEMY of eighteen months ago is quoted, along with Mr. Kipling, as an authority for the compound word Grain-bag. We had no idea that we had ever written about grain-bags, and lo—on looking it up—'twas the present writer.

A rather fine compound of Grand is Grandeval, meaning of a great age, ancient. Henry More wrote in 1650, "Reverend Master Aristotle, that grandeval Patriarch in points of Philosophy," and Prof. Mozley wrote, just about two centuries later, in an essay on Carlyle's Cromwell, "There . . . the one grandeval element of Power exists alone." Grandfather as a verb is unfamiliar, especially in the sense of "to flatter with excessive deference." Samuel Richardson has it thus in Clarissa Harlowe: "Nor would I advise that you should go to grandfather up your cousin Morden." The word is used by Mr. Birrell in a more obvious sense. To grandfather (a thing) is to attribute it to some person as its mediate originator. Thus in his Res Judicate Mr. Birrell speaks of Knox as the man "on whom the Tractarian movement has been plausibly grandfathered." Grandify, to make great, is quoted only from Hooker (and not the "judicious" Hooker): "Whom that . . . God may salnifi, fortifi, and grandifi." Several other words formed from Grand, more or less obsolete, are worth noting, as Grandisonant. "The grandisonant name of The Glory of Mount Pleasant" wrote Christopher North in Blackwood. Grandity seems a useful variant of grandeur; how well it serves Puttenham in his English Poesie (1589): "And in a Prince it is decent to goe slowly, and to march with leisure, and with a certain granditie rather than gravitie." Camden thought that English poets have both qualities: "Our poets excel in granditie and gravity"; and the word was used as late as 1839. It would be interesting to know exactly how and when the phrase, "the Grand Tour," came into use in England. Mr. Bradley's earliest quotation is from Lassels' Voyage to Italy (1670). "And no man understands Livy and Caesar. . . like him who hath made exactly the Grand Tour of France and the Giro of Italy." Great virtue in that "exactly."

The history of the word Graingerize may not be precisely known to everyone. Mr. James Grainger was not so much a graingerizer as the cause of graingerizing in others. In 1769 he published a Biographical History of England, with blank leaves for the reception of engravings, portraits, &c. The idea "caught on," and the filling up of a "Grainger" became the hobby of young ladies.

Twelve columns of the Dictionary are given to Grass and its compounds. As a verb, Grass is distinctly expressive. The reader may remember how the Chicken, in Dombey and Son, attributed his dilapidated visage to "his having had the misfortune to get into chancery at an early stage of the proceedings, when he was severely fibbed by the Larkey one, and heavily grassed"—i.e., floored. Is there a proper analogy between Grass in this sense, and Gravel in the sense of to perplex or confound. Mr. Bradley does not refer the one to the other. A seventeenth century writer had: "This question would gravell a great number," where gravel seems to have the sense of "floor"; and Berkeley writes: "It will perhaps gravel even a philosopher to comprehend it." Thenceforward the word meant to irritate or perplex. "These English songs gravel me to death," wrote Burns to his friend Thomson. This use of the word is prevalent in America, and both Mark Twain and Lowell have it. Gravel is also Stock Exchange slang for a lack of money. "Getting gravelly here" suggests that the financial ship is in danger of beaching for lack of funds to float it. The substantive Grave and its verb are most interesting: we will just note that the verb was once much used in the sense of to bury. Massinger had: "Would I had seen thee graved with thy great sire." It is curious that the two and a half centuries after Massinger yielded no second instance. But, at last, Mr. James Grant wrote in his novel, One of the "600" (1876): "They told you that I was dead, too, and graved in yonder kirk."

Who has met with Graveolent, meaning offensive to the smell? "Such playful missiles as graveolent eggs" is the phrase of a novelist of 1862. Lord Lytton had written: "He strives to buoy himself up from 'the graveolent abyss' of his infancy." Whom did he quote? We might linger long on Great and its compounds: they run to eighteen columns of the Dictionary. We are a little surprised to find that Great in its colloquial sense of "splendid," "immense" was used as early as 1809. In his Knickerbocker History of New York Irving wrote: "She . . . could get along very nearly as fast with the wind ahead as when it was a-poop, and was particularly great in a calm." This use seems to have taken rise in America. Marryat noted in his diary, 1839, that in America "the word great is oddly used for fine, splendid: 'She's the greatest gal in the whole Union.'" It would be interesting to form a list of words coined, or old words revived, by Carlyle. He wrote "greatish" in his Reminiscences. Greed as a verb is rare, but useful. Thus in Lord Lytton's Harold:

The ravens sit greeding,
And watching and heeding.

The Musician of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

Tchaikovsky: his Life and Works. By Rosa Newmarch. (Grant Richards.)

This does not profess to be more than a memoir, a stop-gap memoir, compiled under difficulties of scanty material. Nor is it more than it professes to be. It is of value, because there is yet no life of Tchaikovsky. But we get small real insight into the man, partly because he was retiring, a shunner of publicity. Nor do we feel it satisfactory as an appreciation of his genius. Not that Miss (or Mrs.) Newmarch lacks critical knowledge of music. But one who can talk about the "strange combination of the mediocre and sublime," and the "over-wrought emotion," of the great "Pathetic" symphony, shows a lack of deep emotional understanding not favourable for completely sympathetic comprehension of Tchaikovsky's work. She seems to us to have an instinctive shrinking from the most characteristic side (as she admits it to be) of Tchaikovsky's music, a shy distaste—almost a coldness—for it. That deep personal melancholy is to her morbid, suspect as to its complete, or at least universal, sincerity; may it not sometimes be rhetorical? Certainly, she likes him best in any other mood. But this, unfortunate in the critic, is doubly unfortunate in the critical biographer, for it sets her upon proving that he was not a melancholy man. One should not start a biography with a preconceived thesis. Without it, she might have sought in his character for something to explain that habitual trait of his music.

Undoubtedly, Tchaikovsky was not a morbid man. But he was a very sensitive man, and his life was not altogether happy. There needs no more to explain that dominating melancholy of his works. One need not be morbid to feel keenly that life is a state of unblossoming hopes and defeated joys. Tchaikovsky was a man of long, early disappointment, and his marriage was a premature and disastrous ruin. We know none of the details, so the reader is defrauded of a romance. This modern of the moderns in music was, at the outset, an amateur—like most of the Russian composers, his biographer says. He was an employé in the Ministry of Justice at St. Petersburg, with musical tastes. He began his theoretical studies as an amateur, and was noted for lack of earnestness. But Rubinstein often looked over the exercises of the harmony classes in the Petersburg Conservatoire; and, struck by young Tchaikovsky's ability and carelessness, gave him a serious, yet encouraging, "talking-to." The young student dropped his official appointment and his indolence, took music as a bride, and put forth astonishing energy. Rubinstein once set him contrapuntal variations on a given theme, emphasising the need of quantity as well as quality in this kind.

I thought [says Rubinstein] perhaps he would write about a dozen variations. But not at all. At the next class I received over two hundred. To examine all these (Rubinstein concluded with a bland smile) would have taken me more time than it took him to write them.

Sensitive, affectionate, retiring, clinging to praise and encouragement, for all his fertility of production and methodical industry, he encountered a disheartening succession of failures before the success of his opera, the "Opriehnic." And his most revered friends, the two Rubinstens, who were also his masters, were the severest in their criticism. Anton, in particular, the great pianist, was adverse to most of his works, even the great ones. He scarcely ever played Tchaikovsky's pieces. At the trial of the Quartet in F major we are told:

All the time the music went on Rubinstein listened with a lowering, discontented expression, and at the end, with his usual brutal frankness, he said that it was not in the least in the style of chamber music; that he himself could not understand the composition, &c. The audience as well as the players went into ecstasies; but the one listener whose appreciation meant most to the composer obstinately stuck to his own opinion. He was evidently deeply hurt by Rubinstein's cutting remarks.

It is a tribute to the marvellous energy which accompanied his sensitiveness that he yet never ceased to produce. Both qualities are visible in his finely featured face, which has nothing of the Tartar one sees in Rubinstein.

For the rest, his career—apart from music—is uneventful; apart also from that unhappy marriage which for a time so overwhelmed him that he thought his genius had got its death-blow. He was never in straits; and a timely endowment by an unknown lady enabled him, like Wordsworth, to retire into the country and write solely for fame. Modern of the moderns (as we have said), his early and enduring passion was yet for Italian music, specially Rossini's, which gave to his own work its characteristic of melody. Still more surprisingly, he loved not Wagner, until in his last years he yielded to the conquering "Parsifal." Even Berlioz he loved "no more than reason" (as Beatrice says). Through Rubinstein, Liszt, and Schumann the genius of modernity seems to have been transmitted to him. Mozart, also, he worshipped as Mozart should be worshipped. Let us add also the influence of the Russian Glinka to his musical genealogy. His opinions on music yield more matter than his life as here given; and it would be interesting to quote them had we space. For the sake of these, and of the Diary of his Tour in 1888, the book is well worth reading apart from the facts of his life, for the brevity of which (as we have said) the author is not responsible. She has done what could be done in the absence of that material which only an authorised biographer can furnish. An authorised biography is understood to be in preparation; and, if properly handled, it will be a most interesting and important addition to the personal literature of music.

Lyon King of Arms.

Heraldry in Relation to Scottish History and Art. By Sir James Balfour Paul, Lord Lyon King of Arms. (Edinburgh: David Douglas.)

"I OBSERVE," wrote Camden in 1600, "that those who know nothing about this noble study regard it as frivolous and receive it with derision"; and that has remained the plight and the attitude of the vast majority, even of otherwise educated people, to this day. The fact that some of the sixteenth and seventeenth century writers on armory brought discredit upon their science by the fantastic extravagancies of myth, allegory, and mysticism, with which they overlaid it, is no excuse in the present time, for those who are innocent of armorial knowledge are not likely to have read their works. But diu servavit odorem: the ill-name has stuck to the dog and become a fixed tradition. Those, however, who are engaged in mediæval research are aware that some acquaintance with heraldry is indispensable not only for the purposes of the genealogist, but also for the student of the art and the history of the Middle Ages.

Some of us are old enough to remember the time when the opinion that instruction in at least the grammar of armory was considered a necessary part of the education of gentlemen had not yet become extinct, and to have imbibed its rudiments at the grand-maternal knee during the construction of the heraldic fire-screen or sofa-cushion that served as our first "accidence of armorie." But the elegant accomplishments of the English gentlewoman are, unhappily, fast disappearing. It is, therefore, with genuine gratitude that we welcome this effort on the part of the Lyon King of Arms to revive, at any rate within his own jurisdiction, a more general interest in the "gentle" cult which offers the twofold attraction of being at the same time both a science and an art. The volume, too, is naturally the more acceptable in that it comes backed by the official authority of one of the most learned and accomplished heralds of the day, and, moreover, represents original work, and is not merely another addition to the sum of rechauffés issued to round off some series of manuals. Nevertheless, both in form and in substance, the book, which is a republication of the Rhind Lectures on Archaeology for 1898, is essentially a popular treatise, and one to be readily understood of the multitude. Sir James reminds us that at the first outset the uninstructed inquirer may be dismayed by the apparently uncouth jargon of heraldic terminology, which is mostly of French origin; but the fact that in armorial lore it is permissible to pronounce the latter language as it is spelt should invest its study with a fascination for the average Briton.

The author acknowledges his indebtedness in parts to Mr. George Grazebrook's excellent monograph on The Dates of Various-shaped Shields, which, it is greatly to be regretted, was printed privately, and its usefulness consequently limited; and also to Lang's Ancient Scottish Seals, which did for Scotland what might have been done for England had it not been for the death of Mr. Grazebrook, whose projected Corpus Sigillorum would have supplied a much-felt want.

Neither argument nor abuse, nor, it would seem, even ridicule, is able to rouse conscience in, or to instil common-sense into, the public mind anent things armorial: the bogus coat still flourishes exceedingly; the crest, which is properly inseparable from the helm, still adorns the livery button and the spoon. But what hope of regeneration can there be while heraldic officials, who should know better, still permit their draughtsmen to display profile crests on full-faced helmets, or to poise on the latter a barber's-pole-like wreath productive only of an effect resembling that of the deftly balanced tray of the muffin man? There are some interesting pages on methods of marking family cadency, based on the use of the bordure: a plan that might well be universally adopted in place of the microscopic and unworkable system of tiny charges introduced in the days of decadent armory, and which has long since hopelessly broken down.

The volume is admirably and generously illustrated, and from the best contemporary authorities, such as seals, banners, and monuments. One plate, however, from lack of sufficient explanation, may occasion at first a little bewilderment; but reflection will show that it is subtly left to us to draw from it for ourselves a silent artistic moral. It is a representation of a combat between a knight and a somewhat stunted lion, in which Providence, whose antiquarian and æsthetic tastes are evidently outraged by the tasteless and Germanesque form of the shield borne by the former, is handing to him from heaven as a substitute one of the strictly orthodox heater shape.

We were about to hazard a few remarks touching the literary style of these lectures, but, on reconsideration, have arrived at the conclusion that they must not be supposed to be couched in the English language, but in the rude dialect of Caledonia; hence any comment on their linguistic peculiarities would be hypercritical. Latin, however, should be much the same on both sides of the Tweed, and we hardly think that this concession would altogether palliate the confusion of fibule with infule (p. 170).

It is worthy of note that, although Scotland has produced, in Mackenzie, Nisbet, and Seton, three armorial writers of the highest rank, the present Lord Lyon is the first Scottish Officer of Arms who has given to the world a treatise on Heraldry. Time was when the English Herald's College produced author after author of eminence; and we trust that Sir James Balfour Paul's example may be followed south of the border, and that new Segars and Camdens, Dugdales and Bysshes, may yet arise to show that heraldic scholarship is not quite dead in England.

A Camp-Fire Book.

Mafeking: a Diary of the Siege. By Major F. D. Baillie. (Constable. 6s.)

AFTER the war correspondents' books on the war come the soldiers' books. This is a soldier's book—no more. Major Baillie has few literary graces; he abounds in colloquialisms; his sentences are strangely built; his punctuation is awkward; and he is capable of a slip in grammar. Yet this is a thoroughly readable and convincing little record.

It has a character which is possible only to a soldier's book: war is realised as work—the day's work. The book is a diary kept from day to day, recording plain events and plain feelings. We get an excellent idea of all the features of siege life—except, perhaps, its monotony. The siege lasted seven months; but Major Baillie's book can be read, at a pinch, in two hours, and it bristles with event and incident. The weariness of waiting is conveyed only in occasional sentences: "Till you have experienced it no one (at least I hadn't) has any idea how trying it is to exist without news of the outside world"; and, again, with better effect—"Nothing, perhaps, brings home our isolation so much as to see the rails overgrown with grass, and reflect that this is a main line to England." To do them justice the beleaguering Boers seem to have become just as bored by the siege. Nothing, indeed, is more curious than the little time-killing amenities which sprang up between Boer and British. Each Sunday brought truce, and Major Baillie makes the apposite remark: "I suppose we are the only two nations who would observe it." They tried hard to kill each other these outlying Boer and British forces, but somehow jocularly would creep in. An unexploded five-pound shell, fired into Mafeking, was found to contain the following missive:

Mr. Baden-Powell,

Please excuse me for sending this iron messenger I have no other to send at Present. He is rather excentric but forgive him if he does not behave well. I wish to ask you not to let your men drink all the whisky as I wish to have a drink when we all come to see you. Kindly tell Mrs. Duukeley that her mother and family are all quite well.

I remain, Yours trewly, a Republican.

Conversation by flag went on frequently. This was the sort of dialogue:

Yesterday the Boers volunteered that they, the Dutch, were knocking us about in the Free State. The orderly said, "The Free State, where is the Free State?" and the Boer said, "North of the Orange River." On the orderly's answering, "Ah, you mean New England," the Boer seemed hurt, but they are pretty civil all the same and both sides continually ask after their various friends and get answers.

Many character-sketches of British officers and private soldiers who went to their deaths are scattered up and down the book. These heroisms are not pushed forward, they belong to skirmishes and sorties which few of us have kept in mind; and yet they are of the perfect British kind. On December 26, Colonel Baden-Powell ordered an attack on Game Tree fort. The attempt to secure secrecy failed, and the Boers were forewarned and fore-armed: all unknown to our men the earthwork at the top of the hill had become a block-house with three tiers of fire. And yet our men rushed up to its walls. Corporal Cooke got on the roof, and Lieutenant Paton was shot dead whilst firing with his revolver through the loop-holes. "The Boers still speak of Paton's courage," says Major Baillie as he passes on. Trooper Muttershek is celebrated in the pages which tell of the greatest fight of the siege, the fight which ended in the capture of Eloff. Muttershek "absolutely declined to surrender and fought on till killed. It wasn't a case of dashing in and dashing out and having your fun and a fight, it was a case of resolution to die sooner than throw down your arms, the wisdom may be questionable, the heroism undoubted. He wasn't taking any surrender." Not all the brave bit the dust. In the same fight McLeod, "the man in charge of the wires," played his part. Here is his portrait:

MacLeod commenced career about armed with a stick and a rifle, and followed by his staff of black men with the idea of directly connecting Major Godley's fort and the headquarters. I may mention McLeod is a sailor and conducts his horse on the principle of a ship. He is perhaps the worst horseman I have ever seen and it says much for the honour of the horse flesh of Mafeking that he is still alive. However, be that as it may, his pawky humour and absolute disregard of danger has made him one of the most amusing features of the siege. You always hear him in broad Scotch and remarkable places, but he is always where he is wanted.

Major Baillie has conceived a great affection for that cattle-stealing tribe, the Baralongs, whose headmen were of so much service to Colonel Baden-Powell. Their qualities are as peculiar as they are valuable. Lieut. F. Smitheman, Colonel Plumer's Intelligence Officer, is the man of all Englishmen in South Africa who understands the Baralong mind: and, observing his ways, Major Baillie says:

It is curious to note how the Englishman associated with the natives identifies himself with his tribe, and becomes a Zulu, Baralong, Fingo, or Basuto with a firm belief that all other natives except his own particular tribe are no good at all and that their methods of fighting are useless. Having heard the point discussed by many of my friends and having witnessed their implicit confidence in their own particular tribe and distrust of the others, one can understand that the foreigner may see something to laugh at in an Englishman's absolute and justified confidence in the English. They call it insularity in Europe. I wonder what they would call its offspring here?

We have read many war books of late; none with more pleasure than this. For there is the real camp-fire smack about Major Baillie's stories and his shrewd soldierly philosophy.

A Forgotten Thinker.

Studies in John the Scot (Erigena.) By Alice Gardner. (Henry Frowde. 2s. 6d.)

WE are afraid that very few people outside the ranks of students of philosophy have ever heard of the name of John the Scot; and, so far as we are aware, this is the first attempt that has been made in England to make the public familiar with the work of one who towered above the men of his time. And the public, not being specially interested in working out the pedigree of abstract ideas, is not without some measure of excuse for its ignorance in this particular instance. For Scotus was a philosopher of the dark ages, and many of the questions he dealt with belong to an entirely different "climate" from ours; while his writings contain a good deal of what Hallam bluntly called "unintelligible rhapsodies of mysticism." But while he made a very free use of allegories, it must be placed to his credit, as a bold, independent, thinker that among the doctrines he disbelieved and treated as allegorical was that of the literal material fire of hell; and at the time he wrote the agonies of the lost seemed to be the central fact of religion. Even with all his mysticism and odour of Middle Age problems, Scotus stands out clearly as a very remarkable man, who was not afraid to discuss all questions in the most fearless manner, and who attained as nearly to the position of agnosticism as it was possible for one of his age to do. A man like this, who was in advance of his time, and had the courage of his opinions, makes an interesting figure; and Miss Gardner, of Newnham College, Cambridge, has produced a bright little volume, which ought to prove acceptable to a wide circle of readers.

The personal element in the volume is very satisfactory, the facts and fictions of the life of Scotus being handled with superior discernment, and narrated with much literary skill. Considering how very little is known about her philosopher, Miss Gardner succeeds in framing a wonderfully realistic picture of that remarkable Irishman John Scotus Erigena, who led the life of a wandering scholar, and was unwearied in his labours to infuse some measure of rationalism into theology, and to rekindle the torch of Greek philosophic thought. But when we pass from the man to the part he played in theology and philosophy opinions will differ regarding the manner in which Miss Gardner has discharged her task. There is decidedly too much of Scotus the theologian, and we might well have been spared somewhat lengthy dissertations on predestination, and symbolism and sacrament. Doubtless Scotus was free from the gross materialism of his time; but the growth of the spirit of rationalism, and the solid work accomplished by the comparative and evolutionary school of thinkers, has largely altered the point of view, and made the startling things of yesterday the commonplaces of to-day. Our authoress would have us believe that the plainest man who has any religion at all is bound to have a teleology and a theodicy of some kind or another, but it is likely to be crude and inconsistent. Even the philosopher, we are told, "must have his in more subtle form, yet it would be rash to say that he more than his humble neighbour has ever attained to consistency." This may be true enough of philosophers who represent Cambridge modes of thought, but it is certainly not true of those philosophers, mostly men of English birth, who, proceeding on M. Sherer's dictum, that "God is the cause of all things, but the explanation of nothing," have with perfect consistency swept away every form of anthropomorphism.

The book is decidedly more interesting, to lay readers, in those portions which depict Scotus as making no vain efforts to force reason to attempt tasks that are quite beyond it, as recognising the principle of the relativity in all knowledge; believing in an unknown God which is a datum of consciousness, but respecting which nothing can be asserted, and always acting on the dictum that authority proceeds from right reason, not reason from authority. We have been surprised, however, to come across such expressions as "an eclectic philosopher," and "a philosophy rationally eclectic," for we have yet to make the acquaintance of a rational and consistent form of eclectic philosophy. There has been much controversy about the method and meaning of Eclecticism, but since Mr. Cousin's time it has become tolerably clear that the system is made up of flimsy sentimentalism and shallow rhetoric, and that, in John Fiske's words, "it has harangued itself to death."

Other New Books.

CONVERSATIONS WITH PRINCE BISMARCK.

EDITED BY SIDNEY
WHATMAN.

This is a selection made by Mr. Sidney Whatman from the publications of that Bismarck's Boswell, Heinrich von Poschinger. It is welcome because, without giving anything new, it condenses and brings within reach some of the more pregnant utterances of him who was perhaps the greatest political mind of the nineteenth century. The editor eulogises the "humour, sarcasm, pathos, pity," of these "keen shafts and sallies," and no one knew his Europe better than the Great Chancellor. But yet how vain the forecasts even of the most acute! Bismarck thought the French war would be followed by six other wars; it has been followed by none. He looked on England as a mere crowd swayed hither and thither by Gladstonian rhetoric, no longer a force that by its nature could persist in a given direction. Gladstone is dead, and the country is once more very like what it used to be in the old Wellingtonian days. He seems to have exaggerated the importance of President Kruger, and mistaken animal cunning for the simple wisdom that might have preserved the Transvaal. Nor did he fully understand that the Nihilism of his day was largely an outcome of hard times—the nations have prospered since, and the revolutionary movement has shrunk into insignificance. Temporary, no doubt. At the ebb of the tide we shall hear again from the Fenians, dynamitards, infernal machine men and destructives, quiet though they be at present. Bismarck, too, knew the personal forces of the hour, but could not judge what their successors would be. These were his limitations, but there were questions in which the virile, sagacious mind seemed incapable of error, as in the passage on agrarian policy on p. 129. No English statesman of our time understands that matter as Bismarck understood it. The whole chapter in which this occurs—a conversation reported by the editor of the Neue Bayerische Landeszeitung—exhibits the sound practical wisdom of Bismarck at its best. "If I am to go through life with certain given principles," he said to a philosophically minded cousin, "it seems to me as though I had to pass through a narrow forest track with a long pole in my mouth." Characteristically the simile was taken from sylvan life. Bismarck's ambition, patriotism, or whatever it was, might lead him to cities and parliaments; but his frank speech and broad humour, his brutal wit and sarcasm, and his delight in hound and trencher were those of a man who would rather hear the lark sing than the mouse squeak. You might call him a Squire Western of genius. (Harper's.)

THE STORY OF BIRD LIFE.

Mr. W. P. Pycraft undertook a difficult task when he tried to give a simple account of the bird's evolution and a description of its main characteristics in one volume. Ornithology is an old science, but it has taken on an entirely new shape since the time of Darwin. There is a tendency in some quarters, and this book is not quite free from it, to press too far some of the deductions from the work of that great naturalist, but in his main lines the student will find him a safe guide. In particular he shows what ought to be studied. Mr. Pycraft gives us the history of what one may call the abstract bird, its reptilian descent, form and structure. There are chapters on wings and flight, courtship, nest-building, migration, distribution, classification, and so on. As soon as the observer has mastered the theory of the subject, he may leave Mr. Pycraft, who, like his model Dr. Bowdler Sharpe, is more of a museum than a field naturalist, and apply the general rule to the individual bird. In other words, he may learn from the book what to look for, and instead of collecting a mass of loose items arrange his knowledge on useful lines. He will note a bird's plumage and as far as possible ascertain the reason of it. We do not know that in all cases that given by Mr. Pycraft will be satisfactory. For example, he refers to certain experiments that aroused much interest at the Zoological Gardens some time ago, the effort being to show that the white on the lowest part of the bodies of certain animals is a help to protection. He gives the rabbit as illustration. Quite true, but it is also a fact that in the dusk you can know a rabbit by its white scut when nothing else would be seen but for that. So it is with those equally timid and harmless creatures, roe-deer—the white renders them visible. Truth to tell, the reasons given for coloration are still to a large extent theoretical and speculative. The young ornithologist, however, will find it of great service to note the following facts about any bird he is interested in—its plumage and its haunts and enemies to see if one is affected by the rest, its beak and method of feeding, of which one probably depends on the other, any special plumes or ornaments donned by it in the breeding season, its nest and the method in which it rears or fails to rear its young, its migrations if it makes any by land and sea, and its song. Such particulars need only an attentive eye and care to gather them, but in the body they make the starting-point of ornithology. Why they do so is admirably explained by the author. (George Newnes. 1s.)

A HISTORY OF EPIC POETRY.

By JOHN CLARK.

THIS excellent little book traces the history of the epic from the time of Virgil onward. It is a novel idea, thus to follow the fortunes of a special literary form, but an idea justified by the execution. It is unusually well written, the criticism exceedingly judicious, it is well proportioned, and—above all—interesting. Perhaps the chief defect which might be alleged is the curt and uncere- monious dismissal of the Hindu epics. The most attractive feature to many will be Mr. Clark's very taking account of the obscurer epics—obscure either from their alien tongue, or the minor character of their authors. To the former class belongs the Kālerala, the curious and curiously formless Icelandic epic. Even the minor epics of Greece and Rome Mr. Clark's keen eye for lurking beauty invests with interest. Quintus Smyrnaeus has his due, and Apollonius Rhodius discloses neglected blossoms. This, for instance (we spare the Greek):

Her heart moved ceaselessly within her breast, as in a room leaps a sunbeam reflected from water that hath been newly poured into a vessel, for it darteth here and there, shaken by the swift whirling. So, too, fluttered the maiden's heart in her breast.

Or yet again this pretty simile:

In such wise did Eros dart a graceful brilliance from the head of fair-haired Aisonides, who drew on himself the lady's bright glances; she dissolved into love as her heart within was warmed, just as the dew, warmed by the morning light, dissolveth round roses.

Statius, too, is appreciatively criticised, though who now reads him? One remembers that phrase so vividly giving the impetuous grasp of the disguised Achilles on the arms which Ulysses displays before him:

Manu consumitur hasta.

Though Mr. Clark does not quote it, he plentifully illustrates the poet's felicity of phrase-making. Altogether, a volume with a poetic insight which sets it far above mere academic compilations. (Oliver & Boyd.)

Fiction.

Little Lady Mary and Her Best Friend. Two Stories. By Horace G. Hutchinson. (Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

IN a short preface Mr. Hutchinson ingeniously apologises for including two stories (actually, there are three) within one cover, and finds his excuse in the fact that the same motive forms the basis of each plot. All three stories turn upon a self-sacrifice. In the brief middle one, the characters belong to the masses: this tale is a failure; it is not realised. In the other two the characters belong to the classes, and both are distinctly successful. "Little Lady Mary" makes periodic excursions from her husband's side, and refuses to disclose to him the place of her sojourn or the reason thereof. Rather than saddle him with the knowledge that the condition of her health necessitates several serious operations, she incurs suspicion and suffers unpleasantness. The situation reminds one of that between Jules Desmarets and Clémence in Balzac's Ferragus. Ultimately a grave risk of dying compels her to enlighten her husband; she then recovers, and perfect happiness is achieved. In the second story an unmarried man is in love with a married woman. The latter's husband cheats at cards, and to save the woman from a disastrous grief, the lover, by allowing himself to be suspected, enables the husband to go scot-free. The death of the husband is the lover's reward.

It will be perceived that neither plot shows much freshness of invention in its main outlines. In the first, the conduct of Lady Mary, and in the second, the preservation of the husband's written confession, are points as to which the author scarcely convinces us. The tales are, however, both fresh and agreeable. Mr. Hutchinson appears to know the political and social world; he is lavish with a pretty sentiment which is not maudlin; and he can draw the portrait of a charming woman. "Little Lady Mary" and Mrs. Falconer, the two heroines, are truly delightful. What distinguishes the whole book is a certain delicacy and sobriety both of statement and of feeling—a fine natural reticence and literary good taste. The writing is at once careful and adroit, but there are places, at somewhat frequent intervals, where Mr. Hutchinson utilizes the outworn clichés of domestic fiction:

Lady Worthing's Saturday to Monday parties—for it was she whom Little Lady Mary affectionately addressed as "M'amie"—were famous. Her husband was a staunch representative of the old-fashioned landed interest, but his wife's parties, in their historical country house, included all the most interesting men, and (should one not add?) women, on either side of politics, and, besides, all that were best known in science, art, or literature. You could not tell whom you might not meet in that curious medley, but you might be certain that none whom you would meet would be altogether undistinguished or hopelessly dull. It goes surely without the saying that the unique character of the Worthings' house-parties was due rather to the indefinable charm of the hostess' personality. . . .

Doubtless exactly such parties and exactly such hostesses are to be found in the world, and may therefore be described in novels; but the describing novelist, at this time of day, should seek a fresh terminology and more precise definition.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE MAN-STEALERS.

BY M. P. SHIEL.

Mr. Shiel's new novel deals with the time and events immediately following the banishment of Napoleon to St. Helena. We witness the operations of certain secret societies formed in Paris with the aim of "either . . . getting Napoleon out of St. Helena, or the vaguer one of revenge; and in both cases the mind turned naturally to one man—the Duke of Wellington." Hence the story is correctly described by its sub-title: "An Incident in the Life of the Iron Duke." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

MISS'ESS JOY.

BY JOHN LE BRETON.

Joy is Farmer Eden's daughter; and, being a strong man, he takes her to his home when Joy's unwedded mother dies. There is consternation among the farmer's sisters; much moral flutter and dread of consequences. Farmer Eden's French housekeeper—a wise woman—enjoys the situation sardonically; and Joy's childish beauty, contrasting with the regular Eden stamp, wins hearts. We watch her growth, and all the ironies and fatalities that beset it. The level of the author's Miss Tudor and Unholy Matrimony is maintained. A strong story. (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE.

BY ELLEN GLASGOW.

A story of American life by the author of Phases of an Inferior Planet. We watch the hero's career from farmer's boy to judge. "There ar'n't nothin' in peanut-raisin'" is Nick Burr's early conviction; he accounted a judge's career "cleaner work." The story is a strong commentary on the lynching practices which are the disgrace of certain States of America. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE FATHER CONFESSOR:

BY DORA SIGERSON
STORIES OF DEATH AND DANGER. SHORTER.

Seventeen "stories of death and danger." Mrs. Shorter's strong imagination and forcible style ensure the reader's interest. The first story tells how a husband, inspired by De Quincey's essay on "Murder as one of the Fine Arts," brings about his wife's death by means of which the law can take no cognisance. The priest to whom he makes confession has a personal interest in the drama. (Ward, Lock.)

THE STRONGARM.

BY ROBERT BARR.

Mr. Barr's new novel is a Rhineland romance of the olden days. Castles, intrigues, archbishops, barons, outlaws, and men-at-arms. The action never rests. Ten short stories follow the one which gives its title to the volume. Mr. Barr had some difficulty in naming his novel, and on a flyleaf he recalls Sir Walter Scott's experience with Rob Roy: "When the author projected this further encroachment on the patience of an indulgent public, he was at some loss for a title; a good name being very nearly of as much consequence in literature as in life." (Methuen. 6s.)

ON ALLEN SHORES.

BY LESLIE KEITH.

A story of modern society life, its ambitions and difficulties, by the author of The Mischief-Maker. The imprudent but happy marriage of Susannah Berentine, and her consequent plunge from West-End brilliance and prospects of wealth into suburban dullness and small economies, is the motive of the story; which, however, takes up new interests as it proceeds. The portrait of Mrs. William Berentine, Susie's aunt, a typical good-natured, but convention-bound, Society woman, is well sketched. On her first visit to Susie's suburban home she came in a cab, to spare the feelings of her coachman; "it was out of a growler she stepped, wearing a dress nicely calculated to express her shocked sense of Susie's sins; a black silk, rather shabby, and a bonnet out of which she had taken the feathers." (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

BLOOD TRACKS OF THE BUSH.

BY SIMPSON NEWLAND.

All that is dramatic in Bush life seems to be piled up in this story, which resembles the author's earlier novel, Paring the Way, in being a romance of wild and lurid adventures, and strange complexities of plot. "Across the boundless wilds of Australia fate had pursued and overtaken him, in the shape of the man he most dreaded to meet. 'Dismount' was the second command, and he found himself standing on the ground. . . . 'Take off your clothes, everything'! For one second Gilbert hesitated. 'Beware.' And the revolver grew steady." (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

THE UTMOST FARTHING.

BY B. PAUL NEUMAN.

A study of revenge. The passion is developed in the heart of a London girl whose family has come down in the world through—as she conceives—the financial treachery of a friend of her father's. The suburban and commercial surroundings of the Medlett and Croft families form an effective and well-studied background to Nora Croft's sleepless and dangerous desire for vengeance. (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE MINISTER'S GUEST.

BY ISABEL SMITH.

A close study of Dissenting life, narrow views, and religious busybodies. We are spared none of the dreariness of Duck Lane chapel; its "damp and warmed pew varnish and musty cushions"; the creaking of the deacons' boots as they walk in; and evangelical preaching in the dim light. The story is written with knowledge. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

James Lane Allen.

An Inquiry.

WHEN a book attains a large circulation one usually says that it succeeds. But the fine books succeed of themselves, by their own virtue, and apart from the acclamatory noises of fame. Immure them in cabinets, cast them into Sahara: still they imperturbably succeed. If on a rare occasion such a book sells by scores of thousands, it is not the book, but the public, which succeeds; it is not the book, but the public, which has emerged splendidly from a trial. Look at this following passage, and say whether the author or his readers are the more to be congratulated on the fact that the book containing it has met with wide popular acceptance:

Poor old schoolhouse, long since become scattered ashes! Poor little backwoods academicians, driven in about sunrise, driven out toward dusk! Poor little tired backs with nothing to lean against! Poor little bare feet that could never reach the floor! Poor little droop-headed figures, so sleepy in the long summer days, so afraid to fall asleep! Long, long since, little children of the past, your backs have become straight enough, measured on the same cool bed; sooner or later your feet, wherever wandering, have found their resting-places in the soft earth; and all your drooping heads have gone to sleep on the same dreamless pillow and there are sleeping. And the young schoolmaster, who seemed exempt from frailty while he guarded like a sentinel that lone outpost of the alphabet—he, too, has long since joined the choir invisible of the immortal dead. But there is something left of him though more than a century has passed away: something that has wandered far down the course of time to us like the faint summer fragrance of a young tree long since fallen dead in its wintered forest, like a dim radiance yet travelling onward into space from an orb turned black and cold, like an old melody surviving on and on in the air without any instrument, without any strings.

A fine book is above the populace; if the populace reaches up to it, let us praise the populace. Mr. Allen's novel, The Choir Invisible, has been bought in America to the extent of two hundred thousand copies. America has succeeded brilliantly; America has, in fact, surpassed England, even assuming that her population is twice ours, for no book of equal merit with Mr. Allen's ever had half such a welcome from ourselves—that is to say, within a similar period of time. The phenomenon of that two hundred thousand must give pause to the facile generalisations of those who are saddened and disgusted by the triumph of mitigated rubbish. It must tend to reinstate the public in the artist's esteem, to correct an undue pessimism, and to establish a sane and proper belief in the "ultimate decency" of the average man. What, despised average man, you like this, you pay a dollar and a half for this! Miracles, then, have not ceased! . . . But why should the thing be a miracle? Say, not that miracles have not ceased, but that they have never begun. The two hundred thousand which aspired to The Choir Invisible did not aspire by chance. They, and perhaps two hundred thousand more, are always alert, longing, anxious to appreciate and ascend towards some nobility above them. Not all nobility is for their eyes, but when their eyes see their hearts are lifted. And let no one think that these phrases are inappropriate here.

The Choir Invisible, like Mr. Allen's latest novel, The Increasing Purpose, is the story of a superb moral struggle; and the action of both books passes chiefly amid rural scenes, close to the earth and to the calm, uncomplaining beasts of the field. Mr. Allen is the novelist of Kentucky. In reading him one is made conscious of the fact that the United States is not a single country, but several. Kentucky, with its glorious grass, its ancient homesteads and hospitality, its Roman delight in fine roads; Kentucky, which with a population of two millions has only one town of over five thousand inhabitants, seems as unlike the America of our imagination as old middle England itself. Indeed, it is a true offshoot of old England, descended by way of Virginia. And one has a comfortable suspicion that this, and not roaring New York nor Chicago affronting the skies, is the real, valid America. In all Mr. Allen's work you will find two governing ideas, the idea of the beauty of the earth, and the idea of the moral grandeur of human nature. These ideas monopolise his imagination. He does not wilfully ignore ugliness and meanness, nor seek dishonestly to hide them—he has no time to attend to them, being otherwise busy. In The Choir Invisible we have a picture of Kentucky while Washington was yet alive. It was less civilised then and less tamed, but more colossal in its solitudes, and not less lovely. The book is a series of rhapsodies upon Kentuckian earth. In such an amphitheatre Mr. Allen places two human beings whose moral strength and moral beauty make them truly heroic—John Gray, the young schoolmaster, and Jessica Falconer, a great lady married to a gentleman-farmer. These two fall in love: that is all the tragedy. Jessica is Mr. Allen's finest achievement. He has lavished upon her the supreme efforts of an imagination which by instinct turns women into angels. When John Gray, in a valedictory sermon, exhorts his schoolboys to mend their ways, he adds: "As for my little girls, they are good enough as they are." That is the voice of Mr. Allen. As for Jessica, who, by the way, is thirty-eight, her purity is almost passionate; yet she is warm-blooded, she has sex. She might be a composite of Gautier's de Maupin, and one of Christina Rossetti's nuns. High above John Gray and everyone else, she exists as an embodied ideal. The schoolmaster is desolated by his terrible struggles against temptation; but she, victimised by a love perhaps more consuming than his own, knows neither hesitancy nor fear. Fate has no stroke which she cannot bear in dignity and grace, and with inimitable fortitude she draws even from the final disaster a consolation. Jessica is a woman to rouse one's enthusiasm; certainly, she roused her author's; his sympathy with her is so constant, so intense, so righteous, and so intimate, that no other could hope to match it; one feels that he alone of all men will ever fully appreciate Jessica.

The cause of the popularity of The Choir Invisible is apparent. The book is the expression of a temperament at once kindly, profound, and simple, but, above all, simple—a temperament which, while absorbing modern ideas, has retained the charm of ancient ways. Mr. Allen is an ingenuous writer. In technique he has some of the quaint, surprising simplicity of Balzac. No considerations of literary custom, no narrow regard for a superficial realism, will prevent him from arriving in the directest manner that occurs to him. He cares little for the trickeries of the expert penman. In none of his books is there, perhaps, anything so extraordinarily bold as the treatise on Swedenborg in Balzac's Seraphita; but again and again Mr. Allen abandons his narrative entirely in order to discourse, or make his persons discourse, on some moral point, the exposition of which may assist him in the business of characterisation. Note that it is always a moral point. Here we are concerned with morals; the question is invariably of right-doing or wrong-doing; God and Conscience command the scene. And poor Humanity, rendered grandiose by Mr. Allen's large and sublime trust in the soul, makes a brave show. That is the inmost secret. Can you not see the two hundred thousand, reassured by Mr. Allen's simplicity, strengthened by his faith, charmed by his fine chivalry to women—can you not see them, now, watching with intent and content faces the mighty struggle of John and Jessica against themselves and circumstance, confident of the result, and deriving from the spectacle a personal stimulus and complacency? "If this is human nature," they muse, "then we are not so bad after all." (And we are not.) Long-dormant impulses are reawakened, forgotten purposes remembered, and for a time the world runs better because of Mr. Allen. Esthetically, The Choir Invisible reaches a high standard. Imperfect it is, but it is noble—nobly conceived, nobly imagined, and nobly written. Its imperfection is due partly to Mr. Allen's lack of fertility and skill in the invention of incident, but more to a general looseness and inconsequence of construction. To borrow the terms of music, Mr. Allen seems to have been satisfied with the fantasia form when he should have used that of the sonata.

In these technical respects, The Increasing Purpose is an improvement upon The Choir Invisible, but the later book has scarcely the rich glow of its forerunner. The hero of The Increasing Purpose is the son of a poor, old-fashioned, narrow-minded Kentucky yeoman, who after exasperating hardships reached college, intending to become a minister; but there he found Darwin, and losing his faith in any dogmatic creed was expelled from Alma Mater. David's tragic return home—"I always knew there was nothing in you," was his father's bitter sentence—is magnificently done; and the description of his subsequent life on the farm discloses Mr. Allen's feeling for nature and animals at its most intimate and most admirable. The weak portion of the book is the last, where David falls in love with a delightful schoolmistress, and so recoups himself for previous loss of happiness. These scenes appear to be over-subtilised, and decidedly they fail in original imaginative power. There is, moreover, too much clever chatter (we hesitate to say that it is devised ad captandum vulgus) about men and women. For example:

"I may do very well with science, but I am not so sure about women."

"Aren't women science?"

"They are a branch of theology," he said; "they are what a man thinks about when he begins to probe his Destiny."

Mr. Allen might well leave mere cleverness to the merely clever, resting content with the simplicity of his own individual genius. Now there is a book—or, rather, there are two books making one—which seem to us to be more personally and specially Mr. Allen's than even The Choir Invisible, and which, preceding that novel in date of composition, constitute the most perfect work he has yet accomplished, if not the biggest. We refer to A Kentucky Cardinal and its sequel, Aftermath. Mr. Allen has here set down, in quasi-diary form, the ideas and sensations of a nature-lover, who was for a time snatched away from nature by an angelic woman, and who returned to nature saddened and ennobled by the catastrophe of that woman's death. The story is not conceived in the grand manner of The Choir Invisible; it is smaller, less considerable, but in achievement it is exquisite: its wit, its humour, its wisdom, and its tenderness must surely be among the best that ever came out of America. It is a radiant and marvellous little work, and from the playfulness of the opening to the austere sweet melancholy of the close it entrances and enchants. It may never be popular, but more than anything else it will help to sustain Mr. Allen's reputation with those few upon whose decision his reputation must ultimately depend.

Things Seen.

Mère Tue-Mouche.

MÈRE TUE-MOUCHE they called her, and she lived alone in the little white-washed house at the end of the village, where, at the foot of the hill, the path ran down to the sea-wall. The sun was strong and the heat was stifling, and at all times you would see her standing in the open doorway to breathe the air. She was very brown and very wrinkled, but erect for all her age; exceedingly picturesque she looked against the blackness of the darkened room, in her blue apron and her spotlessly white Norman cap, beneath which the pleasant eyes shone out from the kind old face.

There were two things that had no place in Madame's placid philosophy, and they were dust and flies. Especially against the latter she waged—gently, methodically, and without malice—an unceasing warfare. In her work of slaughter—for which her only weapon was a folded cloth—she showed no emotion, no haste; she would come to the doorway to taste the sunlight, slowly flick flick, and she would stop to exchange a cheery "Bonjour, madame, il fait bien beau, n'est ce pas?" with a passing friend. Then she would walk round the white walls and flick, flick, flick; for flies might have no more peace without than within. Back to the doorway, a pause, another "Bonjour," and again from within the room would come the flick, flick, flick as before. She never ceased in her task, she only paused—not from weariness nor from remorse, but because for the time she saw no more victims; very soon it began again.

So they called her Mère Tue-Mouche. She was standing in the doorway killing flies when I saw her last. And if I pass again by the little white house at the foot of the hill, I know she will still be there—unless, in the meanwhile, gently, methodically, and without malice, she too has been swept away in her turn.

A Lady and Gentleman.

THEY sat opposite to me in a second-class railway carriage, a little boy between them.

She was much older than the man—she must have been fifty at least, and he was quite ten years younger. A widow's bonnet surmounted her pretty, silvery hair; a pathetic tremble of the chin marked her bereavement as recent. But she listened with a gentle, appreciative interest—not the less charming that it was maintained with effort—to the stories which her military-looking friend was relating with an embellishment that was evidently prompted by an anxious desire to please her.

I noticed that topics relating to the war were carefully avoided—perhaps her husband had been a soldier. There was still, in spite of her sorrow, a faint look of hope about her—a vague expectancy in the gaze that wandered to the swiftly-receding darkness outside.

Possibly an elder son was fighting now; for when at a station a soldier in khaki passed the window the little boy looked up with an excited exclamation of "Charlie!" that caused a spasm of pain to pass over her lips.

The friend was a big man, with a sunburnt face, upon which the past years had written a number of kind little lines. He sympathetically drew the little fellow's attention away from his mother, and together they had a merry battle of childish wit and nonsense.

And so they helped each other—a perfect lady and a perfect gentleman—she never letting him see the struggle it was to hear him with a smile—such a pretty smile in its sad patience; he as gentle and chivalrous to the faded woman beside him as if she had all the charm of youth. He paid her little compliments that the veriest baby could have seen through; and she accepted them in gratitude for the kind heart that had prompted their utterance.

A Lady and a Gentleman

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

It is a long time since I have enjoyed so thoroughly a French novel as I enjoyed lately Jacquon le Croquant, by M. Eugène le Roy. The story is a vivid and delightful study of rural life after the Restoration. It is nothing of the nature of an historical novel, though the world sixty or seventy years ago seems as far removed from us almost as a couple of centuries. It is the revival of a forgotten period so brilliantly done, of such a rare and captivating charm, of such a rich and deep simplicity, as to seize the reader with all the intensity of actual fact. Indeed, you could scarcely call it a novel, such is the breathing reality of its inspiration. There are no adventures, no hair-breadth escapes, no wild flights of imagination such as we associate with our notion of a tale placed in an outlived period; but the characterisation is striking, full of quiet originality, of delicacy and reserve. The main features apart from the rustic atmosphere, which is admirably suggested, are the delineation of the hateful hardness and cruelty of the parvenu aristocrats, offspring of the Revolution, and the bitter rivalries of the congregationalists and the regular clergy, which have had such a disastrous influence upon French modern politics.

This book is written in autobiographical form. Jacquon tells his own story in the language of an intelligent and educated rustic, and the tale is one of courage, of pathos, with all the gracious surprises life holds in store for the worst-treated creature that ever drew breath. For this is the great, the eternal lesson of experience. With humour and courage no existence can be entirely sombre, whatever terrible tragedies may shake it. This little lad bears his troubles bravely, unconscious of his heroism, and when a ray of sunshine falls athwart his path he has the grace and sense to profit by it. The scenery of Perigord is painted with a master hand; you live in it as you turn the pages, and the dialect is not difficult or rough to the eye. In this quaint land they worship God, the Devil, and, far greater and more mysterious than either, the Maker of Rain. Nothing could be more charming than the opening pages describing the midnight Christmas Mass, and the walk home from the Castle where it was celebrated of the child and his mother through a wild, snowy landscape. The details noted are so exactly what would strike a peasant child who had some innate delicacy of sentiment and the gift of acute observation. When they get back to their cold and comfortless cabin, in terror of the wolves, the mother gives the boy a morsel of food, and he writes: "Eating this ball of maize flour, kneaded in water, cooked with cabbage leaves without a bit of lard inside, and quite cold, I thought of all the good things seen in the Castle kitchen, and—I won't hide it—it made me find the morsel bad, as it was really; but usually I did not mind it." This is the gallant spirit in which both child and man meet the most terrible misfortunes. At the end he revolts against his horrible persecutors, the titled landlord and his equally iniquitous agent, and wreaks a dire but well-merited vengeance. "Why up there in the Castle so many good things, and down here in this cabin nothing but cold, stale morsels to eat? In my child's head I did not put the question so clearly, but all the same I felt there was something not quite right." I hardly know what to praise most in the style: its perfect lack of pretension, its seemingly unstudied and virile charm, its rough elegance, all of which are the result of a hidden art.

In no Irish tale is there a worse landlord, a more insolent agent than the Comte de Nunzac and his miserable creatures; in none a more infamous example of injustice in an eviction. Jacquon's father, a brave unfortunate, struggling with undeserved calamities, shoots the agent, who has just shot his beloved dog on the pretext that the Count objects to a peasant possessing a hound. Here begins the tragedy which a quarrel between an unscrupulous lord of the soil and a poor helpless peasant, his victim, ever is. The mother is a silent heroic figure, one of those figures of wife and mother made to redeem a race, a superb, reticent, unconsciously noble peasant woman, to whose thrift and endurance France owes the better part of her greatness and prosperity.

The most lovable character of this remarkable book is the curé Bonal, the most human of saints—hated and persecuted by the Jesuits—in power under the Restoration, because he had accepted the Republic and the Empire, convinced that it is a priest's duty to do good to his neighbours instead of meddling with politics. Into these generous hands Jacquon, orphaned under tragic circumstances, falls for his happiness. The curé dresses him, feeds him, teaches him, makes a servant of him first and then a friend, and the boy's gratitude and devotion are boundless. There is a delightful chevalier and his angelic sister Hermine, two old unmarried aristocrats, who give the little they possess to the poor, and adopt Jacquon as well as the curé. These pages are full of sweetness and brightness, but the wicked Count and the wicked Jesuits have their eyes malevolently fixed on this little terrestrial paradise. The congregationalists do not stop until they have spread the charge of atheism against the curé, and with unutterable baseness attack the private characters of two such exquisite souls as the old priest and the old maid. The upshot of their hideous intrigues is the sentence of excommunication, and the ex-curé turns peasant with Jacquon and dies of a broken heart, passionately revered by his parishioners, who only accept his successor, after heaping every insult upon him, at the prayers of their old disgraced pastor. Jacquon's idyllic love affair is delightfully told, and lightens up the sombre episode of his burning down his ancient enemy's castle and casting the family adrift. The whole book is original and quaint, like the life it treats of.

H. L.

Correspondence.

Mr. Robertson's "Introduction to English Politics."

SIR,—In a current number of the ACADEMY the review of J. M. Robertson's Introduction to English Politics struck me as being in many ways most remarkable. As I am now reading the book, so mercilessly "slated" by your reviewer, for the third time, I am driven to prove my appreciation of it by a protesting word or two.

1. Why are the words "demotic" and "subsume" jargon? If "demotic" is jargon, so are "erotic" and "neurotic," both of which are now exceedingly common. What other words will serve the purpose better? "Subsume," too, is as good as "résumé" (used by your reviewer along with "métier," although there are English equivalents), or as "pre-, con-, and re-sume."

2. Why is Mr. Jenks's definition of politics "practical and scholarly"? "By politics we mean the business of government—that is to say, the control and management of people living together in a society." Mr. Robertson's definition is: "Politics, in its most general and fundamental character, is the strife of wills on the ground of social action. As international politics is the sum of the strifes and compromises of States, so home politics is the sum of the strifes and compromises of classes, interests, factions, sects, theorists." This definition may not be "practical or scholarly"; but, at any rate, it is true, and your reviewer will find his work cut out for him to prove it otherwise.

3. In the course of his argument Mr. Robertson always informs his readers on what evidence he has built up his synthesis. Will your reviewer be good enough to point out where the syntheses are false, or a more fruitful method of inquiry, and more intellectually invigorating?

4. Can anything but good result from a revision of certain historical shibboleths, such as the Greeks had a genius for this and the Teutons for that, &c.; art thrives best under a despotism; war is good for trade, &c.?

5. Mr. Robertson has set himself a task of enormous difficulty; but in his preamble he modestly says: "And I can but hope that by setting up, as it seeks to do, a series of provocations to the study and discussions of tendencies and principles, it will help to provide what safeguards are needed to its own errors" (italics are mine); therefore, it behoves a reviewer who taunts the author with writing "red rags of politics" to accept that challenge, and specify the errors.—I am, &c.,

F. KETTLE.

[These observations scarcely call for reply. At his best moments, and I gladly admitted how good they are, Mr. Robertson himself avoids jargon of the demotic order. What I said about his definition was, that it was vague and, by implication, that it was not as simple, practical, and scholarly as that I quoted. Anyone may judge for himself how far this was justified. In regard to the so-called "historical shibboleths," my point was that the analogy of nature is against the author: as different breeds of other animals have their several capacities, so have the breeds of men. My main desire was to show that the depressing pessimism of Mr. Robertson's conclusions is not justified by the facts, and has probably been reached by his too concentrated attention on issues that are either dead or act as red rags on an interesting but not judicial temperament. Mr. Kettle dwells on the little questions, but shirks the big ones.—YOUR REVIEWER.]

Style.

SIR,—I think your anonymous inquirer for "Aids to Style" has been hardly dealt with by some of the prize answerers, and that notably the prize-winner's remarks are beside the point. There seems to be a fallacy somewhere in his implied assumption that because "you cannot be a good stylist if you have no brains," therefore if you have brains you must be a good stylist. The inquirer will, indeed, be puzzled if after reading Mr. Armstrong's authoritative dicta he turns to your review of the works of Mrs. Steel and Mrs. Caffyn on page 13.

It is hardly credible that anybody with literary experience should suppose that "ability to conceive an interesting subject will ensure (the) telling of it in an interesting manner." As well might one assert that the possession of a block of fine marble ensures the eventual production of a fine statue; no doubt there would be no statue without the marble. Again—"Get something great to write about, and you may be sure that your method of putting it into words will also be great"! There really is an art of expression quite apart from the abundance or otherwise of the matter waiting to be expressed. Hume and Bentham had both plenty to say; Hume succeeded in saying it, Bentham failed. Swift on the other hand could write well upon a broomstick. There is a whole class of literary work which depends for its charm on a dallying with "airy nothings."

Certainly brains are essential for this sort of work; but the question to which your inquirer wanted an answer was, I take it, this: What are the points on which you should concentrate your brains, if you are to succeed in the very difficult operation of transmuting thought into literary speech? Now whether it be possible to give a useful answer to this question or not, it is certain that the process is not the same as that by which ideas are conceived and stored.—I am, &c.,

J. M. S.

SIR,—The letter which gained the prize in your competition last week asserts that there is no such thing as style, per se; that it is but the expression of intellect, and that the ability to conceive an interesting subject ensures that the telling of it will be interesting. Several of the other letters you quote say much the same thing in other words.

In another part of the same number there is a criticism of two recent novels, in which the writer gives unstinted praise to the exceptional gifts of the authors—allows them insight, imaginative power, sympathy, and says that they have chosen fine subjects which they fully understand, but that their books are almost unreadable because they have never taken the trouble to learn the essential part of their business—that they cannot write.

If the ingenuous writer of the request which prompted last week's competition reads the ACADEMY in a teachable and receptive spirit, as seems probable, will not he (or she) be somewhat bewildered?—I am, &c.,

7, Gordon-street, W.C.

E. M. SMITH.

[We are, of course, not responsible for the views of our competitors; and it must not be supposed that we endorse Mr. Armstrong's hints on Style without qualification; but we think that he meant more by "conceive" than his correspondents allow, and that his letter shows this.—ED.]

A Correction.

SIR,—I notice a statement on the front page of the ACADEMY of this week which is not at all correct. You say that Mr. Hall Caine received £1,500 for the serial rights of his story, The Eternal City. This is not correct. The sum we have paid Mr. Hall Caine for the British serial rights alone is far in excess of this.—We are, &c.,

C. ARTHUR PEARSON, LTD.

(PETER KEARY, Managing Director.)

Henrietta Street, London, W.C.:

July 6, 1900.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

A HISTORY OF GREECE.

By J. B. BURY.

Prof. Bury's ripe scholarship has already been exhibited to the literary world in his edition of Gibbon's Decline and Fall. In this history of Greece his aim is educational in its plan and aims, but it is also intended to reach a wider circle than students. The book is about the size of Green's Shorter History of England, and is admirably equipped with maps and illustrations. (Methuen. 8s. 6d.)

LETTERS RECEIVED BY THE EAST INDIA COMPANY. VOL. IV.

ED. BY WILLIAM FORSTER.

This volume, in a series of great interest, contains documents relating to the year 1616. This was an important year in our early relations with India: it saw the foundations by Roe of English influence at the Mogul court, the despatch of the first trading ship to a Persian port, and the first permanent settlement on the Coromandel coast. (Sampson Low.)

SCRAMBLES IN THE EASTERN GRAIANS. BY GEORGE YELD.

This book, by the author of the Alpine Journal, will interest all mountaineers. The author insists on the special charms of mountains which rise from the almost tropical luxury of the Aosta valley to the cold and solitude of great peaks and glaciers. "The Cogne group is still unswept by the wave of tourists which annually floods so many districts of the Alps, and the lover of the mountains may enjoy their glories and the treasures of an unequalled flora all unvexed." (Unwin.)

MEMORIES OF SOME OXFORD PETS, BY THEIR FRIENDS.

COLLECTED BY MRS. WALLACE.

This is a pleasant little book about dogs and cats and other pets which have lived snug lives at Oxford. The most notable is undoubtedly Oriol Bill, the world-famed bulldog of Oriol College, who died two years ago. A portrait of Oriol Bill is the frontispiece of the book. A distinguished professor of Oriol wrote, when he received his appointment: "My highest ambition is gratified, now that I am part owner of Oriol Bill." This fine dog knew every member of the college; and "the more he lived among us, the more he caught the humour of the place." (Oxford: B. H. Blackwell.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received:

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Delmar (Alex.), Ancient Britain in the Light of Modern Archaeological Discoveries (Clarendon Press, New York)
Hurd (Percy A.), People You Know (Arrowsmith)
Mackenzie (Prof. W. Douglas), South Africa: Its History, Heroes, and Wars (Marshall & Son) net 6 0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Schmeil (Dr. Otto), Text-Book of Zoology. Part I. Mammals (Black)
Leicester (Mary), The Philosophy of Many Things (Lloyd)
Clark (John Bates), The Distribution of Wealth Macmillan net 12 6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Clover (Sam T.), Glimpses Across the Sea (Windiknowe Publishing Co.)

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Kastner (L. F.), and Atkins (H. G.), A Short History of French Literature (Blackie) 4 6

EDUCATIONAL.

Ewart (Alfred J.), First Stage Botany, as Illustrated by Flowering Plants (Clive) 2 0
Vince (J. H.), Ovid—Metamorphoses: Selections (Blackwood) 1 6
Duff (J. Wight), Johnson's Lives of Milton and Addison (Blackwood) 2 6
Scott (Sir W.), Lady of the Lake (Blackwood) 2 6
Sandford (Philip), The Aeneid of Virgil, Book III. (Blackie) 1 6
Weekley (Ernest), Le Songe D'Or and Other Stories (Blackie)
Smith (D. Nichol), Dryden's Essay: Of Dramatic Poesy (Blackie) 2 0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rehmann (Dr.) and Seiler (Dr.), The Human Frame and the Laws of Health (Dent) net 1 0
Index to the Periodicals of 1899 (Mowbray House) net 10 0
Hale (Captain M. H.), Volunteer Soldiers (Kegan Paul) 1 0
Butler (Josephine E.), Native Races and the War (Gay & Bird)
Millock (M. M.), The Economics of Modern Cookery (Macmillan) 3 6
Layritz (Lieut.-Col. Olfried), Mechanical Traction in War (Simpson Low)

NEW EDITIONS.

Borrow (George), Lavengro (Ward, Lock) 2 0

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 42 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best plot for a gruesome-grotesque novel on the model of Mr. Bernard Capes's plot of "The Dead Cook under the Coal Shoot" (Cornhill Magazine, July). The answers we have received are few, and they do not make pretty reading. Our competitors have emulated Mr. Capes's tragedy but not his tact. On the whole, the prize is due to Mr. Ernest H. Harrison, 43, Hopton-road, Streatham, S.W., for

THE FATE OF THE EXTRAORDINARY COMPANY PROMOTER.

A series of appalling calamities take place, defying the utmost efforts of prevention. In one week a great railway accident, an immense conflagration, and several other terrible disasters, in which hundreds of lives are lost, alarm the country. A short while before the M.F.S. Company had been successfully floated by an eccentric and successful company promoter, whom we may call Jopley. The mysterious expectations of the new company succeed in creating an enormous rush on the shares. As a result there is a gigantic financial panic on 'Change. The horror of the nation is increased by the number of bodies that still await interment. Jopley is equal to the occasion, and comes forward with his newly-formed company, offering to bury them all immediately and at almost infinitesimal expense. His proposal is first violently assailed, then accepted. The company's fine steamship is at once commissioned, and its gruesome cargo shipped without delay. Jopley sets off on the fateful voyage, accompanied by a large circle of friends of as doubtful a reputation as himself. When they are gone a strong body of his opponents—chiefly undertakers, paid mourners, and coffin-makers—raise a howl of indignation, inflamed by Jopley's extensively circulated pamphlet on "A Rational Burial System." A logical detective becomes suspicious, commences statistical calcu-ations and comparisons, and finally proves that the recent great disasters must have been the work of miscreants. Investigation into the Company's affairs discloses strange secrets. Jopley's dastardly scheme is gradually unfolded, and the net is drawn closer. The strange conditions of the state of preparedness in which the M.F.S. Company were after Jopley's proposal are thrown into lurid light by the discovery that the letters "M.F.S." stand for "Marine Funeral Steamship." This the logical detective works out from a perusal of Jopley's pamphlet, and of the extraordinarily vague prospectus of the Company. The country is in a ferment at these disclosures, and, lashed into a fury by the proof of such dastardly outrages, awaits Jopley's return. The weeks fly past, then months and years, but nothing is ever heard of Jopley again save weird rumours and startling tales of his fate.

Another reply is as follows:

THE KODAK.

Mulberry Smithson, a wealthy merchant, purchases old country manor house; retires there with wife and daughter, Annelida; agrees with vendor to keep in his employment his housekeeper. She says that one room is haunted by ghost of last representative of family that built the house. This gentleman mortgaged the estate to a lawyer, who foreclosed and ousted him, meaning to reside there himself. The day before the lawyer was to enter the owner having first left on the table a declaration that his ghost would murder any one who slept in the room for ever after cut his throat in the best bedroom. The lawyer slept in this room the next night, and was found with his throat cut in the morning (add details to liking). No one had slept there since.

Annelida tells her maid of her resolve to sleep in this room; binds her to silence. Maid, being alarmed, goes to room in the night, finds Annelida with throat cut; screams and swoons on the body; household rush in, in various deshabilles. Mrs. Smithson dies in a fit. No trace of murderer.

American detective employed to investigate. Behaviour of maid arouses his suspicion. He overhears her talk in her sleep; taxes her with the crime, and threatens arrest unless she confesses. She confesses that rejected lover of Annelida bribed her to communicate to him all Annelida's actions. She told him of Annelida's intention to sleep in the room. By accident she discovered he had obtained admission to the room the night Annelida was murdered; accused him of murder. He confessed, but threatened to implicate her if she told.

Detective, finding half a broken shirt-button in the room, traces lover thereby to London, thence to the Transvaal, where he has enlisted in Boer army; follows him to war. Lover wounded; nursed by detective, who decoys him to Delagoa, has him arrested, and confined on British man-of-war. Lover hangs himself in cabin with his braces; leaves confession that he bade Annelida choose between his love or his knife; she chose the latter.

Mulberry Smithson goes mad; raves amid maniacal laughter of Annelida's beautiful necklace "of rich, blood-red rubies—blood-red!—blood-red!" [G. W. H., Manchester.]

Other replies received from: E. L. C., Redhill; G. S., Banbury; E. R. S., Croydon; C. E. B. P., Alton; T. C., Buxted; N. A., Kent; T. V. N., Essex.

Competition No. 43 (New Series).

We offer this week a prize of One Guinea for the best rendering of the following lyric by Alfred de Musset:

DERNIERS VERS.

J'ai perdu ma force et ma vie,
Et mes amis, et ma gaieté:
J'ai perdu jusqu'à la fierté
Qui faisait croire à mon génie.
Quand j'ai connu la vérité,
J'ai cru que c'était une amie.
Quand je l'ai comprise et sentie,
J'en étais déjà dégoûté.
Et pourtant elle est éternelle,
Et ceux qui se sont passés d'elle
Ici bas ont tout ignoré.
Dieu parle, il faut qu'on lui réponde.
Le seul bien qui me reste au monde
Est d'avoir quelquefois pleuré.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 17. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

CATALOGUES.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 2 may be had on application,
price 2s. 6d., at

1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

15th and 16th CENTURY BOOKS; AMERICANA;
85 LOST or UNKNOWN BOOKS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done 10d per 1,000 words. Samples and references
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSEY, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 131, Strand, London, W.C.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCI-
DENTS caused by Collision, the Pulling, Bolting, or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles.
Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post
free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIVE STOCK AND GENERAL INSURANCE
Co., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered
Transport in the Crimean War.....
The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2 1/2%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post
free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.

Telegraphic Address "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

SWINDON and NORTH WILTS TECHNICAL SCHOOL.

Principal—H. BOTTOMLEY KNOWLES, M.A. (OXFORD).

APPOINTMENT OF ART MASTER

The Committee require the services of an ART MASTER
for the Day and Evening Classes in connection with the School of Art. Salary, £175 per annum.

The Art Master appointed will be required to commence duty on Wednesday, September 20th, 1900.

Forms of application, to be returned not later than Thursday,
July 26th, may be obtained from the SECRETARY, Swindon and North Wilts Technical School, Swindon, Wilts.

July 14th, 1900. J. S. PROTHEROE, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SOUTH WALES and MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The Council invites APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in HISTORY and ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE.

Applications, with testimonials, must be received by the undersigned not later than September 9th, 1900.

Particulars may be obtained on application to

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,

Secretary and Registrar.

CHÂLET CAUDE COTE, DIEPPE.—An

English lady RECEIVES EIGHT GIRLS of 16 and upwards in her Châlet near Dieppe. Conversational French rapidly acquired. Special facilities for Music, Sketching,
German. Opportunities for every form of healthy enjoyment.
Direct Service twice daily with England.—Full details will be supplied on applying to Miss CURRIER, Dieppe.

MR. X. Q. would be happy to hear of a Gentleman able and willing to FURNISH MATERIAL for a HISTORY of ENGLISH LITERATURE, both in England and America, from 1880-1900.—Letters Sub. X. Q.
Office of this Paper.

"Miss Rossi writes with grace, humour, and vivacity."
The Speaker.

LESSONS by CORRESPONDENCE.—
The art of Literary Composition, like other arts, cannot be acquired, because it is the expression of the artist's personality.

But, like every other art, it rests on a basis of knowledge,
and of principles which may easily be acquired.

The system of instruction is adapted to meet the requirements of each correspondent. A subject is set for a composition of a given length, which is returned with marginal comments and corrections, and, in addition, a couple of sheets giving reasons for each correction, and practical advice.

MSs. already written may be substituted for the subject set,
and will be carefully criticised.

Fee, payable in advance: Twelve lessons, Three Guineas; or a trial course of three, One Guinea.

Miss Rossi, 32, Monmouth Road, Bayswater, London, W.

ALL EXAMINATIONS.

PREPARATION by CORRESPONDENCE on a THOROUGHLY INDIVIDUAL SYSTEM. The STAFF includes Graduates of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Royal Universities.

SINGLE SUBJECTS TAKEN: Latin, Greek, French,
German, Mathematics, Science, Logic, Political Economy, &c.

Address Mr. J. CHARLESTON, B.A. (London and Oxon.), 27, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION

FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF

SCIENCE, ARTS, AND EDUCATION.

FIRST INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY, PARIS EXHIBITION, 1900.

The Assembly recruits Members for the Official Congresses, and gives Information to those interested about Congresses, Exhibition and University Arrangements.

For Visitors to the Exhibition a Guidance Scheme, comprising Lectures, Visits to the Galleries of the Exhibition, Excursions in and around Paris, Entertainments, &c., has been arranged, and is now in working order.

Membership, including Five Tickets for Exhibition and copy of Special Guide, with full participation in Paris arrangements, for one week, £1 1s.; additional weeks, 12s. 6d. each.

Full Information, Prospectuses, Programmes, List of Lecturers, &c., from the Secretaries, Professor PATRICK GEDDES.

Mr. T. R. MARR.

5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J.
PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, &
LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRUICETH, and PŴLLHeli.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

CHINA AND THE FAR EAST.—BOOKS TO READ.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER HAVE JUST PUBLISHED A SECOND EDITION OF VILLAGE LIFE IN CHINA. By Arthur H. Smith,
 D.D. With 31 Illustrations from Photographs 7s. 6d.
CHINESE CHARACTERISTICS. By the same Author.
 FIFTH EDITION. With 16 Illustrations. 5s.
The Morning Post—"Read together, the two works present a most complete and valuable picture of the least known phase of the little understood subject of Chinese life."
A CYCLE OF CATHAY; or, China, South and North.
 With Personal Recollections. By W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D., LL.D., Imperial Tungwen College, Peking. With Map and numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d.
The Scotsman—"A real and substantial addition to our knowledge of modern China."
THE GIST OF JAPAN: the Islands, their People, and Missions. By R. B. PEERY, A.M. With 8 Full-Page Illustrations. 5s.
The Athenaeum—"Portrays with admirable truth and justice the Japanese people."
 21, Paternoster Square, London, E.C.; and Edinburgh; or of any Bookseller.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA.
CHINA: the Long-Lived Empire. By ELIZA R. SCUDMORE. With a Portrait of the Empress Dowager and over 50 other Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
DAILY NEWS—"The book is to be recommended as a lively and vivid account of Chinese life and character. With its sketches of scenes, and persons wherewith the entire world is now deeply concerned, 'China: the Long-Lived Empire' appears at an opportune moment. It contains a large number of good illustrations."
WORLD POLITICS at the END of the NINE-
TEENTH CENTURY as INFLUENCED by the ORIENTAL SITU-ATION. By Professor PAUL S. REINSCH, Ph.D., LL.B. Globe 8vo, 5s. net.
 "This book treats of the Chinese question as the true centre of interest in present international politics."
MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

EUROPEAN SETTLEMENTS IN THE FAR EAST:
 China, Japan, Corea, Indo-China, Straits Settlements, Malay States, Siam, Netherlands, India, Borneo, The Philippines, &c. With Map and 32 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready next week.]
 EXTRACT FROM PREFACE—"The frequent occurrence in the Press, on both sides of the Atlantic, of the phrases 'Spheres of Influence' and 'The Open Door,' the great prominence given to the Far East, both politically and com-mercially, and the prominent part it seems destined to play in European politics in the near future, leads the compiler to believe that this brief account of the European Settlements in the Far East will not be without interest to the political student, the merchant, and the public generally."
London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd.,
 St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE HISTORY OF CHINA. By
 DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, Author of "Chinese Gordon," "Sir Stamford Raffles" &c., &c. A New and Revised Edition. Illustrated with Portraits and Maps. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s.
 "The Second Volume contains a full history of China and her connection with European Nations, and detailed accounts of all events, including the Sino-Japan War, and its diplomatic consequences."
 "Mr. Boulger is a thoughtful writer, and his facts may be relied on. He has, too, the true inwardness of the historian. For the purpose of information it would be difficult to point to a more handy and trustworthy book."—Morning Post
 "Regarded as a history pure and simple, indeed, Mr. Boulger's latest effort is all that such a work should be."—Fort Mail Gazette
 "One cannot read this admirable history without feeling how much Mr. Boulger's sympathies have been enlisted by the wonderful record of Chinese achievement and Chinese character which he has collected with so much charm and ability."—Saturday Review.
W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

FEUDAL AND MODERN JAPAN.
 By Arthur May Knapp.
 2 vols., with 24 Photogravure Illustrations.
 small fcap. 8vo, 8s. net.
ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE—"Contain the most complete exposition of Japan, past and present, that has hitherto been given to British readers, and their material is as well arranged as it is rich and informative."
SPECTATOR—"An attractive account of the 'Island Realm.' A number of good full-page illustrations help one to realise the aspect of Japanese life."
DUCKWORTH & CO., 3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

JUST READY.
THE "OVERLAND" TO CHINA.
 BY
 ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN, F.R.G.S.
 WITH ILLUSTRATIONS AND MAPS.
 Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.
HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.
CURRENT ACCOUNTS
 2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%
DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
 2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%
STOCKS AND SHARES.
 Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
 The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post
 free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.
 Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
 Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS
 TO
"THE ACADEMY,"
 Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY
 (LIMITED).
 For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
 all the BEST
 ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
 SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.
TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
 per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
 per annum.
 N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-
 SCRPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.
 Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
 Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
 and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS
 NOW OFFERED AT
 GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)
 Sent Gratis and post free to any address.
 The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in
 TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
 SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
 PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
 SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.
 30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
 241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 43, Queen Victoria
 Street, E.C., LONDON;
 And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.
 No. 393. JULY, 1900. 8vo, price 6s.
 1.—GOLDWIN SMITH'S UNITED KINGDOM.
 2.—CHEVALIER'S HISTORY OF THE FRENCH NAVY.
 3.—K NIGHTS, TEMPLARS—SOLDIERS, MONKS, HERETICS.
 4.—PROGRESS IN IRELAND.
 5.—THE LIFE OF WELLINGTON.
 6.—PARIS IN 1900.
 7.—A HISTORY OF NORTHERN IRELAND.
 8.—THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.
 9.—PICTURES AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION. THE NEW MOVEMENT IN ART.
 10.—SOME RECENT NOVELS OF MANNERS.
 11.—THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR and its CRITICS.
 12.—COLONIAL AND IMPERIAL FEDERATION.
 London: LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.

THE ENGLISH
HISTORICAL REVIEW.
 Edited by S. R. GARDINER, D.C.L., LL.D., and REGINALD L. POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.
 No. 59. JULY, 1900. Royal 8vo, price 5s.
 1. Articles.
 THE SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT BEFORE THE UNION
 OF THE CROWNS. By ROBERT S. RAIT. Part II.
 THE REGULATION OF WAGES IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. By Miss ELLEN A. McARTHUR.
 HUMANISM UNDER FRANCIS I. By ARTHUR
 TILLEY.
 THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ENGLAND UNDER
 WALPOLE. By EASIL WILLIAMS. Part II.
 2. Notes and Documents.—3. Reviews of Books.—4. Notices of Periodical Publications.
 London: LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.

NOW READY.
 SIXTH EDITION, finally Revised, price 16s., with Portrait.
FIRST PRINCIPLES.
 BY
 HERBERT SPENCER.
 London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., W.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S PUBLICATIONS.

NOW READY AT ALL BOOKSELLERS AND LIBRARIES.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth, with 58 Illustrations, price 2s. 6d.

CHINA and the CHINESE. Translated and Edited, from the French of EDMUND PLAUCHUT, by Mrs. ARTHUR BELL (N. D'Amvres), Author of "Elementary History of Art," "Science Laidlers Series," &c.

AN IMPORTANT WORK.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, illustrated by numerous Maps and Plans, price 12s. net.

THE EGYPTIAN CAMPAIGNS, 1882-1899.

Being a Complete Narrative of the Rise and Fall of the Arabist and Mahdist Movements, as well as a History of England's Intervention in Egypt. By CHARLES ROYLE, late R.N., Barrister-at-Law, Judge of the Egyptian Court of Appeal, Cairo.

"Will interest those who have attention to spare from our South African campaign. Indeed, it will have even for those—the vast majority—who can read, think, or talk of nothing but our present war, the incidental interest of a glimpse of the record of some of our South African heroes."—Truth.

NEW WORK ON MADEIRA

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, with 76 Full-Page Illustrations and Maps, price 20s. net.

The MADEIRA ISLANDS. By Anthony J.

DRENEL BIDDLE. Containing the History of the Madeiras, Information for the Traveller and Visitor, and a description of the Natives: their Characteristics, Religion, Laws, and Customs, &c.

MR. W. ROSSETTI'S NEW WORK.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, illustrated, price 6s.

PRÆRAPHÆLITE DIARIES and LET-

TERS. Containing Letters of DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI; Diary of FORD Madox Brown; The P.R.B. Journal, by W. ROSSETTI. Edited by WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI.

MR. TIGHE HOPKINS'S LATEST SUCCESS.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, extra cloth, price 6s.

AN IDLER in OLD FRANCE. By Tighe

HOPKINS, Author of "The Dungeons of Old Paris," "Nell Haffenden," &c.

BOOKS FOR THE COUNTRY AND SEASIDE.

NEW AND POPULAR EDITION.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

AYLWIN.

BY

THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON,

Author of "The Coming of Love; Rhona Boswell's Story," &c.

With a New Introduction and Portrait.

UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE.

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN.

By Mrs. CRAIK.

NOVELS BY BEATRICE WHITBY,

AUTHOR OF "BEQUEATHED."

Each in 1 vol., crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE AWAKENING of MARY FENWICK. PART of the PROPERTY. MARY FENWICK'S DAUGHTER. A MATTER of SKILL, and other Stories. IN the SUMMER of HER YOUTH. ONE REASON WHY. SUNSET.

NEW WORK BY CAPT. M. H. HAYES.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, price 12s. net.

STABLE MANAGEMENT and EXERCISE

A Book for Horseowners and Students.

By Capt. M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S.

Illustrated by numerous Reproductions of Photographs taken specially for this Work.

BOOKS ON HORSES BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

POINTS of the HORSE. A Familiar Treatise on Equine Conformation. By Capt. M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Illustrated by 200 Reproductions of Photographs of Typical "Points" and Horses, and 205 Drawings by J. H. Oswald Brown. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Super-royal 8vo, cloth, gilt top, price 31s.

ILLUSTRATED HORSE-BREAKING. By Capt.

M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Illustrated by J. H. Oswald Brown, and by Photographs specially taken. Second Edition, Rewritten and greatly Enlarged. Imperial 16mo, buckram, price 21s.

VETERINARY NOTES for HORSEOWNERS. An Illustrated Manual of Horse Medicine and Surgery, written in Popular Language. By Capt. M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Illustrated by 202 Reproductions of Photographs. Fifth Edition. Large crown 8vo, buckram, price 15s.

INFECTIVE DISEASES of ANIMALS. Being

Part I. of Frieburger and Frohner's "Veterinary Pathology." With a Chapter on Bacteriology by Dr. G. NEWMAN, D.P.H. Translated and Edited by Capt. M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Demy 8vo, price 10s. 6d. net.

THE HORSEWOMAN. A Practical Guide to Side-saddle Riding. By ALICE M. HAYES. Edited by Capt. M. HORACE HAYES. With 15 Illustrations by J. H. Oswald Brown and 4 Photographs. Large crown 8vo, price 10s. 6d.

TRAINING and HORSE MANAGEMENT in INDIA.

By Capt. M. HORACE HAYES, F.R.C.V.S. Fifth Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

Each in 1 vol., cloth binding, price 3s. 6d.

The WONDERFUL CAREER of EBENEZER LOBB.

Related by Himself. Edited with an Appreciation by ALLEN UPWARD.

FOLLY and FRESH AIR. By Eden Phillpotts.

Fully Illustrated.

THE SECOND THOUGHTS of an IDLE FELLOW.

By JEROME K. JEROME.

FROM VELDT CAMP FIRES. Stories of Southern Africa. By H. A. BRYDEN.

THE KISS of ISIS. By Capt. Arthur Haggard.

LONDON at the END of the CENTURY. By Arthur W. A. BECKETT.

THE PROFESSIONAL, and other Psychic Stories.

Edited by A. GOODRICH FREER (Miss N.).

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF EDNA LYALL'S NOVELS.

Each in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

DONOVAN. | WE TWO. | KNIGHT-ERRANT.
IN the GOLDEN DAYS. | WON by WAITING.
TO RIGHT the WRONG. | A HARDY NORSEMAN.

UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION, in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

DR. GEORGE MAC DONALD'S NOVELS.

DAVID ELGINBROD. | SIR GIBBIE. | ALEC FORBES.
ROBERT FALCONER. | SALTED with FIRE.

London: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13, Great Marlborough Street, W.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1472. Established 1869.

21 July, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE proposal now on foot that the Irish language should be made the vehicle of instruction in all the schools in the Irish-speaking districts of Ireland has certainly the merit of being new and astonishing. As set forth by Mr. George Moore in the Times, the aim of the movement is to provide a vehicle for future literature. Mr. Moore contends that the English language, burdened with 400 years of literature, has lost its freshness; and that its fate is to become the mere language of commerce, as Latin became the language of theology. The literature of the future, Mr. Moore thinks, will be written in the small languages rather than in the universal languages. This strikes us as a very dubious saying. It ignores, it seems to us, the vital connexion between literature and life. Small languages connote a small population, a restricted outlook, an over-awed polity. Can great literatures spring from such soil? Graceful, subtle literatures may, but great ones? History does not warrant that hope. Mr. Moore talks about Denmark, to whose language he credits Ibsen and Bjørnsen. Well, Ibsen and Bjørnsen have yet to be tested by time. In the case of Ireland, what ground have we for believing that the Irish language did not exhaust itself in the old Irish literature? And what probability is there that its revival will enable it to produce a fresh literature? Mr. Moore may be right about England, but we suspect he is quite wrong about Ireland. However, he has the support—the carefully qualified support—of Mr. Edmund Gosse, who says:

The language of Ireland has been blossoming there unseen like a hidden garden of roses, and, whenever the wind has blown from the west, our English poetry has felt the vague perfume of it.

But of real support of Mr. Moore there is little in Mr. Gosse's pretty letter to the Times.

THE first impression of Mrs. Meynell's John Ruskin having been exhausted, Messrs. Blackwood have issued a second edition.

PUBLICATION of a novel in England and America is, from a pecuniary point of view, good for the author. But the practice has its drawbacks, one of them being that American publishers sometimes go to press without waiting for the author's corrections. We know of one novelist who suffered in this way, and of another who, happening to turn over the pages of the American edition of his book some months after it had been published, discovered that an entire chapter had been omitted. "I suppose they were short of paper," he soliloquised. But the most flagrant case is that of the author of Red Pottage. The following explanatory and apologetic paragraph is from Harper's Weekly:

Owing to various difficulties and complications, the details of which need not be here set forth, the first American edition of Miss Cholmondeley's Red Pottage, which was published by the Messrs. Harper, had to be printed from proofs which the author had not revised. The demand for the novel was so prompt and so urgent that three following editions had to be printed from the same plates as the first. In these first four American editions there were errors, which the author corrected in proof and which did not appear in any of the English editions. In the last four American editions of the book (there have been eleven in all) these errors do not appear, but unluckily the reviewers in this country dealt with the earlier American editions, and some of them have charged Miss Cholmondeley with mistakes of grammar and sense which she did not commit, but which existed in the English proofs before she revised them. The reviewers who accused Miss Cholmondeley of ignorance and disregard of syntax are invited to take notice that she was not guilty of those offences, and that they were misled by appearances due to complications of which she and her American publishers were both disconsolate, though blameless, victims.

WE offer to industrious book compilers an idea for a new anthology—"Poems by the Fathers of Poets." It would be curious; and as the fathers of poets would buy the volume, the anthology should have a wide sale. We are moved to these remarks by the publication in the Daily Chronicle of some lines by the Rev. Stephen Phillips, D.D., father of Mr. Stephen Phillips. They were suggested by a remark of M. Maurice de Fleury, to the effect that love is a malady of the mind, to be classed among the most distressing of the diseases:

Of love, life's balm, by heavenly instinct led,
'Tis true our Shakespeare's peerless wit hath said,
It is an ill that harmeth heart and head;

Nay, up-to-date authorities on nerve
Declare it but a poison that may serve
Briefly to end the bliss we would preserve;

Still, like Orlando and all lovers sure,
Though French physician find its certain cure,
We say, Ah, let us yet such ill endure!

FROM "Latest Wills": Robert Alan Mowbray Stevenson, 41, Oxford-road, Chiswick, art critic of the Pall Mall Gazette, painter, and Roscoe Professor of Fine Arts, Liverpool University College, 1887-93. Sole executrix—Mrs. H. L. Stevenson, the widow. £7,117.

THE title of one of Mr. George Allen's new books, announced for the autumn, does not strike us as being felicitous. To whom would one give it? and, when given, imagine the feelings of the child seeing the title every day. The book is called The Dull Child's Grammar.

To the Review of the Week of last Saturday Mr. Thomas Hardy contributed a little poem which his admirers will like to note. It is called "To Sincerity." There are six stanzas, of which the first, and last two, are as follows:

O shunned Sincerity! . . .
Where modern methods be,
What scope for thine and thee?

—Yet, would men look for true things,
And questioningly view things,
And count to bear undue things,
The real might mend the seeming,
The fact the dread foredeeming,
And Life its disesteeming.

IT is difficult to reconcile the proceedings of the Boxers with the character of the Chinese, as revealed in their songs. "Through most of these," says Prof. Douglas, a distinguished authority, "there breathes a quiet calm, a spirit of peaceful repose, of family love, and of religious feeling." Below is a specimen, taken from The Book of Odes, compiled by Confucius. It might be called "The Lazy Husband and the Dutiful Wife":

"Get up, husband. Here's the day!"
 "Not yet, wife, the dawn's still grey!"
 "Get up, sir, and on the right
 See the morning star shines bright.
 Shake off slumber, and prepare
 Ducks and geese to shoot and snare.

All our darts, and line to kill,
 I will dress for you with skill;
 Thus a blithesome hour we'll pass,
 Brightened by a cheerful glass;
 While your lute its aid imparts,
 To justify and soothe our hearts.

On all whom you may wish to know,
 I'll girdle ornaments bestow;
 And girdle ornaments I'll send
 To anyone who calls you friend;
 With them whose love for you's abiding,
 My girdle ornaments dividing."

Most Chinese songs are in the same key. The epic is conspicuously lacking from Chinese poetry. But there is one exception—the prayer alleged to have been uttered by King Suen during the great drought of the eighth century. Some of the lines are very vigorous and forceful:

The Monarch cried, "Alas!
 What crime is ours that Heaven thus sends on us
 Death and Disorder, that with blow on blow, Famine attacks us?"
 Surely I have grudged
 To God no victims; all our store is spent of tokens—
 Why is it I am not heard?
 Rages the drought. The hills are parched, and dry
 The streams. The demon of the drought
 Destroys like one who scatters fiery flames.
 Terrified by the burning heat, my heart,
 My mourning heart, seems all consumed with fire,
 The many dukes and ministers of the past,
 Pay no heed."

The reference to the "many dukes and ministers of the past" means, of course, that prayers to ancestors had been in vain.

SINCE our paragraph on Mr. Pearson and "The Yellow Peril" appeared, several writers have made references to the subject, but none of them, somewhat suspiciously, go deeper than the author of our note. Thus not merely did Mr. Pearson opine that the Chinese would dominate the world, but he conjectured that we should sink to their level, morally and intellectually, a view also once expressed by Mr. Mill. Thus to quote from National Life and Character, which none of the many writers who have recently referred to it, save ourselves, have done:

Ultimately he [the European] will have to conform to the Oriental standard of existence, or—and this is the probable solution—to stint the increase of population. If he does this by methods that are inconsistent with morality, the very life-springs of the race will be tainted. If he does it by a patient self-restraint that shows itself in a limitation to late marriages, national character will be unimpaired, but material decline will be commenced. With civilisation equally diffused, the most populous country must ultimately be the most powerful; and the preponderance of China over any rival—even over the United States of America—is likely to be overwhelming. . . . Let us conceive the leading European nations to be stationary, while the Black and Yellow Belt, including China, Malaysia, India, Central Africa, and Tropical America, is all teeming with life developed by industrial enterprise, fairly well administered by native governments, and owning the better part of the carrying trade of the world. Can anyone suppose that, in such a condition of political society, the habitual temper of mind in Europe would not be profoundly changed? Depression, hopelessness, a disregard of invention and improvement, would replace the sanguine confidence of races that, at present, are always panting for new worlds to conquer.

MESSRS. SOTHEBY began on Wednesday a four days' book sale of considerable interest. The books are gathered from many sources, and there is a rather pathetic suggestiveness about the divisional headings, which include:

The Property of a Nobleman.
 The Property of a Gentleman.
 The Property of a Lady.
 The Property of a Baronet.
 The Property of a Clergyman.
 Another Property.
 Other Properties.

Many of the books and MSS. are of special interest, and the general run of books is good. We note the following entry:

STEVENSON (ROBERT LOUIS), THE BODY SNATCHER,
 ORIGINAL AUTOGRAPH MS., 17 folio pages 1884

The original MS. of this remarkable story, which appeared in the Christmas number of the Pall Mall Gazette for 1884, with the number of the magazine in which it first appeared; press notices of the story, the last portrait of R. L. Stevenson, a trial plate, and a proof of the design by Mat. Morgan.

An autograph letter of Byron's, written to John Hunt, from Genoa, March 17, 1823, is interesting. Byron writes about public disapproval of his works. He adds:

Every publication of mine has latterly failed. I am not discouraged by this, because writing and composition are habits of my mind with which Success and Publication are objects of remotest reference—not causes, but effects, like those of any other pursuit. I have enough of both of praise and abuse to deprive them of their novelty, but I continue to compose for the same reason that I ride, or read, or bathe, or travel—it is a habit. I want sadly Peveril of the Peak, which has not yet arrived here, and I will thank you much for a copy; I shall direct Mr. Kinnaird to reimburse you for the price.

A letter of Shelley's, dated from Marlow in 1817, contains the sentence:

I published sometime since a Poem called Alastor after Baldwin's; the sale, I believe, was scarcely anything.

A quatrain in the handwriting of the Duke of Reichstadt, the unfortunate son of Napoleon I., and the hero of M. Rostand's "L'Aiglon," is also offered, and runs as follows:

Heureux qui met en Dieu toute son espérance,
 On a toujours besoin d'explorer sa bonté;
 Il nous consolera dans les jours de souffrance
 Si nous l'avons servi dans prospérité.

FRANÇOIS.

WHAT we may call the dynamite criticism of Shakespeare goes on merrily. Not only has Mr. Donnelly been busy again, but at least two other American commentators have put forward explosive theories. Mr. Charles Allen, of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, assails the Baconian theory, but substitutes one not much more acceptable—viz., that Shakespeare collaborated to a greater extent than is realised with other dramatists. "If such collaboration is established on the part of the writer of any of the Shakespearean plays, it makes against the Baconian theory of authorship. It is not likely that Bacon would unite with any of the ordinary playwrights in the production of plays." So that to save Shakespeare from Bacon, Mr. Allen throws him into the sea of dramatic authorship, and allows his genius to mingle with the general waters. This is not inspiring

THE second critic is a Mr. W. H. Edwards, who has written a book entitled Shaksper, not Shakespeare, the argument of which may be gathered from the following passages:

In the pages to follow, I assert and prove that the Shakespeare plays were not written for William Shaksper's Theatre, and that no one of them was ever played at his theatre, except in special scenes or in pantomime; and also that no man during his lifetime attributed the plays to William Shaksper, or suspected him of any authorship whatever. I assert and prove that until the issue of the First Folio of the Collected Plays in 1623, years after the death of William Shaksper, these plays, singly or collectively, had no reputation whatever.

Mr. Edwards then sketches Shakespeare's life, and, coming to his name, says:

The name Shakespeare is quite another etymologically and orthographically from Shagsper, or Shaksper, or Shaksper, or Shaxpeyr, or Shackyspere, or Shaxper. It is not in evidence that any author lived in the age of Elizabeth whose family and baptismal name was William Shakespeare, or Shake-speare. There is no such historical man—no individual known who bore that name—and the inference is fair that the name as printed upon certain poems and plays was a pseudonym, like that of "Mark Twain" or of "George Eliot."

Mr. Edwards scouts the idea that a man of Shakespeare's bringing up could have a command of languages and of court life. Who, then, wrote the Plays? More dynamite is brought forward. If Shakespeare cannot be embodied in Bacon at least he can be blown to fragments and his genius divided among a crowd.

It would seem, then, to humbler individuals that possibly either one of the writers named and some score others might have worked on the Shakespeare plays without violence to probability. I would suggest that searchlights be turned on the judicious Hooker, or the worthy Donne, or the learned Coke, or Tobie Matthew, or Lord Burleigh himself . . . or the many acknowledged playwrights of that age, university men, who wrote singly or in collaboration—Daniel, Marlowe, Greene, and the rest.

At this rate Shakespeare described his plays when he described Petruchio's attire: "A new hat and an old jerkin; a pair of old breeches thrice turned; a pair of boots that have been candle-cases, one buckled, another laced . . . his horse tripped with an old mothly saddle and stirrups of no kindred," &c. But, for our part, we prefer to think that Shakespeare addresses his critics in Petruchio's words: "Look, what I speak, or do, or think to do, You are still crossing it. Sirs, let 't alone."

In a second article on Prof. Bury's Gibbon, in the Pilot, Dr. Hodgkin touches on Gibbon's attitude to Christianity. He considers that Gibbon was "a non-religious man," who had no spiritual experience of his own.

It may be true, as Lord Byron says, that the effect of his writings was "to sap a solemn creed with solemn sneer," but I doubt whether he was sufficiently in earnest, even in his unbelief, to have consciously set this aim before him. The one quality which provokes his utter scorn and antagonism is "bigotry," and, curiously enough, he finds traces of this abhorred passion of the soul in Voltaire himself. No; Gibbon did not, I think, specially hate Christianity, but he disliked in his languid, superior way, all appearance of religious earnestness in Jew or Gentile. As a matter of curious speculation he was willing to devote a good deal of time and thought to Christian theology (his account of the heresies and orthodoxies of the fourth or fifth centuries is still, perhaps, one of the best that has been written), but the whole thing was utterly outside of him. Religion met no want in his heart, touched no lever in his soul. He was essentially a child of "the polite society" of the eighteenth century, a society which believed in itself and in not much beside, a society which secretly thought that God would never be severe with persons of such high quality.

MR. HENLEY now connects South Africa with whatever literature he is dealing with. His "Ex Libris" in the August Pall Mall Magazine begins: "At the time of writing, Lord Roberts has entered Pretoria, the braves on Laing's Nek are like a nut in a pair of crackers, what was the Orange Free State is British territory, and Mr. Ernest Coleridge has published his excellently edited third volume of the Poetry of Byron." Next month Mr. Henley will hardly arrive at his point so quickly, for there will be events in China to recite in addition. Mr. Henley is the Ulysses of criticism; he will not settle down, but is ever bent on adventure and big effects. To defend Byron he hacks his way through poets, who, left to themselves, would have stood aside and perhaps have applauded his design. But they all bleed to make a Henley holiday. This is the kind of thing:

And Kaled, Gulnare, Zuleika, Julia, Haidée, are they so very much less interesting, do they touch us so very much less instantly, are they so very much more remote from reality, than "faintly smiling Adeline" and these other Tennysonian beauties? And the May Queen—with her Robin and those "garden tools," and that "Traviata cough" of hers—are we really to take her to our bosoms now—even now!—before that thrice excellent Aurora Raby and our "frolic grace Fitz-Fulke," who have so much to do with the gaiety and the supremacy of the last cantos of Don Juan?

I trow not; for these shams signed "Tennyson" are already dead, and not dead only, but damned—damned to the infernal deeps—"With Erebus and tortures vile also."

The next poet to cumber the battlefield is "that mass of half-inspired, half-realised, half-uttered, and wholly perfunctory and futile gabble which—some noble passages apart—is Browning." The next to fall is Rossetti. The last is Shelley, and then there is a gory roll-call:

In truth, Mr. Coleridge is fully justified in remarking that Byron's poetry "holds its own." Does Shelley's? I wonder! some lyrics apart, I wonder! Has The Cenci never been found out? do people still find sustenance in The Revolt of Islam, and "The Witch of Atlas," and "Rosalind and Helen," and "The Sensitive Plant," and Alastor? Were these ever anything to anybody? "I'll not believe it." Or, if they were, in the days of their birth, are they anything to anybody now, after fourscore years and a surfeit of Tennyson and Browning and Rossetti? Probably, of all the poets who ennobled and delighted the earlier days of this dying century, the best read and the best loved is Keats; though Coleridge, the "universal inspiration" as I've called him elsewhere, stands far higher than he did in his own day; and Wordsworth, whose philosophy appears on the whole to have served its turn, is still read largely for that philosophy, and now and then for his divagations—(God knows how or why!)—into high poetry. On the whole, it looks as though Matthew Arnold had but grasped half the truth when he said that Byron and Wordsworth would head the procession of Nineteenth Century English poets into the "mist and hum" of the Twentieth Century. It may be Shelley and Byron; it may be Byron and Keats; it may be Byron and Coleridge. But, whoever the one, the other will certainly be Byron.

So many books have been held over by publishers that, in spite of the complications in China, the autumn season promises to be a very full one. The following novels may be expected:

The Soft Side. Henry James.
In the Palace of the King. Marion Crawford.
Quisante. Anthony Hope.
Richard Yea and Nay. Maurice Hewlett.
Cunning Murrell. Arthur Morrison.
A Master of Craft. W. W. Jacobs.
Sons of the Morning. Eden Phillpotts.
The Gateless Barrier. Lucas Malet.
Zuleika Hobson. Max Beerbohm.

WHEN awarding prizes at the Blackheath School last Saturday, Mr. Birrell talked as amusingly as could be expected, having regard to the fact that he was introduced by the head master as "a modern Macaulay." Fancy trying to "birrell" after that! He said, among other things (we quote the Daily News report):

He could not remember in his schooldays ever getting a prize, but he often witnessed other boys getting them, and though he may have envied them the distinction, he did not envy them the books they carried away. Having kept up his acquaintance in after life with many of those heroes, who now inhabited comfortable homes of their own, he often inquired what had become of those school-prizes, but they were seldom forthcoming. The prizes, however, just distributed, with one lamentable exception—a book that he himself, in a misguided moment, wrote [Obiter Dicta—were admirable and interesting works, taste having improved, and publishers become more enterprising.

WE are to have a biography of Count Tolstoi—necessarily a memoir pour servir—by Mr. Hagbert Wright. Mr. Wright is the energetic librarian of the London Library. He hopes to visit Tolstoi in his home this summer.

HAVE editors their "fancies" in typewriting? Failing style in an article, do they succumb to style in its presentation? We have not detected such susceptibilities in our own breast, but we note the following advertisement in a literary paper:

MSS. copied, from 10d. per 1,000 words, in a new and effective style, which gives the MS. a special chance.

Bibliographical.

THERE is great activity among the biographers. We are to have, for example, brand-new memoirs of Cardinal Richelieu, Gilbert White of Selborne, and Richard Wagner; and all will be welcome. Of Richelieu there is no exhaustive, or even substantial, English life in circulation. The only obtainable memoirs are that which appeared in the "Foreign Statesmen" series four years ago, and that which M. Gustave Masson wrote for the S.P.C.K. in 1884. Most English people of to-day have derived their ideas about Richelieu from Lord Lytton's play, from the dramas dealing with d'Artagnan, or from Under the Red Robe. Of Gilbert White the published biographical details have been few; and of late years they have usually been repeated, with variations, by editors of The Natural History of Selborne, from Buckland to Grant Allen. Among those editors, one remembers, were Richard Jefferies (1887) and John Burroughs (1895). Concerning Wagner there is already existent in English a good deal of biographical material. There are, for example, the memoir by F. Hueffer in the "Great Musicians" series (1883), and F. Praeger's Wagner as I Knew Him (1892); there are also the English translations of the monographs by F. Muncker (1891) and H. S. Chamberlain (1897). Add to these the Wagner-Liszt Correspondence, published in English in 1888, and the letters to Dresden friends, to Roeckl, to Wesendonck, and to Heckel, issued respectively in 1890, 1897, and 1899, and you have a mass of Wagner literature from which a very large measure of biographical data could be extracted without the aid of any new biographer.

The publication of Tennyson's "Princess," arranged as a drama by a certain L. Rossi, recalls the fact that the poem has already been the basis of two dramatic productions, both from the pen of Mr. W. S. Gilbert. L. Rossi has taken Tennyson's lines and used as many of them as possible. Mr. Gilbert, in the first place, made the poem the foundation of a blank-verse extravaganza, likewise entitled "The Princess," and described by the author as "a whimsical allegory," "a respectful perversion of Mr.

Tennyson's poem." This was in 1870, in which year the "perversion" was performed at the Olympic Theatre, London. If I remember rightly, it was not a very great success. On the other hand, when Mr. Gilbert, some fourteen years later, fitted his "perversion" with choruses and other lyric interludes, called it "Princess Ida," and got Sir Arthur Sullivan to write the necessary music, the result was triumph. "Princess Ida" is not one of the best known of the Gilbert-Sullivan operas, but it has done much to popularise (though in the vein of caricature) the creation of the poet. L. Rossi's "Princess" seems to have been performed in private. I should tremble for it in public.

Talking of L. Rossi, I protest, as a bibliographer, against the adoption of a signature so unsatisfactory. What does the "L" import? Is it the initial of a masculine or of a female name? Authors are rather inconsiderate in this direction. They often give no clue not only to sex but to "condition." Is L. Rossi, if a woman, "Miss" or "Mrs."? (Miss or Mrs.? by the way, is the title of one of Wilkie Collins's "problem" stories.) I was glad, the other day, to see the author of a book on Hampstead and its associations setting a good example in this respect. She proclaimed herself quite clearly on the title-page as "Mrs. Caroline A. White." What a relief to the reviewer, who is so tired of writing about an author as "Miss (or Mrs.)"!

We are promised a sequel to Mr. Bellamy's Looking Back, to be entitled My After-Dream, and, of course, not the work of Mr. Bellamy. Sequels not written by the authors of the original productions are not, if my memory serves me, very common in the literary world. One sees more of that sort of thing in matters of the stage—Tom Taylor's "Our American Cousin" being followed by Oxenford's "Sam's Arrival" and H. J. Byron's "Lord Dundreary Married and Done For," Taylor's "Ticket of Leave Man" by Cheltnam's "Ticket of Leave Man's Wife," and Lytton's "Lady of Lyons" by Merivale's "Lady of Lyons Married and Settled"—to name no others. In the realm of fiction, however, the original writer has generally done his own sequels, and it is the safer plan. It is not everyone who can bend the bow of Apollo. William Brough wrote a piece into which he introduced a Lord Dundreary from whom, he pretended, Taylor's Lord Dundreary had descended. That was a bit of audacity to which, I think, and hope, the history of pure literature affords no parallel.

Close upon the paragraphs in which, the other day, I gave some particulars concerning the recent vogue of Ben Jonson, comes the announcement that a couple of scholars contemplate the publication of an annotated edition of his works, in which special attention will be paid to the classic originals of many of the poet-dramatist's lines. Is it possible that Jonson can have, at this time of day, any admirers so seriously devoted to him? I venture to think that as a dramatist he is dead. To an annotated edition of his lyric poems there would, of course, be no objection, though even that seems scarcely worth while.

In the four-page Introduction which Mr. Watts-Dunton has written for the sixpenny edition of his Aylwin, he will explain why it was that he delayed the publication of that work even after the decease of those who might be thought to be delineated in it. "It was simply diffidence," says Mr. Watts-Dunton; "in other words, it was that infirmity which, though generally supposed to belong to youth, comes to a writer, if it comes at all, with years." It was the success of The Coming of Love, with its large gypsy element, which decided the fate of Aylwin, inducing its author to give it to the world. To certain correspondents Mr. Watts-Dunton, through this Introduction, makes it known that the Sinfì Lovell of his prefatory notes to Lavengro is the Sinfì Lovell of Aylwin, and that the Rhona Boswell of Aylwin is the Rhona Boswell of The Coming of Love.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Beatific Pot-boilers.

Essays of John Dryden. Selected and Edited by W. P. Ker, M.A. (Clarendon Press. 2 vols. 10s. 6d.)

THESE essays, which Prof. Walter Ker has had the excellent idea of issuing in a detached form, are the critical prefaces to Dryden's various publications, excluding such as were purely dedicatory. Here we have two volumes of pot-boilers flagrant, unashamed, with little reason, indeed, for shame, since they have survived — and gloriously survived — near two centuries.

Read all the prefaces of Dryden,
For them the critics much confide in;
Though only writ at first for filling,
To raise the volume's price a shilling.

Byron's doggerel happily memorises a fact. Dryden, when he threw off these prefaces to gratify the demands of "the trade," had small thought of writing masterpieces, small thought that he was marking an epoch in English prose. Yet this he did. And he did it by arrant pot-boiling.

O that the present hour would lend
One more pot-boiler of the kind!
Such "padding" as his we should not mind!

Byron may pardon the outrage for its appropriateness. These essays (as Prof. Ker not untruly styles them) are a monumental proof that the man of parts can gild his literary chains; that it is cowardly to say: "I wrote badly because I wrote, not of my own impulse, but for pay"; that the pot-boiler may at least be a thing of veritable merit, if not of transcendent merit. Granted that, without blame, even a man of parts might fail to wear his chains like "Glorious John" — "Glorious John," who could have made a decent poem out of Bradshaw's Guide. Yet do these beatific pot-boilers come as a seasonable rebuke to the slovenly work which overflows the modern press, often the work of men who could do better things, were their literary conscience not hardened as the soles of a street-Arab.

Yet further are they a rebuke, and at the same time a wholesome antidote, to the prevalent poverty of slipshod style. We do not speak of the few who write solely for literary fame: their disease is quite other — a too meticulous anxiety of expression, though not often of structure. We speak of the virtual or avowed pot-boiler, of what goes by the generic name of journalistic style — the style of those who must needs write currente calamo, with indeliberate pen. One knows this general style. With the more expert it consists in successive sentences of almost infantile brevity, turning the flank of structural difficulty — the chopped sausage-meat of composition, Macaulay done to rags. With the less expert it is a diffuse, weak-minded sentence, a labefaction of all structure, relatives wandering aimless, distressedly looking for their connexions, with an unhappy sense that the search is hopeless; there is no attempt at clause, but instead the nearest the writer can go to organism is to take several short sentences, put them end to end, and knock the heads out of them. Dryden is an admirable example for the reformation of both these kinds. He stands midway between the two. His sentences are not mere short yaps, like an excited cur. Nor yet has he the formal, periodic structure of Johnson, or the still somewhat formal though looser structure of Swift. A formal structure would be useless for informal writing. Succeeding to the stately writers of the seventeenth century, yet obliged by circumstances and his own temper to write fluently, he hits on a happy compromise. His sentences are direct, with a certain felicitous laxity of construction, which rids them of all pedantry, any air of deliberation; yet he dexterously avoids the dissolution of structure, and keeps them well in rein, for all the easy bravery of their pace. At the same time, there is throughout the vigorous straightness, the idiomatic, vernacular turn, fresh from and smelling of the soil, which eminently suited his genius, and must have been a joy to himself, as it is to the reader. All these characters make it an admirable influence for the reformation of modern journalistic style, in either extreme of its slovenly effiteness. Alover all, Dryden is not effete. He is brimming with virility, his style is full of fight. Yet it has no taint of the vulgarity, the rowdiness, of what now too often passes for "vigorous English." A phrase here, of course, a construction there, a word or so elsewhere, is obsolete; but these are casual, easily eliminated.

Of his staid narrative style, a little more calculated than the thorough Drydenian writing when his blood is up, there is an excellent specimen in the opening of The Essay on Dramatic Poesy. It has, moreover, a peculiar interest; for it is an admirable little cabinet picture of a striking historical episode as it was realised by the Londoner of that day. Not often, in those impersonal times, are we given a glimpse of events as they came home to the man in the street; but here we are allowed, for a single moment, to see London in a war experience with almost the intimacy of the present day. It concerns a battle off the English coast between the Dutch fleet and the English led by the Duke of York. We insert the proper names, instead of the fictitious ones given by Dryden:

It was that memorable day, in the first summer of the late war, when our navy engaged the Dutch — a day wherein the two most mighty and best appointed fleets which any age had ever seen disputed the command of the greater half of the globe, the commerce of nations, and the riches of the universe. While these vast floating bodies, on either side, moved against each other in parallel lines, and our countrymen, under the happy conduct of His Royal Highness, went breaking, little by little, into the line of the enemies, the noise of the cannon from both navies reached our ears about the city, so that all men, being alarmed with it, and in a dreadful suspense of the event which we knew was then deciding, every one went following the sound as his fancy led him; and, leaving the town almost empty, some took towards the park, some cross the river, others down it — all seeking the noise in the depth of silence.

Among the rest it was the fortune of Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Howard, Sir Charles Sedley, and Mr. Dryden to be in company together. . . . Taking, then, a barge which a servant of Sir Charles Sedley had provided for them, they made haste to shoot the bridge, and left behind them the great fall of waters which hindered them from hearing what they desired; after which, having disengaged themselves from many vessels which rode at anchor in the Thames, and almost blocked up the passage towards Greenwich, they ordered the watermen to let fall their oars more gently; and then, every one favouring his own curiosity with a strict silence, it was not long ere they perceived the air to break about them like the noise of distant thunder, or of swallows in a chimney: those little undulations of sound, though almost vanishing before they reached them, yet still seeming to retain somewhat of their first horror, which they had betwixt the fleets. After they had attentively listened till such time as the sound by little and little went from them, Lord Buckhurst, lifting up his head, and taking notice of it, was the first who congratulated to the rest that happy omen of our nation's victory, adding that we had but this to desire in confirmation of it, that we might hear no more of that noise which was now leaving the English coast.

Buckhurst's wish (or Dryden's in Buckhurst's mouth) has been fulfilled. For near two centuries London city has never again sat solitary, while its citizens flocked Greenwich-ward to harken anxiously that sound as of "swallows in a chimney" — the thunder of an enemy's guns. Is the time at hand when the scene described with such life-like touches may be renewed? Anyway, a more taking introduction to an essay was never contrived.

But this is not, as we have said, Dryden's more current style. Of that a quite average conception may be formed from the following passage in the Examen Poeticum, where he is treating the proper manner of translation:

Mr. Chapman, in his translation of Homer, professes to have done it somewhat paraphrastically, and that on set purpose; his opinion being, that a good poet is to be translated in that manner. I remember not the reason which he gives for it; but I suppose it is for fear of omitting any of his excellencies. Sure I am, that if it be a fault, 'tis much more pardonable than that of those who run into the other extreme of a literal and close translation, where the poet is confined so straitly to his author's words that he wants elbow-room to express his elegancies. He leaves him obscure; he leaves him prose, where he found him verse; and no better than thus has Ovid been served by the so-much-admired Sandys. . . . But this proceeded from the wrong judgment of the age in which he lived. They neither knew good verse nor loved it; they were scholars, 'tis true, but they were pedants; and for a just reward of their pedantic pains all their translations want to be translated into English.

We may demur to that illiberal judgment on an age which produced better translations than anything the eighteenth century has given us; though Sandys, truly, was a poor specimen. But the easy directness of the style, the inartificial variety of short and long sentences; the well-knit structure, diversified with a certain agreeable laxity; the strong, clear vernacular, the English backbone of it all; these things are not only excellent in themselves, but most imitable at the present day. Here, again, is a typical specimen of his most forceful and happy manner; which has the further advantage of containing a judicious and judicial criticism on a point which still affords matter for heated and by no means always judicious discussion. It is from the Dedication of the Æneis:

I will not excuse, but justify, myself for one pretended crime with which I am liable to be charged by false critics . . . that I Latinise too much. 'Tis true that when I find an English word significant and sounding, I neither borrow from the Latin nor any other language; but when I want at home, I must seek abroad.

If sounding words are not of our growth, who shall hinder me to import them from a foreign country? I carry not out the treasure of the nation, which is never to return; but what I bring from Italy I spend in England: here it remains and here it circulates; for if the coin be good, it will pass from one hand to another. I trade both with the living and the dead, for the enrichment of our native language. We have enough in England to supply our necessity; but if we will have things of magnificence and splendour, we must get them by commerce. Poetry requires ornament, and that is not to be had from our old Teuton monosyllables; therefore, if I find any elegant word in a classic author, I propose it to be naturalised by using it myself; and, if the public approves of it, the bill passes. But every man cannot distinguish between pedantry and poetry: every man, therefore, is not fit to innovate. Upon the whole matter a poet must first be certain that the word he would introduce is beautiful in the Latin, and is to consider, in the next place, whether it will agree with the English idiom. After this, he ought to take the opinion of judicious friends, such as are learned in both languages. And, lastly, since no man is infallible, let him use this licence very sparingly; for if too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed, not to assist the natives, but to conquer them.

This is Dryden's criticism at its best; sound, sensible judgment, unentangled by questions of principle, wherein he shows weak. It leaves little to be said on the matter. One notes a characteristic feature of his argumentative style—a certain lively cut-and-thrust manner, sometimes animated by interrogation, which recalls a forcible debater. Such a style is liable to be too unexceptional, to slur nice considerations: here and there one might demand a modification of some statement too sweeping. He slips sometimes in strict grammar: "every man is not fit to innovate" were better "not every man is fit to innovate," for it means structurally other than he intends. You will note his happiness of homely illustration: Swift himself scarce betters it, though he be more fecund in it. What joy were it if many modern critiques were as sane in decision, as hardy and clean in style!

The editing is excellently done. Of course, having once decided what class of preface to exclude, the task with regard to the remainder became mainly a mechanical one. Yet some matters remain for an editor's decision, even in a reprint. Should he adopt the text of Dryden's first or Dryden's latest edition? In this case Prof. Ker seems to us to have made an unfortunate choice. He elects to follow the first editions, on the ground that the text of the later editions is already accessible in other forms, while that of the first editions is not. But is there any reason why readers should hunger after the first edition texts? Dryden's corrections were, as Prof. Ker says, mainly grammatical. He might have added that Dryden (as might be expected from a man who all his life was improving his technique) showed sound judgment in these mostly grammatical corrections. It is surely a curious standard of editorship which reprints an inferior text in preference to a better and later text (corrected, too, by the ripe judgment of the author himself), merely because no other editor has done it—as why on earth should he? Moreover, this is the only separate reprint of Dryden's prose in general—apart from his total works—and the more reason, therefore, why the text should be the best available. Prof. Ker has seemingly been bitten by the modern mania to reprint non-valuable things solely because they are inaccessible—and would they remained so! On the other hand, his judgment in using modern spelling seems well supported by the reasons he advances. Above all, we owe him gratitude for the admirable critical analysis of Dryden's prose—both general and particular—with which he prefaces these volumes.

Two Country Books.

Seven Gardens and a Palace. By E. V. B. (Lane.)

The Birds of My Parish. By Evelyn H. Pollard. (Lane.)

UNLIKE in other respects, these books resemble one another in being beautifully printed and illustrated. Miss (or is it Mrs?) Pollard keeps to her text and writes of nothing but birds. "E. V. B."—since this is how the Hon. Mrs. Boyle likes to be known—ranges far and wide. Nominally, her book is about various homes she has had—"Dropmore," for example, in South Bucks, built by Lord Grenville about 1792. Lady Grenville had a passion for the wild-brier rose, and now the bushes she planted come up all wild about the place in natural and beautiful disorder, in contrast with the stateliness of the famous gardens. "Huntercombe," now "an old house full of echoes," was once part of the ancient priory of Burnham—a broken sword (once swayed by a cavalier) in the hall, a ruin without, a fish-stew, an oak scrub, a willow garth, and much of old legend and new story—material surely made to the hand for "E. V. B."! How easy to imagine "the long-past summer morning, when through the wide glass doors opening upon the garden right across the dewy lawn one could see the low-branched elms in the meadow by the pond where the cows were grazing." Then there is "Marycultur," in far-away Aberdeenshire, with its grey stables and tales going back to 1127, when the Templars had a manor of 8,000 acres. Ellon Castle, its sundial of James the Second's day, its view of the lovely peak of Bonnachie, old yews, shaded alleys—it, like the rest, has a clothing of romance. So by degrees we come to Hampton Court. Nowhere is the authoress one little bit of the mere enthusiast or fad-ridden gardener. She has sympathy, imagination, poetry, a full mind. Perhaps her one great fault is a tendency to indulge in sentiment, and, at unguarded moments, to fall into a style patented by Ouida: "The palm-gardens of Bordighera where periwinkles—flori dei morte—rain down their blue from the overflowing laps of ancient palms, or wander in smiles about the rugged roots." A whole chapter is written in a style of which this is a favourable example. We like "E. V. B." best without stilts, as in the following extract. A critic second to none has said you can always tell a true lover of nature when he or she begins to write about the wind. There are things that almost write themselves—the slender young moon like white ivory, stars reflected from still water, reeds, bulrushes, lilies, foliage, flowers, hayland, and cornland, but you must really know and feel to write thus of the wind:

The "sorry wind" is singing now. A little of the sorry wind goes a long way; and even in my new garden-room, with the wide delightful window of leaded panes—made to catch the full south pouring in great floods of light—I do not care to listen. The sorry wind in a solitary evening singing, chanting, reciting all the time, is most melancholy. What it says I am never sure of; but I know that in the music of the sorry wind is never heard aught but a strain of hopeless sorrow. . . . If pathos be, as has been said, the "sense of loss and longing mingled with melancholy," then the sorry wind is surely pathos itself. It is the saddest sound in the world to listen to.

The ring of sincerity is there as if heard in a speaker's voice. We hasten to add that the mournfulness of this passage is not at all characteristic of the book. Mrs. Boyle, as a rule, writes cheerfully, though one regrets that the presence of pen and paper seems to repress her acute sense of fun, which is but indicated in a few passages such as the following:

Half the world knows no more about their neighbours the rooks than the old Scotch farmer, who, on the occasion of a village meeting, when the lecturer proposed to read a paper about rooks, remarked "What can he have to say about the crow? It's juist a bird that eats tatie."

This of Maryculter churchyard: "It was the old man that does the mowing who meditatively remarked to us one day—leaning, like old Time, upon his scythe: 'It is a verra solemn place' (I wish he had not added—'seems summat to look at when it's cleaned up')." There is, again, the story of the gentleman's butler who passed stolid and unimpressed through all the fairest scenes of the Continent till he came to the giant cork trees at Madrid, the sight of which woke the enthusiasm of his butler's mind. But "E. V. B." has been too sparing of this playful element in her nature, and we could have wished that her pages had been more freely adorned with passages of a similar kind. There are, however, many human touches equally interesting. For example, take this pen-portrait of her grandmother, Lady Albinia Cumberland, daughter of George, third Earl of Buckingham, who died, at ninety-two years of age, in 1852. She had been one of Queen Charlotte's ladies and a great beauty in her youth, as her portrait by Romney remains to testify. But here is the figure she cut at Hampton Court in her old age:

A little old woman, rather bent, yet with slow and stately gait. Her train of soft black mode silk she held up at the back as she walked. A white kerchief, and a black lace veil arranged over her close round cap, completed the picturesque toilette. Bonnet she never wore excepting on Sundays for service in the chapel. At chapel, Lady A. (she was always "Lady A." to her family and friends) sat upstairs in the Royal Closet or enclosed gallery, then the exclusive right of present or former members of the household. Here she made a point of beguiling the hour of service with the peculiar chronic long-drawn cough in which she indulged to the exasperation of the whole congregation. Vainly they threatened to bring her before the Board of Green Cloth—the Star Chamber of Hampton Court—Lady A.'s cough was indomitable.

But, after all, these passages only illustrate the subsidiary features of "E. V. B.'s" merits as a writer—her main attraction lies in the expression of that charm of the garden which she puts with an intensity unique among her contemporaries, though easily paralleled from the pages of Gerard and other enthusiasts of the past. Not to prove a skill that long has been demonstrated, but only to show by example what the reader may expect to find, we give a description of "the most beautiful tree in all the world"—the phrase is that of "E. V. B.":

It is a willow—grand, immense in both bulk and height. It is mirrored in the glassy farm pond near, where cattle cool their feet and drink, and shelter beneath the shadow of it when the sun is hot. Walk past a little way, then turn and look back, and gaze upon the tree rising up into the blue, in the glory of its countless silver. The grey of it is like an olive-grove on the hill slopes of Estelle. The shimmering leaves, as the light breeze lifts them, are like the silvery turn of olive sprays when the south wind blows. One longs to sit down before the tree with an easel and a big canvas. Most hopeless of tasks! Words cannot paint the rhythm of its triad foliage; no painter's brush could give the glimmering grey of it.

That picture of a willow should be set in a gallery with Dorothy Wordsworth's birch and the oak of Richard Jefferies. We have room for only one more extract, and it is chosen rather for the gardening amateur than the literary gardener:

Have you seen the green rose? You would love it if you knew it well. Ours—with a plant of that rare delight, white lavender—was sent to me from Tabley Hall, whose lady devotes herself to all old-fashioned garden flowers. It is very curious, yet far too fine a thing to rank only as a curiosity. I have grown to think the green rose beautiful in its own weird way. . . . You must go close up and look it in the face, or you will not know the bush is really flowering. Then what seems at first all leafage is transformed into a mass of roses green.

Our other book is of an altogether different sort. The authoress tells us she read White's Selborne, and thereafter wished to do for the parish of Hayford in Norfolk what has already been accomplished for Selborne. For the length of three or four pages she most gravely adheres to the model and then—why then, in a charmingly feminine way, she forgets all about it, and the bulk of the book consists of conversations between birds, of which a single specimen will probably entertain more than our description could:

"Madam," rejoined the kestrel blandly, "pardon me, but I think you have made a mistake, for no ladies are admitted to —"

"Lady!" shrieked she. "Don't call me a lady; call me a woman! Yes, I'm a woman, and I'm proud of it. Let me tell all you men present —"

"Madam, excuse my interruption, but you are evading the point, which is, that no lady, I mean no woman, is permitted to be present at this august —"

"First of July, isn't it?" laughed the jackdaw.

These be japes indeed, and the book is rich in them. Another pleasant device of the authoress is to invert the gender of her pronouns, so that such a quaint sentence as the following is not uncommon: "He once laid eight eggs in a rotten tree in the parish" (p. 238). On the very next page the pronoun is changed throughout an old rhyme that we at all events have never seen printed so before. The italics are ours:

In April come she will
In May she sings all day
In June she changes her tune,
In July she begins to fly
In August go she must.

We do not for a moment doubt that the author, who is not usually ill-informed, knows as well as the reader that it is the cock bird that is referred to, and does this, as children say, on purpose, only we do not quite see her object. On the whole, we feel inclined to recommend her to return to the old ways and call the male "he" and the female "she."

A Gentlewoman of the Slums.

The Autobiography of a Charwoman. As Chronicled by Annie Wakeman. (John Macqueen. 6s.)

ANNIE WAKEMAN'S (Mrs. L. A. Lathrop's) book belongs to the same genre as Mr. Clarence Rook's Hooligan Nights. It is a selective biography, shaped from a verbal narrative given to the writer. We believe that the great danger in writing such a record is that of making it too long. The reader cannot be in close personal relation either with the writer who reports or with the person who is reported. He misses in the writer the freedom of the novelist, and he misses in the subject the freedom of the autobiographer. But the writer himself, being in direct contact with his subject, is apt to be unconscious of these conditions. He hopes to be a perfect conduit between the speaker and the public. But personality can never be so conveyed with complete success. The writer must shape, embellish, suppress, and control the written record; and though all his touches may be in the interests of fidelity, yet every artistic touch defeats, in a manner, its own end, so that there slowly arrives a page when the method is seen to be a little leaky and a little fatiguing. The critical moral is that books of this kind should be short; but the public, accustomed to books of a standard length at a standard price, exert an unconscious pressure on publisher and author, with the result that they get full measure, but the liquor is somewhat diluted. We feel that this is the case with an otherwise admirable book. It would have gained by pruning. The interest of the book lies in the character, morals, and humour of a London charwoman; but these would have displayed themselves in a smaller number of incidents and situations than are actually employed for the purpose.

This said, and we hope we have said it without over-emphasis, there is nothing to do but to advise the reader to read this most amusing and touching record of a woman of the people. Mrs. Dobbs, as she eventually became, had her full share of the ups and downs of life in a sphere where ups and downs meant varying degrees of privation. She was a thoroughly sound, self-respecting woman, who loved her children, was fond of flowers and music, was a born cook and nurse, and dragged herself and her family through life with infinite toil and resource and cheerfulness, keeping her innate sweetness and even her personal beauty. Her errors were completely circumscribed by her virtues. Betrayed and forsaken by "a real gent," she instantly recovered her tone of mind, and set to work to do right by his child—fighting her way back to respectability. Yet she could glory in the glimpse of high life she had enjoyed:

I 'ad loved, and see life with a gent. Nobody could take that mem'ry from me. I never blamed 'im. Not likely 'ee could bother over a charnce offspring. I'd done wrong, and I was sorry, and I must swaller me gruel and make no wry faces over it. It's no good chewin' your wrongs, it only gives you indigestion. Besides wick, wen a woman makes 'er fust babby close she feels a kind of solemn joy a-liftin' 'er up, and that's why 'er under lip looks so lovin' and gentle and appealin' wen she meets strangers.

Among strangers, in an alley off the Euston-road, Betty became the mother of "an uncommon fine boy," as Dr. Crampton made mention."

I forgot ev'rything else, fur me thoughts was all on me son, and I was 'appy in thinkin' over and choosin' a 'igh-clarss name fit fur the son of a real gent. At larst I lighted on Ferdinand Harther, callin' of 'im "Ferdie" for short, and makin' up me mind 'ee should 'ave the best I could give 'im, if I worked fur 'im day and night, so as 'ee should be a credit to 'is father, even if he never know'd 'im.

Ferdie never did know his father, but Ferdie remained the apple of his mother's eye through all her domestic experiences. His "igh clarss" ways did not seem to lead him to success, but they were perpetual reminders of his good origin. His mother's most tragic moment came many years later when her husband, the little-worth but handsome Dobbs, a "snobber" by trade, and "the Dook" by nickname, took Ferdie into the middle of Hampstead Heath and told him the secret of his birth. Ferdie had by that time gone into lodgings of his own; and thither his mother took train and 'bus with a heavy heart, to recapture her son's love. This produces the most poignant piece of irony in the book:

'Ee was at the door, goin' in, as I arrived. Wen I spoke 'ee avoided me, like I'd 'ad the plague, makin' me explanation 'arder fur me. But I follered 'im upstairs and into 'is room. 'Es never spoke. I lit the lamp, got 'is slippers out, put the room a bit to rights, and waited patient.

At last I begun. I told 'im me life from a child till 'ee was born. I said no word cruel of 'is father and I didn't try to excuse me own conduc'. But I told 'im 'ow I'd sung in the streets fur 'im in rain and fog, layin' in rheumatics fur me old age. And I begged of 'im to forgive me. 'Ee made no reply. I set quiet, then the old life come over me and I wep' bitter. In two or three minutes Ferdie put 'is arms round me, and 'ee says, "Mother, I forgive you!" That's wot 'ee would natural say, bein' born of a 'igher clarss 'im. I was so full of rejoice over 'is goodness that I larfed and cried to wunst.

In another vein are the descriptions of the weddings of Betty's sons, Tim and John 'Enery. Tim's chosen partner, Florrie, was an East End match girl, who spoke the dialect of Bow with such purity that even Mrs. Dobbs could scarcely understand it. But Florrie always said her prayers, and meant well by Tim. "She talks Cockney, but thinks Park-lane, in a manner of speaking," was her mother-in-law's verdict. The wedding was engineered principally by John 'Enery, now in almost affluent circumstances. The exclusive Ferdie didn't go to the wedding: "you see 'im, there was lines Ferdie couldn't cross, being the son of a gent."

Leavin' the church, we was all covered with rice, enough to make puddins fur months to come, I should say, fur the factory gells was all there to give a cheer fur the bride. Then the principal ones took four-wheel cabs to Florrie's 'ome. There was 'er fambly, me, and the nearest of the "old fambly friends." The dinner was mostly fluids—gin bein' cheaper than joints and producin' 'igh spirits quicker—but no one was drunk. . . . After dinner we 'ad some music, and I sung "Then You'll Remember Me," and "Er Bright Smile 'Aunts Me Still," afore we started off fur supper at me own 'ome—me tryin' to give the shake to some of them "fambly friends." But lor'! you might as well a tried to knock off a limpet. They all come, and their eyes bunged out when they see a proper supper—a cold joint, a cold goose, salads, cheese, sweets, and a weddin' cake, with claret and port at two shillin's the bottle, and a drop of sperrits fur the men—all paid fur by John 'Enery, who wasn't goin', as 'ee said with pride, to see 'is brother marry beneath 'im without teachin' 'is new sister-in-law's people 'ow their betters conducted their share of weddin's.

To the "Dook's" eternal credit he was sober and civilised on this occasion. He brought to the banquet all the majesty of his height and his big voice, all the ease of his assured strength, and, what was even more valuable, the trained eloquence of a man accustomed to speak up at his Club.

Never 'ave I been prouder of Dobbs. . . . 'Ee made the openin' speech, Florrie's father respondin' fur the bride, Tim bein' too shy. Lawk! wen I yeared that speech of Dobbs's I wondered wotever Parlyment 'ad been doin' that Dobbs wasn't in the 'Ouse of Commons.

'Ee begun by referrin' to the Queen, the Army, Navy, and Reserve Forces, bangin' 'is 'and on the table for us to applaud, wick we did 'earty. Then 'ee says, "And now I come to the bride—our new Queen—Tim bein' Army, Navy, and Reserve Forces all in 'isself." We all laughed and called "Year, year!" Tim looked uncomfortable and scared, as if 'eed suddent swallered somethink the wrong way. The Dook went on and says, "Ladies and gents," and yere the "fambly friends" set up straighter and put on a expression of a fust-class limited company when shares is goin' up. 'Ee says, "I repeat, ladies and gents, I 'ave to-day lost a son, but I 'ave found a daughter."

This was layin' it on fairish thick, fur Ferdie, who give a quiet laugh to 'isself, knowin' 'ow Dobbs despised Tim, and never regardin' of him as a son. Florrie looked beamin', throwin' a kiss at Dobbs, wile she give Tim a dig and motioned 'im to rise and bow, which 'ee did, lookin' nowheres in partic'ler.

Amid all her fidelities—and they were many—Betty Dobbs remained faithful to her early error. On her death-bed she spoke plainly on the matter:

'Arry was the only gent in me career, and I see life with 'im, and I love 'is memory, and I love 'is offspring, and 'ave tried to be a good mother to 'im. Me one foot is in the grave at this minute as I'm speakin' to you 'im, and that bein' so, I can honest say as I ain't frettin' over me sin with Ferdie's father. I told you as I wouldn't never repent it—no more 'ave I. And them was the views as I give to the Vicar. . . . 'Ee talked very kind to me, and most affectin', and 'ee seemed to sense me complete, understandin' me point of view, though 'ee didn't say so in words, as 'ow could 'ee, repentance bein' a special point with vicars. 'Ee didn't arguty the point. 'Ee always cuts 'is coat accordin' to 'is cloth, by which I mean 'ee meets the needs of them as 'ee talks to, 'is remarks bein' full of tac'. 'Is tex' was love, leavin' out vengeance fur them as is bent on ehivvin' people. The Vear never chivvies no one into 'eaven, and 'ee was comfortin' and give me 'ope and peace. I told 'im as 'ow I should live less of a 'earhen durin' the rest of me short journey by reason of 'is comfortin' words.

We have relied on extracts, rather than on floating praise, to commend this book. It is delightful in its kind. The illustrations by "Rip" are well conceived; indeed, the frontispiece picture of the wedding party, with the "Dook" proposing the Army, Navy, and Reserve Forces, is excellent. So is the realisation of the Charwoman on the cover.

A Book of Parody.

The Girl with Feet of Clay. By Edgar Turner. (Long. 6s.)

OF all the dishes in the literary banquet none offers so piquant a flavour as the parody, and from none do we exact so high a degree of excellence. A mediocre parody is a poor thing, and a long parody is a poor thing. In parody we want only the essence, the heart of hearts. We permit length only to burlesques, which are different. Thackeray's "Rebecca and Rowena," for example, is burlesque, Mr. Burnand's "'Strapmore,' by Weeder," and "'One and Three,' by Fictor Nogo," are burlesques; but Mr. Bret Harte's "Miss Miggs" is parody, and Calverley's "Lovers—and a Reflection" is parody, and Mr. Seaman's "Ballad of a Bun" is parody. Briefly defined (but the attempt to define is, we know, foolishly temeritous), parody might be called a comic condensation of a mind and style; burlesque, a comic extension of them.

Mr. Turner hovers between the two states, that of parodist and that of burlesque writer. The result may not be a valuable addition to the literature of comic criticism (which is what both parody and burlesque amount to), but it is amusing reading. What we miss from Mr. Turner's work is any power to master difficulties. His very choice of subjects—or victims—suggests this incapacity. He aims low. Not Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy, Mrs. Ward, Mr. Barrie, but Mr. Crockett, Mr. Le Gallienne, Miss Corelli, Mr. Jerome. That is to say, not great manners so much as small mannerisms attract him. And, of course the small mannerisms practically parody themselves. Mr. Le Gallienne, for example, is the simplest material. Mr. Turner has done his task very well and very cleverly, but it was facile. Here is a passage from The Girl with Feet of Clay, a perversion of The Quest of the Golden Girl.

I had promised to meet at Blackfriars, and to take to see the procession, a lady whom I sometimes suffered to pass a hand through my long fine hair. But such promises are kept only when it is convenient to keep them. I looked at the Titian hair and throat, and I looked at the eyes like new-born passion flowers. Then I asked the girl whether she would come with me to a window where I had seats.

"With all my heart," she said; and her voice was gentle and clear as fairy marriage bells.

We left the train at the Temple, and went to the seats I had booked on Ludgate Hill. It must have been a joyful quarter of an hour to the girl. Before she had only walked with soulless men—men who know not art, men to whom Aucassin and Nicolette are but names or less than names. Now she walked with a man of romance, a man of feeling, a man to whom the mysteries are not mysteries, but laughing, labelled graces.

We sat, she and I alone together, while the procession went slowly by. Sometimes I held her hand, sometimes I touched her shoe with mine, and always I talked. I pictured to her a future—how that together we would read Bernard Shaw for the first wonderful time, together learn Max Beerbohm's works by heart, together roll over an A.B.C. table the sumptuous cadences of Stephen Phillips.

That is neat and amusing, and it shows that full familiarity with the victim's work which is needful to the good parodist.

No one else inspires Mr. Turner quite so successfully. Miss Corelli incites him to something nearer spleen. His treatment of her is merciless. Mr. Turner imagines her as a little girl who has never grown up, and he explains why:

Twenty years ago the crusade for the emancipation of women began. Articles descriptive of the hardships of their position appeared in newspapers and reviews. Meetings to assert their claims to equal rights with men were held. The first of the insurrectionary novels was published.

I was only ten then, but even at that age I liked to be in touch with the question of the day. I read one of the articles and went to one of the meetings. They frightened me. I had long known that I was growing up to be a woman, and now I learned that most women were oppressed and unhappy.

Eager for full particulars, I read the insurrectionary novel. I learned from it that men were selfish savages and women their natural victims, and I became still more frightened. Was it worth while, I asked myself, to grow up? As a little girl I was safe, but as a woman I should be in constant danger. Was it worth while? . . . At last I made up my mind. If I became a woman, the odds on my falling a victim to some man would be about twelve to one. The risk was too great. I decided to stop growing, and to remain a little girl.

The book is not all parody. There are some original stories, one of which, "The Soul of the Woman," is very promising for Mr. Turner's own individual career. Perhaps the time has come for him to embark upon this career seriously. Our advice to him is to consider the present diverting volume his literary wild oats, and turn his back upon it and upon the study of his contemporaries and the "Literary Gossipers" who comment upon them. His own work lies before him. Meanwhile we are grateful for some light chuckling.

Other New Books.

A SPORTSWOMAN IN INDIA.

By ISABEL SAVORY.

There is something pathetic in the sporting temperament. "I am in violent motion; I encounter danger; therefore I am alive," it seems to say. It wonders whether people who pay afternoon calls and sit at desks are alive. En revanche, the sporting temperament causes a vast amount of discomfort to people who are not engaged in proving their vitality. That is the impression derived from the perusal of the effervescent narrative before us. Miss Savory goes pig-sticking. The pig objects, whereupon he overthrows "two wretched women . . . who were going down the road with waterpots; both were badly cut." Or Miss Savory goes tiger-hunting and an unfortunate coolie (you hire coolies for about fourpence a day) is bitten through the thigh, and dies. Or she rides along a precipice and her horse is dashed to pieces. So our sportswoman is big with fate, and the Puritan may sniff. But whether sport for sport's sake be admissible or not, there can be no question that in sport Miss Savory finds the natural expression of her individuality. Here is no mere globe-trotter's record. She has shot a tiger on foot while he was charging, and has stood four yards from an infuriated black bear. In her eager fearlessness she reminds us of the late George Kingsley. The emotion she gives to sport is intelligent; by a paradox it includes an admiration for the creatures she kills greater than ours who pity them in their helpless contest with the skill of man. Hence this veritable animal story-book, apart from the curious profusion of quotations which pepper it, has its own poetic interest. Take this description of a tiger:

Suddenly there was a sound—monkeys trooping through the jungle, high in the trees, grasping the pliant branches and shaking them with rage! . . . Another second, the jungle-grass waved and crackled, and out into the open emerged and advanced slowly a picture of fearful beauty. . . . On he came, his cruel eyes largely blinking in the sun. His long slouching walk, suggestive of such latent strength, betrayed the vast muscle working firmly through the loose, glossy skin, which was clear red and white, with its double stripes, and the W mark on the head. The sight of such consummate power, as he swung majestically along, licking his lips and his moustache after his feed, was one of those things not soon to be forgotten.

It was this tiger that ran up the tree where Miss Savory's companion was posted, and "tore his finger all down the back of it to the bone." She shot the tiger as he clasped the tree, and "How could she!" many women will exclaim.

One is amused with the irony which brought this Diana into the presence of a very pious little girl, the daughter of a Civil Servant. There was one little boy at the tea-party in question, and he had been reciting the Lord's Prayer "in stenterian tones." "I asked the little girl," says Miss Savory, "where her other brothers were." "Tom's at school [she replied], and Arthur's in Paradise; he's flying about with wings like a vulture."

Here we take leave of a portly but companionable volume. It is, let us add, freely illustrated. The pencil of Mr. Wimbush, whose name appears on several drawings, does not hesitate at the most tremendous themes. (Hutchinson. 16s.)

PARIS OF THE PARISIANS.

By JOHN F. MACDONALD.

The triumph of civilisation is this—the show of naïveté without the reality of childlikeness. Of this triumph Paris is a splendid illustration. It is not only we who see her thus; it is thus she sees herself. From the classic pages of Murger to the latest Guide des Plaisirs à Paris the "coquaine," as Daudet's Planus called her, has ever the same bewildering freshness of aspect, she is always the queen of siren cities. Mr. Macdonald's clever volume of impressions, to which Miss Katie Macdonald contributes some bright chapters, is throughout reflective of the charm exercised by the seemingly-ingenuous, and the gaiety which is as instinctive as a religious emotion. Who can get angry with this Paris that says, with one voice, "n'en parlons plus" when you ask its opinion on the Dreyfus verdict, and calls the "new century" problem the "Nouvelle Affaire"? It is like a child. It "loves incongruities"; it will "make October May by decking the trees on the Champs Elysées with artificial blossoms and buds." It is cruel with grace, and again it is ignorant with grace.

Imagine an Englishman sensible of his commission of a public mistake in eating; he becomes red and dejected; he is far from amused. For comparison, listen to a French lady struggling to eat a bun with a fork. "On dit que le muffin est encore plus pervers," she remarks. Though the world observe her she cannot be confounded with her mistake.

Work with us is grimly done, and if it is paid for treated as a matter of course. That is not the view of French carpenters. "Venez, donc." Approach the handstand with them. Peer at it. Go down on your knees with them. Feel that board. Look at that screw. . . . Only they know what work is. . . . Know that they toiled and toiled and toiled for hours and hours and hours, . . . bravely and uninterruptedly, beneath a fearful sun." It is playing with life, and one may say the same of the facile affections of the Quartier Latin. But there is a philosophy in that attitude, so long as the mask be never allowed to fall. And in a particularly brilliant sketch, "The Tragedies of Montmartre," Mr. Macdonald shows how the religion of gaiety is kept up at the cost of reason itself in the "feverish atmosphere of the 'Butte.'" It is a terrible position that of High Priest in the Temple of Pleasure; it is like playing the bones with one's spirit; but the Parisian knows where to rusticate when he feels énervé. At Pré Catelan he takes milk, and is soon so restored as to ask, "Which is my Cow?" "I refuse," he proceeds, "to go home until I have sung my cow a song." As no one can point her out, he resolves to sing to them all, one after the other, starting with the first." Paris, the professionally gay, is not the only Paris; the bookworms who haunt the quays would tell us otherwise, and so would thousands of her industrious citizens. Their children make a pretty spectacle in this charming book; and, in fine, Paris is fond of them and all her children, because she is like a child herself, and knows the difference between the likeness and the reality. (Richards. 5s.)

THE EARLY HISTORY OF ENGLISH
POOR RELIEF.

By E. M. LEONARD.

With the dissolution of the monasteries, the break-up of feudal households, and changes in industry, a numerous, well-defined pauper class for the first time emerged. Bands of vagrants—"a rowsey, ragged rabblement of rakehells"—roamed over the land, robbing and burgling. The secular powers, therefore, were driven to exact what charity refused to give, and thus the erratic doles of individuals were gradually replaced by systematic grants of relief under State compulsion. Miss Leonard shows that poor relief was at first partly a police measure, and reasonably suggests that our legal system of relief largely accounts for the comparative absence of violent catastrophes in our history.

Not until Henry VIII.'s reign was relief effectively organised in London and a few other towns. Municipal orders, having proved successful, became the basis of legislation. Statute followed statute, however, without any substantial results, because the enforcement of the law was irregular. Even the great Elizabethan poor law of 1601, which served as the foundation of our system of relief for 233 years, was not at first effectively carried out.

Strangely enough, a better administration of the law was secured by the Privy Council in the period 1629 to 1640. The Council, which during these years was guilty of notorious tyranny and misrule in the general affairs of State, achieved more by illegal orders and proclamations than had been achieved previously by legal processes. This paternal body not only cared for children and the impotent poor, but provided work as a livelihood for able-bodied parishioners, and hard labour for sturdy vagrants. The decrees of the Council were enforced most strictly in the Puritan counties. Probably the design of the Government was to secure the adhesion of the poorer classes to despotic rule; but, whatever the motive, the result of efficient relief was seen in a cessation of complaints by the justices of vagrancy, felonies, and disorders down to the time of the Civil War.

The history of poor relief shows conclusively that the fundamental difficulty of every system lies not in legislation but in administration. The law may draw distinctions between "valiant beggars" and the deserving poor, but the guile of the adept pauper may battle the most expert relieving officer.

Miss Leonard has dealt in a clear and forcible style with a subject of permanent interest. The scope and method of her work have been well conceived, and she is scholarly without being dull. (Cambridge University Press.)

Fiction.

The West End. By Percy White.
(Sands & Co. 6s.)

THIS novel begins, and continues for a long time, in a manner which is deceptively modest and unassuming. The narrator, Rupert Atherton, lame orphan nephew of an excessively rich wholesale provision dealer, mildly introduces himself, and announces his intention of telling you how John Treadaway's family ("Treadaway's Teas," see omnibus boards) took the West End by storm, and entered into the kingdom of the smart. The family consisted of Treadaway, his wife, their daughter Miranda, their son Archie—and Rupert, who was his uncle's secretary and intelligencer. The drama begins by the building of a palace in Park-lane. One by one the strings are pulled: the necessary complaisant Countess is discovered; the necessary enterprises of charity are undertaken; the newspapers begin to talk; old acquaintances are dropped; and even among the new ones the less smart are sifted from the more. When Mrs. Treadaway is indisposed, she has the migraine. So the vast and perfectly honest intrigue proceeds, financed and engineered by John Treadaway, but kept in a smooth, level motion by the watchful diplomacy of Rupert. You read on and on, and what you feel is that you are being diverted by a sound skill neatly used. The plot is full of ingenuities, changes, contrasts. You are shown how the Treadaways, old-fashioned in morals to the last, narrowly escape the crushing wheels of a scandal; how Mr. Treadaway once nearly doubts his wife's virtue; how this adventurer and that true lover seek the hand of the beautiful, sensible, and strong-minded Miranda; how Archie, wild, often fatuous, but good-natured, joins a crack cavalry regiment; and how Rupert, scorned by many, patronised by others, and secretly feared and admired by a few, really occupies a twin-throne with his uncle at the very heart of the great movement. . . . Possibly you wonder what power is carrying you through this book so nicely; for there is no high emotional quality and no compelling charm of style. You are merely interested. You think you could put this book down.

But could you? Perhaps you might, up to a point, but not after the Transvaal War has supervened in the tale. You then immediately find out that the author has had you in his grasp for a long time; he has only to close his fingers and you will be held fast. Well, he closes them. He never achieves a distinguished style, but he achieves emotion, and he manages his plot with absolute virtuosity. The grip is tightened, and you cannot escape. You perceive now that all those kaleidoscopic pictures of smart and plutocratic society and of the usurious underworld have fulfilled a part pre-arranged for them; all this mild satire and witty analysis has had a deeper purpose than seemed to you. From the moment that Archie, that foolish, boyish, beloved subaltern, leaves for South Africa, the story bursts out into its true colours of dignified and austere tragedy. The terrible war-atmosphere of London last winter envelops everything; you live over again the week of Magersfontein and of Stormberg. You hold your breath while Rupert opens the halfpenny evening paper in front of four footmen. Then comes the news of Archie's death ("There seemed, even at that rigid, leaden moment, something incongruous in a Treadaway dying for his country"), and then the laying bare of his secret, scandalous marriage, and the disaster of the divorcée, who is about to bring into being the sole heir to the Treadaway baronetcy and millions. It is a stringent, appalling finale, with Miranda's happiness to lighten it.

The West End is a fine social satire, but it is a great deal more than that. Mr. Percy White has done nothing so good before.

The Gifts of Enemies. By G. E. Mitton.
(A. & C. Black. 6s.)

THIS novel is unsatisfactory, distinctly inferior to the author's first book, A Bachelor Girl in London; but it is the work of a man who has the capacity to write a reasonably excellent story. Mr. Mitton is gifted with a sense of the dramatic. Several times in the course of The Gifts of Enemies he uses this gift with effect—particularly in the two affairs of the Yorks v. Surrey cricket match and the gambling-club raid. Further, his character-drawing is not without merit. That strange girl, Rosa Wybrow, who begins the tale by killing a man, is very well realised. The hero, Neil Hawtrey, baronet and professional cricketer, whose adventures constitute the theme of the novel, is a grey and neutral person, neither attractive nor powerful. His attributes are the attributes of the book, which is chiefly commonplace. Mr. Mitton sees with some earnestness, but he sees nothing fresh. He is at the trouble to tell us what we already know; and were it not for his ingenuity in striking fire from the collision of events, the story would be of an unredeemed tameness. The following passage, taken from the description of an Empire ballet, shows Mr. Mitton's shortcomings as an observer and describer:

All the cunning invention, all the contrast of colour that artistic power could devise and money procure, had been lavished on the gorgeous scene. It was a symphony of colour, a harmony of sight. Hundreds of girls in soft art silks of radiant hues moved in rhythmic motion—a flash—and there were a hundred glowing daffodils, replaced a second later by tulip and narcissus; the motive was the procession of flowers throughout the year. By combination of colour, by deftly-flung draperies, the flowers of each season were represented following each other in lines and filmy waves; a breeze seemed to waft over them, they bowed, and rose again more resplendent than before in new and vivid tints. Hundreds crowded upon hundreds, until the culmination was reached in the national flower of England, the rose, which . . .

All which is quite futile.

Not infrequently Mr. Mitton's style descends to the worst badness of Fleet-street. On p. 9 is that weird adjective "horney"; on p. 26 is a culpable error of mere grammar; on p. 26 the word "phenomenon" is used in a wrong sense; on p. 101 we read "the girl had a Madonna-like purity of feature and expression" (imagine the audacity of an author who can employ that phrase again!); on p. 134 someone "suggested an adjournment to the Empire." The catalogue of peccadilloes might be extended indefinitely. The worst sin of the book is the amazing and entirely inexcusable street accident coincidence on p. 322. Nevertheless, despite our serious discontent with this particular novel, we have hopes of Mr. Mitton.

The Priest's Marriage. By NORA VYNNE.
(Burleigh. 6s.)

BOTH in these columns and elsewhere it has been noted how hardly a man hammered, tusione plurima, into a Catholic priest may transform himself into the likeness of the world. The subject is well worthy of treatment. Mr. Howells attempted it long ago and, sober realist that in these days he is, produced melodrama; at any rate, his book was melodramatised very successfully for Mr. Benson. Miss Vynne, in her account of the process by which Stravel comes to see in his wife his sin incarnate, does not quite escape the same condemnation. The moment in which Annie, approaching her husband to tell him that she is to become a mother, is repulsed with a word which "Christ alone ever spoke kindly," and a blow on the breast with a crucifix, should prove effective behind the footlights. Yet, though as a whole the book is an intelligent and careful piece of work, we confess that we do not altogether believe in Stravel. True, he is free from the grosser absurdities and incoherences which encompass the priest in the hands of many excellent writers; he fills even with some dignity his place in the story of which he is the organic centre. But the red blood of the book runs in the arteries of the minor characters, and particularly of the group of girls out of which our priest selects his bride. Miss Vynne has studied a certain type of the young woman on the hither borders of Suburbia to some purpose: she knows her tricks and manners—her shrewdness, her simplicity, her ignorance, her narrowness of outlook, her whole-hearted devotion to the duty of securing, first for herself and afterwards for her sisters, a husband. From an early chapter come these characteristic fragments:

"Ella is right; Nan is good, of course, dreadfully good, but Mr. Stravel does not love her for that. He loves her because he thinks she's good, but he only thinks she's good because she's pretty. . . ."

"I'm too stupid naturally," said the shy girl, "so I suppose I ought to marry very well."

"That's quite a different thing," said Ella, who was screwing her hair into pins. "Natural stupidity is like naturally curling hair, it never twists in quite the right way. You'll have to learn to be clever, Dolly, and then learn to hide it."

"Yes," said Effie, "because the husband who married you for not being clever would be sure to neglect you for not being clever afterwards. The really clever thing is to make him love you because he thinks you a silly, ignorant little thing, and then make him go on loving you because he finds you a clever woman."

A well-constructed story, written in a direct, concise style, which will add to its author's reputation as a novelist; but her short stories are better.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

FOR BRITAIN'S SOLDIERS. By VARIOUS AUTHORS.

Fifteen well-known writers have presented stories to this book, the profits of which will go to the War Fund. The book will be on sale for three months only. The fare offered seems excellent. Among the contributors are Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Kipling, Mr. Crockett, Mr. Mason, Mr. Ridge, and Mr. Wells. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE BANKER AND THE BEAR. By HENRY K. WEBSTER.

AN American story of financial interest, showing how the hero tried to form a corner in lard. It is a little to be regretted that the heroine passes under the masculine name of Dick. Witnessing an exciting scene at the Board of Trade, Dick asked: "Are they doing anything but yell?" . . . "Anything but yell!" he quoted. "They're making a price that will rule in all the markets of the world." Lard and love. (Macmillan. 6s.)

AN EYE FOR AN EYE. By WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

This time Mr. Le Queux weaves his mystery in London, and the mystery-hunters are journalists and detectives. At the outset we have a novelty in the shape of a detective inspector who will not report a crime he has discovered because it is mixed up with a snake, and he has private superstitions about snakes. The story is full of verve and sharply realised incident. (White & Co. 6s.)

THE SIN OF ATLANTIS. By ROY HORNIMAN.

"The shorter of the two men was Edwin Lever, occultist and individualist. The other was Michael Broadhurst, occultist and altruist, and everything which the latter carries with it. . . . Broadhurst, unruffled, smiled most humorously. 'Was it to organise evil that you went to Tibet ten years ago?'" (Macqueen. 6s.)

THE CRIMSON CRYPTOGRAM. By FERGUS HUME.

"A Midnight Surprise"—"The Writing in Blood"—"The Reading of the Blood Signs"—"A Music Hall Star"—"What Mrs. Amber Knew"—"The Red Pocket Book": such are some of the chapter headings of this lineal descendant of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

THE SHIELD OF HIS HONOUR. By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE.

Russian melodrama by the clever author of My Official Wife. The atmosphere is that of wealth, the highest military and diplomatic circles; Grand Dukes, and Excellencies, and Cossack colonels, and great bankers move through the story, which is laid in St. Petersburg and New York. (White & Co. 6s.)

TOWN LADY AND COUNTRY LASS. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

"It was in the days of King George the Second," begins this love story by the author of The House on the Marsh, "when England and France stood watching each other like snarling dogs on either side of a ditch." The King is one of the characters in a story that lacks nothing of action, but on the whole provides a quiet old-English type of interest. (White & Co. 6s.)

FOR RIGHT AND ENGLAND. By HUME NISBET.

A tissue of abuse and bad taste, this novel purports to draw the portrait of Mr. Kruger, who is introduced as the preacher in the Dopper church at Pretoria. He is promptly compared to a gorilla, a wild boar, an octopus. "Imagine a criminal of the most brutal type," &c. (White & Co. 6s.)

JUGLING FORTUNE. By T. W. SPEIGHT.

Mr. Speight's earlier stories have been of a more melodramatic cast than this "Everyday Romance," dealing with commercial and middle-class life. Romance is perhaps hardly the term to apply to a story of which the hero begins life as an artist, and a few years later is the patentee of a mincing-machine; but that is a trifle. Though not exciting, the story justifies itself by its careful study of financial life. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Omar Cult.

SOMEONE who has a dry humour and keen insight ought to write the history of the modern cult of Omar Khayyam. In France the suggestion would not need to be made; some gay psychologist would already be at work on a task offering such rich material of tragedy, comedy, and humbug.

Those who desire to do this thing should dip their pens at once. Every day the inducements to the task are becoming more irresistible. It were best to be first in the field. The material for the final chapters is beginning to arrive, and it is of a sort which promises more rollicking fun than any earlier elements in this strange affair. But, indeed, the whole story is curious, picturesque, and pathetic in high degrees. Consider how your historian's mere rough notes would crackle with possibilities and opportunities, seen far ahead. Naishapur—Woodbridge. Omar—FitzGerald. How one might embroider on these connexions. The utter improbability of FitzGerald being drawn to a far-off, forgotten Persian poet, and the incredibility of his making an English poem out of a Persian one in the intervals of indolent sailing in the Scandal, and a sixth reading of Madame Sévigné's Letters. The impossibility of the result interesting more than a few eccentrics in these islands. The publication, in spite of all; and the silent Cimmerian passage of the book to Mr. Quaritch's twopenny box. FitzGerald's death. Then the slow discovery. Mr. Swinburne's appreciation. Mr. Meredith's. The Whisper as a force in literature. Tennyson's "divinely well." The fact—the inubitable fact—that this shy, dumb, ruminative recluse and bookman, whose love of literature seemed to leave him no time or inclination to produce it, had done a perfect piece of writing. And then the noising abroad of the miracle. The first choice allusions in journalism. The sumptuous talk in Vigo-street. The invocations to "Old Fitz," as to "the gentle Elia." The paragraphs on the spelling of Rubāiyāt; on its accents; and, lastly, on its meaning. The slow casual awakening of the public. The evolution of a boom. THE BOOM.

We calculate that three chapters would hardly do justice to the boom. Who will sort the material? A plunging humour, as of a leviathan taking the water, will serve the historian best here. Let him toss all on high. There was that letter to the Shah. There was Mr. Le Gallienne's late leap on to the back of Mr. Justin McCarthy. There were the CLUB dinners, and the charts in the Sketch showing where Mr. Edmund Gosse sat. And there was the American echo. The way America hustled into Omar, when it got its advices, was real smart. Mr. Mosher easily sold 20,000 cheap copies of the poem, and for the millionaire youth wondrous editions were hatched. One such was advertised quite recently as follows:

RUBĀIYĀT.—Limited edition of fifty copies printed on genuine parchment, every page of each copy illuminated by hand, in gold and colours, bound in vellum, with metal clasps set with semi-precious stones, 100 dols.

We shall always believe that these "semi-precious jewels" were the beginning of the end. They had hardly ceased to burn their coloured lights in the advertisement columns of the American Bookman when Mr. Edgar Fawcett, a writer of some repute, arose and proclaimed through the New York Journal that the Omar cult has been a silly "fad" and has illustrated the "hypocrisy of English ethics." He talked of the "ruffian heterodoxy" of "this Persian bon vivant." "The most pitiable stuff." "Common-place is no word for it, since it merely decorates the obvious in wine-drenched garlands and tawdry spangles." And the Omarite message was interpreted: "Get drunk as often as you can, and stay so long as you can, for there's nothing in life half so profitable."

Yet Mr. Fawcett was not, we believe, the first of the iconoclasts. From Dundee there had come the voice of Mr. A. H. Millar in high protest; and, compared with his, Mr. Fawcett's words were as water unto wine. For, while Mr. Fawcett called Omarism a fad, Mr. Millar denounced it as a new creed, "the mournful pessimism" of which "seems strangely out of harmony with the spirit of an age which has witnessed many fervent religious revivals." Prodigious! The Omar cult on one side, and the tents of the Christian Endeavourers whitening Muswell Hill on the other! Ritualism versus the Rubāiyāt! General Booth and "Old Fitz"! These were unthought of contrasts; and doubtless some useful purpose, not yet discoverable, has been served by Mr. Millar's indication of their existence. Just here it is convenient to remark that Mr. Millar incontinently mixes these tremendous issues with another of less popular, and certainly less material, interest. He contends that the Omar cult as we now know it is rendered absurd by the doubts which beset the very existence of Omar, and by a possibility (which we do not dispute) that the Rubāiyāt was written nearly four hundred years after the date of Omar's death. Now, Mr. Millar is at liberty to advance, and to prove, any theories he pleases about the authorship of the Rubāiyāt and the date of its composition. He may declare that Omar never existed, or that Omar is libelled by connecting him with a poem full of "nihilistic sensuality." These are interesting matters, but their settlement requires in those who attempt it a deep knowledge of the Persian language and of Persian history. It is, however, notorious that the Omar cult rests simply on the merits of FitzGerald's English rendering of the Rubāiyāt. There are probably not a dozen men in England who have any masterly knowledge of the Persian of Omar. These questions about the date, the authorship, and the readings of scattered MSS. have nothing to do with the living "cult" which Mr. Millar wishes to attack. If FitzGerald had evolved Omar from his inner consciousness—had simply created him—his poem would stand where it does, would have gained the same admiration, and would have communicated the same solace to readers of to-day. And if Mr. Millar should produce pat evidence that the Persian Rubāiyāt is a forgery, that it represents a degraded Mohammedanism, and must have been disowned by Omar, he would have produced nothing more momentous than an interesting foot-note to the English, self-existing poem of FitzGerald. What Mr. Millar fails to see is that FitzGerald's poem is self-existent, and would have been just as effective if Omar and Naishapur and the call to the wine-cup had all originated in his own brain in his Woodbridge cottage. Mr. Millar himself points out—as if it helped his case—that "it is frankly admitted that FitzGerald interpolated many quatrains for which there is no shadow of authority in the original." Precisely in proportion as he did so does his Rubāiyāt escape injury from Mr. Millar's learned statements about the real Omar, and his decadent imitators of a later day. We can, however, understand Mr. Millar's desire to dwell in this region of the discussion as much as possible. The other line of attack—the attack on the morality of the FitzGerald Rubāiyāt—must indeed be difficult work. Still,

Mr. Millar has blown no uncertain blast. We really must register again the full text of his warning. The reader will kindly lay down his "Golden Treasury" Rubāiyāt while we do so.

There is not much comfort in the mournful pessimism of such a creed [as Omar's], and it seems strangely out of harmony with the spirit of an age which has witnessed many fervent religious revivals, and has carefully avoided the pitfalls of Atheism and Materialism. Hence it is probable that the Omarism which has suddenly burst forth within these few years will rapidly sink into oblivion; and the next generation, as the present, will prefer the calm, steady faith of Tennyson's "In Memoriam" and "Crossing the Bar" to the heartless, hopeless, impotent despair of the Rubāiyāt of Omar Khayyām.

So the circle of irony is completing itself. FitzGerald, who hardly dared an essay in belles-lettres, has, it seems, promulgated a creed, and the minds of ministers are disturbed.

Only Scottish seriousness could have originated such a view of the matter—could have seen in the purely literary cult of "Omarism" a power for evil equal, let us say, to the present organised power for good exercised by the Particular Baptists; or could have talked of the cult of Omar and "religious revivals" as if the first movement were one of Satan's devices to stop the second. Mr. Millar takes a wrong turning when he imagines that people are radically influenced by the philosophy of the Rubāiyāt. They are not, and especially is this true if, with Mr. Millar, we take the most positive and least elevated view of that philosophy. Replying to our recent remark that, while many people read Omar, no one takes him for a guide, Mr. Millar says this is a "futile conclusion," and adds: "Surely this is circumscribing seriously the functions of Omarism." Necessarily such a conclusion seems futile to a gentleman whose Knoxian attack on FitzGerald's poem is based precisely on the idea that people are making it their Bible. As for circumscribing the limits of Omarism, we are only circumscribing the limits of the Omarism which exists in Mr. Millar's imagination.

These views of the Rubāiyāt could originate only in minds which have not the perception of certain luxurious functions of poetry, and of the automatic process by which the mind of the reader enjoys the luxury but does not translate it into action or creed. Is it necessary to argue to a critic of the land of Burns that a man may enjoy songs of drink and free love without losing his moral balance? Mr. Millar can have read but little poetry if he is not aware that there is a poetry which seeks to release weary and dangerous moods by giving them expression. He contrasts the Rubāiyāt with Tennyson's "In Memoriam"; but has he ever compared it with Tennyson's "Lotus-Eaters"? Has he compared it with certain songs of Horace? with certain utterances of Montaigne? Can he approve the Book of Ecclesiastes, and then disapprove of verses like these:

A Book of Verses underneath the Bough,
A Jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread—and Thou
Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow!

Some for the Glories of This World; and some Sigh for the Prophet's Paradise to come;
Ah, take the Cash, and let the Credit go,
Nor heed the rumble of a distant Drum!

The Worldly Hope men set their Hearts upon
Turns Ashes—or it prospers; and anon,
Like Snow upon the Desert's dusty Face,
Lighting a little hour or two—is gone.

Think, in this batter'd Caravanserai
Whose Portals are alternate Night and Day,
How Sultan after Sultan with his Pomp
Abode his destined Hour, and went his way.

Ah, my Belovéd, fill the Cup that clears
To-day of past Regrets and Future Fears:
To-morrow!—Why, To-morrow I may be Myself with Yesterday's Sev'n thousand Years.

For some we loved, the loveliest and the best
That from his Vintage rolling Time hath prest,
Have drunk their Cup a Round or two before,
And one by one crept silently to rest.

Ah, make the most of what we yet may spend
Before we too into the Dust descend;
Dust into Dust, and Dust to lie
Sans Wine, sans Song, sans Singer, and—sans End!

The brief truth about the Omar cult we conceive to be this: As a sudden and wide-spread devotion to one fine poem, fanned by advertisement and imitation, and doomed to subside, the cult has its ridiculous aspect. There was really no reason of a satisfying kind why the New Bookishness should not have selected Milton's Comus for its fetish instead of FitzGerald's Rubāiyāt. That had, indeed, been a better choice. But FitzGerald's poem is a fine one; and for our part we take our stand on its intrinsic merits, amused by its alternate fates of neglect, popularity, and opprobrium. These are mere states of the atmosphere. The poem's the thing; and a fine draught it is in the right hour!

Things Seen.

The Hill.

YONDER, far away, the hill rose to the blue sky. From every point of the garden that green, heat-capped hill, immemorial sentinel over the opulent, peaceful countryside, was visible. I had seen it in all weathers, this changeless, friendly hill; but on this still summer day, when peace and the world were interchangeable terms, and the warm, flower-scent laden air lulled the senses, I felt almost a feeling of worship towards that green hill. When evening fell; when the sun dipped, and then peeped from behind the fir-trees, and a hush came over the land, someone sang—

But I was up at break of day,
And brought my flowers along with me.

That gave me the idea. I would that very night absent myself from my bed. I would sleep out of doors; before dawn I would be climbing that hill, and see the sun rise from the summit. Midnight found me feeling my way up, up through the warm, still woods. Little living things scurried across my path, or moved restlessly in the undergrowth as I swung by seeking a place of rest. Did I sleep? I know not, for my eyes were hardly closed before, so it seemed, the birds were twittering of another dawn:

But I was up at break of day,
And brought my flowers along with me.

I picked them on the hillside, under a sky flecked with red and gold. Beneath stretched the awakening valley, awakening to a day that knew no fear; a day in which the mere joy of living sufficed. As I neared the summit of the hill, I saw above me a mound. I climbed towards it. . . . It was a fort—a fort newly made. The guns were trained over the valley. A soldier stood there peering. And beyond was—France.

The Hymn-Book.

THE great Assembly Rooms looked bare and dusty in the morning sun. The bits of ribbon, lace, and tulle scattered over the floor, with here and there a piteous crumpled flower, the piles of chairs in the great stone hall below, and the strip of crimson felt which spread its faded length down the muddy steps—all bore witness to the fact of last night's "soirée."

In the great saloon upstairs some children were having a dancing lesson, and the most lingering of sensuous waltzes came borne to me where I waited.

I thought I would go and watch them.

Round they went in their dainty attire, amid glitter and music and flash.

"The heirs of all the ages." . . . They smiled at me. I smiled back. I stood and wondered at them. . . .

As I passed out of the hall the wind blew a leaflet towards me, and I picked it up and read.

It contained three or four Lenten hymns, as used in a Welsh monastery. . . . How had it come there? . . . Then I remembered that Father I—was preaching there every Sunday, in that same hall where the children were dancing now. . . . A poster bearing his name was before me as I turned. . . . I opened the little book. . . . The hymn that caught my eye was called "What then." . . . And I saw in my dream a kneeling penitent and the face of a priest. . . . The tones of the waltz came borne to me sweeter than ever. . . . I laid the leaflet down on a chair, and went my way . . . and wondered. . . . For I had stood where two worlds met.

"The heirs of all the ages." . . . Heirs of what? This little life—a dance—a dirge—no more? . . . And is that all we call their heritage? . . . And . . . What then? . . .

"Robert Orange."*

"JOHN OLIVER HOBBS" has brought to the continued study of the personality whom she calls "Robert Orange" the distinction of her earlier book, The School for Saints. Robert Orange ends, as it was clear from the first that he would end, in the religious vocation. Orange marries Brigit, only to discover, on the day after the wedding, that her nominal husband, the wretched Parilete, is alive, and that there is nothing but renunciation for both of them. For a short time Orange lingers on the stage, faintly pursued by the phantom loves of two other women—Lady Fitz-Rewes, whom we know of old, and a new rather "orchidaceous" type, very brilliantly sketched, in the person of Lady Sara de Treverell. A duel with Castrillon, who renews his pursuit of Brigit, hastens the end to which this fine, rather bloodless, character manifestly tends, as Brigit, with her inheritance of the artistic temper, tends towards the unreal but attractive world of the stage. Robert Orange's final surrender of his will to the forces that mastered him in his youth is described in a kind of valedictory letter by Disraeli:

It was his faith to believe that salvation rests on the negation and renunciation of personality. He pushed this to the complete suppression of his will, tenderly considered. I need not detain you on the familiar dogmas of Christianity with regard to the reign of nature and the reign of grace. Your view may be expressed thus:

Puis-qu'il aime à périr, je consens qu'il périsse.

Perhaps this consummation is made less convincing inasmuch as it comes through the stress of an exciting situation, the revulsion of a sensitive nature from a moment of passion, the moving power of which is jealousy. Not having been from the first strongly drawn to Orange's character, I confess that the end of his career leaves me cold. The study of his temperament is to me an historic study, rather than a piece of instant and living portraiture. He seems to be a figure in the world of Disraeli's novels rather than in the society of to-day. 1869, which is Robert Orange's date, must, indeed, be far from 1899, for I do not feel that I recognise the social atmosphere of the earlier period as having many points of resemblance to that of the later time. Surely unless our social life is all along idealised by a lady who has for literary purposes the advantage of not belonging to the people who produced it, it has grown much coarser than it was. Even Lord Reckage, a most delightful portrait, stands far above the average intellectual interests of the English aristocracy. Perhaps that is because that aristocracy has ceased to exist, or has become a mere ornament and appendage of the money-making type. But at its best I doubt whether in this century at least it possessed the quality of subtlety, of fascination, of semi-poetic beauty, which both Disraeli and "John Oliver Hobbes" appear to have found in it. Both these writers are, indeed, admirable critics of institutions they admire, or seem to admire. Nothing can be more vivacious than the dissection of Lord Reckage or the slight but very humorous sketch of Lord Garrow; but, on the whole, I feel that if all this delightful artificiality ever existed, it at no time possessed the capricious grace of the society of which Reckage is a part. Surely, one asks, this is not England—even the England of the Disraelian period. It is a group by Watteau—something classical and French, like the genius of its author.

Having said so much, it is easy for the critic to surrender himself without reserve to the singular charm of manner, the power of close description of subtle or perverse moods, which increasingly distinguishes "John Oliver Hobbes's" work. Reckage himself is a persuasive and elaborate work of portraiture, which must, I think, have been taken from life—though I cannot identify him with any public character on the stage, now or then. Admirable, indeed, and often profound, is the suggestion of this wilful and corroded temperament, devoted to the mixed pursuit of those frivolous and pious ends which in English life are so closely identified. "John Oliver Hobbes" has a peculiar advantage for analysing this kind of career. She is an American and she is a Catholic—i.e., she can see its ludicrous side and its dilettantism, and that of the Anglican busybodies whom she depicts. You may easily state the objections to the Catholic view of life, but there is one thing which it is not—it is never vulgar. Who can say the same of the Anglican Archbishop, or those other models of temperate piety, the mould of which is the Anglican Church? Her special and avowed portrait—that of Disraeli—I find less satisfactory. It may be true, but I find it hard to read some sentences in Disraeli's conversation and letters, showing a strong feeling for Catholicism, when I remember that their author was the man who introduced and carried the Public Worship Regulation Act. On the whole, perhaps this strange man is more plausible in the sequel than in the earlier book, The School for Saints. His sincere affection for personal friends was undoubtedly a characteristic, as it is of many people who, lacking an ideal aim, look at the world with strong emphasis on its folly and its untrustworthiness. But to such a man English society must have been more of a sheer boredom than "John Oliver Hobbes" imagines. Disraeli, we know, was often a silent and indifferent table-companion. Neither as a politician nor as a writer could he long keep the tongue out of his cheek when the subject was English institutions. He flattered the aristocracy, which disliked him; and in a sense, no doubt, he admired it. But he had the intellectual man's contempt for it; the Jew's aversion for anything so self-centred, so self-satisfied.

Of the style of Robert Orange little but praise can be spoken. "John Oliver Hobbes's" gift of epigram even threatens to be something of a danger to the development of her work. She is never satisfied till she gets the mot juste—until language has given her the precise reflection of the mood or humour which she desires to convey. The book is full of good sayings, all of them elegant as to their dress; some profound as to their thought. Take these, for example:

* Robert Orange. Being a continuation of the history of Robert Orange, M.P., and a sequel to the School for Saints. By John Oliver Hobbes. (T. Fisher Unwin)

The second-rate mind, whether represented in a person or by a council, shrinks from the adoption of simple measures, and invariably seeks to make itself conspicuous by so placing others as to make them appear unnecessary.

Food, and wine, and money, and fine houses, and amusements were subjects on which he expended a large amount of silent enthusiasm.

Reckage knew well that he was himself too selfish a man to let affection for any one creature come between his soul and its God. There was no self-discipline required in his case when a choice had to be made between a human being and his own advantage—whether temporal or eternal.

An impulse, which had something in it of brute fury, urged him to tear open that still face and drag the thoughts behind it to the light.

Character is the rarest thing in England.

. . . Her quick sympathies rendered the most trivial interchange of ideas an emotional exercise.

The English can never deal with systems or ideas. They can only attack individuals—you depend in a crisis on the passions of men, never on their reason.

No powerful being ever yet either stood by the glory, or fell by the disasters, of a love-affair alone, uncomplicated by other issues.

Any man who is written up into a place can be written down out of it.

Society . . . does not practise any of the virtues which it demands from the individual. It ridicules the highest motives, and degrades the most heroic achievements. It is fed with emotions and spectacles: it cries, laughs, and condemns without knowledge and without enthusiasm.

What one feels is that much of this observation of life, so acute and so delicate, is limited by the writer's faith; it springs rather from religious feeling than from the universal philosophy which is the root of the greatest literature. In all her recent books you have the two worlds set in steady contrast—the world of human striving and imperfection, the ideal cloistered world in which the passions have rest, and the soul's progress is at once sure and eternal. The problem which such a treatment of the world's doings suggests can hardly be discussed here. Modern literature seems determined to approach it from a point of view widely different from that of "John Oliver Hobbes." It excepts nothing from its analyses. She, it is clear, excepts much. Her books show increasing literary power, humour, and delicacy of feeling. But they show also an increasing detachment from the world which she often criticises so admirably, and which, unlike her, writers so essentially modern as Ibsen and Tolstoi insist on regarding as a sufficient arena for effort at once profound and stimulating.

H. W. MASSINGHAM.

Correspondence.

Style.

SIR,—Will you allow me to offer you my thanks for so kindly taking up the cudgels on my behalf? Certainly I did mean more by "conceive" than my correspondents seem to allow—or discern. It seems to me that the man who says anything about style is very much in the same position as the unfortunate, bald-headed gentleman who went to gather honey without his hat. The character of Hamlet, or the Antinomianism of Genius, are subjects which cannot compare with it for offering opportunities for discussion!

I must object to "J. M. S.'s" use of the word "authoritative" concerning my Dicta. It is a side-kick which is quite gratuitous. I simply wrote what I thought, and think. I do not claim to be an authority on anything—except what is good for me to eat.

He also takes me to task concerning my statement that "you cannot be a good stylist if you have no brains" (which I think should be pretty evident!), and says that by making such a statement I implied that, "therefore, if you have brains you must be a good stylist." Did I? If he says so I suppose I did. But surely he is somewhat hazy about the very special character and kind of the brains we are dealing with. Let me remind him that we are discussing the literary, not the ordinary mind, or any other species of mind. If a man has brains it does not necessarily follow that he is, or should be, a literary man—a statement that cuts both ways!

As for his remark that there is "an art of expression quite apart . . . from the matter waiting to be expressed," I can only assure him that it would afford me the sincerest gratification to see a specimen of it! The only sample that has hitherto come my way was a pamphlet of political import, obviously inspired by a Tory, and entitled "What the Liberals have Done." It consisted of a collection of blank leaves, which implied, of course, that the Liberals had done nothing at all! But this is politics, and I must be careful. I am stepping from the frying-pan into the fire.—I am, &c.,

ARTHUR COLES ARMSTRONG.

Tchaikovsky.

SIR,—With reference to your review of Mrs. Newmarch's Tchaikovsky, I should like, with your permission, to emphasise your statement as to his not being "a morbid man." Some of the scandalous stories that have reached England since his death have aroused the suspicion that he was something worse than merely morbid, and the report of his mysterious suicide just at the precise moment when popular success was assured him added colour to this suspicion, and with many people the suspicion became a conviction. I have, however, had the privilege of conversing with several of Tchaikovsky's friends, and I have been assured by them that the great Russian composer could not in any sense be called "morbid"; that he was full of the joy of living; and that, in a limited degree, he was happy and contented. Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who is mentioned with so much affection and regard by Tchaikovsky in his Diary, has more than once told me that the story of the latter's suicide is credited by none of his friends and relatives: it is merely an invention of a scandal-loving public, which is only too ready to believe anything that will bring shame and ignominy on the name of an illustrious man.—I am, &c.,

C. FRED KENYON.

Mr. Robertson's 'Introduction to English Politics.'

SIR,—Your reviewer, in his partial replies to my queries, says that I dwell on the little questions, but shirk the big ones—an assertion which goes to explain why he refrains from answering what, in all innocence, I considered an important question; but before re-stating that question, I had, perhaps, better deal with the following statement: "In regard to the so-called 'historical shibboleths,' my point was that the analogy of nature is against the author: as different breeds of other animals have their several capacities, so have the breeds of men"—a refutation which leaves me wondering how variability within a closely-related group of animals has been brought about if not by crossing, change of environment, natural or artificial selection, regulation of hot and cold, &c. It thus turns out that this analogy corroborates Mr. Robertson's main thesis: that race genius is a consequence of geographical position, socio-economic conditions, religious and culture contacts. There is, however, no necessity to press this analogy, as our author expressly confines himself to higher societies; and, believing that history is interpretable, he uses the well-accredited histories in order to obtain generalisations which shall give us political and social guidance in the present. My question, then, is: Into what specific errors has our author been led by his rejection of the race-genius theory? It is a simple enough question, especially as the material for answering it is given in the book itself.—I am, &c.,

F. KETTLE.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 43 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best rendering of the following poem by Alfred de Musset :

DERNIERS VERS.

J'ai perdu ma force et ma vie,
Et mes amis, et ma gaité ;
J'ai perdu jusqu'à la fierté
Qui faisait croire à mon génie.
Quand j'ai connu la vérité,
J'ai cru que c'était une amie.
Quand je l'ai comprise et sentie,
J'en étais déjà dégouté.
Et pourtant elle est éternelle,
Et ceux qui se sont passés d'elle
Ici bas ont tout ignoré.
Dieu parle, il faut qu'on lui réponde.
Le seul bien qui me reste au monde
Est d'avoir quelquefois pleuré.

This competition has been popular, and many of the translations are good. As usual, some efforts succeed as poems better than they do as translations. We have awarded the prize to Mrs. Alice Ferrand, Littlefield House, Exmouth, for the following :

LAST VERSES.

My strength is gone, and the glad lust
Of living fades, and friends depart ;
Lost even is the pride of heart
Which made me in my genius trust.
When first I saw the face of Truth
I deemed that I had found a friend ;
But having proved her to the end,
I satiate grew, and tired, in sooth.
And yet she is eternal power,
Nor have they lived a single hour
Who here below have scorned her sway.
God speaks, and I must answer soon.
The world contains but this last boon—
That I have wept upon a day !

The following translations are among the best sent in :

A LAST WORD.

My strength and life are gone from me,
My friends estranged, and mirth forgot ;
The very pride men held to be
My pledge of power, remembered not.
I looked on Truth, and knew her fair
Of face, and gave her all my trust ;
I probed her inmost heart, and there
My rapture sickened to disgust.
Yet has she life that cannot die ;
Nor is there any secret known
To souls who pass her heedless by.

God calls, and man must speak : the years,
Ruthless, have left me this alone—
That I, for speech, have given Him tears.

[M. A. W., London.]

LAST LINES.

My life, my powers, abandon me,
My friends, my gaiety are fled ;
Even the pride on which was fed
My self-belief has ceased to be.
When first truth came to me I said :
Lo ! she will prove a friend to me ;
But when I felt her, and could see—
Already I was surfeited.

Yet truth is endless ; whoso'er
Rejected her, missed everywhere
The lore that is in nature hid.

God speaks, and I must make reply.
The sole good left me is that I Remember tears which once I shed.

[L. L., London.]

LAST WORDS.

Energy gone and life beside,
With friendship, and the youthful glow
Of joyousness—and power to show
My genius justified of pride.

For when I looked Truth in the face,
Methought a friend and comrade found,
Till Knowledge brought the bitter wound
Of disenchantment in her place.

Yet Truth stands rooted fast on high,
And scoffers who have passed her by
From them, through time, is wisdom kept.

God speaks, and wills an answering sign.
The only blessing left of mine
Is this, that I have sometimes wept.

[A. H. W., Croydon.]

LAST VERSES.

I have lost strength and life's desire,
And my friends, and gaiety :
That pride itself was fain to die
Which lit by faith my sacred fire.

When I met Truth upon the way,
I thought that she would be my friend,
But ere I knew and felt the end,
I had wearied of her sway.

Natheless she lives immortally.
And they who heedless pass her by
Here below have lived inept.

God speaks, we needs must make reply,
The only blessing I desecry
Is, that I have sometimes wept.

[M. T., London.]

Other replies received from : N. L., Bristol ; R. F. McC., Whithy ; H. V. H., London ; E. W. H., London ; N. S., London ; W. G. F., Southsea ; H. R. S., Newcastle-on-Tyne ; J. D. A., Ealing ; F. R. M., London ; F. H. S., Bridgewater ; J. P., Trowbridge ; C. L. C., Redhill ; H. W. D., London ; W. C. T., Liverpool ; G. E. P., London ; G. H., Malvern Wells ; K. E. T., London ; A. M. P., Folkestone ; E. B., Liverpool ; S. M., Addiscombe ; E. C. M. D., Crediton ; Miss B., Brentwood ; C. J. F., Gloucester ; A. W., London ; K. K., Dublin ; A. B., Edinburgh ; C. J. W., Bristol ; Miss P., Norwich ; A. R. P., Folkestone ; F. W. C., London ; E. A. S., Sevenoaks ; Miss B., Bideford ; N. A., West Bromwich ; F. B. D., Torquay ; K. J., Bristol ; J. P. B., Lossiemouth, N.B.

Competition No. 44 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best sonnet entitled "China."

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 24. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

"Truth-Seeker," Religion and Reason (Watts & Co.) net 1/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Bell (F. W.), The South African Conspiracy, or the Arms of Afrikanerdom (Heinemann)
Galen (Alfred S.), Studies in Eastern Religions (Kelly)
Rowell (T.), Natal and the Borders (Dent) net 2/6
Penny (Mrs. Frank), Fort St. George, Madras (Sonne schien) net 10/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Inglis (H. R. G.), The John o' Groat's Road Map (Gill & Inglis) 1/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Ferreira (Aug. J.), Nebo, the Merchant of Susa : a Drama (Greening) net 2/6
Templemore (Bryan), Cravenpark : a Play (Hiscoke) net 2/6
Pooler (C. K.), Translations and Other Verses (Longmans) net 3/0

EDUCATIONAL.

Niekin (J. A.), Scott's Old Mortality (Camb. Univ. Press) 2/-
Lyde (L. W.), A School Geography of the World (Black)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Spicer (Howard), Sports for Girls (Melrose) net 1/-

NEW EDITIONS.

Mallock (M. M.), The Economics of Modern Cookery (Macmillan)
Lozan (James), Gaelic Gatherings (Bryce & Son) net 6/0
Bulwer (Sir Henry Lytton), Historical Characters (Macmillan) 3/6
Bastable (C. F.), The Theory of International Trade (Macmillan) net 3/6
Temple Classics, Golden Legend, Vols. III. and IV. (Dent) each 1/6
Chiswick Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, King Richard II. (Bell) each 1/0

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

CATALOGUES.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 2 may be had on application,
price 2s. 6d., at

1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

15th and 16th CENTURY BOOKS; AMERICAN;
85 LOST or UNKNOWN BOOKS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

TO AUTHORS.—Mr. FREDERICK
ROUTLEDGE, late of George Routledge & Sons, Publishers, Lodgeat Hill, RECEIVES AUTHORS' MSS. with a view to placing them with Publishers or Editors. Authors'
MSS. Typewritten. Terms on application.—ROSEBURY HOUSE,
8, Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane.

MR. X. Q. would be happy to hear of a Gentleman able and willing to FURNISH MATERIAL for a HISTORY of ENGLISH LITERATURE, both in England and America, from 1850-1900.—Letters Sub. X. Q.
Office of this Paper.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent,
N.W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

SELECTIONS FROM

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S
PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 6s. each, post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.
"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes full of thought and knowledge and power."
British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Felicitous exposition, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—World and Work.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."
Methodist Times.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and economy to attract the most cultivated."
New York Observer.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 11th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."
North British Daily Mail.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LIMITED,
21 & 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, London, E.C.

UNIVERSITY of GLASGOW.

ADDITIONAL EXAMINERSHIPS.

The University Court of the University of Glasgow will shortly proceed to appoint the following ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS:—

(a) EXAMINERS for DEGREES in ARTS—viz.,

Four Examiners: (1) in Moral Philosophy and Logic; (2) in English; (3) in Education; and (4) in History.
The appointment in each case will be for three years, from 1st January next, at the following annual salaries—viz.:
Moral Philosophy and Logic, £50; English, £30; Education,
£10 10s.; and History, £20.

(b) EXAMINER in POLITICAL ECONOMY for DEGREES in ARTS and LAW.

The appointment will be for three years, from 1st January next, at an annual salary of £10 10s.

(c) EXAMINERS for DEGREES in ARTS and for the PRE-LIMINARY EXAMINATIONS—viz.,

Two Examiners: (1) in French, and (2) in German.
The appointment in each case will be for three years, from 1st February, 1900.

(d) EXAMINERSHIPS for the PRELIMINARY EXAMI-
NATIONS—viz.,

Two Examiners: (1) in Mathematics, and (2) in Classics.
The appointment in each case will be for a period not exceeding three years, as from 1st February next, at the following annual salaries—viz.: Mathematics, £42; and Classics, £70.

Candidates for the above should lodge twenty copies of their Application and Testimonials with the undersigned on or before 12th September, 1900.

ALAN E. CLAPPERTON,

Secretary of the Glasgow University Court.

91, West Regent Street, Glasgow.

SWINDON and NORTH WILTS
TECHNICAL SCHOOL.

Principal—H. BOTTOMLEY KNOWLES, M.A. (OXON).

APPOINTMENT OF ART MASTER.

The Committee require the services of an ART MASTER
for the Day and Evening Classes in connection with the School of Art. Salary, £175 per annum.

The Art Master appointed will be required to commence duty
on Wednesday, September 5th, 1900.

Forms of application, to be returned not later than Thursday,
July 26th, may be obtained from the SECRETARY, Swindon and North Wilts Technical School, Swindon, Wilts.

July 14th, 1900. J. S. PROTHIERO, Secretary.

CARRIAGES INSURED AGAINST ACCI-DENTS caused by Collision, the Fallins, Bolting, or Kicking of Horses, or by being Run into by other Vehicles.
Policies issued for the Year or Season only. Prospectuses post
free.—IMPERIAL ACCIDENT, LIFE STOCK and GENERAL INSURANCE
Co., Ltd., 17, Pall Mall East, London, S.W. Agents wanted.

CITY of LONDON SCHOOL.—WANTED, a CLASSICAL ASSISTANT-MASTER to teach Classics and English in the Upper Fourth Form, and to take some work (chiefly Classics) in the Fifth and Sixth Forms. Good Composition in Latin and Greek required. The salary will be £300 a year, increasing to £450 a year.—Candidates for the appointment are requested to forward their applications, accompanied with a copy of testimonials as to qualification and character, not later than SATURDAY, July 21st next, to A. J. AUSTIN, Secretary, at the School, Victoria Embankment, E.C. Selected candidates will be duly communicated with. Forms of application can be obtained of the Secretary. A gentleman not over 30 years of age will be required.

ST PAUL'S SCHOOL.—An EXAMINA-TION for filling up about SIXTEEN VACANCIES on the Foundation will be held on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 10th
SEPTEMBER NEXT.—For information apply to the Bursar of St. Paul's School, West Kensington.

ASSISTANT SCHOOLMISTRESS.—Miss
LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND University
Graduates, Trained and Certificated High School Teachers, Foreign Teachers, Kindergarten Mistresses, &c.—CENTRAL REGISTRY FOR TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

SUPERIOR SCHOOLS for GIRLS.—Miss
LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND High-class
BOARDING and DAY SCHOOLS in England and on the Continent.—CENTRAL REGISTRY FOR TEACHERS, 25, Craven
Street, Charing Cross.

CHÂLET CAUDE COTE, DIEPPE.—An English lady RECEIVES EIGHT GIRLS of 16 and upwards in her Chalet near Dieppe. Conversational French rapidly acquired. Special facilities for Music, Sketching,
German. Opportunities for every form of healthy enjoyment.
Direct Service twice daily with England.—Full details will be supplied on applying to Miss CUNNICK, Dieppe.

"Miss Rossi writes with grace, humour, and vivacity."

The Speaker.

LESSONS by CORRESPONDENCE.—
The art of Literary Composition, like other arts, cannot be acquired, because it is the expression of the artist's personality.

But, like every other art, it rests on a basis of knowledge,
and of principles which may easily be acquired.

The system of instruction is adapted to meet the requirements of each correspondent. A subject is set for a composition of a given length, which is returned with marginal comments
and corrections, and, in addition, a couple of sheets giving reasons for each correction, and practical advice.

MSS. already written may be substituted for the subject set,
and will be carefully criticised.

Fee, payable in advance: Twelve lessons, Three Guineas; or a trial course of three, one Guinea.

Mrs Rossi, 32, Moonmouth Road, Ray-water, London, W.

An American Transport
in the Crimean War.

CHAPTER I.

The Old and the New Mediterranean Trade—The Pioneer Steamship—Arrival at Marseilles—The Cholera—Origin of the Crimean War—French
Hilarity succeeded by Disappointment.

CHAPTER II.

The Passage to Constantinople—Reminiscences of Antiquity—Ashore in the Dardanelles—Disinterested Kindness of Suleyman Pasha—Constantinople and its Surroundings—The Passage to the Crimea—The Seaports and the Battlegrounds—Starvation at the English Camp—
French Economy and Hospitality.

CHAPTER III.

The Mistake of the Allies in Making their Landing—
The Commencement of the Siege and the Misery attending it—Another Passage from Marseilles—
Narrow Escape from Foundering in a Gale—
Arrival at Kamiesh—The Monastery of St.
George.

CHAPTER IV.

The American and the French Cuisine—A Trip to the Sea of Azof—Contrasted Scenes of Peace and War—Vandalism of the Allies at Kertch—
Trading with a Pasha—The Unsuccessful Attack on Sebastopol—Panic at Kamiesh and Balaklava —Return to Marseilles—Trip to Algeria.

CHAPTER V.

Return Again to the Crimea—Ravages of Disease in the Camps—French Transport System compared with Ours in the Civil War—The Sisters of Charity—The Capture of the Malakoff and Redan
—A View of the Ruins—Bomb-proof Female Curiosity.

CHAPTER VI.

Entering the Turkish Service—The Turk a Man of his Word—Good Pay and Little Work—Our Philosophic Chief Officer—The Pasha's Bedclothes—
His Friendship—No Use for a Propeller.

CHAPTER VII.

Hafiz Effendi and his Harem.

CHAPTER VIII.

Mustapha Pasha Wide Awake—We are Hurried Off to Eupatoria—A Rescue in the Black Sea—A British Frigate comes to our Aid—Arrival at Eupatoria.

CHAPTER IX.

The Blunder of a British General—A Post-Mortem held by Mr. Sears and Some of his Religious Ideas—The End of the War and Comments on its Results.

By Capt. CODMAN.

Frontispiece. 198 pp. Price 3s. 6d.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

CHINA AND THE FAR EAST.—BOOKS TO READ.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA.

CHINA: the Long-Lived Empire. By

ELIZA R. SCIDMORE. With a Portrait of the Empress Dowager and over 50 other Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

DAILY NEWS.—"The book is to be recommended as a lively and vivid account of Chinese life and character. With its sketches of scenes, and persons wherewith the entire world is now deeply concerned, 'China: the Long-Lived Empire' appears at an opportune moment. It contains a large number of good illustrations."

WORLD POLITICS at the END of the NINETEENTH CENTURY as INFLUENCED by the ORIENTAL SITUATION. By Professor PAUL S. REINSCH, Ph.D., LL.B. Globe 8vo, 5s. net.

*. This book treats of the Chinese question as the true centre of interest in present international politics.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

THE HISTORY of CHINA. By

DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, Author of "Chinese Gordon," "Sir Stamford Raffles" &c., &c. A New and Revised Edition, Illustrated with Portraits and Maps. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 24s.

*. The Second Volume contains a full History of China and her connection with European Nations, and detailed accounts of all events, including the Sino-Japan War, and its diplomatic consequences.

"Mr. Boulger is a thoughtful writer, and his facts may be relied on. He has, too, the true inwardness of the historian.... For the purpose of information it would be difficult to point to a more handy and trustworthy book."—Morning Post.

"Regarded as a history pure and simple, indeed, Mr. Boulger's latest effort is all that such a work should be."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"One cannot read this admirable history without feeling how much Mr. Boulger's sympathies have been enlisted by the wonderful record of Chinese achievement and Chinese character which he has collected with so much charm and ability."—Saturday Review.

W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

BOOKS ABOUT CHINA, MONGOLIA, and JAPAN.

SOUTHERN CHINA. RAMBLES IN JAPAN: THE AINU OF JAPAN:

By Rev. J. MACGOWAN, of the London Mission, Amoy. With 77 Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

"The description of the scenery round about Hong Kong and the open parts of Amoy, Canton, and Foochow is delightful; the sketches of European life faithful, and the appreciation of Chinese character just. A feature of the book is its many high-class illustrations."—Pall Mall Gazette.

AMONG the MONGOLS. By James

GILMOUR, M.A., of Pekin. With Engravings. 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"No one who begins this book will leave it till the narrative ends, or doubt for an instant that he has been enriched by something separate and distinct in literature, something almost unobtainable in the way it has gripped him, and made him see for ever a scene he never expected to see."—The Spectator.

MORE ABOUT the MONGOLS. By

JAMES GILMOUR, M.A., of Pekin. 6s., cloth.

"The experiences of a devoted missionary, whose gift of circumstantial narration has not inaptly been likened to Defoe's."—The Times.

OLD WANG: the First Chinese

Evangelist in Manchuria. A Sketch of his Life and Work, with a Chapter on Native Agency in Chinese Missions. With a Portrait and Illustrations. By JOHN ROSS, Missionary of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. 1s. 6d., cloth.

the Land of the Rising Sun. By Rev. Canon

TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D. With many Illustrations by Edward Whymper, from Photographs and Sketches. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

"Dr. Tristram is an experienced traveller, keen in observation and kindly in appreciation, an accomplished field naturalist, and an enthusiastic collector of things rare or beautiful both in nature and art. These qualities have stood him in good stead during his visit to Japan."—The Times.

GILMOUR and his BOYS. By

RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Illustrations. 2s. 6d., cloth, gilt.

The book is largely made up of the letters written by James Gilmour to his two boys, between 1886 and 1891. They describe many of his self-slaying labours in Mongolia, they are full of strange and interesting incidents, and they tell, in his own graphic style, the story of his life and work from day to day.

FOR HIS SAKE. A Record of a

Life Consecrated to God, and Devoted to China. Extracts from the Letters of ELSIE MARSHALL, martyred at Hwa-Sang, China, August 1, 1895. With Portrait. 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

"A more fitting title could not well have been chosen for the intensely interesting volume of letters of Miss Elsie Marshall."—The Record.

the Religions, Superstitions, and General History of the Hairy Aborigines of Japan. By the Rev. JOHN BATCHELOR, C.M.S. With 80 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s., cloth boards.

"Mr. Batchelor's book is valuable as being the first which treats at any length of this strange people."—Pall Mall Gazette.

GILMOUR of MONGOLIA: his

Diaries, Letters, and Reports. Edited and Arranged by RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth.

"We gladly welcome another notable addition to the number of impressive and fascinating missionary books—a volume fit to stand on the same shelf with the biographies of Paton and Mackay."—British Weekly.

AMONG the DARK-HAIRED

RACE in the FLOWERY LAND. By SAMUEL B. DRAKE, of the Baptist Mission in No. 10 China. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

GLANCES at CHINA. By the

Rev. GILBERT REID, M.A., of the American Presbyterian Board. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, INCORPORATED, 56, Paternoster Row, London.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW AND CHEAPER ISSUE.

THE INTRUDERS: a Novel.

By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "Mr. Smith," &c. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

New Volume of the "SILVER LIBRARY."

The HEART of PRINCESS OSRA

By ANTHONY HOPE.

With 9 Illustrations by JOHN WILLIAMSON.

NEW AND CHEAPER ISSUE.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST, 1900.—Price SIXPENCE.

ONE of OURSELVES. By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "Mr. Smith," &c. (Continued).

ENGLISH MIDSHIPMEN and FRENCH PRISONS, 1897.

By EVELINE C. GOULEY.

EL DORADO. By MAY KENDALL.

THE EVANGELIST. By MARY PENGILIN.

A NATURALIST'S RAMBLES. By GEORGE A. B. DEWAR.

IN THE NAME of a WOMAN. By AARNA W. MARCHMONT.

Author of "By Right of Sword," "A Dash for a Throne," &c. (Continued).

AT THE SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1018.—AUGUST, 1900.—2s. 6d.

HOW WE ESCAPED FROM PRETORIA. (With Plans.)

By CAPTAIN HALDANE, D.S.O., 2nd BATT. GORLON HIGHLANDERS.—A GLIMPSE OF ERIN: SORLEY BOY'S TOWN.

—MORE ABOUT RETRIEVERS. By LT.-COLONEL SIR

HENRY SMITH, K.C.B.—PRISCILLA HOBBS. By

GILFRID W. HARTLEY.—THE WARDEN OF THE

MARCH—LORD JIM: A SKETCH. By JOSEPH CON-

RAD.—THE ELDER BROTHER OF THE SHAN. By

WILFRID SPARROV.—THE WAR OPERATIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA: THE COST OF RAPIDITY—A SNEAKING FOR-

WOMAN'S WORK—DOCTORS DISGUISED—SETTLING DOWN IN

PRETORIA—A TIGHTENING COIL—CAPTURE OF BETSHEHEM—

DISTRACTED CHINA: II.—THEIR SIXTH SESSION.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 383.—JULY, 1900.—Price 6s.

CONTENTS.

1.—DR. THEAL on SOUTH AFRICAN HISTORY.

2.—LORD BYRON.

3.—THE ETHICS OF CREMATION.

4.—JAPANESE LITERATURE.

5.—THE COUNTRY MOUSE.

6.—GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO.

7.—ROME and BYZANTIUM.

8.—THE CONDITIONS OF GREAT POETRY.

9.—A BRITISH SCHOOL at ROME.

10.—NEW CREATURES for OLD COUNTRIES.

11.—JOHN DUNNE and his CONTEMPORARIES.

12.—DOMESTIC PARTIES and IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT.

13.—THE WAR in SOUTH AFRICA.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

THE TROUBLES IN CHINA.

CHINA. By Prof. R. K. Douglas. New Edition, thoroughly Revised and brought up-to-date. Now Ready. Fully Illustrated. (Story of the Nations Series.) 5s.

—AN IMPORTANT NEW HISTORICAL WORK.

PICTURES of the OLD FRENCH COURT.

Jeanne de Bourbon, Isabeau de Bavière, Anne de Bretagne.

By CATHERINE A. BEARNE, Author of "The Lives and Times of the Early Valois Queens." Illustrated by Edward H. Bearn from Ancient Prints, Original Drawings, &c. Cloth, 10s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME IN "THE BUILDERS OF GREATER

BRITAIN" SERIES.

SIR STAMFORD RAFFLES: England in the Far East. By H. E. EGERTON, M.A. With Photographic Frontispiece. Cloth, 5s.

SECOND EDITION.

SIDELIGHTS on the WAR. Being

Sketches based on Personal Nursing Experiences at the Front. By Lady SYKES. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

A REVIEW of IRISH HISTORY in RE-

LATION to the SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT of IRELAND.

By JOHN PATRICK GANNON. Cloth, 6s.

"This is an attempt to explain historically some of the difficulties suggested by the present state of Ireland, and at the same time treats of the ancient history of that country in an interesting manner."

THE PARIS SALON of 1900. In Four

Parts. Part 3, with 24 Full-Page Illustrations. Just Ready. 1s.

A SEQUEL to "LOOKING BACKWARDS."

MY AFTERDREAM. By Julian West.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A continuation of the story told by the late Mr. Edward Bellamy in the work by which his name is best known to the public, "Looking Backward." While admiring the skill with which Mr. Bellamy narrated before them the arrangements pre-valuing in his ideal world, readers of his book could not fail to see many objections to the adoption of the system he advocates.

Episodes, both ludicrous and pathetic, might reasonably be expected from the scheme, and of such "My Afterdream" mainly consists.

ROBERT ORANGE. By John Oliver

HOBBS. 6s.

FOR LOVERS OF POETRY.

THE POETICAL WORKS of MATHILDE

BLIND. Edited by ARTHUR SYMONS, and with an Introduction by RICHARD GARNETT, LL.D., C.B.

Green cloth, with Hellogravity Frontispiece, 7s. 6d.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Square, E.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ANDREW MELROSE'S PUBLICATIONS.

NOW READY.
THIRD EDITION, FIFTEENTH THOUSAND.
Price One Shilling net.

Field-Marshal LORD ROBERTS,

V.C., K.P., G.C.B.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By HORACE G. GROSER,

Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," &c.

"The story is complete and glorious in itself.....
Worth re-reading.... A rousing little book."

St. James's Gazette.

"Admirably welded together into a stirring and dramatic story."—Literary World.

"The entrancing narrative..... Well printed and neatly bound."—Christian Leader.

"A close and vivid account."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"Tastefully got up."—Scotsman.

"Does full justice to the drum-and-trumpet career of the veteran soldier..... Could easily sell at three or four times the humble shilling."—Dundee Advertiser.

THIRD EDITION.—Price 3s. 6d.

OUR LIVING GENERALS. By ARTHUR TEMPLE. Biographical Sketches, with fine Portraits of Twelve Generals, no fewer than ten of whom are now at the front.

"Pleasant and proud reading."—Saturday Review.

"A capital book, brightly and breezily written."

St. James's Budget.

SECOND EDITION.

TOLD from the RANKS. Recollections of Service during the Queen's Reign by Privates and Non-Commissioned Officers of the British Army. Collected by E. MILTON SMALL. Illustrated by W. B. WOLLEY, R.I. Antique laid paper, uncut edges, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

THIRD EDITION. Making Six Thousand Copies.

THE MAKING of the EMPIRE. The Story of our Colonies. By ARTHUR TEMPLE, Author of "Our Living Generals," &c. Profusely Illustrated. New Edition, with an Additional Chapter bringing down the record to December, 1897. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

A Notable Book of Daily Bible Readings.
IN the HOUR of SILENCE. By ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A., Author of "Torch-Bearers of the Faith." Price 5s., imp. 16mo, cloth boards.

"All is original and all of choicest quality..... The thought is never abstruse, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life; yet it is always fresh..... We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this is, though many have tried to furnish one."—Expository Times.

CHILD VOICES. Twelve Sketches of Child-life, full of quaint humour and fancies. By W. E. CULE, Author of "Sir Constant," &c. Illustrated by CHARLES ROBINSON. Imp. 16mo, cloth, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. net.

"In every way the book is a beautiful one," Guardian.

FAIRY STORIES from the LITTLE MOUNTAIN. By JOHN FINNEMORE. Charmingly Illustrated by JAMES R. SINCLAIR. Imp. 16mo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"The book is a real addition to fairy literature. One of the best books of the kind the year has produced. The illustrations are excellent."—Bookman.

THE COMMON LOT. A Religious Novel. By ADELINE SERGEANT. Imp. 16mo, cloth, gilt top, uncut edges, 3s. 6d.

IN THE PRESS.

JOHN RUSKIN: a Biographical Sketch. By R. ED. PENGELLY. With Original Letters never before Published, and many Illustrations. Price One Shilling net.

16, PILGRIM STREET, LONDON, E.C.

MR. R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

TWO STAGE PLAYS.

DENZILL HERBERT'S ATONEMENT.
BONDAGE.

By LUCY SNOWE.

Royal 16mo, Three Shillings net.

"A couple of carefully-imagined and well-written tragic dramas of modern life."—OBSERVER.

"Both plays show unmistakable dramatic power."—OUTLOOK.

"There is besides really original talent in both these plays."—TOPICAL TIMES.

"They should be read with interest by everyone who follows the most recent development of dramatic literature."—SCOTSMAN.

MONDAY NEXT.

LIBERALISM AND THE EMPIRE.

Imperialism and Finance.

By FRANCIS W. HIRST.

The Exploitation of Inferior Races in Ancient and Modern Times.

By GILBERT MURRAY.

Colonial and Foreign Policy.

By J. L. HAMMOND.

Crown 8vo, Three Shillings and Sixpence net.

8, YORK BUILDINGS, ADELPHI, W.C.

JARROLD & SONS' LIST.

OF SPECIAL INTEREST AT THE MOMENT.
A REALISTIC STORY OF PERIL IN THE CHINESE CAPITAL. 6s.

SECOND EDITION.
THE CAPTIVE of PEKIN. 6s.

By CHARLES HANNAN. 6s.
With 25 startling Illustrations of Chinese Torture Fiends by A. J. B. Salmon.
Manchester Guardian.—"A sensational story of more than ordinary power."

Morning Post.—"Of strong dramatic realism. Chin-Chin-Wa is the most striking figure of this powerfully written and absorbing story."

THE CAPTIVE of PEKIN. 6s.

By CHARLES HANNAN. 6s.
With 25 realistic Drawings by A. J. B. Salmon.
Times.—"Told with great vividness. The reader's interest does not flag from beginning to end."
Sheffield Daily Telegraph.—"A remarkable story..... Intensely exciting from cover to cover."

THE CAPTIVE of PEKIN. 6s.

By CHARLES HANNAN. 6s.
A REALISTIC STORY OF PERIL IN THE CHINESE CAPITAL.

With 25 startling Illustrations of Chinese Torture Fiends by A. J. B. Salmon.
Public Opinion.—"The book abounds in strong situations, thrilling episodes, and vivid pictures of Chinese life."

New Novel by Maurus Jokai, the famous Hungarian Novelist.

DEBTS of HONOR. By Maurus JOKAI. With specially Engraved Portrait of Dr. and Madame Jokai. Author of "Poor Plutocrats," "Black Diamonds," &c. 6s.

St. James's Gazette.—"A series of pictures, stirring, sorrowful, and gay, but always beautiful."
Daily Telegraph.—"Of much force and pathos, and Jokai's marvellable pen, vivid, fiery, humorous, never fails to stir and to attract. Full of life and incident."

SECOND EDITION.
DEBTS of HONOR. By Maurus JOKAI. An attractive Romance. 6s.

Exciting Detective Stories.
IN TIGHT PLACES. By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS. Author of "Forbidden by Law," &c. 6s.

Fall Mail Gazette.—"A lively and varied series of stories of cosmopolitan crime, with plenty of mixed adventure and sensation. Such stories always fascinate, and Major Arthur Griffiths knows how to tell them."

LONDON: JARROLD & SONS, 10 & 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
And of all Booksellers.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

55,000 COPIES HAVE BEEN SOLD IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

JAMES LANE ALLEN'S NEW NOVEL,

Author of "The Choir Invisible" (213th Thousand).
Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

The Increasing Purpose. The Increasing Purpose. The Increasing Purpose.

A TALE OF THE KENTUCKY HEMP-FIELDS.

Westminster Gazette.—"Such a book as this is a rare event, and as refreshing as it is rare. This book.... is a beautiful one—beautiful alike in thought, tone, and language, leaving in the mind of the reader a succession of delicately painted and utterly truthful pictures of nature and country life in Kentucky during the middle of the nineteenth century, and one character-study of extraordinary breadth, power, and interest.... To our readers we say, Get this book, read it, and ponder over it."

Globe 8vo, 4s. 6d.

EUROPEAN TRAVEL for WOMEN

NOTES AND SUGGESTIONS.

By MARY CADWALADER JONES.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BANKER AND THE BEAR.

The Story of a Corner in Lard.

By HENRY K. WEBSTER.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for AUGUST.

- 1.—A SUBALTERN in the BUSH. By Captain SLESSOR (the Derbyshire Regiment).
- 2.—THE SINS of LORD SALISBURY.
- 3.—A SCHOLAR'S CONSCIENCE.
- 4.—STUDIES in SHAKESPEARE'S HISTORY. By J. L. EVELY.—I. Henry the Fifth.
- 5.—THE DOMESTIC PROBLEM. By Mrs. MAJOR.
- 6.—THE POPLAR.
- 7.—OUR MATCH at the PARK.
- 8.—THE RICHEST GOLDFIELD in the WORLD. By S. C. NORMAN.
- 9.—ANTHONY'S FORTUNE. By ARTHUR BECKFORD. Chaps. XXIII.—XXVI.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

Price 1s.—Contents for AUGUST.

- 1.—THE FLOWER of the FLOCK. By W. E. NORRIS. (Conclusion.)
- 2.—SONGS of the SEA.
- 3.—"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HIGHNESS."
- 4.—ST. EVREMOND and the DUCHESS MAZARIN.
- 5.—CECIL RHODES and the GOVERNOR.
- 6.—DR. JOHNSON as LOVER and HUSBAND.
- 7.—PROFESSOR HERON'S MISTAKE.
- 8.—SQUARING the CIRCLE.
- 9.—HOW I DIDN'T BECOME an AUTHOR.
- 10.—AN INDIAN FAMINE RELIEF CAMP TWENTY YEARS AGO.
- 11.—CORBAN. By CONSTANCE SMITH. Chaps. XIV.—XVI.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The AUGUST NUMBER contains—
AMUSEMENTS of the PARIS EXPOSITION.—I. The Palace of the Dance. By JEAN SCOTTER.
THE RIVERSIDE of EAST LONDON. From London Bridge to St. Katherine's Docks. By SIR WALTER BESANT.
DR. NORTH and his FRIENDS.—VI. By the Author of "Hugh Wynne," S. WEIR MITCHELL.
OLIVER CROMWELL.—X. By JOHN MORLEY.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The AUGUST NUMBER contains—
THE SULTAN'S VERSES. Story. By TUDOR JENKS. Illustrated by R. B. BIRCH.
PRETTY POLLY PERKINS. Serial. By GABRIELLE E. JACKSON.
THE "LUCKY LIEUTENANT." A True Story. By REGINALD GOURLAY.
THE GREATEST EXPLOSION of HISTORIC TIMES. By DR. EUGENE MURRAY-AARON.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1473. Established 1869.

28 July, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

It is announced that Mr. Tree will produce a new play, "The King of the Jews," by Mr. Stephen Phillips. It seems to be the fate of the poetic dramatist to live on hope and paragraphs, but we trust that in this case "will produce" means more than "has accepted."

MR. HENLEY has written much stirring patriotic verse in his time, and especially of late. These poems he has now collected in a slim, capably printed volume (Mr. Henley oddly calls it a "sheaflet of numbers"), issued by Mr. Nutt at a shilling net. The dedication is as follows:

F. M.

FREDERICK HUGH SHERSTON ROBERTS, V.C.

LIEUTENANT, KING'S ROYAL RIFLE CORPS

(Simultaneously published 8th January, 1872: Chieveley Camp, 16th December, 1899)

AND THE MANY VALLANT SOULS
WHOSE PASSING FOR ENGLAND'S SAKE
HAS THRILLED THE ENDS OF THE WORLD WITH PAIN AND PRIDE.

THE hot weather has produced in certain critics of novels a tendency to confuse the author with his characters. To one of these, a writer in the St. James's Gazette, Mr. Percy White has addressed the following pawky and sensible letter:

I trust that I am too modest a journalist and humble a novelist to appeal against the mature judgment of any critic save in the meekest spirit, especially as it places me in the invidious position of a man compelled to apologise for a minute joke. When Miranda asked Herrick whether he was called "Fair Daffodils" at school because "he wept too soon," I was aware that she was adjusting the poem to suit her own temporary purpose. The happy-go-lucky people in "the West-end" do stretch their quotations to suit their convenience; this plea also applies to "a quotation presumably from 'In Memoriam.'" I also know how to spell the name of the author of the Rubidiat, however cleverly the typewriter and printer may have conspired to conceal this accomplishment. Mr. Bailey-Martin, the author of another of my novels, perpetrates numerous "Curiosities of Illiteracy"; the blunders were intended to be characteristic of that ingenious character, but, split my infinitives! I am still bearing the burden of his reckless ignorance.

MRS CRAIGIE'S little boy has been seriously ill, and is still in need of every care and attention. She is, therefore, quite unable to reply at present to certain technical criticisms applied to the use of certain words and expressions in Robert Orange. She hopes to do so later on. In the meantime she points out that the term à l'outrance, objected to by one or two reviewers, is perfectly correct in the sense in which she has employed it. This information may be found in any good dictionary or in any treatise on duelling.

THE report of Messrs. George Newnes, Ltd., has just been issued, and spells prosperity little affected by the war. There is a net profit for the year of £65,308 12s. 9d.

The directors propose to pay a dividend on the ordinary shares at the rate of 10 per cent. for the year, and to carry forward £3,011 13s. Last year the profits amounted to £66,019 2s. 1d.

It is not often that one meets with a better story, better told, than the following, which we find in the Evening News:

Private Edward —, wounded before Johannesburg, returned home on sick leave a few days ago, and a lady interested in the family called on the mother, whose only child he is. To the visitor's dismay the woman, who had been so brave during the weary weeks of waiting, burst into tears. "They've gone and took away my boy," she said at length. "Last October 'e went off full of 'is fun, pullin' Kroozer's whiskers and the like o' that nonsense, and now, now of a sudden, 'e's got a mau—good and kindlike, as 'e wasn't never afore; but I'm empty fer my little lad, wot the army's took and left in Afriky. Seems just the other day 'is father give 'im the strap fer mixin' treacle with the blackin', and now we can't neither of us find a tongue fer to talk easy with 'im."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Don't you think you fret yourself unnecessarily over the title, The Dull Child's Grammar? Every child will simply call it 'The Dull Grammar.' When at school I used Sullivan's The Spelling-Book Superseded; but we always called it 'The Superseded Spelling-Book.'"

THE title of the Earl of Rosslyn's book of war adventures will be Twice Captured. The author was present as a soldier at Pieters Hill and at the relief of Ladysmith; he crossed Basutoland, made his way through the Boer lines near Thabanchu, and was captured at Dewetsdorp. Escaping from his guards, he was recaptured at the Reddersburg disaster, and was imprisoned at Pretoria.

DR. WILLIAM BARRY has now almost finished his new novel, The Wizard's Knot. It is a story of the time just before and during the great famine in Ireland, the scene being laid in the south-west angle of Cork and Kerry.

LITERARY aspirants who are discouraged by the cold return of their MSS. should try a Chinese editor. The MS. may come back, but with it will come a note of rejection in which all the balm of Gilead is concentrated. For, according to the Religio-Philosophical Journal, an American organ, this is the way in which MSS. are refused in China:

Illustrious Brother of the Sun and Moon! Look upon thy Slave, who rolls at thy feet, who kisses the earth before thee, and demands of thy charity permission to speak and live.

We have read thy Manuscript with delight. By the bones of our Ancestors we swear that never have we encountered such a Masterpiece. Should we print it, His Majesty the Emperor would order us to take it as a criterion, and never again to print anything which was not equal to it. As that would not be possible before Ten Thousand Years, all trembling we return thy Manuscript, and beg of thee Ten Thousand Pardons. See! my hand is at my feet, and I am thy Slave.

MR. A. H. MILLAR, whose fair and generous reply to our article of last week we print elsewhere, will be rejoiced to know that whatever Omar Kháyyám was in the flesh, he is a reformed character in Hades. So, at least, we gather from an amusing little book, The Soliloquy of a Shadow-Shape on a Holiday from Hades (Karslake & Co.), for which Mr. Arthur H. Scaife is responsible. In this poem, written in his own quatrains, Omar Kháyyám appears as the critic and denouncer of latter-day morals, not by any means as their corrupter. To a tired Editor the old man appears in a flowing beard, and the Editor takes him to his club for a chat:

"What name shall I put down?" asked the Editor, as he opened the visitors' book.

"Omar Kháyyám," said the old Persian, with Oriental dignity.

The Editor entered the name, but did not put any address. A certain sense of delicacy prevented him from pressing inquiries on that point.

Then they went upstairs to the visitors' room, which they had all to themselves.

"Have a whisky and soda or a lemon squash?"

"Thanks, I never drink anything now." There was a slight emphasis on the "now" which was not lost on the Editor.

"What a change!" he thought.

"Yes," said the old man slowly, "it is somewhat of a change."

Naturally, the conversation soon turned to literary matters:

"I am glad" [said Omar] "to think that my poor verses have at last begun to meet with some slight show of appreciation. But, oh dear me! the points that have been missed by my translators!"

"Not by FitzGerald?"

"Yes, even by FitzGerald; but let that pass."

OMAR'S business with the Editor is to induce that worthy to translate and publish a new Rubáiyát on his observations of London life. The Editor accepts the commission, and the quatrains follow. We find in them a vein of somewhat elementary satire on modern social evils, especially drink, the satire extending to the Editor's notes. We quote a few quatrains:

LXI.

As for your marriages: on making search
I find, to tie the knot you go to Church;
To get the knot untied you go to Law
And leave your Holy Mother in the lurch.

LXII.

That Piccadilly in my gizzard sticks—
Last night I got into an awful fix.
And I a Shade! What would my poor wives think?
They manage these things better on the Styx.

LXIII.*

· · · · ·
· · · · ·
· · · · ·

LXIV

Their good kind sisters seem to pass them by Like lady Levites. Can you tell me why?
Are they all innocent, or are they blind?
Or do they see, and "wink the other eye"?†

LXV.

Man as a rule sits callous on the fence,
Headless he's thereby guilty of offence,
Little he knows, or reckes not if he knows,
The only heinous crime's indifference.

* Beyond the power of Bowdler himself to Bowdlerize, It positively recommends the adoption of a single moral standard for the two sexes.—ED.

† Apologies are tendered for the extreme inelegance of this expression, but it is the only one which adequately expresses the meaning of the original.—ED.

Mr. Scaife is to be congratulated on essaying the difficult art of satire at a time when that branch of the literary tree is as good as dead. He is also to be congratulated on his representation of Omar as a little lower than the angels, just when he is being placed no higher than the brutes. We said the Omar comedy was likely to end with a good "curtain"; and there appears to be no doubt of this consummation.

THE Catholic Truth Society is issuing a series of monographs of Old Masters, which are of almost waistcoat-pocket size, and of a delightfully simple format. Sandro Botticelli and Fra Angelico are the volumes to hand.

China of To-day: The Yellow Peril is Mr. Newnes's latest venture in the photographic album line. The first of the sixpenny parts is decidedly interesting.

A FAIR-MINDED, but distinctly critical, article on the Mysticism of Maeterlinck appeared in last week's Pilot. The writer's position may be guessed from his opening paragraph, which we give below, but the article should be read in its entirety.

To the right appreciation of the ideas of M. Maeterlinck it is essential to realise that his mysticism is literary, not religious. His philosophy is tentative and eclectic—a very interesting outcome of some observation, and more reading, finely assimilated and reproduced in language that is like the soul of music in common words. It is not a philosophy of experience or faith; it lacks conviction in essential matters; and it is without the definiteness of conclusion necessary to the guidance of conduct or the exact testing of principles. Hence it follows that the books which embody it do not altogether satisfy the discriminating reader, who is most capable of appreciating their beauties; while they are likely to mislead dangerously the indiscriminating reader who yields himself unreservedly to the charm of an exquisitely sincere, subtle, and insinuating style.

THE first part of the Index to the Shakespeare Memorial Library at Birmingham is issued, and contains English editions of Shakespeare's works, and separate Plays and Poems. The mere list of editions, with the names of their editors, the number of volumes in which they were issued, the size, and the date of issue, is not uninteresting. In the eighteenth century only one edition appeared in so many as twenty volumes. Nor were twenty-one volumes ever exceeded until 1894-6, when the Temple Shakespeare was issued in forty volumes. The "Pocket Falstaff" Shakespeare (Sands & Co.) is also in forty volumes, and Messrs. Bradbury Agnew's "Handy-Volume" edition is in thirty-nine volumes. Apparently, Shakespeare has never, like Scott, reached the pomp of forty-eight volumes.

THE Kiote (Lincoln, Neb.) appears in a new dress this month with a "new set of stories, yelps, &c., especially the latter." It also has a new printer, "which may enable the reader who has acquired the gig-lamp habit to throw away his lamps, and rest his eyes. It is printed on a press that revolves, instead of one with a corn-sheller movement." Best among the new yelps we like the following:

It was evening. The wind, weary with miles of travel over sun-kissed prairies came in fitful gusts, and the wind-mill overhead creaked dismally.

"Dave," said Farmer Bryan slowly to Senator Hill, and he rested a well-worn boot on the edge of the watering-trough, "I wish that when you go down to Kansas City to-morrow you would please tell the boys not to come around any more like they did the other night playin' the band and breakin' my rest, not for a spell at least. You see, I've got that field of wheat to cut yet, and then there's them oats, too, over on the hill. I can't seem to make much headway with my work nohow. The old reaper keeps a-actin' up, the dun mule got sick yisterday and kept me up a dopin' him near all the night, and I'm plum worn out with my work, let alone havin' a gang of fellows a-hollerin' and a band a-playin' half the night. You can tell them that if they've got their minds made up to it they can nominate me for President down at Kansas City, but I don't want them to keep me awake half of the night and tramp out the grass and spile the piney beds in my front yard."

THE gospel of Walt Whitman can, it seems, be made very useful in directions which you would hardly think about in reading Leaves of Grass. "Q" writes in the Conservator, the organ of Whitmanism, of the blessedness of the musical comedy (Vaudeville, he calls it) in this exalted strain: "There is a logical hocus pocus reflected in vaudeville to honour which you must accept its extreme conditions of license. . . . It reduces me to first-born desires, glad surprise, invincible gestation. It is truce and amity. In vaudeville every sword disappears and even the ploughshare is dislained. Vaudeville does not make war or schisms or send its auditors home ripe for rebellion or insist upon the sorrows of man. Did you suppose that the sportive instinct and the unrestrained gesture of vaudeville removed it from suffrage and made it a chronic subject for pardon? You are deceived. Vaudeville has that best of reasons for being—its own inherent energy. . . . Not to apotheosise vaudeville, yet also not to hold it up for common scorn, I would simply acknowledge the inalienable majesty of primal rudeness and unchecked passion. I know that you say to me: You are pressing an eccentricity home. No, I am ridding myself of a false plume. I am doing service in a temple, acquitting myself by an act of worship, liquidating a debt." These reflections should prove immensely useful between the acts of certain musical comedies now delighting London.

At the dopôt of the Guild of Women Binders, 61, Charing Cross-road, may be seen a copy of Boydell's History of the River Thames, in two folio volumes, with plates in aquatint. To this fine copy are added more than 680 extra engravings, inserted and inlaid to size. The book is of exceptional interest to lovers of London.

MR. MURRAY, who is publishing a novel by Mrs. Edith Wharton, a very popular American writer, gives an amusing account of the difficulties which were encountered in naming it. Finally, as will be seen, Mr. Murray had to take the christening on himself. Mr. Murray says:

In the United States the story appears as The Touchstone. While it was passing through the press over here, I was informed that a novel under this name was already in circulation. In accordance with the usual rule of courtesy and convenience which is observed in such matters, I decided to alter the title, and wrote at once to the author, asking permission to call her book The Touch of a Vanished Hand. As the author was travelling in Italy, a month elapsed before I received a reply, by telegraph, instructing me to adopt another title, which, unfortunately, had also been forestalled. Meanwhile, the sheets had all been printed off, when I was informed that a novel was published in 1889 called The Touch of a Vanished Hand. In telegraphing, the author gave me no address, and as a decision has to be made without further delay, I have ventured to give the book the title which it now bears—A Gift from the Grave; and I hope that no other claimant to this will now arise.

Not everyone may know how Mark Twain became a literary person. In his new book of stories, The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, Mark tells the story as follows:

In my view, a person who published things in a mere newspaper could not properly claim recognition as a literary person; he must rise away above that; he must appear in a magazine. He would then be a literary person; also he would be famous—right away. These two ambitions were strong upon me. This was in 1866.

I prepared my contribution, and then looked around for the best magazine to go up to glory in. I selected the most important one in New York. The contribution was accepted. I signed it "Mark Twain," for that name had some currency on the Pacific coast, and it was my idea to spread it all over the world, now, at this one jump. The article appeared in the December number, and I sat up a month waiting for the January number, for that one would contain the year's list of contributors, and my name would be in it, and I should be famous and could give the banquet I was meditating.

I did not give the banquet. I had not written the "Mark Twain" distinctly; it was a fresh name to Eastern printers, and they put it "Mike Swain" or "Mac Swain." I do not remember which. At any rate I was not celebrated and did not give the banquet. I was a literary person, but that was all—a buried one; buried alive.

COMMENTING ON OUR paragraph, last week, on Mr. Farmer's forthcoming Public School Word-Book, the literary gossipier of Country Life remarks that he himself came from the school to which "spieg" (i.e., smart) is attributed, namely Winchester; and he forthwith produces the following imaginary conversation of two Winchester boys who discuss Mr. Farmer's book:

A.—I thoke on that book: one could spend a whole hatch-thoke mugging tother school notions.

B.—Oz der; but I am not bulky enough to buy it.

A.—Then you must be dead brum. Socius round Meads past log pond champions, and let us think of some way of making it.

B.—I can't think, haven't got twenty juniors and sha'n't have them till next short half, and this is only the third half remedy in Cloister time.

Which our contemporary explains as follows:

All that would be perfectly clear to any thorough Wykehamist; for to "thoke" is to anticipate a thing with longing and also to lie in bed; and a "hatch-thoke" is a Founder's commemoration day on which you may lie in bed late; and to "mug" is to work and also to rub linseed oil into a bat; and "notions" are our language; and every school except Winchester is a "tother" school. "Oz der" means so do I, and was invented some thirty-four years ago by two linguistic experts of tender years; and "bulky" is rich. "Brum" is the reverse—stingy or penniless. "Socius" is walk with me, and to "make" is to steal. "Log pond champions" are some heads on the wall near the spot where tradition has it that there was once a pond. In college a man may not say "I think" until he has twenty juniors; "Cloister time" is the summer term; "short half" comes between the summer holidays and Christmas, and it takes three halves to make a whole; and a "half remedy" is simply a half holiday.

THE portrait of Mr. Watts-Dunton which appears on the cover of Messrs. Hurst & Blackett's sixpenny edition of Aylwin does not represent the author as his friends now know him, but as he was when he was beginning, in Stevensonian phrase, to roll the idea of Aylwin on his tongue. Mr. Watts-Dunton's new Introduction to his story concludes as follows:

Some years ago there appeared in the weekly Graphic the early portrait of me, here reproduced on the title-page. It was taken not very long before the time when Aylwin was written. Besides being strikingly good as a likeness, the portrait is so associated with the one period of my life round which all the subsequent years seem to have been revolving, that I requested the publisher of the Graphic to allow me to purchase the block. That gentleman was so kind as to give it to me; and now, after years of change, I find a happy use for it, for since the publication of Aylwin I have frequently been asked where that early portrait could be obtained.

IN explanation of the long interval between the completion and publication of Aylwin, Mr. Watts-Dunton writes:

Why did I still delay in publishing it after these reasons for withholding it had passed away? This is a question that has often been put to me both in print and in conversation. And yet I should have imagined that the explanation was not far to seek. It was simply diffidence: in other words it was that infirmity which, though generally supposed to belong to youth, comes to a writer, if it comes at all, with years. Undoubtedly there was a time in my life when I should have leapt with considerable rashness into the brilliant ranks of our contemporary novelists. But this was before I had reached what I will call the diffident period in the life of a writer. And then, again, I had often been told by George Borrow, and also by my friend Francis Groome, the great living authority on Romany matters, that there was in England no interest in gypsies. Altogether, then, had it not been for the unexpected success of The Coming of Love, a story of gypsy life, it is doubtful whether I should not have delayed the publication of Aylwin until the great warder of the gates of day we call Death should close his portal behind me and shut me off from these dreams.

THE Windsor Magazine publishes an article, with portraits and facsimiles, on "The Favourite Quotations of Literary People." Among those who responded to the invitation of the editor are Mr. Edmund Gosse, Miss Marie Corelli, and the author of When Knighthood was in Flower. Mr. Edmund Gosse is of the opinion that "it must be very difficult for anyone to say what is his favourite quotation or motto; but," he adds, "when I came to this house four-and-twenty years' age I painted on the rafter in my book-room a line from Tibullus:

Piridas pueri doctos et amate potus, and it is there still. I don't know any words which express better my aim in life."

MISS MARIE CORELLI's favourite quotations are:

Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret me, you cannot play upon me!—Hamlet.

Then, welcome each rebuff

That turns earth's smoothness rough,

Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go!

Be our joy three-parts pain!

Strive, and hold cheap the strain;

Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge the throe!—Robert Browning.

"EDWIN CASKODEN" (Mr. Charles Major), the author of When Knighthood was in Flower, writes: "I send you some verses, Wet Weather Talk, by our Indiana poet, James Whitcombe Riley, my very dear friend. I send you the whole poem, but the first verse is the one I specially like, because it breathes a sweet philosophy which, if we but live up to it, will bring to us all that which we most desire—happiness:

It ain't no use to grumble and complain;

It's jest as cheap and easy to rejoice;

When God sorts out the weather and sends rain,

W'y, rain's my choice."

Bibliographical.

EXCELLENT is Mr. Walter Scott's notion of re-issuing his series of translations of Ibsen's prose dramas in volumes, each of which will contain one play. The series came out originally in 1890-91, and ran to five volumes, four of which contained three plays each, while the fifth was devoted wholly to "Emperor and Galilean." In 1897 Mr. Scott published five of these thirteen plays separately and in cheap form—namely, "A Doll's House," "An Enemy of the People," "Ghosts," "The Lady from the Sea," and "The Wild Duck." Now the whole series will have the advantage of revision by Mr. Archer, and will have a uniform appearance. Unhappily, all Ibsen's plays are not in Mr. Scott's hands. Since 1891 we have had translations of "The Master Builder" (1893), of "Little Eyolf" (1894), of "John Gabriel Berkman" (1897), and of "When We Dead Awaken" (1900)—all of them with the imprint of Mr. Heinemann. It would no doubt be very pleasant to many if Mr. Scott could so arrange with Mr. Heinemann that the proposed new series should comprise versions of all the prose dramas of Ibsen down to date. Meanwhile, the admirers of Ibsen will not forget the pioneer of Ibsen translation in England was Miss Lord, whose version of "A Doll's House" ("Nora") came out in 1882, and was recently reprinted. Then came "The Pillars of Society, and Other Plays," edited by Mr. Havelock Ellis in 1888; while to 1889 belong Mrs. Marx Aveing's translation of "The Lady of the Sea," and Mr. Louis N. Parker's version of "Rosmersholm." Thus early did Mr. Parker, now a fertile and popular playwright, evince his interest in the modern literary drama.

It is quite a relief to learn, on what seems good authority, that there is not to be an "official" biography of Mr. Ruskin. That we may have, some day, a selection from his letters and his diaries is, I suppose, possible. Personally, I venture to think that the world knows quite as much about Mr. Ruskin as it is at all necessary that it should know. He himself was not diffident in personal discourse, and his Ego was, I should say, always very present and dear to him. Assuredly, no more biographies of him are wanted. The thing was overdone even in his lifetime. So long ago as 1883 we had The Life and Teaching of John Ruskin, by Mr. J. M. Mather. Exactly ten years after came the two-volume Memoir by Mr. Cellingwood, which recently has been revised, rewritten, and republished in one volume. This may well remain the standard account of Ruskin, excellent in its way as is the little brochure by Mr. Speilmann. I take no account of the books written to expound the Master's "teaching." But the world is over-biographised (to coin a word); and the multiplication of memoirs of this person or that, however distinguished, is greatly to be deprecated.

Why, asks a contemporary, does it never occur to anybody to reprint Sir John Hawkins's Life of Dr. Johnson? Why is it always Boswell's Life that absorbs the attention of the publishers? The answer is too obvious to need stating. One may go, indeed, further, and ask, in turn, why no one reprints the biographies of Johnson by Towers (produced the year before Hawkins produced his) and by Anderson (which dates from 1795). Hawkins the biographer of Johnson has, in truth, been obscured by Hawkins the historian of music, Sir John's work on the latter subject being his best title to honour. It appeared originally in five volumes in 1776, under the title of General History of the Science and Practice of Music. It had a rival in Burney's work on the same topic, but Hawkins's book has lasted the longer. It was reprinted in two volumes so recently as 1875, whereas it is recorded that Burney's History never even reached a second edition.

It is good news that the Complete Works of Emerson are to find a place in the Minerva Library. At the present moment, I suppose, the standard English edition of these Works is that of Messrs. Bell & Sons in three volumes, dating back so far as 1883. It is interesting to remember that Messrs. Ward & Lock brought out Emerson's Complete Prose Works in one volume in 1889. For individual prose works of Emerson there has always been in England a gratifying demand. Of The Conduct of Life, of English Traits, of Representative Men, of Society and Solitude, and so forth, there have been many editions—a fact which reflects credit upon the English reading public.

I see we are to have from Miss Florence Warden, by and by, a novel called The Love that Lasts. Surely it has not been left to Miss Warden to use for the first time so obvious a title? There is in circulation at this moment a work of fiction called The Love that Never Dies, which is at least a variation on a venerable theme.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Byron in Venice.

Byron's Works: Letters and Journals. Vol. IV. Edited by Rowland E. Prothero, M.A. (John Murray. 6s.)

BYRON the letter-writer is always masterly in his kind; and here we have him matured, seasoned, ripe of flavour. The profoundly artificial pose of dash and devilry, absolutely natural because it is the Byronic pose, and to pose as Byron was Byron's nature; this is here in the consummate ease which comes of artistic practice. He conceived a Byron which should strike the world; and in the acting of himself, at least, he was a splendid artist. "Lord Byron, by George Gordon Noel Byron," was a part he had personated so often that it no longer offered any difficulties; it was his one masterpiece of melodrama. He played it to his friends no less than to the public; as Mrs. Siddons awed her fellow-guests by the gesture with which she stabbed the mutton. This brilliant impersonation is at its best in these letters—vivid, cynical, off-hand, full of carefully careless epigram and paradox. They are not studied—he has had too lifelong practice to need study. The point of junction between the original Byron and the trained Byron he could not himself point out. It would be very unworthy of so masterly an actor if he could not deceive himself. In this volume there are many brilliant flashes of interest; but it is, above all, the Venetian Byron, Byron Innamorato—multitudinously innamora'to. We have not the filthy-wallowing Byron whom Shelley saw, and has recorded for all time. But that dubious praise of cynical candour which he claimed for himself these letters vindicate: he does not mitigate (though he may euphemise) the flagrantly physical nature of what it pleases him to call his "loves." Let us study, therefore, the sublime spectacle of the "noble Bard" in love; stripped of what the world long delighted (and the supreme French nation still delights) to consider poetry.

Settled in Venice, at the house of a draper in the Frezzeria, the susceptible Bard fell in love with his landlady, the draper's wife, Marianna Segati. All things considered, he imagined that he had the privilege of first debauching her. Other advices represent her as a woman who intrigued with all in the house, or who visited the house. But, as the noble Bard finely observes, "it does not much signify." In Venice, as he explains, it is considered striking, not to say virtuous, constancy if a married woman confine herself to one lover. Only the unmarried incur the charge of profligacy by admitting a paramour. So it only signifies what attractions Byron found in his landlady; and upon that subject he is eloquent to Moore:

Marianna is in her appearance altogether like an antelope. She has the large, black, oriental eyes, with that peculiar expression in them which is seen rarely among Europeans—even the Italians—and which many of the Turkish women give themselves by tinging the eyelid—an art not known out of that country, I believe. This expression she has naturally, and something more than this. In short, I cannot describe the effect of this kind of eye—at least upon me. Her features are regular, and rather aquiline—mouth small—skin clear and soft, with a kind of hectic colour—forehead remarkably good: her hair is of the dark gloss, curl, and colour of Lady Jersey's: her figure is light and pretty, and she is a famous songstress—scientifically so; her natural voice (in conversation, I mean) is very sweet; and the naïveté of the Venetian dialect is always pleasing in the mouth of a woman.

So Marianna begau; but a "monstrous regiment of women" followed. Marianna's sister had the amiable desire to share her happiness, but did not share Byron, Mariana presenting her instead with sundry sisterly slaps in the face, which moved the dear child to tears by their impulsive warmth. The seraglio, indeed, through defective arrangements of arrival and departure, clashed a good deal, even to tearing of hair and headgear. Marianna's particularly successful rival was a bakeress, Byron's account of whom to Murray is very frank, characteristic, and unquotably long. But here are some details:

The reasons of [her hold over me] were, firstly, her person—very dark, tall, the Venetian face, very fine black eyes—and certain other qualities which need not be mentioned. She was two-and-twenty years old, and, never having had children, had not spoilt her figure. She was, besides, a thorough Venetian in her dialect, in her thoughts, in her countenance, in every thing, with all their naïveté and Pantaloon humour. In other respects she was somewhat fierce and prepotente, that is, overbearing, and used to walk in whenever it suited her, . . . and if she found any women in her way, she knocked them down.

At the masked ball on the last night of the Carnival, . . . she snatched off the mask of Madame Contarini, a lady noble by birth and decent in conduct, for no other reason but because she happened to be leaning on my arm. . . .

But her reign drew to a close. She became quite ungovernable. . . . I told her quietly that she must return home. . . . She refused to quit the house. I was firm, and she went, threatening knives and revenge. I told her that I had seen knives drawn before her time, and that if she chose to begin, there was a knife, and fork also, at her service on the table, and that intimidation would not do. The next day, while I was at dinner, she walked in (having broke open a glass door that led from the hall below to the staircase by way of prologue), and, advancing straight up to the table, snatched the knife from my hand, cutting me slightly in the thumb in the operation. Whether she meant to use this against herself or me, I know not—probably against neither—but Fletcher seized her by the arms and disarmed her. [He sent her home in his gondola.]

We heard a great noise. I went out, and met them . . . carrying her upstairs. She had thrown herself into the Canal. That she intended to destroy herself I do not believe; but when we consider the fear women and men who cannot swim have of deep or even of shallow water . . . and that it was also night, and dark, and very cold, it shows that she had a devilish spirit of some sort within her. . . .

I foresaw her intention to refix herself, and sent for a surgeon, inquiring how many hours it would require to restore her from her agitation; and he named the time. I then said, "I give you that time, and more if you require it; but at the expiration of the prescribed period, if She does not leave the house, I will."

All my people were consternated; they had always been frightened at her, and were now paralysed; they wanted me to apply to the police, to guard myself, &c. . . . I did nothing of the kind, thinking that I might as well end that way as another; besides, I had been used to savage women, and knew their ways. I had her sent home quietly after her recovery, and never saw her since, except once at the opera. . . . She made many attempts to return, but no more violent ones. And this is the story of Margarita Cogni, as far as it belongs to me.

Even with our abridgment, it is not the story of two people lovely and pleasant in their lives. We have omitted some rather plain language of the gentle Margarita; likewise certain significant asterisks—not of Byron's insertion—which are sprinkled liberally over these letters—the stars of heavy cracks in the ice of the proprieties. Byron apparently sometimes diversified the monotony of married intrigue by an infusion of the other kind of passion (passion is a word of conveniently flexible meaning). Let him tell his own story again; and this time with less interruption.

In going, about an hour and a half ago, to a rendezvous with a Venetian girl (unmarried, and the daughter of one of their nobles) I tumbled into the Grand Canal, and, not choosing to miss my appointment by the delays of changing, I have been perched in a balcony with my wet clothes on ever since, till this minute that on my return I have slipped into my dressing-gown. My feet slipped in getting into my gondola to set out (owing to the cursed slippery steps of their palaces), and in I flounced like a Carp, and went dripping like a Triton to my sea-nymph, and had to scramble up to a grated window:

Fenced with iron within and without,
Lest the lover get in or the lady get out.

She is a very dear friend of mine, and I have undergone some trouble on her account, for last winter the truculent tyrant, her flinty-hearted father, having been informed by an infernal German, the Countess Vorsperg (their next neighbour), of our meetings, they sent a priest to me, and a Commissary of police, and they locked the Girl up, and gave her prayers and bread and water, and our connexion was cut off for some time; but the father hath lately been laid up, and the brother is at Milan, and the mother falls asleep, and the servants are naturally on the wrong side of the question, and there is no Moon at midnight just now, so that we have lately been able to recommence; the fair one is eighteen; her name, Angelina; the family name, of course, I don't tell you.

She proposed to me to divorce my mathematical wife, and I told her that in England we can't divorce except for female infidelity. "And pray," (said she), "how do you know what she may have been doing these last three years?" I answered that I could not tell, but that the . . . was not quite so flourishing in Great Britain as with us here. "But," she said, "can't you get rid of her?" "Not more than is done already," (I answered): "you would not have me poison her?" Would you believe it? She made me no answer. Is not that a true and odd national trait? It spoke more than a thousand words, and yet this is a little, pretty, sweet-tempered, quiet, feminine being as ever you saw, but the Passions of a Sunny Soil are paramount to all other considerations. An unmarried Girl naturally wishes to be married: if she can marry and love at the same time it is well, but at any rate she must love. I am not sure that my pretty paramour was herself fully aware of the inference to be drawn from her dead Silence, but even the unconsciousness of the latent idea was striking to an observer of the Passions; and I never strike out a thought of another's or of my own without trying to trace it to its Source.

Flinty-hearted scoundrel of a father to lock up this sweet feminine creature from a noble Bard with an unattached wife and a semi-detached harem! Murray, the fortunate recipient of this improving correspondence, must have gained from it a knowledge of Italy not perhaps extensive, but decidedly peculiar; Byronically demonstrating that in Italy, at least, "every woman is at heart a rake." He will tell "my Murray" such a story as this of the Marchesa Castiglione, who had an affaire with Colonel Fitzgerald, twenty years her junior:

The war broke out; he returned to England, to serve—not his country, for that's Ireland—but England, which is a different thing; and she—heaven knows what she did. In the year 1814, the first annunciation of the Definitive Treaty of Peace was developed to the astonished Milanese by the arrival of Colonel Fitzgerald, who, flinging himself full at the feet of Madame Castiglione, murmured forth, in half-forgotten Irish-Italian, eternal vows of indelible constancy. The lady screamed, and exclaimed, "Who are you?" The Colonel cried, "What! don't you know me? I am so and so," &c.; till, at length, the Marchesa, mounting from reminiscence to reminiscence, through the lovers of the intermediate twenty-five years, arrived at last at the recollection of her povero sub-lieutenant. She then said, "Was there ever such virtue?" (that was her very word) and, being now a widow, gave him apartments in her palace, reinstated him in all the rights of wrong, and held him up to the admiring world as a miracle of incontinent fidelity, and the unshaken Abdiel of absence.

Yet Byron did get weary of it all. That departure to the Greek war was probably a genuine impulse to reach a nobler life than he had hitherto been living. Towards the close of his Venetian life he had thoughts of emigrating to Venezuela—and he gives the reasons to Hobhouse:

I am not tired of Italy, but a man must be a Cicisbeo and a singer in duets and a connoisseur of Operas—or nothing—here. I have made some progress in all these accomplishments, but I can't say that I don't feel the degradation. Better be an unskilful Planter, an awkward settler—better be a hunter, or anything, than a flatterer of fiddlers and fan-carrier of a woman. I like women—God he knows—but the more their system here develops upon me, the worse it seems, after Turkey too; here the polygamy is all on the female side. I have been an intriguer, a husband, a woman-monger, and now I am a Cavalier Servente—by the holy! it is a strange sensation.

Yes, he began to feel the degradation. And after reading these letters—with all their literary interest and brilliance, which we have not illustrated, in order to notice that which is peculiarly and prominently characteristic of this present volume—we do not wonder at it. Over all the dash and élan one is paramourly sensible of the prodigal, the mournful waste of power.

Monstrous China.

China, the Long-Lived Empire. By Eliza Ruhamah Scidmore. (The Century Co. 8s. 6d. net.)

"CHINA! Canton! Bless us—how it strains the imagination and makes it ache!" So Lamb to Manning in 1806. Wars, embassies, consulates, and massacres have not materially lessened that strain. China is still an abstraction. Every book of Chinese travel has the stamp of novelty. The writer on China has no need to steer a course between accumulated shoals of the trite. To do him justice, he generally writes with the newness and urgency of the Ancient Mariner:

We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

The sea of Chinese life is so vast, changeless, and strange, that this adjective "silent" hardly needs to be amended. What does China tell? The traveller goes thither only to hear the sempiternal chatter of the one race in whom stagnation does not connote decay. It was a happy fancy that made Lamb write to Manning, barely six years after his friend's departure to China:

Your friends have all got old—those you left blooming; myself (who am one of the few that remember you), those golden hairs which you recollect my taking a pride in, turned to silver and gray. . . . St. Paul's Church is a heap of ruins; the Monument isn't half so high as you knew it, divers parts being successively taken down which the ravages of time had rendered dangerous; the horse at Charing Cross is gone, no one knows whither; and all this has taken place while you have been settling whether Ho-hing-tong should be spelt with a — or a —.

It is in a spirit of wonder, of scarcely shaken incredulity, that one still turns to any book purporting to describe China. And the excellent book before us hits this mood. Mrs. Scidmore, who has seen, exclaims on China as heartily as the reader, who has not. "The most incomprehensible, unfathomable, inscrutable, contradictory, logical, and illogical people on earth."

Moreover, Mrs. Scidmore's zeal for travel in China has limitations which would probably be shared by most of us. She speaks of the repulsion which the traveller feels whenever he finds himself in the thick of Chinese life.

The hostility of the people, combined with a certain fraternity and equality; the close shouldering and elbowing of the filthy crowds whose solid, stolid, bovine stare, continued for hours, unpleasantly mesmerises one; the inevitable wrangling, haggling, and bribing before one can get in or out of any show-place, and the awful Chinese voice—in fact, the whole scheme and plan of the world Chinese—wear upon one, "get upon one's nerves," in a way and to a degree difficult to explain. . . . The traveller . . . soon feels that he must go, and China's edge is paved with broken intentions, travellers' plans and itineraries abandoned with zeal.

And apart from all special buffets and inconveniences

there is the deep-down, ever-felt enmity of races. Mrs. Seidmore goes too far when she says that affection is never possible between the Anglo-Saxon and the Chinese. Sir Robert Hart's brilliant career—which we hope against hope is not ended, and to which Mrs. Seidmore does the fullest justice—is a leading proof to the contrary. Yet the gulf between white and yellow is seldom bridged. The Englishman can stand most solitudes, but the solitude he feels among the Chinese has in it something nightmarish and horrible:

Their very numbers and sameness appal one, the frightful likeness of any one individual to all the other three hundred odd millions of his own people. Everywhere, from end to end of the vast empire, one finds them cast in the same unvarying physical and mental mold—the same yellow skin, hard features, and harsh, mechanical voice, the same houses, graves, and clothes; the same prejudices, superstitions, and customs; the same selfish conservatism, blind worship of precedent and antiquity; a monotony, unanimity, and repetition of life, character, and incident that offends one almost to resentment.

Everywhere on their tenth of the globe, from the edge of Siberia to the end of Cochin China, the same ignoble queue and the senseless cotton shirt are worn; everywhere this fifth of the human race is sunk in dirt and disorder, decadent, degenerate, indifferent to a fallen estate, consumed with conceit, selfish, vain, cowardly, and superstitious, without imagination, sentiment, chivalry, or sense of humour, combating with most zeal anything that would alter conditions even for the better, indifferent as to who rules or usurps the throne. There is no word or written character for patriotism in the language, hardly good ground in the minds and hearts for planting the seed of that sentiment, but there are one hundred and fifty ways of writing the characters for good luck and long life. And yet in no country have political martyrs ever died more nobly and unselfishly than these reformers executed at Peking in 1898. Although Mongol, Mirg, and Manchu won the empire by arms, the soldier is despised, as much the butt of dramatists as the priest. There is no respect or consideration for woman, who is a despised, inferior, and soulless creature, yet three times in these last forty years the dragon throne has been seized and the country hurried on to ruin by the same high-tempered, strong-willed, vindictive old Manchu dowager odalisk.

Tientsin—what, think you, is this place like, this name in the newspapers? Do you know that it contains, with its suburbs, more than a million people, and stretches for six miles along the banks of its muddy river? A drear congestion of humanity, it is built of gray bricks, has dingy-tiled roofs, and, without space, splendour, greenery, or cleanliness anywhere about it, is but a huge warren, in whose narrow stone runs unceasing processions of people stream and scream and scold their way from dawn to dark.

The few mitigating features of Tientsin life do not dispel this impression, which is the more likely to be correct because in describing Peking Mrs. Seidmore takes other travellers to task for the too sober colouring of their descriptions of the Imperial city. But even in Peking the monstrosity of the city's life prevails over all detail. "Peking is the most incredible, impossible, anomalous, and surprising place in the world." The city suddenly presents itself to the eye by its walls.

Although one travels toward it across the great level plain that extends from Peking's suburban hills for seven hundred miles southward, the city walls are not distinguished until one is near them. Then they loom above, and stretch in such long, endless perspective, that one loses measure of their vastness, and the eye accepts them quite as much as a range of hills or any natural feature of the landscape.

The city, which is four cities clamped together by massive walls and strange gateways, is admirably described by Mrs. Seidmore, with touches which we have not met with elsewhere. One has read in many books of the beauty of the British Legation, with its silent lawns and pavilions and its smooth-running, wholesome English life. But there is another side to that picture, curiously symbolic of the timid, precarious foothold which European diplomacy has in China.

If one enters the Tartar city through the high arch of the Hata-men, he comes almost immediately upon the Chiaomin Hsiang, or Legation Street, which runs parallel with the city wall for a mile, before debouching on the great square in front of the palace gate. All the foreign compounds are on or near that street, but it is a straggling, unpaved slum of a thoroughfare, along which are occasionally seen a European picking his way between the ruts and puddles with the donkeys and camels; envoys, plenipotentiaries, and scions of la carrière diplomatique having lived along this broad gutter for nearly forty years, and had just the effect upon imperial Peking that many barbarians had upon imperial Rome. . . . They have been content to wallow along this filthy Legation Street, breathing its dust, sickened with its mud and stenches, the highway before their doors a general sewer and dumping-ground for offensive refuse of every kind. The street is all gutter save where there are fragmentary attempts at a raised mudbank footwalk beside the house walls, for use when the cartway between is too deep a mud slough. "We are here on sufferance, under protest, you know," say the meek and lowly diplomats; "we must not offend Chinese prejudices." Moreover, all the Legations would not subscribe to an attempted improvement fund, nor all unite in demanding that the Chinese should clean, light, pave, and drain Legation Street—that jealousy of the Great Powers so ironically termed the "Concert of Europe" is as much to blame for this sanitary corner of Peking as for affairs in Crete and Armenia.

That is a surprising state of things, but, as Mrs. Seidmore elsewhere remarks, "China is China to the last word, triumphant over all agents of progress and regeneration." This remark was inspired by her first sight of a Chinese locomotive. The railway train of the West has, like Bottom, been translated—Chinesed.

There are seemingly no springs under the body of the coach, and the first-class passenger finds himself thumped about like a load of freight. Without carpet or cushion or curtain, carving, gilding, and surplus splendours, one is jolted along at the rate of twenty miles an hour. There were curtains and cushions in the first-class cars at the inauguration of railway travel, but the Chinese passengers took away every loose thing when they left the cars, even to the brass catches, snaps, and springs of the window-fastenings.

Perhaps the most laughable example of the Chinese capacity to be advanced and behindhand, learned and ignorant at one and the same moment is afforded by the Peking Board of Astronomers, who compute eclipses with accuracy for the official calendar, but, when the eclipse draws near, leave their instruments, and, assembling in the courtyard of the Observatory, frantically beat tom-toms to scare away the casual dragon which is about to swallow the sun or the moon.

Since the Legations are meanly environed, one might expect that the Chinese Council with which they deal, the Tsung-li-Yamen, was dazzling by contrast. Such is not the case. China deals with Europe through a Board which took its rise in 1860 as a mere temporary bureau of necessity, and which still ranks as an inferior Board outside the six great departments of government.

It has not even the honour of being housed within the Imperial City. Ministers have always a long, slow ride in state across to the shabby gateway of the forlorn old Yamen, where now eleven aged, sleepy incompetents muddle with foreign affairs. As these eleven elders have reached such posts by steady advances, they are always septuagenarians, worn out with the exacting, empty, routine rites and functions of such high office, and physically too exhausted by their midnight rides to and sunrise departures from the Palace to begin fitly the day's tedium at the dilapidated Tsung-li-Yamen.

The midnight rides to and from the palace are explained by the fact that the Imperial Palace is busiest at night. Edicts are decreed by the light of thousands of vegetable wax candles, or were until the recent introduction of the electric light.

The Emperor Kwangsu was supposed to rise for his day at two o'clock in the morning, and, after the rites and ceremonies, to hold councils and audiences, receive memorials and reports, and work busily until after sunrise. He turned to relaxation when plebeian daylight came, and went wearily to bed about five o'clock in the afternoon. Audiences were set for the grisly hour just before dawn, and the assembled ministers usually waited sleepily on the imperial pleasure. Even the foreign envoys were bidden to their audience in the ignoble Pavilion of Purple Light at six o'clock in the morning, as to a French military court-martial.

We wonder whether Lamb's irresponsible chatter to Maunier across Asia, his tea-cup pattern knowledge of China, will yield us a significant sentence in the present crisis. One feels that babes and sucklings can talk best on such a theme. And Lamb wrote jestingly: "Come out of Babylou, O, my friend! for her time is come; and the child that is native, and the Proselyte of her gates, shall kindle and smoke together."

Old Eyes, Young Heart.

The Flowing Tide. By Mme. Belloc. (Sands.)

"Young eyes saw," writes Mme. Belloc, "and an old heart remembers." But the heart of the writer of this book is young. She writes as one to whom the history of the world is set about the growth of the Church of Christ—the visible Church mounted upon the Seven Hills; as one to whom its ultimate triumph is assured by Divine guarantees—"Lo, I am with you all days," "The gates of hell shall not prevail." For her, living among the best of her brethren in the faith, dwelling aloof, perhaps, in memories of a great day of resuscitation, the important movement of the 'Forties still swells—that flowing tide is not yet at the flood. If her book, then, betrays a spirit of ecclesiastical optimism and a tendency to overrate the importance, the significance, even the number of the conversions to the Catholic and Roman Church, the fault springs from no unworthy or unamiable source. Its contents record mainly the personal impressions of an interested observer, not wide enough to form a safe basis for generalisation, but, because of their personal note, a contribution to the ecclesiastical history of the period that has a value of its own. The author is discursive, disjointed, occasionally careless of the niceties of accurate English, but often interesting and seldom positively dull.

Unlike the greater number of Rome's recruits in this country, Mme. Belloc came of a Nonconformist stock. Her people had received from the refugee priests of the French Revolution juster notions of the Catholic clergy and creed than those which had been generally handed down from the days of the Jesuit Persons and his ill-advised dalliance with treason. By their personal reminiscences she was in touch with the priest of Old Oscott, the Rev. Joseph Borington, a cousin of the bishop, with whom he served on what was known as the Catholic Committee—that body which, in its desire to secure from the Government of the day some mitigation of Catholic disabilities, was willing to accept, on behalf of Roman Catholics in England, the ludicrous title "Catholic dissenters." Among the intimate friends of the Parkes family was the famous old parson of Hatton, Dr. Parr, who daily used to send them "messengers with strange little notes, written in corners of his paper." For the Romish Church, according to the unwilling testimony of his biographer, "he ever entertained an almost reverential respect," and in praise of a certain divine he was wont to say that "he was a very learned man in the English Church and would almost have been considered as in the Church of Rome." It was at the house of the conscientious biographer that Miss Bessie Parkes came first into contact with a representative of the old religion—a child with the splendid name of Adelaide de Lys, a French exile, who ate no flesh meat on Friday.

With the end of the burly Georgian period that laid out London in squares and covered the country with stage coaches and the ninepenny post, a new breath—who shall say whence?—stirred upon the stagnant air. St. Augustine and the Venerable Bede emerged from dusty shelves; Thomas à Kempis became a power in literature; an idealised vision of the mediæval Church rapt the minds of Oxford dons. The "Library of the Fathers" and the "Lives of the English Saints" appeared; Newman on the Mediterranean wrote the yearning lyric that, whatever its technical defects, laid a lasting hold upon the hearts of his countrymen. Not long since "There is no court of Rome," Sydney Smith had said, "and no Pope; there is a waxwork Pope and a waxwork court of Rome." Now to Wiseman, visiting London in 1835, came Newman and Hurrell Froude, as it were secretly, to learn upon what terms Rome might be disposed to mother them, and, learning that less than the whole Council of Trent was less than enough, went away sorrowful.

In 1849 Dr. Wiseman was appointed vicar-apostolic of the London District, and that same year—so far had public opinion advanced—in the presence of 240 priests and 14 bishops, he consecrated Pugin's large gingerbread cathedral in Southwark. The Gorham judgment, by which it was declared that in the Church of England the doctrine of baptismal regeneration was of optional tenure, gave a new impetus to the transition movement, and, with a multitude of others, swept into the fold James Hope, two of the Wilberforce family, and Manning. The next year, from "outside the Flaminian Gate," came Wiseman's proud pastoral announcing the re-establishment of a territorial hierarchy; and in view of Miss Parkes's window a wall was hideously frescoed with an ecclesiastical Guy Fawkes. Also the Pope, the twelve Bishops, and the Cardinal were burned in effigy, what time the loyal crowd chanted the National Anthem and the Morning Hymn. At the end of the long low building that was the first home of the Oratory in Brompton, she heard Faber preach; whose All for Jesus had taken pious London by storm, and provoked in the stolid minds of an older generation grave doubts as to his sanity—"Got a bee in 's bonnet," said a worthy Lancashire priest to a fellow ecclesiastic, and alleged the book as evidence. But Wiseman's judgment was different, who wrote to the Oratorian on his death-bed:

There can be no danger in dwelling on the mercies rather than on the justice of God, and, therefore, none in making the best of our claims upon the former, so as to disarm the latter. If one has for years been endeavouring to cleave to the Cross and to cling to the hem of Mary's garment, it is the office of hope to plead these affectionate occupations of a life in favour of mercy, grace, and confidence, at the approach of death. I only wish that I could look forward to similar motives and rights when, in the same crisis, the sense of such heavy responsibilities so little answered will weigh upon me.

An impression of singular vividness was made upon the chronicler by a man little known outside diocesan circles, and certainly alien enough in temper from the liberal woman of the world. Yet it would, perhaps, not be rash to conclude that he was the immediate agent of her conversion.

Whatever enthusiasm [she writes] lurked under Monsignor Gilbert's grave aspect could only be realised by noticing the tenacity with which he held on to his purposes, one of which, by the mercy of God, was to baptize a person in whom he appeared to take a deep interest. . . . To give good plain advice, according to his best lights; to expound, without personal urgency nevertheless, a certain rigid unimaginative faith which was to him as an iron rod which braced him up, body and soul, and which kept him working at his desk within four hours of his death from bronchitis—such was the conception of duty of my dear revered friend. I remember, as if it were yesterday, a conversation he held with me about the damnation of the heathen, and especially the Chinese, and the expression of his face as he said that it was by no means an article of faith that the Chinese, bad as they were, were too bad to afford hope about them as a whole. He said to me, "You are not bound to believe they will be—but I do."

Mme. Belloc's outlook is not confined to her own country. On the continent of Europe and in the United States of America the tide is still, to her eyes, a flowing one. An eddy of it she takes to be the movement in the Established Church which, though making in all things towards conformity with Rome, is yielding at the present time but a scanty harvest. But she is impressed by its proportions, and by the real zeal which, in the midst of a good deal of affectation and self-will, does make itself here and there manifest. Figures from Gorman's Rome's Recruits furnish her with a final flourish. And certainly none need grudge her whatever confirmation she may derive from the 205 officers of the army and the 446 divines who, in half a century, have arrayed themselves beneath the papal standard.

"Oriel Bill" and Dr. Hill.

Some Oxford Pets. Edited by Mrs. Wallace. (Blackwell.)

WRITING about pets has always been one of the literary luxuries. However busy an author may be, he can always readily find time to extol a favourite dog or cat and throw his best into it. Nor does the question of money enter. In other words, writing about pets belongs to the open-handed literature of friendliness.

And this is a very friendly little book, full of good human nature and good dog and cat nature. In response to an appeal from Mrs. Wallace, the editor, a number of people have written kindly and humorously of their pets, in order that the book, when complete, might be sold for the benefit of the funds now being raised for the wounded in the Transvaal War. Mr. Warde Fowler, author of Tales of the Birds, supplies a preface, and then we come right away upon the hero of the book, "Oriel Bill," the famous bull-dog of Oriel College.

The Rev. L. R. Phelps, who serves as Bill's elegist, has a very pretty humorous gift, and these five pages are pleasant reading. Oriel Bill was as much a character, an individual, as the Master of Balliol. He would associate with none but Oriel men; he would enter college only on the annual photographing ceremony, when he settled himself on a table and "faced the camera with placid courage"; he attended all college matches, and once, on a very hot day, he jumped into a hansom and returned to town in comfort. "In the time of his hot youth," says Mr. Phelps, "he was seen at his best in a field of cows." He was charming with children; he appeared twice on the stage, once as Lance's dog in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona"; he was photographed in dozens of curious attitudes in cap and gown; he could not abide fireworks. "No one who ever saw him stretched before the fire, his huge head on his forepaws, his hind legs stretched out behind him, with that inimitable look of pain which goes with a high ideal on his face, and who heard him snore, will ever forget it." After an illustrious career Oriel Bill slipped into self-indulgence and died on May 22, 1898.

Among the other papers in this agreeable book is one by Prof. Max Müller on his dachshunds, Waldmann and Männerl, who was own brother to Matthew Arnold's Geist; an account of Tom of Corpus, the Christchurch cat; and the description of Skian, a "Mull terrier." It was to Skian (Mrs. Massie's dog) that Dr. Birkbeck Hill wrote the following epistle:

To His Highness, Skian,
The Dog(e) of Oxford.

MY DEAR SKIAN,—Many thanks for your kind present of your own portrait. I have shown it to my cat Hodge; after gazing at it a while she said, with a sigh, that there was nothing that she would more willingly lead than a cat and dog life with you. If you would only come and sit in my study with her, I should find it very easy to sit down doggedly and write. Jesuit's bark would not be nearly so bracing as your honest and friendly one, which greets me every morning. You might make me, perhaps, a little too dogmatic, but at all events there is nothing of a puppy about you. How pleasantly you and I could write doggerel verses together, and how helpful would you be to my niece Lillian in her dog-Latin. She would be so grateful to you for your assistance, that at the end of every lesson she would sing the dogsology—I hope that I spell it rightly. It is all very well for the poet to sing:

"My boat is on the shore
My bark is on the sea";

had he known you and lived here he would have wished your bark to be at No. 3, The Crescent. I am not fond of quarrelling, but I should dearly like to have a bone to pick with you every day of my life. If you would not think it personal, I would propose that we should drink dog's nose together. "Love me, love my dog," is all very well: but how if the dog you love is not yours but Mrs. Massie's? I wish she would give you an ill-name, and then she might as well—not hang you—but send you to me. As long as you were in the room I could never be so churlish as to say: "When I open my lips let no dog bark." You might bark as often as you pleased. Your motto and Hodge's shall be: "The cat will mew and dog will have his day," and your day shall be a very long one. So, my dear Skian, pray show your mistress two fair pairs of heels, and run away to your friend
G. BIRKBECK HILL.

When Dr. Hill has entirely done with Dr. Johnson, he might add to the gaiety of nations by a volume of familiar epistles to his friends' dogs.

Other New Books.

THOMAS GIRTIN.

BY LAURENCE BINYON.

Mr. Binyon is connected with the Department of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum, and the circumstance has been of advantage to him in preparing this handsome literary and pictorial memoir of the young artist to whom Turner acknowledged his indebtedness. In setting forth the chief incidents of Girtin's short and brilliant life, Mr. Binyon has perforce relied mainly on Mr. Roget's history of the Old Water Colour Society, where the known facts about Girtin are collected. The son of a Southwark rope-maker, Girtin was London born and bred. Adelphi-terrace is the spot most associated with his name. There he was apprenticed to the well-known Edward Dayes, and there he grew so tired of laying flat tints on Dayes's prints that he ran away. His reward was imprisonment in the Fleet as a refractory apprentice: but tradition has it that he won his first recognition within those forbidding precincts. Lord Essex is said to have come thither to see the graceful drawings with which Girtin had covered the walls of his bare room. Anyhow, Girtin soon found a more genial master in John Raphael Smith, for whom he laid on flat tints without repining. Mr. Binyon justly remarks that this flat-washing was the very work to develop the sureness of hand which distinguished even the minor water-colourists of that day. At Smith's Girtin and Turner came together, and Girtin's progress was for some years more rapid than Turner's. The youths often spent their evenings with Dr. Monro or Dr. Henderson, two dilettanti who lived in Adelphi-terrace, and there they met De Wint, Cotman, Hunt, Varley, and others.

So that Adelphi-terrace is for ever associated with that delightful band of water-colour artists whose work is as English and inspired as anything in British Art.

Mr. Binyon usefully points out that this revival—not rise—of water-colour drawing belonged to a very ordinary, and, indeed, commercial, movement. There was a kind of rage for national topography. Copper-plate views were the desired embellishment of the drawing-room table. Girtin and his contemporaries worked to produce a drawing that would engrave. And this fact explains the quiet, grey tones of their pictures. They usually laid in the design with a faint grey, and worked on that as a basis. Girtin soon made himself an adept. He brought little that was new to the method, but he had a sure hand and a fund of real feeling. He excelled in rendering atmosphere, and the light on the stones of old ruins. Light and the veils and accidents which make it beautiful, he loved, and space and solitude and graceful decay lured him unfailingly. Mr. Binyon claims that no one has excelled him in rendering “the beauty of the colour of old stone, with all its fadings and enrichings by air and sunshine and the kind neglect of man.” Necessarily, much of this charm is lost in the photographic reproductions which follow the text. Yet there is no difficulty in tracing it in the autotypes of “Landisfarne Abbey” and in “Durham Cathedral.” Perhaps Girtin’s command over light and atmosphere is best seen in the autotype of his lovely “White House at Chelsea,” now in the possession of Mr. Horatio L. Michells. The exquisite airiness, freshness, and ethereal perspective of this drawing are not to be described. Mr. Binyon tells how Turner praised it:

A dealer called on him in a hackney coach one morning, and looking at his work, said: “These are very fine, Mr. Turner, but I have brought something finer with me.” “I don’t know what that can be,” returned the painter, “unless it’s Tom Girtin’s ‘White House at Chelsea.’”

Girtin’s undoubted genius, and his early death, go far to justify Mr. Binyon in associating his name with that of Keats. It is matter for congratulation that this adequate memorial of a fine painter has been made; and we echo the wish that Girtin’s claims may be further satisfied by an exhibition of his original drawings. Mr. Binyon has done all, short of that, which can bring his qualities into fresh notice. (Seeley.)

CYCLING ON THE ALPS: A PRACTICAL GUIDE.

By C. L. FREESTON.

Mr. Freeston’s practical guide sets one panting for the “ample ether” of the Alpine passes. You may not, it is true, be able to push your machine to the summit of the Matterhorn, and coast down the other side to dinner and bed; but the passes are quite accessible to a bicycle—that is to say, a bicycle may be pushed up and ridden down with no particular exertion or danger. In the Engadine the prospect is even brighter:

As a cycling ground the Engadine is unique, for it affords the rider a means of cycling sixty miles on end without a yard of walking, and yet—mark this—at a mean altitude exceeding that of the topmost peak of the loftiest mountain in Great Britain. At its highest point the Engadine road is six thousand feet high; it is nearly four thousand at its lowest, and this minor difference is almost evenly distributed along the entire route.

That is the excellence of the roads in the Alpine passes. For the Swiss roadmakers are the best in the world, and their carefully graduated zig-zags never approach the steepness of our “dangerous to cyclist” hills. Mr. Freeston, who has ridden, with ladies too, over most of the well-known passes, has had to dismount from motives of caution but once, when a cart blocked the entrance to an Alpine village.

To those who wish to follow in his footsteps Mr. Freeston gives clear and full advice as to route and points of halt. Energy is needed, for there are stretches which the bicycle must be brought up by hand. But there is the glorious coast in view, to say nothing of the scenery. And when the rider begins to coast he need fear no sudden drop, no cross roads with slumbering waggons to vex him. Let him ride with care round the corners of the zig-zag road; let him have a couple of brakes on his machine, and no accident is likely to mar his joy. In conclusion, we may say that Mr. Freeston has omitted almost everything from his book that would not interest the intending cyclist in the Alps, and omitted nothing that could help him. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

KING ALFRED’S VERSION OF THE CONSOLATIONS OF BOETHIUS.

EDITED BY DR. SEDGEFIELD.

THE approaching “Alfred Millenary” is already yielding its crop of volumes. This is the third or fourth that has come under our notice. Dr. Sedgefield has previously edited for the Clarendon Press a critical edition of King Alfred’s Anglo-Saxon version of Boethius. He now attempts to bring the most interesting work of the scholarship before a wider public, by turning the Anglo-Saxon as literally as possible into modern English. A careful introduction contains specimens of a number of English versions of the De Consolatione subsequent to Alfred’s. They are those of Chaucer, John Walton (1410), George Colville (1556), Sir Thomas Challoner (1563), Queen Elizabeth (1593), J. T. (1609), Harry Coningsby (1664), “A Lover of Truth and Virtue” (1674), Lord Preston (1695), William Causton (1730), Philip Ridpett (1785), Robert Duncan (1789), Anon. (1792), H. R. James (1897). Dr. Sedgefield takes the second “prose” of the fourth book, and the second “metre” of the third book as test passages, and, as he says, his extracts “give a fair idea of the course of English translation during the last five hundred years.” But, curiously enough, he has omitted the most memorable—after Chaucer, and, perhaps, Alfred himself—of all Boethius’ translators. This is Henry Vaughan, the Silurist, who, in his Olor Iscanus (1651) and Thalia Rediviva (1678) gave admirable versions of more than half the metrical portions of the De Consolatione. Vaughan will very much more than endure Dr. Sedgefield’s test. In fact, he is a poet, while most of his rivals are the merest rhymesters. Thus Lord Preston:

I’ll take my harp, and touch each warbling string,
And I, her Bard, will sing
Of Nature’s powerful Hand
Which doth with Reins the Universe command,
My Song shall comprehend each Law,
By which she doth all Beings bind, and awe,
I’ll read her mighty Pandects o’r,
My eye into each Page shall look
Of the Elephantine Book,
And I her choicest Secrets will explore.

Thus Coningsby, as trite as his fellow is diffuse:

Kind Nature the whole World does guide,
With Gordian Knot does bind,
Does certain Laws for it provide,
Which now to warble is my mind.

And thus Vaughan:

What fix’d affections, and lov’d laws—
Which are the hid, magnetic cause—
Wise Nature governs with, and by
What fast, inviolable tie
The whole creation to her ends
For ever provident she bends:
All this I purpose to rehearse
In the sweet airs of solemn verse.

(Clarendon Press.)

NOTES ON PRINTERS AND BOOKSELLERS. BY C. GERRING.

A bookish man is easily pleased with chatter about books, and Mr. Gerring’s compilation of notes on the history of bookmaking and bookselling and on the personalities of Mr. Bernard Quaritch and other booksellers may find its public. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

Fiction.

The Mechanics of Heroism.

Black Heart and White Heart, and Other Stories. By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans. 6s.)

Daniel Herrick. By Sidney Herbert Burchell. (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

Paul the Optimist. By W. P. Dothie. (John Long. 6s.)

THE real converse of egoism is not, as some think, altruism, but hero-worship. It is, in fact, a great relief from the tormenting envies of life to gaze on some manifest and overtopping figure of success standing clearly out amid the striving herd. Even embittered rivals may be at peace while admiring the same superior being uplifted convincingly above them both by his own stature and not by any mere pedestal. Envy comes in when, by standing on tiptoe, a man gets level with his superior, not when his superior tops him by more than a head. Healthy hero-worship not only is the converse of envy, but it yields delightful anodyne for envy's pangs. Something of ourselves must needs reside in what we worship. Our hero is ever, as far as we are concerned, a projection of our own consciousness into a kind of heaven, whatever our hero may be in himself.

So in fiction. It is because we feel with the hero that we enjoy him. And how do we know the hero? Easily enough. The hero wins his way through, and because of, everything to triumphant self-expression. He bursts into flower. If he renounce, behold his head garnished with a halo. If he die, behold him a trailing cloud of glory. If he be happy, behold him splendidly happy, yoked to Earth's loveliest. The career of a hero feeds the eye of the hero-worshipper. The concept of success is greater in his mind by the sight, and he is happy by sympathy and the spell of a dream.

But the hero must be human; his heroism must be illustrated in such fashion that he never passes wholly into the misty region of the demi-god. When, for instance, we read in the Cuchullin Saga that Cúchulainn "dealt three blows in the liss, so that eight men fell from each blow, and one escaped in each group of nine," we simply shrug our shoulders wearily. The feat transcends possibility; but not in that alone is the boast of it nothing. We lack circumstance; it is not "reported." When, however, Guy Livingstone, in dying, crushes the silver cup in his hand we feel both man and matter; the grip is on the mind as well as on the cup.

Mr. Rider Haggard has never neglected this golden rule of hero-creation—visualise. His grandiose situations are always clearly conceived and are appreciated accordingly. He has given us many Guy Livingstones in savage setting, and he loves to exhibit them in Berserk mood. It is a black Guy Livingstone—one of Cetywayo's Zulus—whom he gives us in Black Heart and White Heart: "With a roar like a lion's" he seized a man "round the waist and thigh," and "hurled him over the edge of the cliff to find his death on the rocks of the Pool of Doom." We watch him racing on foot after his galloping enemy "White Heart" (a scoundrel of Herculean strength), till finally they wrestle for life and death. But Mr. Haggard is weary of muscular strength; and, though there is prodigious exercise of this gift in the three stories contained in his latest volume, it is not primary and ultimate; it falls short of the heroic. Courage of soul as against physical prowess is the theme that is uppermost in two of these stories. This is an advance, for there is a taint of the shambles in all Berserk rages, but it is an advance that means no decline in a certain gruesome picturesqueness. An attempt, in language at times curiously modern, to recreate a city of Monomotapa gives us a Hebrew martyr, and Divine justice does not allow a lover to be happy who has bowed to Baal for the sake of saving the life of his sweetheart.

But heroism is allowed the last word. It is not Mr. Haggard's way to leave arch enemies in ascendance. Irony is alien to the heroic spirit. "An eye for an eye" is a motto dear to those who perceive the hurt of heroes. Mr. Haggard's martyr finds time to utter the scathing contents of a page before he is murdered, and an arrow shot from the base of a cliff by an outraged hero finds a vital spot in a ruffianly king standing on the summit.

The missionary hero is an individual whom Mr. Haggard treats in decidedly striking fashion. What if a believer were required to demonstrate the literal truth of his message at the peril of his life? That is the question the novelist set himself, and in sending the Rev. Thomas Owen among "The Sons of Fire" he allows great faith the privilege of proving its validity. Semi-miracles happen, and the missionary converts the "wizard" who poisons him. The wizard becomes a martyr, and in the attitude of crucifixion is seen animating the troops of his king. He dies potent, brilliant, prophetic. Ah, Mr. Haggard, what an incorrigible hero-monger you are!

A hero of a kind that requires more managing than the Haggardian type is that of the modern pseudo-historical novel. Mr. Burchell has made some reputation as a depicter in romance of the Stuart period. The essay in art of such a novel as Daniel Herrick, which takes up the period of Charles II., and sketches his wronged Portuguese queen in some detail, was clearly more difficult to execute—all things considered, more ambitious too—than the tasks lately performed by Mr. Haggard. Admit that Mr. Burchell shows greater deftness than Mr. Haggard, and puts into his puppets more of the stuff of men and women as this poor world produces them, still one must consider Mr. Burchell the inferior romancer of the two. Why? Because Mr. Burchell's hero eavesdrops too luckily, because coincidence is too obsequious to him. In real life coincidence is so rare that its occurrence frequently betrays our superstition, or our desire not to be thought superstitious. In fiction it is a monstrosity. Daniel Herrick tells his own tale. He is the offspring of unknown parents, and one congratulates Mr. Burchell for a courageous realism in allowing one of them to have been a rascal. He spends laborious days in serving his queen privily, and in endeavouring to unravel a case of abduction. Wherefore he is persistently haunted by a hag, heroically aided by a comely dame who loves him, but to whom he can only be brotherly, and sentenced to death by a treasonable assembly. A hag, mark you, affords an excellent foil to a hero; she makes the reader twice as uneasy as an ordinary villain. Mr. Burchell, be it added, invokes the Plague to serve the hero in an extremity, paints a touching portrait of poor Queen Catherine, and a sprightly one of "Old Rowley."

Remains a hero of a third sort—wooden, yet throbbing with a certain genuineness of intention—the idealistic intention of his creator. Paul the Optimist is a man who is not to be knocked down or discoloured by buffets of mortal chance. He is truthful; he has a sort of clairvoyance, yet he falls into a murder-trap and is nearly killed. As tailor's assistant, pawnbroker's clerk, clerk in some gasworks, he stands for plain realism if you disentangle him from the terrible thicket of plot into which Mr. Dothie, with short-sighted ingenuity, has led him. "Where would you be without the old Bethlehem miracle?" is the last question in the book. "I suppose nowhere," is the optimist's reply. It is a pity that words of such eloquent orthodoxy cannot be considered to furnish a key to a really perverse romance, in which much excellent observation and an often distinguished style are set at naught by the imported falsehoods of cheap melodrama. The author's villains amuse by their fictional self-consciousness. They are absurdly perfect in their parts. A sketch of madness on pp. 98, 99, true to the stealthy logicity, the brutal inconsequence which maniacs display, is, in its excellence, the best rebuke to Mr. Dothie's gaudier sensations. It is a pity that a writer's good things are often only his side-shows.

To sum up, we have taken a few heroes from contemporary fiction, and find them not unheroic, but, on the whole, too showy, too well abetted by circumstance, too little realised from within. We do not want imitations; but would it not be a good thing if some of our hero-makers would ponder the character of a certain Beauchamp of story who died in saving a guttersnipe? For there in all fulness is the futility and fineness of the hero—there is the churning process exhibited; there is the waste and anguish felt; and at last, after countless irritations, the beauty seen. After him, fiction seems to deal in toy heroes.

The Father Confessor: Stories of Death and Danger. By Dora Sigerson Shorter. Illustrated. (Ward, Lock & Co. 6s.)

MRS. SHORTER is a poet, and her imagination concerns itself more with ideas than with environments. In the picturesque ballads for which she is best known, it is the idea which reigns over all; everything else is reduced to the simplest, austere convention—lowered to a mere illustrative function. So with these stories: the basis of the story is an idea, and the story exists merely to illustrate and demonstrate the idea. Thus, in "The Three Travellers," the idea is that a woman always demands physical courage from a man, and Mrs. Shorter has devised rather a clever plot in which a woman loses her life in order to conceal from others the fact that her man is lacking in this attribute of physical courage. "The Three Travellers" is one of the best tales in the book, boldly conceived, and narrated with vigour. But it fails in conviction, like nearly all the other tales, because, though idealistically true, it is deficient in symmetry of convention. It begins with the meeting of three travellers at an inn:

Two of them were young, the third was grey-haired and wrinkle-faced. They were discussing women's love. The youngest argued lightly, because he delighted in debate.

The second bitterly, because he had been jilted and fancied himself still in love.

The grey third without emotion, because he had known sorrow.

"For fairy gifts to win the heart of my fair lady," said the youngest, "were we in the magic days of old, I would ask nothing save a light heart and a handsome face with few harsh years stamped upon it."

And so on. Now there is no reason why a tale should not be cast in this convention, remote from the vulgar realism of outward fact, on a fairy plane. The reader well knows that men never actually did talk as these three travellers are made to talk; but the apparent untruthfulness does not distress him, because he feels at once that the author is aiming at a different, a more intimate and subtle, kind of truth. But later on in the story Mrs. Shorter declines into a hackneyed realism of flooded rivers, shattered bridges, and imperilled railway trains. This will not do. A story cannot be told in two absolutely different conventions. As it begins, so it must continue and end. In another story, "Transmigration," the same thing is to be observed:

"I heard you call," he said; "and, fearing you were ill, I entered. I am your neighbour, my latch-key fits your door. You must pardon my coming, but, thinking you were ill—and alone—"

"I am alone," I said—"alone, alone, deserted alike by God and man. Body and soul I am alone, and sick unto death."

Caught up by the spiritual idea governing this story, the reader would properly forget that sick people do not talk like a Hebrew psalm—"Body and soul I am alone and sick unto death"; but Mrs. Shorter, by the inopportune introduction of a latch-key, recalls him to trivial actualities, and the result is a disastrous confusion. With the possible exception of "The Fourth Generation," which is fairly naturalistic throughout, all the tales are more or less marred by this mixture of idealism and realism. Mrs. Shorter has tried to achieve the impossible. It is a pity, for there is fine emotion and nobility in the volume.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE DESCENT OF THE DUCHESS. BY MORLEY ROBERTS.

Smart holiday reading. "Twelve months after the Duke died the Duchess of Teviotdale declared she was tired of being good and respectable. . . . 'I shall travel. I shall go where nothing matters. . . . I'll go to America. I once met an American—' 'Yes?' said Minnie. 'Who was perfectly shameless. . . . He made love to me in the most original, unregulation way you ever heard of, Minnie. He never pulled the end of his moustache, or said Haw! And I remember he said that he was as independent as a hog on ice.'" The Duchess went to America. The first chapter is called "The Frying Pan"; the second, "The Fire." (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

A PRINCE OF SWINDLERS. BY GUY BOOTHBY.

There are novelists who dare to inflict prologues on their readers. Mr. Boothby, with an easy courage, here gives us a preface and an introduction occupying fifty pages. It is on page 51 that he cuts the cackle and comes to the diamonds—the Duchess of Wiltshire's diamonds. The detective's name was Kline, and "princes became familiar with it as their train bore them to Windsor to luncheon with the Queen; the nobility noticed and commented on it as they drove about town; merchants . . . street-boys . . . music-hall artistes . . ." they all had Klimo's name on their lips. (Ward, Lock. 5s.)

THE CATACOMBS OF PARIS. BY E. BERTHET. TRANS. BY M. C. HELMORE.

This is a stirring story of the period preceding the French Revolution, with the special interest which attaches to subterranean doings. "Chavigny!" said Philippe enthusiastically, "the early Christians took refuge in the catacombs of Rome, waiting until God permitted them to change the whole aspect of the world. We are other new religionists . . . we must wait as they did, hidden in the depths of the earth till the hour of our triumph—our martyrdom—arrives!" (Constable. 6s.)

THE MYSTIC NUMBER SEVEN. BY ANNABEL GRAY.

Gorgeous melodrama. The heroine had been born over a muffin shop in Bow, but comes into our ken possessed of "hats, gowns, jewels, horses, carriages, and corsets at extravagant prices . . . a cellar of costly vintages, a refined maid who knew her business. . . . Her gold-stepped scent-bottles were inlaid with diamonds. . . . Her sables were valued at five thousand pounds . . . She looked lovely on the stage. . . . Twisting her costly diamond rings or arranging roses with diamonds in them to represent dewdrops in her hair, Glen shuddered as she thought of ordinary life." (Simpkin, Marshall.)

AGATHA WEBB. BY ANNA K. GREEN.

A rousing, full-blooded, melodramatic novel, good for pier-head reading, by the author of The Leavenworth Case. Dancing and murder begin in the first chapter, and the game is well kept up. (Ward Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

FitzGerald Sans Omar.

LAST week we dealt on this page with that eccentric movement, the Omar Cult. We do not know how we can offer our readers a more drastic change of fare than by simply drawing attention to Edward FitzGerald's quiet life of books, and walks, and letter-writing at Woodbridge, in which Omar Khayyám and all his works were but an incident. To some FitzGerald without Omar may seem like "Hamlet" without the Prince, but that is a ludicrous misconception impossible to anyone who knows FitzGerald's Letters. We firmly believe that these Letters have been overshadowed by the Rubáiyat, and are by no means so widely read and loved as they would be if their claims had not been thus obscured. They are among the best in their world, and one might make all sorts of comparisons between them and the letters of Byron, Cowper, Lamb, and the rest—from which they would emerge wearing still their own peculiar charm. They are, perhaps, the most natural letters in the language. They are packed with matter, yet are perfectly easy, almost lazy, in their movement. Their peculiar quality is, perhaps, to be expressed by transferring to them a thought contained in Bacon's essay on Friendship, and discussed by FitzGerald himself in an early letter to his friend Allen. He says:

Lord Bacon's Essay on Friendship is wonderful for its truth: and I often feel its truth. He says that with a Friend "a man tosseth his thoughts," an admirable saying, which one can understand, but not express otherwise. But I feel, that being alone, one's thoughts and feelings, from want of communication, become heaped up and clotted together, as it were: and so lie like undigested food heavy upon the mind: but with a friend one tosseth them about, so that the air gets between them, and keeps them fresh and sweet. I know not from what metaphor Bacon took his "tosseth," but it seems to me as if it was from the way hay-makers toss hay, so that it does not press into a heavy lump, but is tossed about in the air, and separated, and thus kept sweet.

FitzGerald tosseth his thoughts continually through his Letters. He had time to think, and time to toss. At thirty-two he had already got well into the Quiet Life. To Frederic Tennyson he wrote in 1841:

Day follows day with unvaried movement: there is the same level meadow with geese upon it always lying before my eyes: the same pollard oaks: with now and then the butcher or the washerwoman trundling by in their carts.

And again, to the same friend:

I read of mornings; the same old books over and over again, having no command of new ones: walk with my great black dog of an afternoon, and at evening sit with open window, up to which China roses climb, with my pipe, while the blackbirds and thrushes begin to rustle bedwards in the garden, and the nightingale to have the neighbourhood to herself. We have had such a spring (baking the last two days) as would have satisfied even you with warmth. And such verdure! white clouds moving over the new fledged tops of oak trees, and acres of grass striving with buttercups. How old to tell of, how new to see!

Books are the theme of FitzGerald's Letters. He digresses to pictures, to boats, and to village lore, but the principal events in his life are the opening of new books or old ones. His Letters are an inspiring record of quiet, thorough, personal, unpretentious reading, such as, one fancies, is scarce enough nowadays. Whatever FitzGerald's achievements as a writer may be, they are not more valuable than the example of his wise reading. Ever ready to laugh at the "mob" of writers, FitzGerald found that word entirely to his taste when he discussed reading. He was of the mob of readers, and believed in the taste of the mob—not, perhaps, of the mob we name nowadays, but of the quiet, armchair, reading people, who read and have read for their pleasure since printing began. He preferred the judgments of this mob to those of Higher Critics. He thought that the truth was with the People. When some scholar said he would prove that Richard III. had no hump to his back, FitzGerald wrote:

I am strongly in favour of the hump; I do not think the common sense of two centuries is apt to be deceived in such a matter.

And in a letter to Donne, written when he was nearing sixty, FitzGerald used the same point in a passage which is an admirable statement of the position and critical power of the ordinary cultivated reader of books as compared with the scholar. He wrote, with many capitals:

When your letter was put into my hands, I happened to be reading Montaigne L. iii. ch. 8, De L'Art de Conferer, where at the end he refers to Tacitus; the only Book, he says, he had read consecutively for an hour together for ten years. He does not say very much; but the Remarks of such a Man are worth many Cartloads of German Theory of Character, I think; their Philology I don't meddle with. I know that Cowell has discovered that they are all wrong in their Sanskrit. Montaigne never doubts Tacitus' facts: but doubts his Inferences; well, if I were sure of his Facts I would leave others to draw their Inferences. I mean, if I were Commentator, certainly: and I think if I were Historian too. Nothing is more wonderful to me than seeing such Men as Spedding, Carlyle, and I suppose Froude, straining Fact to Theory as they do, while a scatter-headed Paddy like myself can keep clear. But then so does the Mob of Readers. Well, but I believe in the Vox Populi of two hundred years—still more, of two thousand. And, whether we be right or wrong, we prevail: so, however much wiser are the Builders of Theory, their Labour is but lost who build: they can't reason away Richard's Hump, nor Cromwell's Ambition, nor Henry's Love of a new Wife, nor Tiberius' beastliness. Of course, they had all their Gleams of Goodness: but we of the Mob, if we have any Theory at all, have that which all Mankind have seen and felt, and know as surely as Daylight; that Power will tempt the Best.

It was in this spirit of freedom and self-choosing that FitzGerald read his books and rapped out his little judgments. His Letters are an education in personal enjoyment of books. He is not unconscious nor un-proud of this freedom, which he evidently traced partly to his isolation at Woodbridge, and his immunity there from the invasions of the general cackle of criticism. Thus to Prof. Cowell he writes, in 1868:

"Locksley Hall" is far more like Lucretius than the last verses put into his mouth by A. T. But once get a Name in England, you may do anything. But I dare say that wise men too, like Spedding, will be of the same mind as the Times Critic. (I have not seen him.) What does Thompson say? You, I, and John Allen, are among the few, I do say, who, having a good natural Insight, maintain it undimmed by public, or private, Regards.

But if Woodbridge gave a free sway to his literary affections, it may have narrowed the range of the books on which his affections could alight and linger. "I cannot," he writes, "get on with Books about the Daily Life, which I find rather insufferable in practice about me. I never could read Mrs. Austen, nor (later) the famous George Eliot. Give me People, Places, and Things which I don't and can't see; Antiquaries, Jeanie Deans, Dalgettys, &c. . . . As to Thackeray's, they are horrible . . . wonderful he is, but not Delightful, which one thirsts for as one gets old and dry." This distaste for Thackeray was new, had developed; but to Jane Austen FitzGerald never did take kindly. To W. F. Pollock, who often wrote on Fiction, he says: "I laid out half-a-crown on your Fraser, and like much of it very much. . . . A little too much always about Miss Austen, whom I think quite capital in a Circle I have found quite unendurable to walk in." And to the same friend he wrote on a like occasion:

* Letters of Edward FitzGerald, 2 vols. (Macmillan. 5s. each.)

Letters to Fanny Kemble. (Macmillan. 5s.)

Can't you send me your Paper about the Novelists. As to which is the best of all I can't say. . . . I am . . . sure that Miss Austen cannot be third, any more than first or second: I think you were rather drawn away by a fashion when you put her there: and really old Spedding seems to me to have been the Stag whom so many followed in that fashion. She is capital as far as she goes: but she never goes out of the Parlour; if but Magnus Troil, or Jack Bunce, or even one of Fielding's Brutes, would but dash in upon the Gentility and swear a round Oath or two! I must think the "Woman in White," with her Count Fosco, far beyond all that. Cowell constantly reads Miss Austen at night after his Sanskrit Philology is done: it composes him like Gruel: or like Paisiello's Music, which Napoleon liked above all others, because he said it didn't interrupt his Thoughts.

It is odd that, rejecting Miss Austen, FitzGerald should have warmed to Trollope. Of all English novelists he, perhaps, gave most allegiance to Richardson. But he desired to abridge him. To John Allen he writes:

The piece of Literature I really could benefit Posterity with, I do believe, is an edition of that wonderful and aggravating Clarissa Harlowe; and this I would effect with a pair of Scissors only. It would not be a bit too long as it is, if it were all equally good; but pedantry comes in, and might, I think, be cleared away, leaving the remainder one of the great original Works of the World, in this Line. Lovelace is the wonderful character, for Wit: and there is some grand Tragedy, too. And nobody reads it!

The idea of a rape of Clarissa's locks dwelt with him, and Pollock was the next to hear of it:

I saw advertised in my old Athenæum a Review of Richardson's Novels in the January Cornhill. So I bought it. . . . Whether you wrote the article or not, I know you are one of the few who have read the Book. [FitzGerald refers to Clarissa Harlowe.] The Reviewer admits that it might be abridged; I am convinced of that, and have done it for my own satisfaction: but you this was not to be done. So here is internal proof that you didn't write what Thackeray used to call the Hurticle, or that you have changed your mind on that score. But you haven't. But I know better, Lord bless you: and am sure I could (with a pair of Scissors) launch old Richardson again: we shouldn't go off the stocks easy (pardon nautical metaphors), but stick by the way, amid the jeers of Reviewers who had never read the original: but we should float at last. Only I don't want to spend a lot of money to be hooted at, without having time to wait for the floating.

One of the excellent things about FitzGerald's Letters, considered as a record of his reading, is that he is never too bookish. Anon he looks out of his window at the green fields of Woodbridge, or the wandering fields of foam. How the joys of Books and of Nature are married in this bit about an essay of Carlyle's; it was a Fraser article on the old kings of Norway:

There was a Paper by "Mr. Carlyle" in this month's Magazine; and never did I lay out half-a-crown better. . . . Why Carlyle's Wine, so far from weak evaporation, is only grown better by Age. . . . It seems to me that a Child might read and relish this Paper, while it would puzzle any other Man to write such a one. I think I must write to T. C. to felicitate him on his truly Green Old Age. Oh, it was good to read it here, with the old Sea (which also has not sunk into Decrepitude) rolling in from that North: and as I looked up from the Book, there was a Norwegian Barque beating Southward, close to the Shore, and nearly all Sail set.

How FitzGerald recommends his seclusion in such passages! But anon he looked beyond Woodbridge, and with troubled eyes peered into a world which he understood quite as well as many who were more conversant with its daily turmoil. Here is a passage, from a letter to Prof. Cowell, which may come home to some in 1900:

I am sure there is no longer any great pleasure living in this Country, so test with perpetual Alarms as it is. One Day we are all in Arms about France. To-day we are doubting if To-morrow we may not be at War to the Knife with America! I say still, as I used, we have too much Property, Honour, etc., on our Hands: our outward Limbs go on lengthening while our central Heart beats weaker: I say, as I used, we should give up something before it is forced from us. The World, I think, may justly resent our being and interfering all over the Globe. Once more I say, would we were a little, peaceful, unambitious, trading Nation, like—the Dutch!

We have but dipped a swallow's wing into the two volumes of Mr. Aldis Wright's editions of the Letters, but that is a recommendation. Those who are tired of FitzGerald's "Omar" may fly to FitzGerald.

Things Seen.

The Candle.

THE church was very dark and cold, and a sense of forlornness brooded over the vast empty spaces of the mosaic floor. But in a distant chapel a forest of gleaming candles shed their light on a marble altar and the bowed figures grouped before it.

Suddenly two quiet English tourists came in behind me, borne as it were on a shaft of light, from the brilliant sunshine of the outer world. I knew them by sight—a blameless couple, well advanced in years, and belonging to the old school of pious Evangelicals. To them Rome was anathema, but their gentle, artistic souls were vaguely conscious of the beauty of her ritual. The wife lingered seated near the doorway, while the white-haired gentleman hastened furtively towards the brightness of the chapel.

In a moment a vergier had pressed a candle between his reluctant fingers, and signed him with officious whispers into a seat. Words were of no avail; the old gentleman could speak no tongue but his own, so he silently grasped his candle and waited. All those gathered in the chapel were doing the same.

Then the priest entered, and as the bell tinkled, and the sonorous Latin began rolling up into the vaulted roof, the vergier touched candle after candle, and the Englishman, too, became illuminated. He stood silent, expectant, and no doubt agitated by fears of the Divine wrath.

Then upon the lady, who had slowly followed her husband, there flashed this vision of him with the accursed thing in his hand. He stood near the back of the chapel. She approached, and implored him in anxious whispers to come away.

"But the candle?"—and he held it delicately to shelter it from draught.

"Under the seat," was the stern reply.

"Impossible," he urged, as he bent to obey.

"Blow it out!"

He looked at those beside him and before him, all gazing towards the altar, and shaping their lips to prayer. He must have guessed that to them a darkened candle might mean much. He turned his face once more towards the altar, held his candle resolutely, and remained steadfast to the end.

Ending.

Two hundred white caps bobbed and twisted and turned as their wearers peered and whispered together. The wintry twilight struggled into the hall; firelight at both ends played redly on the nearer faces, as it had played long ago from the fires on other hearths, where the children were beside them and the husband tramped in from work. Some were very old, with patient faces, and white hair smoothed under pleated frills. These held their hands under their aprons—perhaps to hide the quivering muscles, for which work, the touch of children, and the clasp of friends were past.

"Are you happy here—comfortable?" an onlooker asked hesitatingly.

The woman looked up, glanced round, and slowly rallied her senses. A look of recollection came into the pale old eyes. The hands sought each other, and twisted nervously.

"Thank you, nothin' to complain on—except—" [she turned a furtive glance at her neighbour on the bench, just now whispering busily into her other neighbour's ear] "'cept for the comp'ny."

An expressive movement of the thumb, a faint shrugging sigh, indicated the oppressive presences.

"Must you sit near them?"

The old eyes quavered slowly round. Every bench was full.

"Stoop, dear," she whispered. "It's the talk"—the voice shook—"so bad!"

"If my old man had a bin 'ere, we might ha' bin to ourselves; but for the widders they must share with"—another look round—"such as her!"

A leering face suddenly turned; a husky voice mocked.

"What's she bin tellin' yer, lady dear? About 'er ole man an' 'er 'ome? Stoop yer 'ed, I can tell yer—a deal more—about my 'ome! Lawks sakes—yes! All together 'ere, same as in 'evin. 'Ere same as 'evin—thanks be!"

The old eyes dropped pathetically; endurance hardened the trembling mouth; the worn-out body shrank together.

Correspondence.

The Omar Cult.

SIR,—I am not a member of the Omar Khayyam Club—perhaps for the reason that, according to FitzGerald, Mrs. Kemble gave for declining to join the Browning Society, "because of her somewhat admiring him"—and I can, therefore, appreciate at their full value the views that you have forcibly and wittily expressed under this heading. But on a question of chronology I think you are wrong: I mean in placing the "slow discovery" after FitzGerald's death. My old friend Bernard Quaritch, whose commercial instincts were as keen as those of any man I ever knew, published a third edition of the Rubāiyāt in 1872, and a fourth in 1879, and these facts presuppose a sale. The cult, like other emotional growths, did not spring into existence in a single day. Its beginnings date from several years before FitzGerald's death. Its first apostle of any note was perhaps Mr. Schütz Wilson, who, in the Contemporary Review for March, 1876, propounded an Omarian theory that has been the groundwork of nearly everything that has since been written about the philosopher-poet.

Mr. Wilson, like Prof. Cowell before him and Mr. Mallock after him, compared Omar with Lucretius, but thought the Roman poet "inferior in depth, in force, in beauty and glory of rhythm." The English translator, and not the Persian poet, is clearly indicated by the last comparison, and on this point Mr. Wilson fell into a confusion which no later exponent of the Rubāiyāt seems able to escape. Closely on Mr. Wilson's footsteps followed a critic in the Spectator (March 11, 1876), who naturally viewed the subject from a moral standpoint. This writer differed from Mr. Wilson on a most material issue. Instead of regarding Omar as "full of that unconscious faith which complains to the Deity of its inability to comprehend the divine," he considered that his poem should "take rank as the poem of Revolt and Denial, the song of speculative Nihilism and cynical sensualism. . . . As for nobleness in any moral sense, it seems to us utterly absent from this fine poem, which, of course, should be judged by a Mohammedan and not by a Christian standard."

The writer sums up by bidding us "turn to this far from pious poetry, the very poetry of revolt and despair, and observe with what majesty the mere infinitude of the panorama is depicted, even on the author's assumption that the whole panorama is an illusion and a snare." These quotations will show that more than seven years before FitzGerald's death the cult and anti-cult of Omar had each its prophet, and that preliminary rumblings of "the sumptuous talk in Vigo-street" caused some commotion long before the Bodley Head was heard of. It would be a great advantage if those who are moved to write about Omar would first of all carefully read FitzGerald's introduction to the poem. FitzGerald takes a perfectly sane view of the comparison which had been made between Omar and Lucretius. As for the Persian, he credits him with perfect honesty both of heart and head. "Having failed (however mistakenly) of finding any Providence but Destiny, and any World but This, he set about making the most of it, preferring rather to soothe the Soul through the Senses into Acquiescence with things as he saw them, than to perplex it with vain disquietude after what they might be." In these words, which could not have been better expressed by Burton or Montaigne, we find the whole philosophy of the Rubāiyāt; and how far they are consistent with charges of "ruffian heterodoxy" or "heathen, hopeless, impotent despair" we must leave to the verdict of posterity. But posterity must remember that FitzGerald did not sit down to write pious poetry, even to please the Spectator; and that nothing was further from his thoughts than to formulate a creed, whether of mournful pessimism or of sensual conviviality. He knew nothing of Omarism, or of the "functions" that are said to belong to it. Begun originally as an exercise in Persian, the translation developed through the medium of a sympathetic mind, until it became a work of art; and as a work of art it stands upon its pedestal in that great hall of unmoral beauty which contains The Ancient Mariner and The Eve of Saint Agnes.—I am, &c., W. F. P.

SIR,—Unless there has been quite too much of the Omar controversy in your columns, you may spare me a little space. It is very clear that the writer of the eminently reasonable article in to-day's Academy on "The Omar Cult" understands the present position of the argument. He is not prepared, nor even inclined, to question my theory that the verses ascribed to Omar belong to the fifteenth century. He admires FitzGerald's poem as a literary work, though he does not accept it as a moral guide. This is a quite intelligible attitude. The writer gives what might be called an academical reception to the Rubāiyāt, just as he probably does to Shelley's "Queen Mab" or "Laon and Cythna," without meaning to put in practice the theories propounded in these poems. But suppose some enthusiasts were to found a "Jeremy Taylor Club," under the delusion that the saintly Jeremy wrote "Queen Mab"; your contributor would naturally object. Such a proposal would provoke inextinguishable laughter; yet it would not be one whit more ludicrous than is the position of the Omar Kháyyám Club, whose members, as I have said, "worship they know not what." Mr. Clement Shorter's main argument in defence of Omarism is positively comical. Because certain good-natured literary men have dined at the Club, it must, therefore, be a superlative institution! Is it the case that every innocent littérateur who has been seduced into wearing the guest's white rose, and drinking the magic wine of Omar, is, therefore, committed to steadfast belief in all the follies and banalities that members of the Club have written, spoken, and even thought? That is a very large order. I agree with you that the Omarite fad has reached the ridiculous stage, and it is time for a new Gibbon to begin the writing of its decline and fall.—I am, &c., A. H. MILLAR.

Dundee: July 21, 1900.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following verses on Omar Khayyám, "witnessing to the surprising fact that in 1875, or thereabouts, Omar served as an inspiration to an obscure young person. The lines were written in 1898 at the beginning of the present inexplicable craze":

TO OMAR KHAYYÁM.

When first I met you, Omar, years ago—
Full twenty years, how little did I know
The strange, delicious daring of your verse
Would win the modern world to praise you so.

Alone we met in those sad distant days
When Fate decreed the solitary ways
My youthful feet should tread; apportioning
A lonely life uncheered by love or praise.

You spoke the secret rancour of my heart,
Your bitter words relieved its angry smart;
You taught how vain the writhing or the tears
Of helpless pawns ordained to play their part.

Not for the roses or the hulling wine
I loved you, Omar, bending at your shrine:
Shallow the wounds, the disenchantment brief
That find in these a lasting anodyne.

But for the bold defiance which you fling
High at the throne of Heaven's almighty King;
Claiming, Prometheus-like, the kindling fire
Of Love's assurance in our hearts to bring.

Not to the coward doth the great God speak,
Not to the mute, the supine, and the weak:
Better defy, like Heine, to the end,
Than feign submission with the so-called meek.

You taught me, Omar, by your mocking cry,
Rather to doubt than to believe a lie;
You stung the dreamer strenuously to seek
Of life's bewilderments the hidden why.

Not all in vain the bitterness for you,
Blindly providing others with the clue
(Yours now as surely) "to the Treasure-House, Aye, and moreover to the Master too."

Race Genius.

SIR,—One is compelled to ask Mr. Kettle if he really understands his author.

He says Mr. Robertson's main thesis is that "race genius is a consequence of geographical position, socio-economic conditions, religious and culture contacts."

Obviously the assumption is that race genius exists, there is such a thing be it the consequence of what it may. But Mr. Robertson, p. 251, says: "The nullity of the conception of race genius has been forced on us at every meeting with it." Again, p. 15: "The theory of national genius will suffice to wreck any exposition however judicious otherwise."

Pages might be filled with extracts having the same bearing. That is to say, Mr. Robertson aims at destroying a theory, and his commentator vows he only means to explain it "as a consequence." This race theory seems to me to have operated as a red rag on the author, and led him into erroneous, or at least exaggerated, conclusions in regard to nearly every country mentioned in the book, but particularly in regard to England. It leads him to the assertion that "nearly every one of the nations"—to wit, Holland, Belgium, Scandinavia, Switzerland, Spain, Turkey—"has a fairer chance of continuance without decline of wealth and power than England."

This is in the nature of prophecy, and prophecy in an introduction to politics is itself a "specific error."

I do not believe that any unbiassed student of history is likely to arrive at any such pessimistic conclusion.—I am, &c., YOUR REVIEWER.

Style in Literature.

SIR,—The discussion which has been lately going on in the ACADEMY about style in literature is interesting, because it is contradictory, some of your correspondents maintaining that style is everything, others that it is nothing, or nearly nothing. May it not be said that when an author's mind is thoroughly penetrated by a certain subject, or when he is engrossed in the story he has to tell, style is almost forgotten, and takes an altogether subsidiary place? In illustration of this, the following remarks of Beaumarchais (quoted in Mendelssohn's Letters) are much to the point. Beaumarchais was censured because he made his personages utter too few fine thoughts, and put too few poetical phrases into their mouths. He answered that this was not his fault. He must confess that, during the whole time he was writing, he was engaged in the most lively conversation with his dramatis personæ; that while seated at his writing-table, he was exclaiming: "Figaro, prends garde, le Comte sait tout"; "Ah, Comtesse, quelle imprudence, vite! sauve toi, petit page!" And then he wrote down the answers—nothing more.

When any writer has dramatic instincts, the style in which he conveys his own thoughts becomes to him much less important than the embodiment of the emotions of the characters that live and move and have their being in his imagination. At least, so it appears to one who is not a stylist.—I am, &c., C. J. HAMILTON.

Gray's Inn-road: July 24, 1900.

New Books Received.

[These notes on some of the New Books of the week are preliminary to Reviews that may follow.]

FULHAM, OLD AND NEW. BY CHARLES JAMES FÈRET.

This work has been expected with much interest by students of London history and topography. It arrives in three massive quarto volumes. Mr. Fèret has overhauled every source of information, old and new. His book is the book of Fulham. It bristles with points, notes, extracts, epitaphs, statistics, photographs. It is immense. (Leadenhall Press. 3 vols. £4 4s.)

FAMINES IN INDIA. BY ROMESH C. DUTT.

The full title of this timely work is Open Letters to Lord Curzon on Famines and Land Assessments in India. Mr. Dutt is an expert, and Lecturer on Indian History at University College, London. His treatment of his subject is, therefore, highly technical and exhaustive. (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.)

In addition to the foregoing, we have received :

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.
Robertson (John M.), Christianity and Mythology	(Watts) net 8 6
POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.
Cornwaile (John), Yvonne	(Burleigh) net 1 6
M.O.W. Rhymes from the Book of Life	(Simpkin, Marshall)
TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.
Dewar (George A. B.), Hampshire, with the Isle of Wight	(Dent) 4 6
Baring-Gould (S.), A Book of Dartmoor	(Methuen) 6 0
Jones (Mary C.), European Travel for Women	(Macmillan) 4 6
Tourist Guide to the Continent	(Great Eastern Railway) 0 6
MISCELLANEOUS.
Hirst (Francis W.), Murray (Gilbert), and Hammond (J. L.), Liberalism and the Empire	(Johnson)
Mason (James), The Principles of Chess	(Horace Cox)
Bayly (A. Eric) and Briscoe (Walt), Chronicles of a Country Cricket Club	(Sands) 2 6
An Active Army Alphabet	(Sand)
NEW EDITION.
Heine (H.), Buch der Lieder	(Dent) net 3 6

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 44 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best sonnet on China. We anticipated (but did not wish it) that many competitors would concentrate their gaze on the horrors of the last few weeks. The higher poetic method was to treat these allusively. In the immense vision which China affords these incidents occupy a small place, and it may be that they will soon be dwarfed by greater events. Therefore, other things being the same, we prefer those sonnets which contemplate China and its destiny as a whole. The following sonnet, contributed by Miss Mary A. Woods, 17, Gower-street, W.C., takes the prize :

CHINA.

Type of the changeless, thou ; yet not of Good,
Whose high immutable is but the chime
Of waves that ceaseless throng the shores of Time,
Conquerors of fate and all vicissitude.
For thee, thy calm is of the enchanted wood
And wizard spell : a trance that—countless years—
Has sealed thy heart to love, thine eyes to tears,
And blasted so thy flower of maidenhood.
Is there no charm to rouse thee save the word
Of impotent hate, whereby thy sleep is stirred
To fevered dreams, not life ? Across that sea
Whose waters, circling all, encircle thee—
The eternal Good—shall not a voice be heard—“Ephphatha ! break thy bonds ! be strong and free !”

Among the best sonnets sent in are the following :

The eyes of many nations turn on thee,
Dark land of sleep ! gauge-point of coursing Time !
For thou art dormant while towards their prime
The younger peoples, better-nursed and free,
With swift steps move. They shape thy destiny,
Assail thy borders, bid thee wake and climb ;
Or ring thy knell with loud, world-echo'd chime—
Either to be renew'd or cease to be.
But in the womb of chance what mischance lies,
For thou art cruel in thy strength of sleep
Inert as death ; yet in this seeming death
Mayhap are hidden menace and surprise,
To those who venture on an unknown deep
And call up storms with one united breath.

[A. E. W., Inverness.]

China ! the land of mild-eyed mandarins,
Of fearsome dragon-fans and colours gay ;
A land where nature riotous deth play
With blaze of colour and with changeful scenes ;
A land that seemed to throng with kindly folk,
Too simple for their Western brothers' guile
To find a hold—and yet a folk as vile
As ere broke out when age-long pride awoke :
Awoke, to drive to torture and to slay
Their kindly teachers—helpless children—all
Who came to help them from their helpless way.
Cowards and treacherous—many a man shall fall
Ere yet atonement hath been made for sin,
The awful deed of slaughter on our kin.

[D. G.-W., Yorks.]

Rooted in unrevealed antiquity,
How passing strange her history doth seem,
Strange with the disproportions of a dream
That wanders in unfettered fantasy.
Yet ever through the vast monotony,
Its source unknown, floweth a silent stream,
Bright with art's subtle, yet abiding gleam,
And fraught with fair industrial prophecy.

Her will was ever this, “Let me alone,”

As through the ages, in unvarying way,

She moved and circled—“Leave me to my own,”

Scornful of any other lore or sway,

Worship of old her thralldom and her throne,

Self-schooled, self-centred ; as of old—Cathay.

[I. S., Brighton.]

The East is cruel, and the East is old—

She lives on memory—the angel Hope,

Inspirer of the world, has there no scope

To breathe. In far Cathay men's hearts are cold :

Like soulless ants they labour, but the end

Of work is nought but endless ants to feed

That these in turn fresh myriad swarms may breed :

Toil in the dark doth aye to madness tend.

Build boats, oh, Baltic—scourge that Yellow Sea !

Blow, western wind of hope—sweep off this pall !

Let every freeman set a captive free !

Crusaders, Eastward Ho ! from God the call,

And ever in the van shall England be :

The house is raised on sand—the house shall fall !

[T. C., Buxted.]

First-born of Time ! what old barbaric lust

Glitters in those slant eyes, age-deep and blind ?

What dotard dreams infect thine ancient mind,

Purpling with sudden red the hoary dust ?

Thy wildered traitor limbs abjure their trust ;

Vain grope for realms celestial—realms re-ign'd

And forfeit for fell deed against mankind !

More strict than Roman father, Time is just.

What shall avail, though guilt be unconfessed !

An outraged world is panting at thy gates :

Hark to the war-god in the wrathful West !

List to the muttering voice of vengeful Fates !

Ancestral bones lie in dishonoured rest,

And, at the Tribune, stern Confucius waits.

[E. E., Hornsey.]

What ! when across the affrighted Eastern sea

Drive sounds of rapine, and far cries forlorn

Of English maidens doomed, of infants torn

From mothers dragged to nameless butchery—

Shall China be the theme for you and me ?

Shall each competitor his futile horn

Blow emulous, nor turn in sickened scorn

From blood-stained pretexes for that guinea fee ?

Yet Virgil wrote : “Sunt rerum lacryme ; Mentem mortalia tangunt.” Even we

Can weep, if not with those heroic tears

The poets use, the articulate tears which teach

The avenging host to swarm the shot-swept breach

Exacting vengeance for all Europe's fears.

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

Other sonnets received from : G. H. E., Ayr ; A. W., London ; E. C. P., London ; N. A., West Bromwich ; G. E. P., London ; C. K., Eccles ; A. M. P., London ; T. W. C., London ; F. M., London ; T. B. D., Bridgwater ; E. C. M. D., Crediton ; L. M. L., Stafford ; L. L., Ramsgate ; A. W. E., Leyton ; K. E. T., Bristol ; F. W. S., London ; L. M. S., London ; W. E. F., Southsea ; E. B., Liverpool ; F. E. W., London ; Miss T., Bristol ; P. B. D., Blackheath ; M. K., Cheltenham ; E. E. A., Mansfield.

Competition No. 45 (New Series).

In a letter to W. F. Pollock, Edward FitzGerald wrote : “Talking one day about different Quotations which get abroad without people always knowing whence they are derived, I could have sworn that I remember Sprig Rice mentioning one that he himself had invented, and had been amused at seeing quoted here and there—

“Coldly correct and critically dull.”

FitzGerald found reason to doubt whether his friend had really invented this. But we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best original invented poetic quotation which, if printed, would be likely to be quoted “here and there.” It should not exceed four lines, and need not exceed one.

RULES

Answers, addressed “Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.,” must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, July 31. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

CATALOGUES.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 2 may be had on application,
price 2s. 6d., at

1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

15th and 16th CENTURY BOOKS; AMERICANA;
85 LOST or UNKNOWN BOOKS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss Messer, 18, Mortimer Crescent,
N.W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 43, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., London;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post
free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.

Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.

LAST WEEK.

The EXHIBITION will CLOSE on the EVENING of MONDAY, AUGUST 6th.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.—
EVENING EXHIBITION.—The EXHIBITION will be OPEN in the EVENING from MONDAY, JULY 30th, to MONDAY, AUGUST 6th (Bank Holiday), from 3.30 to 10.30.
Admission, 6d. Catalogue, 6d.—ON BANK HOLIDAY the admission throughout the day will be 6d.; on other days it will be as usual.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—
FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.—ASSISTANT in the MUSEUM of SCIENCE and ART, EDINBURGH (Industrial Branch) (1824), 10th AUGUST.
The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission,
London, S.W.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—
FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN
in the HYDROGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the AD-MIRALTY (17-25), 6th SEPTEMBER.
The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission,
London, S.W.

J. G. CHANCELLOR, M.A. (1st Class, Classical Tripos), late Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, PREPARES PUPILS for the UNIVERSITIES and
all Preliminary Examinations, at his Residence, Cross Deep, Twickenham, Middlesex, a fine old house beautifully and healthily situated on the Thames.

SUPERIOR SCHOOLS for GIRLS.—Miss
LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND High-class
BOARDING and DAY SCHOOLS in England and on the Continent.—CENTRAL REGISTRY FOR TEACHERS, 25, Craven
Street, Charing Cross.

CHÂLET CAUDE COTE, DIEPPE.—An English lady RECEIVES EIGHT GIRLS of 16 and upwards to her Châlet near Dieppe. Conversational French rapidly acquired. Special facilities for Music, Sketching,
German. Opportunities for every form of healthy enjoyment.
Direct Service twice daily with England.—Full details will be supplied on applying to Miss CURRIE, Dieppe.

NOW READY.

In Three stately Quarto Volumes, with Maps.

FULHAM OLD AND NEW:

Being an Exhaustive History of the Ancient Parish of Fulham.

PROFESSLY ILLUSTRATED.

By CHAS. JAS. FERET, F.R.G.S., F.R. Hist. Soc.
LONDON: THE LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall
Street, E.C. Three Guineas.

A few copies are reserved in sheets, and can be had interleaved for manuscript additions bound in cloth at £4 4s.

MR. SPENCER'S REVISED WORK.

Now Ready, price 16s., with Portrait, the Finally Revised Edition of

FIRST PRINCIPLES.

BY

HERBERT SPENCER.

London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., W.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S
LIST.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

In cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d. each.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE MARRIED
MISS BINKS,

By the Author of "The Truth Tellers," "The Biaks Family."

A LETTA:

A Tale of the Boer Invasion.

By BERTRAM MITFORD,

Author of "The Ruby Sword," "The Induna's Wife," &c., &c.

The Literary World says: "A really interesting story."

The Daily Express says: "Full of interest and remarkably well told."

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Excellent descriptions of the War and of Boer life in various phases."

New Six-Shilling Novels.

AN EYE for an EYE: a Mystery.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX, Author of "Wiles of the Wicked."

THE SHIELD of his HONOUR.

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE, Author of
"My Official Wife," &c.

TOWN LADY and COUNTRY

LASS. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of
"The House on the Marsh."

THE FOOTFALL of FATE. By

Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL, Author of "George Geith," &c.

THE VANISHING of TERA. By

FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c.

THE FLICK of FORTUNE. By

THOMAS PARKES.

London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., W.C. F. V. WHITE & Co., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, Illustrated

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J.
PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING.
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR,

LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

"This new novel by 'John Oliver Hobbes' is a triumph of intellectual creativeness, and it has held me captive from cover to cover."—G. K. S., in The Sphere.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

6s.

(In Unwin's Green Cloth Library.)

6s.

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME EARLY REVIEWS:—

"This brilliant novel is written with a distinction unfamiliar in contemporary fiction."—Spectator.

"A book that everyone will talk of."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mrs. Craigie's characters—even the most introspective—are, however, so well drawn that it is difficult to have too much of them."—Daily News.

"A piece of writing that shows a very adroit mastery of many elements."—Athenæum.

"The bold experiment again succeeds, and its success is a thing on which Mrs. Craigie may be especially congratulated."—Globe.

"'Robert Orange' is a remarkable book."—Standard.

"Its comedy is alive with the brilliant, half-cynical observation of character."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Almost a remarkable, as it is certainly a most conscientious, study in emotion."—Westminster Gazette.

"There is no possibility of considering this remarkable book in any other light than as the complement of the equally remarkable book which preceded it. It is, probably, one of the most subtle essays on man ever written by a woman."—The World.

"The average novel reader may jib at certain pages of 'Robert Orange,' but the whole book is an interesting and powerful piece of work by a lady novelist possessing a rare individuality."—Anglian Daily Times.

"'Robert Orange' is in the air, and it is impossible to get away from it. Moreover, not to have read it is to confess to being 'out of the movement.'"—Daily Express.

"A notable achievement in literary art.... It is a most interesting story, and it is interesting, not so much for anything the characters of it do, or even say, but for the characters themselves, and for what they feel, for the emotional, the inner life of them.... The one demand we have a right to make of a novelist is that he shall interest us. That John Oliver Hobbes has done, and done thoroughly."—Sunday Special.

"A most entertaining book.... There is no novelist living, except George Meredith, who can equal Mrs. Craigie in the power of making striking and interesting personalities live in their work."—Speaker.

"Rarely can it be said of the sequel of a novel that it equals, much less surpasses, its predecessor, but such a compliment is certainly due to 'Robert Orange,' the new romance in which 'John Oliver Hobbes' continues the history of the hero already familiar to readers of 'The School for Saints.'"—Echo.

"Light the book is, with never a thought of levity; 'smart,' if that is to be the word, with no hint of either vanity or vulgarity, with no strain after paradox, no paltering with truth. To say of people that they are very good is often tantamount to saying of them that they are very dull. That, no doubt, is because we live in an imperfect world. This book, at any rate, gives no quarter to such a reproach. It is the work of one whose wit is as alert as her orthodoxy is openly declared."—Tablet.

"'The School for Saints' was good, but 'Robert Orange' (Fisher Unwin), unlike most sequels, is better."—Star.

"'Robert Orange' is a sequel to 'The School for Saints,' and a worthy sequel; but it may be read very well, by a slight exercise of the imagination in the concluding chapters, as a single production, and, so read, it will produce an abiding impression on any thoughtful mind.... 'Robert Orange' is an eminently religious book, but it is conspicuously bright also; it is political, but it is also witty; it is philosophical, but it is also shrewd; it is an artistic collection of character studies, but they are all human, and nearly all of individual and original type. But it has action also; in its many love stories run their troubled course simultaneously."—Country Life.

"Perhaps 'Robert Orange' may best be classed as being worthy to be placed among those works that we keep, not those that we send back to the lending library; and for such there is always room."—Sunday Times.

"The great quality of this book, however, as that of most of Mrs. Craigie's other books, is that, whether in romance or comedy or analysis of character, it is always the opposite of the commonplace—not with the cheap effects of paradox, but because the author has an eye for colour and for contrasts, and a spontaneous brilliancy of expression. One is so weary of laborious contrivances of adventure, of conventional pictures of 'Society'—the members of which are supposed to spend all their time in restaurants making vapid repartees—of superficial and happy-go-lucky psychology. Or one would be weary if one read them. Mrs. Craigie's books are stimulating, provocative, always distinguished, and always interesting. And this one is, I think, the best of them."—G. S. STREET, in The Londoner.

"It will be appreciated by those who recognise the beauty and literary charm of Mrs. Craigie's work.... It is a book to read, and cannot fail to add greatly to Mrs. Craigie's reputation as a writer of exceptional ability."—Christian World.

"Its literary accomplishment is remarkable; and the book, showing its author at her best, cannot fail to be widely and eagerly read."—Scotsman.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 5s.

LANDSCAPE PAINTING IN WATER-COLOUR.

By JOHN MACWHIRTER, R.A.

With an Introduction by EDWIN BALE, R.I.

With 23 Coloured Plates.

"With the sketches to refer to, Mr. MacWhirter's precepts and hints, based upon long and varied practice, will be completely intelligible to the veriest beginner, and the student who follows his directions will find that many apparently formidable difficulties can be easily surmounted."—67 he.

BOOKS for HOLIDAY READING

By R. L. STEVENSON.

Library Edition, 6s. each;
Pocket Edition, 3s. 6d. each.

TREASURE ISLAND.
KIDNAPPED.
CATRIONA.
THE MASTER of BALLANTRAE.
THE "WRECKER." By R. L. STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE.
ISLAND NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS. (2s. 6d.)
THE BLACK ARROW.

WORKS by Q. (A. T. Quiller-Couch.)

THE SHIP & STARS. 6s.
WANDERING HEATH. 7s.
DEAD MAN'S ROCK. 7s.
"I SAW THREE SHIPS." 5s.
NOUGHTS & CROSSES. 5s.
THE SPLENDID PUR. 5s.
THE BLUE PAVILIONS. 7s.
THE ASTONISHING HISTORY of TROY TOWN. 7s.
THE DELICATE DUCHY. 7s.
LA. A Life Story. 5s. 6d.

By FRANK STOCKTON.

THE VIZIER of the TWO-HORNED ALEXANDER. 6s. Illustrated.
THE KING of OBERURST. 6s.
MAG. 6s. 6d.
THE ADVENTURES of CAPTAIN HORN. 3s. 6d.
MAG. 3s. 6d.

By J. M. BARRIE.

THE LITTLE PRINCE. 6s.
THE LITTLE PRINCE. 6s.

By STANLEY WEYMAN.

THE WINDMILL. 6s.
THE WINDMILL. 6s.
THE WINDMILL. 6s.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

THE WINDMILL. 6s.
THE WINDMILL. 6s.
THE WINDMILL. 6s.

By RIDER HAGGARD.

KING SOLOMON'S MINES. 6s.

By ANTHONY HOPE.

FATHER STAFFORD. 6s.

By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.

THE WINDMILL. 6s.

SIXPENNY EDITIONS

OF

CELEBRATED NOVELS.

READY SHORTLY.

FATHER STAFFORD.

By ANTHONY HOPE.

VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED.

By R. L. STEVENSON.

THE BLACK ARROW.
TREASURE ISLAND.
THE MASTER of BALLANTRAE.
CATRIONA.
KIDNAPPED.

By R. L. STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE.

THE WRECKER.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH (Q.).

DEAD MAN'S ROCK.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

THE IMPREGNABLE CITY.
THE IRON PIRATE.

By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

LIST YE LANDSMEN!
WHAT CHEER!

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

KING SOLOMON'S MINES.

1s. 6d. each.

NEW VOLUMES.

NOW READY, a CHEAP EDITION, price 6s., with a NEW PREFACE by the AUTHOR, of

THE NEW FAR EAST. By Arthur DIOXY, F.R.G.S., Vice-Chairman of Council of the Japan Society, London.

"A few copies of the Original Edition, price 16s., can still be obtained."

JUST PUBLISHED, price 7s. 6d.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS. By H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS.

"Personal Recollections" is a volume which one reads at a sitting and wants to read again.—Outlook.

NOW READY, price 5s.

CASSELL'S MAGAZINE HALF-YEARLY VOLUME. Contains a Complete Novel, by R. W. CHAMBERS, entitled "A Gay Conspiracy," Stories by Leading Writers, Fiction, Trivial Articles, &c. Profusely Illustrated.

NOW READY, boards, price 3s. 6d.; cloth, 5s.

LITTLE FOLKS MIDSUMMER VOLUME. With several Coloured Plates, numerous Pictures in Colour, complete Stories, &c.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED. JUST READY, price 1s. 6d.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

PICTORIAL PRACTICAL GARDENING. A Useful Manual for all Classes of Horticulturists. Giving Concise Directions for the Culture and Selection of the Leading Flowers, Fruit and Vegetables. By WALTER B. WRIGHT. With upwards of 100 Illustrations.

INDISPENSABLE GUIDES.

Paper covers, 1s. 6d.; cloth, 1s.

CASSELL'S GUIDE to PARIS. Profusely Illustrated. With Plans and Guide to the Exhibition.

"The contents offer a complete and accurate information. This illustrated handbook is recommended."—Morning Post.

Paper covers, 6d.; cloth, 1s.

CASSELL'S PICTORIAL GUIDE to the CLYDE. Illustrated in 100 plates and containing 100 Coloured Plates and 100 Maps.

"We know of no better popular guide."—Morning Herald.

Paper covers, 1s. 6d.; cloth, 1s.

THE GOVERNOR'S GUIDE to WINDSOR CASTLE. By the DUKE of ARGYLL. Illustrated.

"It is full of interesting details, and is well illustrated, being pretty and cheap."—British Weekly.

Paper covers, 1s. 6d.; cloth, 1s.

The OFFICIAL GUIDE to the GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY. New and Revised Edition. Illustrated on nearly every page. Maps, &c.

READY IN A FEW DAYS, price 1s.

NOTES ON THE WALLACE COLLECTION.

By M. H. SPIELMANN.

With numerous Illustrations.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Limited, London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1474. Established 1869.

4 August, 1900.

Price Threepence

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

UNDETERRED by the lack of public interest in war books, Mr. Winston Churchill is preparing another for the autumn. It will be called Ian Hamilton's March: being Letters Reprinted from the "Morning Post," with Some Unpublished Letters.

WE cannot bring ourselves to admire the flamboyant style of the war correspondence with which Mr. A. G. Hales is startling the readers of the Daily News, and of other papers too; for Mr. Hales's articles are being widely quoted. He has quick eyes, a picturesque pen, a reach-me-down command of sentiment, brimming enthusiasm, and a lack of reserve that is not without its charm. Mr. Hales is certainly readable, but we cannot commend his style. He can write a sentence like this, and then not erase it: "He is as full of anecdote as heaven is full of angels, and I mean to use him in the sweet days of peace."

BEFORE the first number of the Badminton Magazine was published, in August, 1895, the editor, Mr. Alfred E. T. Watson, received from Major R. S. S. Baden-Powell the offer of an article on "Pig-Sticking." The offer was accepted, other contributions followed, and when the defence of Mafeking made the author's name the most popular in the country, Mr. Watson cabled to Mafeking for permission to collect the articles and publish them in a book. After a long wait, assent came from Major-General Baden-Powell, from Rustenburg, in the single word—"Yes"! That is well; but what is not well is the way the book is ornamented. Every page is enclosed by a hideous and meaningless green frame that dazzles the eye, and makes reading an effort. So pleased is the publisher with the border that he dumps it down on the advertisement pages, and even on those that are blank. We sincerely hope this is not a new fashion in book-making.

THE late Lord Tennyson would have been surprised to learn that, in the autumn of the year 1900, his life would form one of the "Saintly Lives Series." The task is Dr. Horton's.

THOSE who know the inner history of Mr. Joseph Conrad's Lord Jim will be amused at the announcement in the Westminster Gazette that the first instalment appears in Blackwood's for August. We understand that this story was originally intended to be a short one; but Mr. Conrad became so interested in his own creation that he asked to be allowed to develop it. Hence, month after month, Lord Jim's fortunes have gone on expanding, and they are still "To be continued."

MRS. CRAIGIE is under contract to write a long serial for Harper's Magazine. Of the first edition of Robert Orange 10,000 copies were printed, of the first sixpenny edition of The School for Saints 30,000 were printed. New editions of both books are in preparation.

THE result of the Daily News plebiscite as to which are the best pictures of the year at the Royal Academy shows that the shilling picture public is still faithful to Mr. Dicksee and Mr. Leader. The popular taste improves slowly—very slowly. "The Two Crowns" is "the best picture of all," and the "best landscape" is still by Mr. Leader. Among the prize-winners we notice the names of Mr. Harry Quilter, the daughter of an Academician, and the son and daughter of a distinguished caricaturist. 1,094 replies were sent in.

	NAME OF PICTURE.	NAMES OF ARTIST.
The Best Picture of All	The Two Crowns ...	Frank Dicksee, R.A.
The Best Subject Picture	Trial of Queen Katherine	E. A. Abbey, R.A.
The Best Portrait ..	Lord Russell of Killowen	J. S. Sargent, R.A.
The Best Landscape	Hill, Vale, and Stream	B. W. Leader, R.A.
The Best Sea Picture	Ocean's Surge	Peter Graham, R.A.
The Best Animal Picture	Horses Bathing in the Sea	Miss F. Kemp-Welch.
The Best Water Colour	Isola San Giuliano	Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A.
The Best Piece of Sculpture	Tomb of Lord Leighton	Thomas Brock, R.A.
The Picture You would Like Best to Live With	Gold Fish	Sir L. Alma-Tadema, R.A.
The Picture with Most Heart in it	The Sale of Old Dobbin	J. R. Reid.
The Prettiest Face...	Miss Evelyn Oules	H. T. Wells, R.A.
The Best-Looking Man	Lord Kitchener ...	A. S. Cope, A.R.A.
The Nicest Baby ..	La Vierge Aux Lys	W. A. Bouguereau.
The Prettiest Dress	Mrs. Murray Guthrie	Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A.

WE take the following from the British Weekly: "Mr. Alfred Harmsworth tells his friends that he has another big journalistic venture on the tapis. Without being too rash, I may venture to guess that Mr. Harmsworth thinks of a great illustrated weekly newspaper on fresh lines."

IT is said that Mr. Henry Newbolt will edit a new monthly, to be published by Mr. John Murray, under the title of the Review of the Month.

IN the next number of the Anglo-Saxon Review Mr. Andrew Lang will write on "Secresses."

WHAT were the books that most influenced Robert Louis Stevenson in his most impressionable years? Stevenson has left us in no doubt on the point, and the early article in which he made his literary confession now reaches us as a comely little paper booklet, issued by Messrs. Mansfield, of New York. In it Stevenson begins by saying that "the course of our education is answered best by those poems and romances where we breathe a magnanimous atmosphere of thought and meet generous and pious characters. Among these Shakespeare has served me best." After Shakespeare comes Dumas, as his genius was embodied in the character of D'Artagnan—"the elderly D'Artagnan of the Vicomte de Bragelonne." I know not a more human soul, nor, in his way, a finer." Thirdly, the Pilgrim's Progress. Among didactic books, the Essays of Montaigne and the New Testament came next in order of time, particularly the Gospel of Matthew. Walt Whitman followed, and Goethe's Life, by Lewes.

I know no one whom I less admire than Goethe; he seems a very epitome of the sins of genius, breaking open the doors of private life, and wantonly wounding friends, in that crowning offence of "Werther," and in his own character a mere pen-and-ink Napoleon, conscious of the rights and duties of superior talents as a Spanish inquisitor was conscious of the rights and duties of his office. And yet in his fine devotion to his art, in his honest and serviceable friendship for Schiller, what lessons are contained!

Marcus Aurelius and Wordsworth come next. Then—

I should never forgive myself if I forgot The Egoist. It is art, if you like, but it belongs purely to didactic art, and from all the novels I have read (and I have read thousands) stands in a place by itself. Here is a Nathan for the modern David. . . . The Egoist is a satire; so much must be allowed; but it is a satire of a singular quality, which tells you nothing of that obvious mote which is engaged from first to last with that invisible beam. It is yourself that is hunted down; these are your own faults that are dragged into the day and numbered, with lingering relish, with cruel cunning and precision.

Lastly, gathering up less remembered masters, Stevenson remarks that Hazlitt's paper "On the Spirit of Obligations" was a turning-point in his life, and that in Mitford's Tales of Old Japan he learned, "for the first time, the proper attitude of any rational man to his country's laws—a secret found, and kept, in the Asiatic islands." We must not omit to mention Stevenson's warm tribute to Herbert Spencer as a wholesome and bracing writer, whose works are informed with a certain "highly abstract joy." "I should be much of a hound if I lost my gratitude to Herbert Spencer."

In the summer number of the Argosy Mr. Andrew Lang writes characteristically about the late Mr. Grant Allen. "Mr. Allen," he says, "was not a novel-reader; I doubt if most novelists do read novels. Scott, Thackeray, Mr. Stevenson were greedy and multifarious readers of romance, so are most judges; but the mass of novelists do not read their contemporaries or predecessors. In this indifference, then, Mr. Allen was not a paradoxical exception." Mr. Lang puts his criticism of The Woman Who Did thus:

The gospel is one-sided. . . . Mr. Allen never wrote a novel on the following lines. A (male) marries B, a pretty, stupid lass. In a year or two A finds B out; tires of her, meets C. A high sense of morality urges A to desert B (who has grown stout, or is in bad health), and to elope with C. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. The higher morality ought to be applied all round. But Mr. Allen never, for some reason, wrote a novel to preach this part of the new creed. The fact is, that, even if custom sanctioned the system of non-mariage, a gentleman would not take advantage of custom; would not break the heart of a woman who had given to him her love and her youth. Of course the thing is done, but he who does it is—"What you call a sinner; what I call a sweep," as Mr. Stevenson's hero says to the missionary.

NEWCASTLE HOUSE, the fine old mansion in the north-west corner of Lincoln's Inn Fields, which has just been sold, is not altogether without literary associations. Doubtless it was from his library in this house that the Duke of Newcastle lent the MS. of the Spence anecdotes to Dr. Johnson to aid him in compiling his Lives of the Poets. A good story of the house, non-literary in itself, is told by Hawkins in his Life of Johnson which someone has recently suggested should be reprinted. It set forth that Sir Thomas Robinson, a great tuft-hunter, used to annoy the household by his frequent calls. When told that the Duke was out he would ask to be allowed to look at the clock, or to play with a monkey that was kept in the hall, in the hope of snatching an interview with his Grace. At last he wore out the patience of the Duke and his servants to such an extent that a rebuff was arranged. When Sir Thomas next called the servant, without giving him time to open his lips, shut the door, saying: "Sir, his Grace is gone out, the clock stands, and the monkey is dead." Newcastle House became at a later date the home of the S.P.C.K. before the removal of that body to Northumberland-avenue.

It was not to be expected that the amateur statician would wait for the completion of the Oxford English Dictionary before dealing with its noble dimensions. One student has already produced a mass of figures which leave on the mind a generally useful impression of the vastness of Dr. Murray's work. Taking the volumes from the first down to the word Infer, but excluding those from Graded to the end G (all of which are not published), the statician finds that there have already appeared 16,516 columns, 10 $\frac{1}{8}$ inches long. If these columns, each 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, were set on end the type would extend for upwards of 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles—4,645 yards, or say

Nearly four times as high as Snowdon.

Only 602 yards short of the height of Mont Blanc.

Over 38 times as high as to the top of the Cross on St. Paul's Cathedral.

Nearly 69 times the height of the Monument.

More than 14 times as high as the Eiffel Tower.

Upwards of 15 times the length of London Bridge.

Almost 100 times round the dome of the reading-room of the British Museum.

It is also calculated that the Dictionary already contains more than seventy million letters, and more than twelve million words; while for a penny the purchaser receives 1 yard, 1 foot, and 8 inches of erudition 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide. We take these facts from Mr. Henry Frowde's excellent little publication, The Periodical. Do we confess a damaging ignorance when we ask for the source of the Periodical's motto?

A jollie good book, whereon to looke,
Is better to me than golde.

A WRITER in the July Edinburgh Review weighs with considerable judgment the merits of the three women writers whose works are just now the delight of the normal British reader—Miss Corelli, Miss Fowler, and Miss Cholmondeley. His judgment on Miss Corelli is as severe as it is casual:

It is impossible in an essay of this kind to omit at least so much reference to her as is contained in saying that her work is entirely undeserving of any consideration.

On Miss Fowler the vials of criticism are emptied with a more reluctant hand:

We cannot take her picture of society seriously; she knows not enough of life or of the world. But she is witty, she is shrewd, and she may live to be more discriminating in her selection of epigrams; and if she is wise she will return to the genuine sources of her talent. By far the best thing in her books is the study of Martha, the old servant in the Seaton household—a character who gives her creator fair claim to rank not merely as a wit, but as a humorist. It is a depressing circumstance that Miss Fowler's books have certainly not improved as they went on—in this respect or in any other.

Miss Cholmondeley receives a cold blessing:

Her work has a fine intellectual distinction, and, as we have shown, unusual constructive power, yet somehow one cannot look forward confidently to any such advance as would give her a permanent place in literature. Still we recognise gratefully that her books are not only pleasant to read, but are likely to exercise a salutary influence on morals and manners, for they are written by a woman who is evidently in touch, socially and intellectually, with the best culture of the day. Her philosophy of conduct and opinion is not paraded in detached passages, but it underlies the whole texture of her work, and there is nothing cheap or secondhand about it; such as it is, it is genuinely assimilated.

THE readers of Moonshine have decided between them that the ideal ten books for reading during a five years' sojourn on a desert island are these:

Shakespeare.
The Bible.
Pickwick Papers.
Tennyson.
Vanity Fair.
Robinson Crusoe.
Pilgrim's Progress.
David Copperfield.
Lamb's Essays.
Milton.

We confess that the list does not appeal to us. The books named would be equally ideal, or un-ideal, for a five years' sojourn in Bloomsbury apartments.

In the National Review Mr. Leslie Stephen suggests that Walter Bagehot has not yet received his due of fame. The interest of the article is, however, not so literary as it might have been. Mr. Stephen, confessedly, hardly deals with Bagehot as a critic; but from a page or so on this subject we cull a few general remarks:

Bagehot's criticisms [says Mr. Stephen] have, above all things, the essential merits of freshness and sincerity. If he has not the special knowledge, he is absolutely free from the pedantry, of the literary expert. He has none of the cant of criticism, and never bores us with "romantic and classical" or "objective and subjective." When he wants a general theory—as he always does—he strikes one out in the heat of the moment. He has almost a trick—as I have hinted—of dividing all writers into two classes: philosophers are either "seers" or "gropers"; novelists are "miscellaneous" or "sentimental"; genius is symmetrical or irregular, and so forth. Such classifications will not always bear reflection: they only give emphasis to a particular aspect; but they show how his mind is always swarming with theories, and how he looks upon literature as a man primarily interested in the wider problems of life and character which literature reflects.

In the same review, a writer signing himself "An Englishman" writes very disturbing things about our readiness to meet an invasion. His article is suggestively entitled "Having Eyes They See Not." The whole article is one of bitter protest; and we are interested to see that the writer, whose own powers of expression are not meagre, calls in the aid of Matthew Arnold, making words which he wrote many years ago live and quiver in the light of a present crisis. Arnold's warning was as follows:

You may get involved in war, and you imagine that you cannot but make war well by dint of being so very rich; that you will just add a penny or two to your income-tax, change none of your ways, have clap-trap everywhere, as at present, unrestricted independence, legions of newspaper correspondents, boundless publicity; and thus, at a grand high pressure of expenditure, bustle, and excitement, arrive at a happy and triumphant result. But authority and victory over people who are in earnest means being in earnest oneself, and your Philistines are not in earnest; they have no idea great enough to make them so. They want to be important and authoritative; . . . they want to drive a roaring trade; they want to know and criticise all that is being done; they want no restrictions on their personal liberty, no interference with their usual way of going on; they want all these incompatible things equally and at once, because they have no idea deep and strong enough to subordinate everything else to itself.

It is odd to think how an English boy and girl, who has free access to books, and loves reading, may grow up with the vaguest ideas about the material construction of a book and its literary anatomy. In America this danger is now foreseen, and at least one great public library gives simple instruction such as, one sees at a glance, must produce excellent results. The method is described as follows:

The children are shown a title-page and told the meaning of the imprint, publisher's name, place and date of publication. Turning the page, they are shown the copyright entry, and are told its meaning, how long copyright lasts, why the date of copyright is different from and more important than the date on the title-page; and finally are reminded of the clause of the Constitution authorising Congress to grant copyright. Proceeding, the value of preface or introduction is suggested, the difference between a table of contents and an index is described, and how and when to use each. Finally, the chief steps in the manufacture of a book are detailed. The sheets of paper are exhibited as first printed, and are then folded into signatures; the manner in which signatures are sewn on the bands is indicated, and the way the back is rounded, the covers laced on, sided up, and backed. Each step is illustrated by books in different stages of binding; and as the process is explained it is carefully demonstrated how careless treatment injures the books. We are confident that more careful handling of the books has resulted already from the children's having gained an intelligent comprehension of how the book is made, why shutting a pencil in it starts the bands, or opening it improperly breaks the back.

All this is imparted in one simple lecture. In a second lecture more advanced pupils are taught the use of reference books of all kinds, and a third lecture deals with more advanced reference books, catalogues, &c. The idea seems to be excellent.

In a note on Mr. Charles Fèret's Fulham, Old and New last week we gave the price of this work as four guineas. That is the price of specially interleaved copies; the price of the work in its ordinary form is three guineas. We are glad to hear that there is an interleaved edition—an excellent idea.

THOSE who are writing for posterity may like to hear of Higgins's Eternal Ink, advertised in American literary papers. We are told that "the seven stomachs of a camel, not to speak of its long and thirsty neck, never wished for the oasis spring more than cultured man has for a true black writing ink." Possibly, but we know some very cultured writers who never use ink at all. They descant on the advantages of a lead pencil.

UNLIKE an American writer to whom we referred last week, Mr. William Archer does not find a Whitmanesque delight in the musical comedies of the day. In the July New York Critic he writes concerning these plays:

I have no sympathy with Mr. Sheldon's total boycotting of the theatre. But if he had gone manfully into the temple of art and tried to scourge from it the dealers in patently noxious wares—rancid vulgarity and leering uncleanness—he would have earned my heartiest applause. . . . Vulgar entertainments there will always be so long as there are people of vulgar tastes to be catered for. But their popularity, in England at any rate, would be much less overwhelming if people of culture and refinement did not affect and even parade in regard to the theatre a vulgarity of taste which they would blush to own in regard to any other department of art or of life.

In conclusion, Mr. Archer says:

We must draw a clearer line between what is reputable and what is disreputable in the work of the stage before we can blame our Puritan assailants for not recognising the distinction. I do not myself think the Puritan ideal of life a practicable one, and am far from desiring that the stage should ever conform to it; but that is no reason why I should stand by unprotesting, and see a beautiful art soiled by brainless prurieny and reckless license. It was a dramatist (and assuredly no Puritan) who wrote—

The best of men
That e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer;
A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit—
The first true gentleman that ever breathed.

In His quality as a gentleman, if in no other, the Authority whom Mr. Sheldon invokes would assuredly find much to pain and disgust Him in the theatre of to-day. Why should not we so far follow "In His Steps" as to try, even in the theatre, to think and feel like gentlemen?

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW have just issued a capital two-shilling pocket edition of Lorna Doone on very thin paper, similar to India paper. The neat red cover suits the book well. Arrangements for this edition were made with Mr. Blackmore only a week or two before his death.

A SIXPENNY edition of Dean Farrar's school story, St. Winifred's, is issued by Messrs. Black. Originally published anonymously in 1861 the story was reprinted with its author's name in 1865. It has since enjoyed more than twenty editions.

WE do not know how many editions have been published of the Imitatio Christi in English; but the number must be very great, and the copies of the book sold of course run to hundreds of thousands. It is curious that it is still left for the Clarendon Press to announce an absolutely faithful translation from the Latin, in which no word will be altered in the interests of any party. At last we are to have the Imitation as it is.

Bibliographical.

WE are promised for the autumn an illustrated edition of the Essays of Elia. This, of course, is no new thing. So long ago as 1884 (to go no further back) an edition with "illuminations" was published in quarto by a Scotch firm. Two years later came an edition, published by Low & Co., for which L. O. Murray did the illustrative drawings. Seven years ago there was an edition by Putnam & Co., for which R. S. Gifford did some etchings. And last year we had Mr. Dent's dainty edition, with drawings by Mr. C. E. Brock. But an illustrated Elia! How many Lambites would it satisfy? An original writer can be truly "illustrated" only by his equal in sympathy and insight. A number of draughtsmen may tackle him pretty safely at certain points, but can any one draughtsman tackle him in all? I doubt it. Did any one artist succeed in doing anything like justice to Dante, or Shakespeare, or Milton? I doubt the power of any one artist to do anything like justice to Lamb.

There ought to be room for the "little biography" of Savonarola of which announcement is made by Messrs. Methuen. Of course we have the Life and Times of Savonarola, by Pasquale Villari, published in English so long ago as 1888, and reproduced in a cheap edition so recently as 1896. There is also an American biography of the great monk, circulated in England in 1890, to say nothing of short memoirs published in London in 1881, 1882, and 1895. These last, however, hardly count; and the forthcoming "little biography" will, no doubt, be welcome as coming half way between Villari and the mere trifling booklet. Owing to the place he occupies in Romola, the personality and career of Savonarola ought to be well-known to all educated English people.

I read in the Daily Chronicle that "Ned Myers, a hitherto unpublished book by Fenimore Cooper, is announced by Messrs. Putnam." That Messrs. Putnam are about to issue a new edition of Ned Myers is, no doubt, the fact, but the book was originally given to the world so long ago as 1843. It cannot, therefore, be described truthfully as "hitherto unpublished."

Mr. T. E. Pemberton seems to have constituted himself a sort of biographer-royal to the dramatic and histrionic profession. He has already "taken the lives" of T. W. Robertson, E. A. Sothorn, Mr. John Hare, and the Kendals; and he now proposes to "take" that of Mr. Charles Wyndham, though I understand that, so far, he has only been making notes and collecting materials generally. I presume he will first present to us the memoir of Mr. Bret Harte which he is announced to have written for Messrs. Greening. From that firm we are to have a monograph on Mr. Swinburne, and it would be interesting to know if the work has the sanction and approval of the poet. Of printed matter about Mr. Swinburne in his private life there is not much. There are references to him scattered through the literary biographies and autobiographies of our time, and it would be open to anybody to collect these and string them together. The result, however, would not be very imposing. I fancy that the latest bibliography of Mr. Swinburne dates as far back as 1887.

We are promised another edition of Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his Son. Well, I daresay we can do with it. During the past twenty years we have had nothing but selections from the Letters. Three years ago Messrs. Low republished that which Hain Friswell had made long ago for their Bayard series (the one to which Sainte-Beuve's Essay was prefixed). But, in addition to that, a series of Maxims from the Letters was issued in 1884, followed by another selection for the Camelot Classics in 1889. Dr. Hill's Worldly Wisdom of Lord Chesterfield (1890) was, I think, derived from the whole of his lordship's Correspondence. It will be remembered that Chesterfield's Letters to his Godson were published, under the editorship of the late Lord Carnarvon, in 1890 also.

Mr. Murray, we are told, is preparing The Gypsies in Spain for publication in the revised edition of Borrow's writings. But why is the title of the book thus objectionably truncated? The full name, as bestowed upon it by the author in 1841, is Zincali: an Account of the Gypsies in Spain, and it was under that name that it was reprinted by Mr. Murray, in a cheap edition, in 1888. There has not, so far as I know, been any fresh edition since then.

There is a distinct boom in Borrow. Now it is Mr. Hindes Groome, the well-known authority on gypsies, who is to edit Lavengro, which he is to present to us in two volumes. Mr. Murray issued a cheap edition of the work in 1888. Then came the Minerva Library reprint in 1893. In 1896 the story was included by Messrs. Macmillan among their "Standard Novels," with an introduction by Mr. Birrell. In the following year Messrs. Newnes reprinted it, in 1898 Messrs. Scott added it to their Oxford Library, and during the present year Messrs. Ward & Lock have reproduced the Minerva Library reprint, with an introduction by Mr. Watts-Dunton, which many forgetful critics have taken as new.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Great Sisters.

The Life of Charlotte Brontë. By Mrs. Gaskell. With an Introduction and Notes by Clement K. Shorter. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

NOTHING, in French phrase, "leaps to the eyes" more saliently and vividly, upon any reading of Charlotte Brontë's novels and letters, than her entire sincerity of mind and spirit, of imagination and thought. Her splendours and her absurdities, her loves and her hates, are absolutely her own, unborrowed from the influences of culture, of society, of the Weltgeist. She admirably exemplifies Mr. Ruskin's saying, that genius consists, not in originality, but rather in genuineness: in that supreme conviction of the artist that his work must be done in this and in no other way; in the feeling, that faithfully and fearlessly to execute his own conception is to obey a divine command, the will of eternal beauty and truth. Charlotte Brontë knew to the full how the artist both masters and is mastered by his art, and that in the very act of creation there seems to be, and is, a "something not himself making for righteousness," for artistic rightness and justice. So she writes to Lewes:

When authors write best, or, at least, when they write most fluently, an influence seems to waken in them, which becomes their master—which will have its own way—putting out of view all behests but its own, dictating certain words, and insisting on their being used, whether vehement or measured in their nature; new-moulding characters, giving unthought-of turns to incidents, rejecting carefully elaborated old ideas, and suddenly creating and adopting new ones. Is it not so? And should we try to counteract this influence? Can we, indeed, counteract it?

When a sovereign of men objected to a sovereign of music, that there were too many notes in a certain passage, the answer was: "Sire, there are just the right number." That was the kind of reply that Charlotte Brontë made to her critics: "It happened so, and not otherwise. I saw it, heard it, and refuse to lie about it." The world of her imagination was terra firma, not any Cloud-Cuckoo-Land, wherein anything may happen anyhow. She was capable of writing to her friends, as Balzac wrote to his, news of her imagined characters and creatures: "Do you know that So-and-So is dead; Such-an-One married? Is it not wonderful?" At the date of Villette she had not read the mighty Frenchman; but Harriet Martineau discerned in that glorious masterpiece an affinity with his genius. It lies in a common passion of reality, conviction, belief in their creations: both writers make an "act of faith" in their imaginations. The shy, strong woman whom, in her circumstances and in her character, we might almost call the nun of English literature—if the title did not belong of right to Miss Rossetti—vowed obedience to the precepts of her art, faithful in the letter and in the spirit, resigned to her own inspiration. She could not have written what Walt Whitman calls "books distilled from books." She wrote books distilled from life, from personal intuition, from the intimations of the spirit, from the voices and the silences of nature, from acquaintance with grief, from an impassioned pondering. Her writings—we do not say it wholly for praise—have little savour of libraries, little air of moral purpose, little suggestion of "the literary life." But in all that she wrote, whether novels or letters, there is a wealth of words which, "if you cut them, would bleed": words vital, sensitive—not dead, but "quick."

Mrs. Gaskell's noble Life of her great fellow-artist and friend stands in no need of elaborated praise; but it has for some time stood in need of precisely that reverent treatment wherewith Mr. Clement Shorter has treated it. His introduction, chronology, notes, are entirely helpful and welcome. Here is no re-writing of Mrs. Gaskell, no tampering with her text, but just those elucidations, comments, that additional or complementary matter, which the lapse of time necessitates. It is probably an edition of a classic as final as is Dr. Birkbeck Hill's edition of Boswell. We could not say more. Obviously, Mrs. Gaskell and Mr. Shorter had no call nor occasion to emulate the minuteness of Boswell and Dr. Hill. There could hardly be a more pronounced contrast than that between the immortal Londoner, burly, magniloquent, "clubbable," the idol and the terror of The Town, and the reticent, fragile, secluded woman among the lonely moors, the vasta silentia surrounding little Haworth. She was none of Dr. Johnson's ladies: no Mrs. Thrale, Miss Burney, Mrs. Montague, Charlotte Leunox, Hannah More; no brilliant blue-stocking, no queen of salons, no intimate of wits and statesmen; no elegant candidate for the honours of Sir Joshua's canvas, the whispered compliments of Burke, the rounded nothings of snuff-box-tapping Gibbon, the dear impertinences of Boswell. Yet she lived a full life in her brief allotted period. Not a peopled, thronged, frequented life, but one passed in the almost visible society of a few profound emotions, a few deep joys and sorrows, a few ardent aspirations and desires. A year or two in Brussels, a week or two in London, were the practical extent of her experience of all that portion of the world which is not comprised in Haworth. A word or two with Thackeray, Brewster, Monckton Milnes, "young Mr. Arnold"; a correspondence of no great length with Lewes and Sydney Dobell; a fair degree of intimacy with Miss Martineau and Mrs. Gaskell; that is the practical extent of her acquaintance with the contemporary living world of literature. Three tragic deaths of two adored sisters and a deplored, but deplorable, brother; her own death from the dangers of maternity, at the moment when through happy marriage she might anticipate a life of long happiness amid the calmed memories of old sorrow; those are the most arresting incidents in this volume of more than six hundred pages. Yet they abound in adventures adventured in that supremely existent world, the world of the created spirit, itself creative. We watch two young sisters busied with homely household cares in a small Yorkshire parsonage, and we learn that these are spirits of puissance and fire, indomitable, vigilant, proud. We see the elder of them turn from some dutiful loving service to her half-blind, brooding father, to deliver fearless judgment upon the great things of life and art, and that with a superb unconscious daring, an intense freshness of "large utterance." What need was theirs of crowds and libraries who communed with the ancient moors and conversed with the winds and stars?

Mrs. Gaskell felt the spell of lives so lived: she portrayed them artfully. The external scene, rugged Yorkshire, primitive, stubborn, warm-hearted, wild; the strange family, which in fiction would scarce gain credence; their varieties of the one same vehement nature, Celtic and Northern; their ways of facing life, as something to be wrestled with and conquered—even though ambition be fixed upon no more than setting up a girls' school—their zest of intellectual culture, their unremitting energy of mind: all this is portrayed with a quiet, cunning strength of hand and insight; the picture lives, breathes, pulsates. Our attitude towards the Brontës is one of slightly alarmed, somewhat amazed, wholly worshipful intimacy. We would fall in love with them, if we dared and if they would let us. These home-keeping sisters are partly Amazonian, Artemisian. Their writings contain challenges, and ring with clarion notes of war upon the world's conventions, sham smoothnesses, smug hypocrisies. It would be wounding to incur their ridicule, to detect the smile of a silent contempt upon their lips and eyes, to be made "feel small." To a Rochester, a Robert or Louis Moore, a Paul Emanuel—oh, best-beloved of the men who never were!—they will capitulate: but they seem to expect to meet more often with Peter Augustus Malones, David Sweetings, and Mr. Donnes (en passant, we have a curiosity to know that egregious gentleman's Christian name). The four deathless stories keep us sensitively on the alert; we make examination of conscience; that trenchant and almost pure English has a certain haughtiness. Reading page after page, we are reminded of the Charlotte Brontë who, upon first encountering her "Lion come up out of Judah," forthwith opened an assault upon Mr. Thackeray for his "shortcomings (literary, of course)." Charlotte Brontë was amusingly sceptical as to the high genius of Jane Austen. But they resemble one another in the impress of their personalities upon their pages. Guilty conscience tells most of us that it would be a terrible thing to furnish forth material for a portrait by either immortal lady. Reading Boswell, we are moved to debate within ourselves whether the Great Man would have esteemed us worthy of the Mitre and Bolt-court, of a "dish of tea" with Miss Williams; and we wonder, whether Elia would have voted us good fellows, or uncongenial sharers in his tobacco and punch. The Brontë novels are the Brontës, and we read them with admiring apprehensions, with a wary delight. For to read them is not to turn from the turmoil of life to the inanimate repose of literature; it is to be in the visible, tangible, audible presence of two subtle, reticent, outspoken, and all-noticing ladies.

Perhaps the paramount interest of those lives, which Mrs. Gaskell's patient skill was the first instrument in revealing to the world, lies in the fact that, though they reveal a tragedy, a story of sorrows, there is nothing of that pitifulness so often attaching to the literature of literary mourners. The case of the disastrous Branwell excepted, here are noble griefs nobly borne; fears stoically confronted; disappointments met with redoubled endeavour; nowhere a touch of Wertherism, an hint of Byronism. We have nothing to forgive, palliate, condone, excuse, explain away in Charlotte Brontë. We have never cause to say "Here is weakness, and here is vanity, and here is malice, but they are natural and pardonable." These writers of books, quivering and aching with passion, lived lives of unshakable fortitude, and of integrity not less mental than moral. To use a somewhat undignified word, there was no flabbiness, no pettiness in their temperaments; and even Branwell, who lived like a hysterical and besottedly vicious woman, died like a man, upright upon his feet, as the death agony seized him. A brave book this of Mrs. Gaskell's; the record of courageous women true, like Jane Eyre, "to the finest fibre" of their natures. We close it with renewed homage to the memories of its writer and of them; close it also with Arnold's lines in memory:

Sleep, O cluster of friends,
Sleep—or only when May,
Brought by the west wind, returns
Back to your native heaths,
And the plover is heard on the moors,
Yearly awake to behold
The opening summer, the sky,
The shining moorland—to hear
The drowsy bee, as of old,
Hum o'er the thyme, the grouse
Call from the heather in bloom!
Sleep, or only for this
Break your united repose!

Of a truth, in the last words of Wuthering Heights, we cannot "imagine unquiet slumbers for the sleepers in that quiet earth"; and they had earned their slumbers.

Hardly!

Two Stage-Plays: Denzill Herbert's Atonement; Bondage.
By Lucy Snowe. (R. Brimley Johnson. 3s. net.)

It often happens that a book is condemned by its own title-page, and here is an instance. Why stage-plays? Is the reader to understand that, despite their seriousness, these dramas do not disdain the stage? or that they have a special suitability and appositeness for the stage not possessed by any common play? or merely that in the eyes of the author there is some subtle difference between a play and a stage-play? And why Denzill Herbert's Atonement? We do not think we stretch the point in asserting positively that an author capable of a title like Denzill Herbert's Atonement cannot yet have arrived at that literary tact and taste without which passable literature is never produced. By all the rules of the game Denzill Herbert's Atonement should rest daintily on the same shelf as The Awakening of Mary Fenwick, The Probation of Dorothy Travers, Not like other Girls, Wee Wifie, and Ought We to Visit Her? Indeed, it does belong to that same shelf, despite the fact that when you first examine it Miss Snowe's work has an air of emancipation and modernness. Denzill Herbert was a fashionable and handsome young clergyman, well married, and the first act of the atonement passes in front of his church. Harry Field and Ralph Champneys are discovered talking. "Que diable? You, Harry, 'dans cette galère?' begins Ralph." But it is really Harry who should have put the question to Ralph; for, while Harry (an "agitator" with a special animus against parsons) loves the parson's wife, Ralph is quite outside the action, and fulfils no useful function whatever. His presence among the dramatis personæ, not to mention the prominence accorded to him, is one proof among many of the author's lack of technique. When Ralph and Harry have finished the preliminary explanations, in the manner of Sardou's domestic servants, the congregation comes out of church:

FIRST MAN.

Rattling sood sermon that!

SECOND MAN.

Ripping! Guess he's knocked about a bit himself, don't you?

FIRST MAN.

Rather!

(They go out. Another group of ladies come from the church.)

FIRST LADY.

Isn't he wonderful? I have not heard anything that moved me so since—since Paderewski.

SECOND LADY.

Don't speak of it! I shall never forget—never—the way he said— Oh, look! Isn't that the Duchess?

THIRD LADY.

Sh! You know he said we were not to talk about "notorious sinners."

Needless to say the Reverend Denzill has had a past. That past was a girl named Susan Archer—and a child. In the second act Denzill confesses his sin to Harry Field; and then a certain Lady Deloraine, one of Denzill's flock, enters the intrigue. She has not been in the minister's study five minutes before she is talking thus:

LADY DELORAINE (seizing and kissing his hand passionately).

Kind, kind man! (looking up at him). You—you know—who is it?

DENZILL (surprised and cold).

No!

LADY DELORAINE.

You must—you must have seen, and known. I thought you did (holds his hand and looks at him). Who else could it be but—oh, Mr. Herbert—let me say it this once—I know it's horribly, hideously wicked—but she—I know your married life is not as happy as it ought to be. (He starts.) Don't you see—can't you believe—it's God's sacred truth, and I'm not ashamed of it. He made us for each other, you and me, and only I have found it out—yet! Denzill, my darling, let me kiss you once.

(She throws her arms round his neck, but he sternly repels her and rises.)

DENZILL (with his back to LADY DELORAINE).

Get up, Lady Deloraine. (She slowly rises and stands, turning away from him.) I must apologise for allowing this to go on. I was taken by surprise, and so, I think, were you. We will both agree to forget—

LADY DELORAINE (after a pause).

I will only ask you to remember one thing—that if ever, as might happen, you are in need of anything that I could help in, I will not fail you.

Next comes Rachel, Denzill's wife:

RACHEL (repelling him).

Don't touch me, Denzill, yet.

The truth is that Susan Archer has had a word with Rachel, and Denzill's atonement now actually starts. We are not quite sure what occurs next, but it would appear that Denzill went off and lived at a great pace with Susan—presumably by way of penance. In the third act Harry Field is sailing smooth with Rachel, when the errant pastor returns like a ghost to his study, and Lady Deloraine, who had promised not to fail him, administered poison to what was once an idol of the West End.

LADY DELORAINE.

. . . He asked me to give it him, and I thought it was best. I did it for his sake. But it was you who killed him. (To Rachel) You are a murderess. (With quiet enjoyment) I loved him.

RACHEL (to Harry).

Help me.

CURTAIN.

We like that "with quiet enjoyment." It is an achievement of true humour. So ends this modern stage-play. Somewhat affected and bombastical, it yet represents, we think, an earnest effort to portray the times in which the author lives. Unhappily, Miss Snowe shows neither force nor skill, nor any aptitude for drama; she is an amateur, having nothing but her earnestness. Earnestness is not enough; unassisted, it merely invites the scoffer to scoff. Poor little Atonement. Time, "which hath an art to make dust of all things," will make dust of you too! And in future years that will, perhaps, be Miss Snowe's consolation.

Bondage, with drunkenness for subject, is rather more incoherent and improbable than its companion.

A Tyrtæan Muse.

For England's Sake. Verses and Songs in Time of War.
By W. E. Henley. (David Nutt. 1s.)

LET it be said at once that Mr. Henley's booklet is the best thing in verse that the Transvaal War has brought us, or probably that it will bring us. The description does not, indeed, entirely fit the book; for some of the pieces were written before the War—so far back as 1891 and 1892, during Mr. Henley's editorship of the National Observer. But the majority are not only songs of war, but the product of war-time. Good though the book is, nevertheless, not all of it represents Mr. Henley at his best. It opens seductively, with a prologue that is very Henley—one says, "Ha! ha! among the trumpets," to hear the old masterful notes struck out again. Listen:

When the wind storms by with a shout, and the stern sea-caves

Rejoice in the tramp and the roar of onsetting waves,
Then, then it comes home to the heart that the top of life
Is the passion that burns the blood in the act of strife—
Till you pity the dead down there in their quiet graves.

But to drowse with the fen behind and the fog before,
When the rain-rot spreads, and a tame sea mumbles the shore,

Not to adventure, none to fight, no right and no wrong,
Sons of the Sword heart-sick for a stave of your sire's old song—

O, you envy the blessed dead that can live no more!

That "lifts the blood" in well-remembered fashion. It strikes the note of delight in action and energy which is of Mr. Henley's inmost character; for he "was ever a fighter," like his pet aversion, Browning (if we may venture to give pre-eminence to one among Mr. Henley's veritable seraglio of cherished aversions). And it strikes it without overstepping the modesty of art. It sounds a rousing outset to the poems which follow. Note that "tame sea mumbles the shore." The first poem is a stimulant reclamation against the early blunders of the war; not without the defect we shall have to observe further:

REMONSTRANCE.

Hitch, blunder, check—

Each is a new disaster,
And it is who shall bleat and scrawl
The feebler and the faster.

Where is our ancient pride of heart?

Our faith in blood and star?
Who but would marvel how we came
If this were all we are?

Ours is the race

That tore the Spaniard's ruff,
That flung the Dutchman by the breech,
The Frenchman by the scruff;
Through his diurnal round of dawns
Our drum-tap squires the sun;
And yet an old mad burgher-man
Can put us on the run!

Rise, England rise!

But in that calm of pride,
That hardy and high serenity,
That none may dare abide;
So front the realms, your point abashed;
So mark them chafe and foam;
And if they challenge, so, by God,
Strike, England, and strike home!

One might ask whether "our faith in blood and star" were not but too conspicuous, as the cause (in large measure) of those disasters which stirred Mr. Henley to song. But this is by the way. More important is it to note here a touch of the over-emphasis which seriously mars some of the other poems. Mr. Henley, who can be so strong without effort, in his restless lust of energy sometimes overleaps himself, and becomes violent. The kingdom of poetry differs from the kingdom of heaven, in that the violent do not bear it away. There are parts where some of these poems fairly shout in one's ear. The worst offender is "The Man in the Street," where substance and expression alike exceed. It is Mr. Henley out with a shillelagh, trailing his coat, and spoiling for a ruction: it might, indeed, have been called "In Praise of Rowdiness." Unfortunately it is lengthy, and no mere quotation would convey its total effect. Moreover, it would be unfair, for the poem is an extreme example. But of violence in expression there are examples in "The Choice of the Will." Here and elsewhere he shows a fondness for "the Pit" and "Hell" as means of forcing an emphasis, which he might well have left to another fine poet, who surely deserves the thanks of timorous souls for having clicked the terrors out of the place mentioned.

Till now the Name of Names, England, the name of night.

That will surely stand as sufficient specimen of the excess we deprecate. Yet in the same poem we have so truly virile a couplet as this:

We tracked the winds of the world to the steps of their very thrones;
The secret parts of the world were salted with our bones.

The "Envoy" which closes the book, were there nothing else, would win oblivion for that defect of Mr. Henley's quality (though the Pit does again open under our annoyed feet).

Taese to the glory and praise of the green land
That bred my women and that holds my dead,
England, and with her the strong broods that stand
Wherever her fighting lines are pushed or spread!
They call us proud?—Look at our English Rose!
Shedders of blood?—Where hath our own been spared?
Shopkeepers?—Our accout the high God knows.
Close?—In our bounty half the world hath shared.
They hate us and they envy?—Envy and hate
Should drive them to the Pit's edge?—Be it so!
That race is damned which misesteems its fate,
And this, in God's good time, they all shall know,
And know you too, you good green England, then—
Mother of mothering girls and governing men!

This is, by the way, an example of that avoidance of the epigrammatic close in the quatorzain which Mr. Henley has made it a special study to achieve. But there is something else than this—a poem on Lord Roberts, of such splendid swing and vigour that we would its length did not forbid us to quote it whole. Here is a handful of it—though we do it wrong by such mutilation:

"They have given us war, good war so far as their burgher souls knew how:
In a dead boy's name, and for England's sake, I'll set my hand to the plow,"

Did he promise thus in the thought of his dead? We must do as we must—not will!
If he did, by the Lord, he has kept his word, for they've had of him thrice their fill.

By the dismal fords, the thankless hills, the desolate, half-dead flats,
He has shepherded them like silly sheep, and cornered them like rats.

They have seen themselves out-marched, out-fought, outcaptained early and late.
They've scarce a decent town to their name but he's ridden in at the gate.

Desert and distance, treason and drought, he has mopped them up as he went,
And only those he must shed in the rush of his swoops were discontent.

Patient hardy, masterful, merciful, high, irresistible, just,
For a dead man's sake, and in England's name, he has done as he would and must.

So three times three, and nine times nine, and a hundred times ten,
England, you, and you junior Englands, all, bats off to our Chief of Men!

With that salutation to "Our Chief of Men" ringing in our ears, let us close the book, and thank Mr. Henley for it. His hand, that poem shows, has not lost its cunning, nor his mind its energy.

The Romance of Soot.

The Last of the Climbing Boys: an Autobiography. By George Elson. (John Long. 6s.)

THIS is a book of no literary pretensions, but of considerable human interest. Sixty years ago Mr. Elson was one of those "dim specks—poor blots—innocent blacknesses," to whom Elia loved to give a tester, and Jim White a meal. If he does not figure as the very chimney-sweep of Elia's portraiture, the differences are inessential. Mr. Elson began sweeping chimneys after the humane Act of 1842 had forbidden chimney-climbing. That he climbed them just the same was due to the fact that in country districts the Act soon became a dead letter. The new sweeping machines produced little effect on chimneys in which soot had gathered from a mixture of wood and coal fuel, and housekeepers quickly perceived that the climbing boy with his steel scraper was better worth their money. Hence the law was cheerfully and consistently broken all over England. Young Elson and his brother became chimney sweeps by running away from home. Their father and step-father were hawkers, and occasionally the boys returned from chimney-sweeping to less grimy occupations. It is curious to see how a half-starved but well-meaning and courageous boy could make his way about England on foot fifty years ago, from town to town, and master to master, toiling and running away, sleeping in barns, and upheld by chance meals and pathetic slices of good luck. Elson was not quite friendless. His mother was always glad to see his sooty face again for a few days, and the lad had kind-hearted aunts, who seem to have dotted themselves about the shires in a certain strategy of helpfulness to their grimy little nephews.

The boys had been trapped into their calling by a sweep who offered them a night's rest, but took care that they should awake so black in skin and clothing that sweeping chimneys was their only resource. Thus it was as an unwilling convert, baptized with soot by an alien hand, that Elson tackled his first cottage chimney. The plan of climbing a chimney was this:

With the feet standing upon the grate, the body would nearly fill up the width of the chimney, thus to rise was a matter of outward expansion or outward pressure. The right arm lifted above the head, the left down by the side; the elbows were pressed hard against the brickwork so as to hold the body suspended until the knees were drawn up. Then the knees on one side, and the bare heels on the other, held the body secure, while the right hand plied the scraper to bring down the soot. The elbows again reached higher up, and the knees and heels repeated their action; thus the ascent was made.

The smarting eyes and skin of the climbing boy were Elson's immediate reward, and these were quickly followed by peeled knees and festering sores. Nor was the climbing without its own technical disagreeables, such as would now be thought of as intolerable cruelties. A narrow chimney with a poor draught might almost stop a boy's breathing. Sometimes Elson forced his way up a chimney which had been the grave of a less attenuated climber, who had stuck there and died before he could be unbricked. Fumes from boiler fires only just extinguished were another danger, and more than once the lad fell from top to bottom of a chimney, overpowered. Loose brick and mortar gave him many a hard knock. It is astonishing to read that he climbed scores of chimneys exactly nine inches square. A chimney nine inches by fourteen was a regular thing, but chimneys fourteen inches square "we could, as it were, run up and down":

There were even occasions of hilarity in climbing. Many a time, when in good spirits, I have sung at my work; I and another boy in an empty house have raced each other up and down a pair of chimneys out of fun, and I have dared to ascend when even the chimney-stack has rocked with my weight and movements, showing how use may become second nature. I remember once at Mount Sorrell, four miles from Loughborough, coming across the chimney of a house that had been pulled down, and of which this was the only remaining relic. Out of pure mischief I climbed this chimney, though it rocked from side to side with my weight.

Among chimneys which Elson did not love were those which had only one shaft for two or three fireplaces. In these it was possible to be smothered by smoke from the fire of the next-door house. It was also possible to make a mistake when descending, and come down into someone's porridge pot, or, as happened with one of Elson's comrades, to appear without warning in front of a gouty old gentleman whose fright equalled his own.

Travelling sweeps had the camping-out privileges allowed them that were enjoyed by roving tinkers. But they were regarded with more suspicion within doors, and hence, in self-protection, they developed a cant of their own. Mr. Elson says: "If one sweep met another strange member of the trade, to detect whether he was a greenhorn . . . the first would say: 'Can you patter cant (speak slang)?' and, if a veteran, the stranger would reply: 'Oh, yes, I know; nix is nothing, and a penny roll is a win' buster,' and directly they were hail friends well met." This cant was often used by a sweep to his boy in the presence of a housekeeper, whom it was not desirable to enlighten as to his thoughts. If a mistress had refused a good price, "he would put his head under the cloth before the grate, and call out: 'Now, boy, are you near the top?'" when an indistinct reply descended, which indicated he was not getting on very well. 'That's right, my lad, pike the lew,' meaning burk the top; then the lad would cry 'All up,' and come gently down, leaving the top part of the chimney full of soot for some other better-paid sweep to clear away." Other curious cant words are explained by the author:

A chimney-sweep was a feiker, and, strange to say, the words feik and feikment stood for these things which had no cant name. The sooty cloth was a tuggy, the scraper a deacon, the brush a switch, the soot was called queer, the herse was a prod, the cart a drag, rain was parney, a field a puv, a fire a glim, a door a gigar; water, lag; potatoes, spnds; a servant a dolly, and deiking for looking. A stick was a cosh, a knife a chif, eyes were ogles, and the face a mung, a house a ken, a barn or hovel to sleep in a crib, a cap a cadie.

Mr. Elson's story is lightened by the gleams of a happy nature. It is clear that he worked with a will, and bore cold and an empty stomach as well as they can be borne. There were gentlemen's houses where chimney-sweeping was a joy, so nobly was it rewarded with hot food and drink, and kind words from the maids. Even in farmhouses kindness and liberality were the rule, and Elson won them in larger measure by his ability to sing love songs and sing them well.

At last our author came to town and swept chimneys with the jointed brush of civilisation. The great event of his London career was the part he took in chasing and, instrumentally, bringing to justice three burglars whose attentions to a West End mansion, unfortunately for themselves, synchronised with his own. This exploit brought Elson fame and money, and the last pages of his book recount his emergence from soot to affluence. But the cream of the book is its stories of travelling chimney-sweepers, and of village life fifty years ago. Once, standing on a hill overlooking Leicester, the author was able to indulge these proud reflections: "Among my first thoughts was one of pride that I had climbed fully three parts of the myriad chimneys I then beheld; that, too, I had swept them better than any other lad." Mr. Elsen has done well to give his life-story, to which the Dean of Hereford writes a suitable preface.

The School and the Man.

A History of Bradfield College. By Old Bradfield Boys. Edited by Arthur F. Leach. (Henry Frowde.)

In some respects those who write the history of a school of to-day are happy in their lot. The whole life of the school has passed within the memory of man; the first boy who entered the school may be still alive; dubious points may be cleared up authoritatively, and the space at the author's disposal is sufficiently great to allow of his dealing with subjects of interest at greater length than is possible in the case of a foundation over three hundred years old. Bradfield College, Berkshire, is quite a modern public school, for this year it celebrates the fiftieth year of its existence, but into these fifty years it has crowded as many incidents and as many hairbreadth escapes as many a school of five or six times its age. Its founder was the Rev. Thomas Stevens, the "squarson," as Sydney Smith put it, of Bradfield, where his family had lived for several generations. Dr. Jowett summed him up more or less epigrammatically as "a funny old gentleman who had tied a school up to a church"; and, in fact, the foundation of the school was almost an accident. Mr. Stevens succeeded his father as rector and "lord" of Bradfield in 1842, and set to work to restore the church as a memorial to his father. Then it struck him that a choir was wanted, so he decided to found a school to train choir boys after the model of Magdalen College School. The school began with six boys in August 1850, and from this it grew up round the Old Manor House with an irregular regularity, till after a struggle of about thirty years it ended in the bankruptcy of Mr. Stevens and in all but the total wreck of the school. Dr. Gray, the present headmaster, was the man who pulled it out of its difficulties, and now in its fiftieth year Bradfield can boast a roll of over 300 boys, and a growing reputation.

The two things for which Bradfield is remarkable are its Founder and its Greek Play. Of the Founder as he was in 1850 Dr. Gray gives the following description:

Imagine a short, burly figure, clothes anyhow, thick-soled boots, a mere patch of shirt showing, with a wisp of white tie with dangling ends, and on the top of this there was set a colossal head, a massive, formidable forehead, eyes penetrating, and at times almost fierce, with a peculiar way of watering when roused. But it was the beard that was the feature of the man—patriarchal, sweeping, flowing—something you could not get away from, which seemed to move and sway with every emotion. A man of masterful power, was my feeling when he began to speak his words of dignified welcome. . . . The next morning I walked with the Warden down to "morning chapel" in the Parish Church. His outdoor costume was even more original than his evening attire. A black cut-away coat, which hung like a sack round his figure (he told me afterwards he had bought such things sometimes from a travelling tailor); a real beaver hat, such as is rarely seen in the England of to-day; and a very crooked stick slung with a little black bag on end over his shoulder, in which he carried his letters for the day to his "den" over the College gateway.

Such was the man who spent all his patrimony in founding a public school; and went bankrupt, in 1881, with debts of £160,000, of which about half were secured. Just before the crash came, and towards the end of the term, the Warden announced that he could not yet pay his staff, and that they must be content to wait. One of the assistant masters (then reduced to five) went boldly to the Warden's "den" and said: "Mr. Warden, I have no money to go home with." To which he replied: "Well, my dear, then you must stay here. I can feed you, but I cannot pay you." Stay he did, but the incident marked the beginning of the end.

The book is full of school stories of the familiar type, which hardly bear transplanting from their surroundings; but there is one perfect translation from English verse into Latin verse, which was shown up to Mr. A. D. Godley, of all persons, who was then a master at Bradfield. It is, as the author says, worthy of a place in Lyra Frivola.

Aud thou hast joined her gentle train !

was Latinised as :

Et placidam caudam duxisti rursus in unum !

For unconscious humour of the Dog Latin order this will be hard to beat.

The recent performances of the "Agamemnon" in the Greek theatre in the school grounds have acquainted the civilised world with the fact that Greek plays are performed at Bradfield. Of the theatre it will now suffice to say that the present Warden built it in 1888 in an old disused chalk-pit just outside the school grounds, and that the orchestra is shaped on the model of that at Epidaurus in the Peloponnesus, that theatre being chosen as the type because it is the only one in the mainland of Greece which escaped the alterations introduced by the Romans. In 1881 the Alceste had been played in the buildings under the management of Mr. F. R. Benson, who was an old schoolfellow of Dr. Gray at Winchester. Some of the Bradfield boys took part in the performance, and found special jests of their own in it.

Among them was an unrehearsed effect behind the curtain, when F. R. Benson, having barked his shin over a plank behind the scenes, used some very vigorous expressions not in the original Greek. Happening to see one or two youngsters who had been in hearing, he, with great presence of mind, gave them a short but impressive lecture on the evils of strong language, but did not explain his own lupsus linguae.

Bradfield is now in a flourishing condition, and, we say it with all respect, could not have a better advertisement than its Greek theatre and Greek play.

Other New Books.

THE REMARKABLE HISTORY OF THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.

BY GEORGE BRYCE

The Hudson's Bay Company seems suddenly to have attracted the attention of writers on the British Empire. Not long ago we reviewed Mr. Beckles Willson's two sturdy volumes on this subject, and now Mr. George Bryce comes with his book dealing with the great Company, the French traders of North-Western Canada, and of the North-West, X.Y., and Astor Fur Companies. Naturally, the later book covers much the same ground as the earlier, and, indeed, differs from it only in detail and in treatment. Those who are interested in Canada will read it eagerly, but those of the general public who have already tackled Mr. Willson will not venture on a second work on the same subject. Mr. Bryce is a professor in Manitoba College, Winnipeg, and has already written much on Canadian history. He is a practised writer, and his book is more attractive in style than that of his predecessor. The history of the North-West is a chapter of fine romance, and many passages in Mr. Bryce's work are as fascinating as any work of fiction. At the present moment it is worth noticing that old John Jacob Astor, a German merchant of New York, and the ancestor of the family of Astors, went to Montreal about a hundred years ago to trade in furs, and used to export skins to China, where high prices are the rule. Washington Irving's Astoria is based on the travels of Astor's traders, but he never tells us where these people went, as Dr. Coues remarks, for the simple reason that he never knew. The book is well illustrated with reproductions of portraits and of pictures, and with photographs. The appendices are useful, and that containing the Cree syllabic characters is most interesting as a specimen of what may be termed Indian shorthand. The index is fair, but might be fuller with advantage. (Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

BRITISH AMERICA.

"BRITISH EMPIRE" SERIES III.

This is the third volume of the series dealing with the various parts of the British Empire, which is founded on the lectures delivered at the South Place Institute, Finsbury, on Sunday afternoons, from 1895 to 1898. Like the other volumes, it is of a patchwork description, being the work of many hands. It is an admirable book of reference, but hardly lends itself to quotation. Canada as a whole is dealt with by J. G. Cohnier, C.M.G., and by Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, High Commissioner. Ontario is written about by Mr. Byrne, its Agent; New Brunswick, by Mr. C. A. Duff-Miller, its Agent-General; and so on, all the different provinces of the Dominion being handled by thoroughly competent writers. Messrs. Williams and Coryn treat of the Canadian Aborigines, and Sir J. G. Bourinot writes a short review of Canadian Literature, a literature which has the advantage of possessing the two languages English and French. Sir Augustus Adderley introduces us to the West Indies, Sir William Robinson writes on the Bahamas, Sydney Olivier, C.M.G., on British Honduras, and Dr. Emil Reich on British Guiana, so that the student may feel sure that those who instruct him have more than a bowing acquaintance with their subject. The book is full of information, and if it is brought up to date now and then will always be an invaluable book of reference. There are two well-drawn maps of Canada and the West Indies, but we would suggest that maps on a larger scale of each separate province and island would add largely to the value of the book. The concluding volumes of the series will be "Australasia," and "General," which will include the small outlying portions of the Empire. (Kegan Paul.)

THE GENEALOGICAL MAGAZINE. Vol. III.

The third volume of the Genealogical Magazine does not yield in interest and importance to its predecessors. Among many noteworthy items, there is a series of somewhat startling articles that expose the extraordinary "nobility epidemic" now raging in the French Republic. Not merely are titles assumed wholesale by the bourgeoisie, but a special state department exists, the Chancery of Titles, which on receipt of a fee registers, and confers official sanction upon, these ludicrous personal adornments. Titles are bought and sold in this country shamelessly enough in the political market, and both the baronage and the baronetage have been thereby irremediably degraded, but the logical genius that characterises the Gallic intellect has gone so far as to establish an absolutely open door for titular free-trade, whereas we have hitherto not ventured beyond the stage of backstairs jobbery. In point, however, of unaffected and barefaced honesty, the advantage appears to lie with the French system.

The vexed question is once more raised as to the occurrence and the meaning of the word "baronet" prior to the creation of the degree of baronets by James I. in 1611. Undoubtedly the term is used frequently before that date; but even if those antiquaries are wrong who maintain that in all such cases it is merely a scribal error for "banneret," it is certain that there can be no connexion whatever between the baronet of the Middle Ages and his namesake of the seventeenth century. The baronetage of James I. was an entirely new class of nobility, created under specific and unprecedented regulations and for a particular purpose.

The almost forgotten story of the burying of Cromwell's body on the field of Naseby is revived in a letter, and meets with an astonished and indignant protest from Mr. Algernon Ashton. Neither writer seems to know that the tale comes from the Harleian Miscellany.

One of the most useful papers is that explaining the origin of the insensate law which since 1835 has prohibited marriage with a deceased wife's sister. As the author says, ignorance concerning that iniquitous transaction is widespread and profound.

We do not know whether Mr. Beerbohm Tree and Mr. John Morley are subscribers to the Genealogical Magazine. If so, the former will doubtless have rectified the heraldic anomalies that deface his presentment of "King John," and the latter will have learnt not to "debruisse" his speeches with a "bar sinister," an armorial charge that never did and never could exist. (Elliot Stock.)

THE EARLY POEMS OF ALFRED, EDITED BY LORD TENNYSON. J. CHURTON COLLINS.

By the "early" poems Mr. Churton Collins intends, in accordance with the laws of copyright, all Tennyson's writings up to and comprising the two volumes of 1842. His edition of these is a "critical" edition. That is to say, in the first place, it is complete, the pieces discarded by Tennyson, together with his Cambridge prize poem on "Timbuctoo," being put in an appendix; and, secondly, Mr. Collins has been at the pains to hunt out and record all the innumerable variants and corrections which the poet's restless itch for technical perfection led him from time to time to introduce into his work. The result is exceedingly interesting to the student of poetic style who is not afraid to be let into the secrets of the workshop; to the general reader it will perhaps be rather bewildering. Then Mr. Collins has supplied a critical introduction, and a comment after the fashion of his earlier book, Illustrations of Tennyson, abounding in parallel passages and the citation of "sources." The value of this sort of criticism is an old subject of controversy, and Tennyson's own views upon it were not obscure. Nevertheless, although some of Mr. Collins's quotations are farfetched, the majority of them seem to us to be really helpful and to throw a flood of light on Tennyson's temperament and artistic methods. For a precise scholar Mr. Collins is uncommonly lax in his own licence of quotation. Browning would hardly thank him for assigning to him the "couplet":

The little more, and how much it is;
The little less, and what worlds away.

The familiar lines are truncated, and they are not a "couplet." (Methuen.)

ORDINALE CONVENTUS VALLIS BY W. DE GRAY BIRCH, CAULIUM. LL.D., F.S.A.

The document, carefully edited from a Paris MS. by Mr. Birch, is a useful addition to our knowledge of the daily life of a mediæval monastery, a subject which has received growing attention in England since the publication, half a century ago, of S. R. Maitland's stimulating work on The Dark Ages. It is the "Rule" of a small monastic order, known as the Order of the Val-des-Choux. The history of these communities has been written by J. A. P. Mignard, to whose work that of Mr. Birch is supplementary. The original Priory of Val-des-Choux, or Val-des-Choues ("Valley of Cabbages," or "Valley of Owls"), stood in a deep forest on the bank of the Ource. It was founded just at the end of the fourteenth century, and its Rule is adopted from that of the Carthusians, by the addition of elements taken from Benedictine and Cistercian sources. "Silence and peace," says Mr. Birch, "simplicity of life, the greater part spent in prayer and religious exercises, appointed hours and methods of work, rest, worship, and relaxation, seem to have made up the daily routine in this sequestered spot hidden in the forest of Villiers-le-Duc." Some twenty dependent houses of the order are known, of which three were planted in Scotland. Those were the Priors of Ardhattan, Beaulieu, and Pluscardine. Into England the Order does not appear to have made its way. The text of the Rule is edited by Mr. Birch with extreme care, and he adds a full historical and bibliographical preface, a calendar of documents concerning the Priory of Val-des-Choux in the departmental archives at Moulins-sur-Allier, and two very full and useful indices. (Longmans.)

Fiction.

A Son of the State. By W. Pett Ridge.
(Methuen. 6s.)

MR. PETT RIDGE is moving surely, and not slowly, in the right direction. As a student of humanity—and we do not think the phrase is too big for him—he has worked his way from the surface inwards. In his earlier sketches, amusing as they were, he was merely flicking the froth of experience at his readers. Then, after feeling his way hither and thither with a novel or two, he gave us Mord Em'ly, and proved that he could search beneath the surface—humours of the street, the tramcar, and the third-class railway carriage and discover character. Now, finally, with A Son of the State, in which we have, as it were, a Mord Em'ly who happens to be a boy, we find even more proof that Mr. Ridge can turn the searchlight of humour upon the serious problems of life. It is evidence of Mr. Ridge's firmer hold upon character—and deepening sympathy with it—that he has made Bobbie so interesting. We have spoken of the book as serious, and the redemption of the slum-boy by way of the industrial school and Her Majesty's navy is a serious matter enough; but one may be serious with a smiling face, and Mr. Ridge's humour is unfailing, even at the funeral of Bobbie's mother. The curate speaks:

"So you're all alone in the world, my boy? (Bother the wind!) Now you must make up your mind to be a good lad, because there are plenty of people ready to help good lads, and very few who will waste their time over bad ones."

"That's what I tell him, sir," remarked Mrs. Rastin ingratiatingly.

"And don't forget—" the curate stopped and sneezed. "I mustn't stay here in this wind," says he. "Good-bye, my lad."

"Say good-bye to the kind gentleman," Bobbie.

"So long," said Bobbie, resenting the interference of Mrs. Rastin. "Look after that cold of yours."

Bobbie's life up to date is concentrated in his courtesy to the curate—"so long." But therein lies Mr. Ridge's strength, the swift delineation of characters which he has watched by phrases and repartees to which he has listened. Thereafter Bobbie lived on the edge of crime with Mr. and Mrs. Bat Miller, Mr. Leigh and the Duchess, so-called from her reminiscences of a higher life, who ran what the detective called "a rare old little snide factory." But the State snatched Bobbie as a brand from the burning and sent him to an industrial school. The rest of the book is an account, written with delightful insight, as well as with appreciation of the personal imperfections which combine into success, of what the State can do when it takes a slum-boy in hand and insists that he shall run straight and not crooked. Bobbie's talks with the coastguard by the convalescent home turned him finally into the straight.

"Old Lady," declared Coastguard, blowing at his tea, "will have the best. She don't mind what she pays for her Navy, but she will 'ave it good."

"I see what you mean," said Bobbie.

"Do you like the outside or the inside?" asked the angel at the cake.

"Both, miss," said Bobbie.

"None of your ne'er-do-wells for her," went on Coastguard. "None of your thieving—"

"You've dropped your knife on the floor, little boy," said the angel. "That's a sign you're not careful."

"None of your bad characters, none of your criminals, for my Navy," she ses, "'if you please.' And, jigger me," said Coastguard explosively, "jigger me if the Old Lady ain't right."

"You ought to call her 'Her Majesty,' uncle. You'd look silly if she happened to be listening."

One fault we must point out in the framework rather than the filling in of the story. Mr. Ridge, always optimistic, and seeing, as he should see, possibilities of good in the worst, is unduly optimistic in his belief in coincidence. Myddleton West and Sister Margaret coincide with Bobbie too inexplicably for our credulity. And the characters are so real when they do meet us that their creator could afford to take a little more trouble in bringing us together. Finally, as regards the difficult question of conveying the pronunciation of the uneducated by misspelling, we would suggest that "ses" might as well be "says," and "bis'ness" represents nothing more than the ordinary pronunciation of "business."

Mis'ess Joy. By John Le Breton.
(Macqueen. 6s.)

AN English farm in the days of the Regency is the scene of Mr. Le Breton's new story, and a charming silhouette of Mis'ess Joy preludes a pleasant note. The "peccadillo" is the name given to the farmer's love-child by the provincial wit and bean, Mr. Pierrepont, whose association with the farmer and his parochial sisters leaves something to be explained. And his witticisms, addressed to simple people who cannot be expected to understand them, smack somewhat of priggishness. Richard, the hero, who is introduced to us while still a child, deals most effectually with him:

"And what saith the King? Come my Lord Richard, tell us, have you analysed the sorrows yet, and found them so highly spiced that they give insipid life a subtle joy?"

"I'm going to be a pirate," said Richard, fingering his guinea. He seldom understood Mr. Pierrepont, but he did not care to own this; and so, long ago, he had hit upon the ingenious idea of abruptly introducing a new subject when the conversation grew too difficult for him.

To Richard Mr. Pierrepont is constituted mentor in ordinary; but he does not save him from a dull marriage with his plain cousin Susannah, nor Joy from a miserable fate. For all that it ends unhappily, the book is sufficiently exhilarating to read. The two maiden aunts in love with Mr. Pierrepont and tenderly attached to each other are generously imagined.

The Minister's Guest. By Isabel Smith.
(Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

FROM a country rectory owned by a squire-parson—a type now almost extinct—to the demure villa of an Independent minister in a manufacturing town, was a terrible transition for Nannie. The minister was an excellent man, but, to her face, he spoke of her as "our young friend"; and his maiden sister dragged her to Dorcas meetings, where her wretched inefficiency with the needle made her horribly conspicuous, and a mark of scorn to the blameless Mary Leek. Upon her, however, she had her revenge: for Mary's betrothed, the stalwart son of a distinguished deacon, much preferred her defects to the perfections of his Mary. So, when sharp shears cut the throat of the registrar of marriages at the moment when the company was assembled at the chapel to witness the nuptial rites, so pointed a hint was not lost upon James, who openly turned his attention to Nannie—with the happiest results. The story is told at immense length in such unstudied English as: "It had not seemed then as if he cared for Mary other than a friend," and is adorned with quotations both German and Greek. A mind steadily concentrated upon a story of this class should as nearly realise a condition of complete repose as during the inevitable working hours of this troubled life it might reasonably hope to do.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE BELLE OF TOORAK.

BY E. W. HORNUNG.

MR. Hornung is one of our best Bush novelists, and the crisp opening pages of this story promise good things. "She had fallen a happy victim to the law of contrasts. Society favourite and belle, satiated with the attractions of the town, and deadly sick of the same sort of young man, she had struck her flag to one who might have swum into her ken from another planet; for the real bush is as far from Toorak and Hawthorn, and the Block in Collins-street, as it is from Hyde Park Corner." Such is Moya Bethune, when she and her fiancé are looking over their future home in the bush. While they are doing this it becomes necessary for Rigden to lie to a police sergeant in his fiancé's presence, and several vivid interests are at once created. (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THE MESMERISTS.

BY B. L. FARJEON.

A characteristic melodrama, in which the complications arising out of love and murder are dealt with by an unscrupulous mesmerist. Between the same covers the author publishes a play on the same subject with the remark: "Readers may feel some interest in comparing the Novel, which is intended for the closet, with the Play, which is intended for the stage, and in observing the points of difference between the two." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

FITZJAMES.

BY LILIAN STREET.

"No, it isn't heart. It's the Juan in a man that appeals to women; and he has it strongly. But what is the Juan? Nobody has discovered. And—it certainly cannot be bought." Thus was Galt FitzJames, a typical strong Englishman, poet, artist, critic, and squire, described by the woman who had bewitched him years ago, but whom he now found to be married to a money-bag. A sweeter woman trips on the scene, and from the two motives there rises an interesting and ingratiating love-story. A good character is Galt's old valet, Johnson, who is seventy, and quotes Shakespeare with great aptness. He believed in "the Bible and Shakespeare and the other poet—his master." (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

OUR COVE.

BY J. HENRY HARRIS.

THIRTEEN short stories of fishing-cove life in Cornwall, touching on simple themes with quiet humour. "The market with us for widows is dull; but they look comely in chapel, and are much given to the sucking of peppermint lozenges on Sunday evening. There is some consolation in peppermints—the girls take to them in the winter, or after they have been jilted. A widow with a little money need not, however, suck peppermints longer than she likes, for usually there is a 'staid' man somewhere about with a 'gift in prayer,' or some other excellence, open to an investment." (Simpkin, Marshall.)

AN AMERICAN VENUS.

BY ELLIOTT PRESTON.

This is described as an "emotional romance." It may be that, but it is also a tissue of bombastic reflections and impossible incidents. The author, in pronounced Byronic costume, forms the frontispiece. The title-page is adorned with a quotation from Miss Corelli's Ziska. This is the sort of thing: "Let me hasten to say (lest I lose caste) that I love the ladies—nay, I adore the very dust on which they tread. . . . Forgive me, gentle reader, that I stray thus from my theme. . . . But to return!—Ah! I was describing Eleanora's bathing-costume, was I not?" (Beane. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Literary Tall-Talk.

BETWEEN literary small-talk and literary tall-talk the sober lover of books has little peace nowadays. A reasonable quantity of each would not offend. It is interesting to know a fact or two about writers whose books compel discussion; it is interesting, also, to speculate on tendencies, and cast the horoscope of talent. But each of these pleasures is somewhat beside the mark of present and practical enjoyment of literature, and their too eager purveyors have to answer for much mental indigestion. Chatter about this author's message, and that author's message, fills the ear to an extent which almost forbids mere private reading. The mind wearies of facts which time shows it does not need to store, and of theories which time shows it need not examine. Again we say, in moderation both chatters are acceptable; and to see them in this degree, and in combination, you have only to read Hazlitt's Spirit of the Age. To see them in excess—vide Press. However, it is always easier to ignore petty facts than promising theories. The gossip will be recoverable within twenty-four hours, and will fill the half-hour of a railway ride. But the theory, the classification, engages the mind at once, and from the first offers a discovery. The small-talk may distract, but it is the tall-talk that lures and tires.

These discontented and disconnected ejaculations—they are no more—are prompted by a perusal of a magazine "wholly composed" of new and would-be-important interpretations of modern literature. It is with the quarterly arrival of Poet-Lore from Boston that we feel how many rungs of the ladder of Culture we have yet to climb. Our only doubt is whether anyone can be so cultured as the readers of Poet-Lore seem to be. There is here no mingling of the cup. The April-May-June number begins with a translation of Sudermann's symbolical drama "The Three Heron's Feathers," which opens with a dialogue between a grave-digger and the Burial-wife. After some forty pages of symbolism the reader is regaled with an original poem, called "Marah of Shadowtown," grey and tepid:

The days go by so wearily
Like crooked goblins, evilly,
Like silly shadows, fast and still,
Wind-driven and drearily.

Like the gray clouds are my eyes gray, mother,
Like them, heavy as things grown old
Only the clouds' tears are but dream-tears—
Lifeless, cold.

From this we proceed to an essay entitled "George Meredith on the Source of Destiny," which to our unannointed eyes appears to be a typical young-womanish screed illustrating the tall-talkativeness of what the writer calls "this latter nineteenth-century of ours." Lest we are mistaken, we will give the writer's summary:

This, then, is George Meredith's message. We have eaten of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and the power to choose between the two has entered into our souls. We are under the rule of a great overhanging law. Destiny's wheels we cannot stop, but through our capacity for moral choice, our hands lie on the button that moves the whole machine in its relation to our own individual lives.

We had innocently thought that all this might be picked up elsewhere; and that Mr. Meredith's novels were only a commentary on some such truths. But it is the way of tall-talk criticism to make the document under discussion yield up every elementary truth. You are to rout up and glorify an author's common philosophy as if the fundamentals were not much the same in all men. There are rules of life, too, which are accepted; why proclaim them like an auctioneer's clerk shouting "Correct" as he counts a set of spoons? Of Mr. Meredith we are told with empressement: "This novelist-philosopher has taught us, then, that folly tends to bring failure, but that righteousness is stronger than folly. He is not content to stop in his teachings even here. [We should think not!] In The Tragic Comedians he goes still further, and deals with the interrelations of the moral and intellectual. For character rules intellect, as intellect reacts upon character." Of what novelist—or of what writer—might not this be said? In the same spirit of false importance Mr. Meredith's views on fate and free-will are irresponsibly collected and compared with those of—Beowulf, Shakespeare, and Browning!

It is in his scientific insight into moral life that Meredith's growth beyond Beowulf, Shakespeare, and even Browning appears. We of the nineteenth century would be sorry to think that we had not one master who goes even deeper into our modern life than these. We believe that, as men of the later twentieth century look back upon our day, they will call George Meredith our greatest literary exponent.

We do not discuss this comparison between a living writer and three poets in three distant ages born. We only ask: Has it any value or charm whatever? and does it amount to anything more than an assertion that of four lamp-posts in the Strand the most westerly is nearest to the Nelson Column? It is fit that a paragraph which tumbles Mr. Meredith among a mixed crowd of immortals, and brings him out on top, should end on such cobble-stone English as "They will call George Meredith our greatest literary exponent."

We might still have escaped headache but for the next paper, on "Clews to Emerson's Mystic Verse." Here we have portentous interpretations of verse which is alleged to be occult, but is, in fact, nearly as plain as verse can be. Emerson says that the Universe

Sole and self-commanded works,
Fears not undermining days,
Grows by decays,
And, by the famous might that lurks
In reaction and recoil.
Makes flame to freeze and ice to boil;
Forging, through swart arms of Offence,
The silver seat of Innocence.

On this we have a page of high falutin explanation:

When the Living Universe builds a house, it builds it out of its own soul substance; while man sleeps and loiters, the Unconscious ceaselessly toils. In the phrase "grows by decays," Emerson embodies, I believe, the law of the conservation of energy. The magazine of divine power is exhaustless; does energy sink out of sight here, it is only to reappear yonder; the tree decays, but out of its fertilising substance new plants may spring up; the coal under the steam boiler of the locomotive is consumed, but the swart goblin has lost no whit of his might: he just slips darkling up into the stream, makes the driving-rods his swift shuttling arms, and, grasping with his steel fingers the fellos of the wheel, whirls you half a thousand miles over the green bulge of the earth ere set of sun. The mystic Power grows by decays; and also, by "the famous might that lurks in reaction and recoil," reconciles apparent antinomies and opposites. . . . If a heavy body be rolled up an inclined plane. . . . If you lift the big pendulum of the clock in the corner. . . . &c.

The writer is great on minutiae. "Even in so slight a matter as choosing a name for his verses 'To Rhea Emerson's philosophical belief is glimpsed." It is rather a relief to know, however, that "the title of the poem 'Hamatreya' has baffled a perfect and indubitable explanation." The writer says that, after searching "through all the Hindoo scriptures," he has "reached a conviction which approaches absolute certainty that 'Hamatreya' [the title of one of Emerson's poems] is Emerson's imperfect recollection of Maitreya, or—that he purposely coined the word." The next paper is "A Defence of Browning's Later Work," which informs us that a poetical slough of despond may be transfigured by hard thinking. We believe it may be created by the same means. In all these papers we find that jerkiness of thought and aridity of phrase which one associates with notes taken at a lecture or extracted with enthusiasm from a newish book. There is also an inveterate tendency to fine writing. The defender of Browning's Perishtah's Fancies and The Parleyings of Certain People cannot lay out her subject without declaring that these poems have been obscured by "mists of non-appreciation" in which she proposes to open a "rift" in the hope "that some glimpses of the splendour of the giant form behind them can be gained." Similarly the eulogist of Mr. Meredith seems to think she will gain the ear of the reader by saying that genius, "in its formed philosophical theories may err, but not in its perceptions of life"—and that therefore "in his inspired representations of life and character, coming not from thought alone, but from his whole nature, Meredith cannot err." The italics are ours. Like the cuckoo, the Bostonian critic selects an author in which to find, or deposit, a gospel; and once the selection is made the poor man has no peace. He is not even allowed to err.

The last item in our Folk-Lore is a veritable tit-bit. It is a kind of examination paper in "Present-Day Poets," in which some very solemn questions are propounded by the editors. We give below a few of these questions, and the answers which we have framed from the residue of our intellect:

Is Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton too narrowly restricted to emotional themes and emotional means of expression for bounteous poetic cheer, or is the perfect alliance of her emotional range and workmanship the very source of her lyric excellence?

We give it up.

Does Mr. Thomas Bailey Aldrich escape the usual penalty for laying emphasis on delicacy of finish so that the result is satisfying in its happy precision? Or does he seem cold and elaborately superficial? Does he, so to speak, carve cherry-stones oftener than he engraves cameos?

We don't know. Does it, "so to speak," matter twopence?

Is Miss Louise Imogen Guiney's scholasticism too dominant in her work? Does she lack human warmth? Or are her restraint and good taste the index of deeper feeling? Does her cultured thought and chaste concentrated power of expression lift her above the ranks of the minor poets?

Perhaps they "does." We will leave it open.

Does Miss Hannah Parker Kimball's portraiture of Judas Iscariot reveal a capacity for dramatically creating development in character? Are her lyrics too grave, or is it their especial blend of high seriousness and intellectual insight with unforced expression which gives them unusual richness?

We should say that the blend named would give unusual richness to any human composition; but, there, we are tired. We have seen the message of Mr. Meredith calmly defined in half-a-dozen lines, and we have been told that Browning's Perishtah's Fancies and Parleyings "give complete expression to the thought of the age." What is left for us to do but learn the message by heart, and buy a pocket edition of the poems? Oddly enough, we have no inclination to do either.

The Future of the Six-Shilling Novel.

THE six-shilling novel has now existed riotously for some ten years, and, to the casual observer, its position would seem to be assured, impregnable. Yet the real fact is that those most concerned are profoundly dissatisfied with it. A publisher whose reputation for successful fiction is second to none in London said the other day that he was ready to try any experiment for a change, even to the length of issuing novels at thirty-one-and-six; and he was not talking facetiously. A famous authors' agent, commenting on this despairing remark, said that novels might be issued at thirty-one-and-six or at half-a-crown, but that, in any event, the six-shilling price was bound to be altered. A leading West End publisher, to whom we mentioned the matter, said, with the utmost calmness, "I think it would be a good thing, as regards many novels, to return to the thirty-one-and-six figure." "But surely," we urged, "such a change would destroy your business in novels so issued." "It would," he said; "and I should be delighted to have my business in certain novels destroyed absolutely. You must understand," he added, "that no one has any fault to find with the present price of novels which sell well. It is the work of the new author, and of the author with a reputation but no circulation, that causes the trouble and the dissatisfaction. Such work, take it all round, results in a loss to the seller.

Here undoubtedly was truth. A successful novel is satisfactory, whatever its price; and, therefore, it is satisfactory at six shillings. The bookseller makes his fourpence out of it, and it does not stick on his shelves. What the publisher makes out of it is known only to the publisher: but that he makes something considerable is proved by the extraordinary competition among publishers for successful and partially successful authors. Any one acquainted with the arcana of a publisher's office, and especially any publisher's literary adviser, knows the ravenous appetite of publishers for successful authors. Let a man write a novel which sells only two thousand copies, and he will find half-a-dozen firms anxious to accept all risks and pay him from £75 to £100 on account of royalties upon delivery of the MS. of his next novel. Even if a novel sells but a thousand copies, thus clearing its first edition, the author may in future choose his publisher from several, and obtain from £30 to £50 in advance on his next MS.

It is the new author who fails to make a hit that is the cause of tears. In nine cases out of ten the publisher expects to lose on a first book, and he is not disappointed. He prints, say, seven hundred and fifty copies, and sells from two hundred to five hundred. If he sells five hundred he considers himself well out of the affair. As for the author, his receipts vary from nil up to £10—and this for something upon which he has probably lavished a year's labour. The worst is that the sales of first books are steadily decreasing; they are from thirty to forty per cent. less to-day than they were six years ago. And so there is naturally disgust. The author is disgusted because his reward is so absurdly trifling; the publisher is disgusted because he is often at an actual monetary loss; and the bookseller is disgusted because he finds his shop encumbered with dead stock. The question may be asked: "Why are mediocre novels produced at all? No one wants them." But someone does want them. The author wants them, and the author will have them. It was assumed ten years ago that the abolition of the three-volume novel would mean the abolition of the mediocre new writer. But how blind an assumption! You cannot change nature by an edict of the libraries. Mediocrity is immortal; nothing can scotch it. Instead of being annihilated the mediocre new writer is more numerous than ever. "But," you say, "why does the publisher publish the fellow's stuff and why does the bookseller buy it?" Simply because hope springs eternal in the human breast, and because the supply of non-mediocre authors is unequal to the demand. The publisher is very human, and the bookseller scarcely less so. Every sparrow that lights on their window-sill may prove to be the Arabian bird; and after the bitterness of a thousand disappointments they hope on, hope on, with a sublime and miraculous fortitude.

In the meantime the condition of affairs has distinctly worsened for author and publisher, and, perhaps, also for the bookseller. Who, then, has profited, since the public certainly reads more than ever? It is the libraries which have profited. They buy for four shillings that for which they formerly paid fifteen, but one does not perceive that they have reduced their subscription-rates. Silently but steadily money has been diverted from the pockets of the publishers and authors to the pockets of the libraries. In the old days nearly every three-volume novel cleared its expenses, and a new author could be fairly sure of a reasonable emolument. A number of blamelessly inane writers existed in comfort upon their modest share of so many thirty-one-and-sixpences. Then the fiat went forth, and without a cry these unfortunate persons sank beneath the waves of reform. That was nothing—at least, it was nothing to literature. But it was not all. The public buy more novels now than they did, but the improvement in this respect has not by any means been sufficient to atone for that tremendous leakage into the pockets of the libraries. Now, as then, the average reader gets his novels from the library, and not from the bookseller. And the libraries pursue their golden path, purchasing as many, or as few, of a novel at six shillings as they did of a novel at thirty-one-and-six. The successful, the meritorious writers have suffered to some extent, and, as for the rest, they have suffered enormously.

It is useless to blame the libraries. The libraries occupy an empyrean in which remonstrances cannot be heard. There are two remedies, and it is these remedies which the publishing world is now thoughtfully pondering. The first is to increase the price of speculative novels, and to rely for support wholly on the libraries instead of partly on the libraries and partly on the booksellers. The objection to such a course is that the libraries would probably decline to sanction it. Why, indeed, as commercial concerns should they sanction it except under compulsion? And who would apply the compulsive force? The second remedy is to decrease the price of speculative novels. Now the three-and-sixpenny novel has been tried and has proved a failure; but the half-crown novel, the shilling novel, have yet to go through an exhaustive test. Decidedly there are signs that the half-crown novel is coming into fashion. Mr. John Murray began a new half-crown series only last week, and it is reported that Mr. Heinemann will shortly renew his activity in this direction. The object of cheapening the speculative novel is twofold—first to popularise it, and second to reduce the pecuniary risks attached to it. If you print on thinner paper, and use a flimsier binding, spending £60 instead of £100 on an edition at a smaller price per copy, you will naturally stand to lose proportionately less on dead stock. And it is the risk of loss, not the hope of gain, which chiefly affects the publisher of a first book. As for the new author, the new author must openly reconcile himself to writing his first book for naught. He must not even pretend that the thing will be remunerative. It should be distinctly understood on all hands that a first book can only pay when a miracle happens. On such an understanding the new author may start fair—without illusions. After all, a first book is a mercantile experiment, and it is only proper that the experiment should involve the least possible risk.

The Travels of "Ivanhoe."

By way of practical joke a type-written copy of Scott's Ivanhoe was recently sent round to the publishers under the title When John was England's King. It was returned in every case, among the letters of rejection being the following:—

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. regret to have to return When John was England's King; but they fear that interest in historical fiction is diminishing. Their reader's report of the story is in the main favourable, but he points out that the charge of imitating The Forest Lovers, one of Messrs. Macmillan's recent publications, might perhaps be difficult to rebut. In his opinion, the author of When John was England's King would perhaps have made a better and more readable book had he studied Mr. Hewlett more carefully.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton must decline When John was England's King in its present form, but if a few modifications were made they feel that the story might be very popular and profitable. The author, they would suggest, might advantageously substitute a Christian girl for the Jewess Rebecca, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton having noticed, in their long experience, that there is more money in Christianity than in Hebraism, at any rate in books. They would also recommend an infusion of Scotch dialect; and a pathetic scene between Ivanhoe and his mother—if it could be arranged—would, they feel convinced, add to the story's vogue.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. would willingly publish When John was England's King if the author would make a few alterations. They beg to bring to his notice the accompanying works by Mr. Guy Boothby, an acceptable writer in their employ, and to suggest that he should adapt the story to the minds of Mr. Boothby's numerous readers. By giving Ivanhoe more dash and address, by modernising and accelerating the style, and removing much of the antiquarian padding, this effect would, they feel sure, be attained.

Mr. John Murray begs to return the MS. of When John was England's King, and to quote a passage from his Reader's report thereon: "I do not recommend this novel, although it is painstaking and thorough. The author would, I think, have been wiser had he chosen another name for his hero. Ivanhoe has already been used by Sir Walter Scott."

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. thank the author of When John was England's King for the offer of his story as a serial for the Cornhill Magazine, but are obliged reluctantly to return it, having made arrangements for a number of serials by Mr. S. R. Crockett.

P.S.—The foregoing correspondence is, of course, absolutely fictitious.

Things Seen.

The Ambulance Corps.

BEHIND the parched Parade Ground stretched the barracks, and from the windows leaned the regulars. Coatless, hatless, arms akimbo on the window-sill, flannel shirts open at the neck, their jolly sun-burnt faces smiled at the little army of boys who had possession of their Parade Ground. The annual inspection of a flourishing Cadet Corps was proceeding, and it amused the regulars to see the red-coated children with carbines, bayonets, and a band, busy at the business of war.

In the corner of the Parade Ground stood the Colonel's dog-cart—the Colonel of an historic regiment, who, in full uniform, with a languid aide-de-camp at his heels, had come to inspect the battalion. And near the dog-cart stood the tragedy of the inspection. It was a small tragedy, a matter of four little boys in red with a military stretcher—the Ambulance Corps. They were perfect in their drill; they had mastered First Aid; they were young, strong, brimming over with energy, but nobody had needed them, and the inspection was drawing to a close—that was the tragedy. None had fallen, none had fainted, all had gone through the most surprising evolutions without the slightest distress. The Ambulance Corps alone had waited and watched, and nothing had happened. The Colonel glanced at the clock, made a speech to the boys, mumbled a word to the commanding officer and walked towards the dog-cart followed by his languid aide-de-camp. The Ambulance Corps watched despairingly. Each small figure was taut, each face was flushed, each pair of hands clutched nervously at the Ambulance poles. The battalion stood at attention as the Colonel (he was a trifle stiff in the joints) raised his foot to place it on the high step of the dog-cart. As he did so the horse started, the Colonel was thrown off his balance, and fell sideways to the ground. In the twinkling of an eye a cloud of dust rose about the place where the Ambulance Corps had stood, there was a gleam of red and four pair of legs scampering across the ground, then the startled battalion saw the prostrate Colonel pounced upon; they saw him hustled into the stretcher, his arms gesticulating, with more vigour than is usual with a disabled man; they saw the commanding officer race towards the spot; they saw the Ambulance Corps retire, but with heads erect, and a proud air. But the Colonel, as he drove away from the Parade Ground, looked ill-pleased.

A London Night.

Too hot to sleep indoors, I drag a chair on to my balcony, meaning to dose there. But the freshness of the night rouses me, and I am held in a waking dream.

There is hardly any air. The dark silhouettes of the trees in the square stand out, statuesquely graceful against the grey blue sky—through the black masses of shade beneath them, one or two lights glitter from the farther side.

A mysterious cat creeps across the street and glides through the railings into the dark garden. And just above the roofs, the misty yellow moon hangs low in the sky, and plays hide-and-seek among the chimney-pots.

I close my eyes, and my thoughts wander off to a low Sussex shore, where the light shines over the water, and the tide is creeping up round the wall of an old sea-wall. The waves ripple in gently. I hear their whispers as they hasten to overtake each other on the beach. Or is it the longed-for rain upon the plane-trees in the Square? I look up to find the dusty wood pavement transformed into a shining waterway by a water-cart. The wet street stretches its glittering length far away up to Regent-street—long lines of gas-lamps throw trails of light across it—a lumbering Post-office van shows flashes of scarlet as it rattles past on its way to Paddington with the early mails. Now and then a belated hansom—the cat of London traffic—slips past; a couple of tired waiters stand for a moment beneath my window, and separate with a friendly “Gute nacht.”

There is silence for a space—the town sleeps—then a brilliant meteor flashes across the heavens, and loses itself in the soft shades of green and saffron which have begun to tinge the east—a delicate rose colour creeps up into the sky—the caress of a new-born breeze wakes the trees, and another hot day has dawned.

Correspondence.

A Dream Sentence.

SIR,—This morning I awoke with the following sentence on the tip of my tongue: “No private duty is so paramount but that a man may neglect it in the service of the State.”

Now, although I cannot defend the use of the word “paramount,” it seems to me that the idea set forth is sufficiently striking. How it came into my head I am wholly at a loss to discover. The thought is perfectly new to me so far as I am aware. I may, of course, have read it somewhere, but I feel convinced that, if I have, I have never before appreciated its meaning. Perhaps some of your readers, well versed in ethics, may be able to provide the reference.

All I can say is, that I went to bed after reading several chapters of Mr. Edward Spencer's The Great Game, and I do not think that the idea could have been suggested by his entertaining account of “Horses of the Century,” jockeys and owners. Or can it be that in Dreamland I earn a precarious livelihood by writing (or speaking) on the ideas of “Rightness and Oughtness”?—I am, &c.,

G. S. LAYARD.

Lorraine Cottage, Malvern: July 26, 1900.

Style.

SIR,—In John Stewart Mill's essay on Nature occurs the following remark: “The first thing to be done with a vague term is to ascertain precisely what it means.” It is therefore necessary to define style before commenting about it, and this is just what the correspondents of the ACADEMY fail to do. “It is synonymous with literary intellect, brain, thought”; “or subtle thing that grows”; “the natural expression of the literary individuality”; are some of the meanings presented in the ACADEMY, all of which, to my mind, are absolutely wrong and misleading.

Style is just a mode or manner of expression and nothing more, and it is generally qualified by adjectives, such as pure, good, bad, picturesque, turgid, pleasing, perfect, easy, simple, diffuse, classical and many more. Style, then, without the adjunct of an expletive, is only a verbal garb of thought, beautiful or ill-fitting as the case may be.

Of course, it is the aim of the literary aspirant to acquire a good and, if possible, a charming style, a con summation only to be reached by a thorough acquaintance with authors whose mode of expression delight and charm. Afterwards, continuous practice may help the literary mind to develop its own style. The grub of patience may burst into the full-blown performance. Every author whose name is stamped upon the literature of the period has a style sui generis, which may not always be a pure or even a correct one. But the impress of individuality is often the golden hall mark of popularity. An author of distinction has generally a distinctive style.

Constant converse with good verse, and its practice, successful or otherwise, ensures a limpid, delightful style. The rhythm, melody, and choice of words necessary for the art impart a musical flow and a gracious elegance to composition. For instance, the pure style of the Vicar of Wakefield, or the vivid word-painting of Jane Eyre, are doubtless due to the fact of their authors being poets.

“From grave to gay, from lively to severe,” mark the attributes of an enchanting style. And, for my own part, I can endure the matter of any book or article, even if threadbare or commonplace, as long as the manner, the style, can arrest and delight.—I am, &c.,

ISIDORE ASCHER.

July 31, 1900.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 45 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for an invented poetic quotation which if introduced into print would be likely to gain currency. We award the prize to Mr. Alfred Edward Wright, Inverinate Villa, Attadale-road, Inverness, for the following :

SELF-PRIDE.

Lost to all sense but that of inward pride,
Wrapt in himself, he needs no other guide ;
No magnet points him to a distant pole—
Himself the chart, the compass, and the goal.

Other invented quotations sent in are as follows :

Be not a coward, fearing to face
Life, when disrobed of pleasant grace,
But with soul-eyes find thou the key
Of grace, in Life's adversity.

[A. V., London.]

Dead leaves aglow with autumn's sun,
Loves long dead alive in memory.

[H. R., Gt. Grimshy.]

To work is good, yet let him rest who can ;
Life without leisure makes a soul-less man.

[M. F., London.]

When first the Angels bore thee to the House of Hopes and Fears
The World beside thy cradle laughed for joy—thou wert in tears !
So live, that on the eve of thy Great Sleep
Thou laugh for joy and all the world shall weep !

[M. N., London.]

Blindly squandering powers of Infinity o'er trifles of time.

[H. L. G., Edinburgh.]

A night for goblins to bestride foul air.

[W. M. R., Manchester.]

Strong in consistent inconsistency.

[A. M. P., London.]

Yes ! I will own that subtlety I lack,
Which proves twice two are five and white is black ;
Substance, not shadows, ever I pursue,
And seek not for the glittering, but the true.

[B. D., London.]

Let Love train eagles and discard her doves.

[W. A. S., Sale.]

O friend of mine, thou led'st me safe,
Thro' the valley that I went—Past the swamps of Might-have-been
To the hills of Pure Content !

[Z. McC., Whitby.]

The soaring lark above
Takes up the tale of love,

There pois'd on pinion spent,
And on its song intent,

[A. F., Exmouth.]

What a long list at close of day,
If duly writ in pen and ink.
The things we thought but did not say.
The things we said but did not think.

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

O Pilot strong unfurl my sail,
Our barque must skip the sea.
And while the sullen billows wail
Come display thy skill to me.

[L. M. S., London.]

To hide a charm is to display a better.

[H. M. C., Glasgow.]

Serene in boredom's dull tranquillity.

[E. W. H., Manchester.]

Afraid to starve, denied his fill to stuff.
He never knows when he has had enough.
Alike dyspeptic (his digestion such)
Whether he eats too little—or too much.

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

The ceaseless tongue that speaks the senseless mind.

[E. R. W., Farnborough.]

Pardon wouldst have, and yet wouldst hug thy sin ;
Wouldst cling to hell, and yet the heavens wouldst win.

[F. W. S., London.]

... Things that become
As weary-worn as loves that mate too soon.

[E. H. H., London.]

He is the noblest victor in life's fight
Who knows what's wrong and ever does what's right.

[H. G. H., Ruswarp.]

The tortuous pathway to the Peak of Fame.

[E. C. P., London.]

Fame stole his clothes and left him stranded on the sands of Time.

[B. B., Birmingham.]

For God is God, all others are but selves.

[E. A. M., Eltham.]

Gold is the magic wand to which all doors respond :
Save the Divine ones—pure love, good health, and life.

[G. S. A., Ilford.]

Solitude, slum, crowds, parks, and ceaseless sound.
London ! In thee the best and worst are found.

[S., Manchester.]

'Tis better to have lived and died
Than never to have lived at all.

[A. M. C., Leicester.]

Too close the vivid present weaves her spell.
And we are blinded by the visible.

[I. S., Brighton.]

The wayside rose soon drops
Its withered bloom which aids the parent stem,
And with its fading beauty scents the tomb
With sweetest odour of a sainted life.

[W. A., Edinburgh.]

Each failure but a stepping-stone,
To lead to something higher.

[L. M. L., Stafford]

Other replies received from : W. G., Hexham ; E. G., Bradford ; A. F., Exmouth ; R. F. McC., Whitby ; E. S. C., Kidderminster ; A. W., London ; J. S. M., Dundee ; C. R. B., Derby ; F. von S., London ; H. M., London ; E. J. L., London ; W. A., Edinburgh ; T. C., Buxted ; M. J., London.

Competition No. 46 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for a sketch of "The Street I Know Best," not exceeding 200 words.

We again very respectfully ask each competitor to write his name and address on the same sheet as his answer, even when it is thought necessary to send an accompanying letter. We prefer that no letter should be sent.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, August 7. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

The Acts of the Apostles in the Language of the Glibbaway Indians (S.P.C.K.)
Portions of the Common Prayer in Eskimo (S.P.C.K.)
Whitman (C. H.), The Christ of Cynewulf (Longmans & Co.)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Fishwick (Henry), The History of the Parish of Preston (Stock 3s 6d)

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Ames (Percy W.), Chaucer Memorial Lectures, 1900 (Longmans & Co.)

EDUCATIONAL.

Green (G. E.), A Short History of the British Empire (Dent)

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Green (J. R.), An Introduction to Vegetable Physiology (Longmans & Co.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Paget (J. Otho), Hunting (Dent)

NEW EDITIONS.

Linn (Thomas), The Health Resorts of Europe (Kempson)
Mandeville (Sir John), Travels (Macmillan) net 3s 6d

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The AUGUST CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 2 may be had on application, price 2s. 6d., at

1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

15th and 16th CENTURY BOOKS; AMERICANA; 85 LOST or UNKNOWN BOOKS.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION.

Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
241, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.

Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

GEORGE HERIOT'S TRUST.

HERIOT WATT COLLEGE.

The Governors are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the office of PRINCIPAL of the HERIOT WATT COLLEGE, EDINBURGH.

The College exists for the purpose of providing Technical and General Education for the Industrial Classes, and the Principal to be appointed shall devote his whole time to the duties of the office.

Subject to the approval of the Governors, the Principal shall exercise a general supervision over the teaching in the College, and shall have under his control the arrangements and hours of classes, and, generally, the whole organisation, discipline, and arrangement of the College.

A copy of the Calendar, which gives full particulars of the various classes, will be supplied on application.

The Principal must be a Graduate of some University of the United Kingdom.

Salary, £750 per annum. Applications, with thirty copies of Testimonials (limited to fifteen in number), to be lodged with the undersigned on or before 1st September next.

PETER MACNAUGHTON, S.S.C.,
Clerk to the Governors.

20, York Place, Edinburgh,
27th July, 1900.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.—ASSISTANT in the MUSEUM of SCIENCE and ART, EDINBURGH (Industrial Branch) (38-24), 10th AUGUST.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN in the HYDROGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (17-17), 6th SEPTEMBER.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

J. G. CHANCELLOR, M.A. (1st Class,

Classical Tripos), late Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, PREPARES PUPILS for the UNIVERSITIES and all Preliminary Examinations, at his Residence, Cross Deep, Twickenham, Middlesex, a fine old house beautifully and healthily situated on the Thames.

GOVERNESSES for PRIVATE FAMILIES

—MISS LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND several highly-qualified English and Foreign Governesses for Resident and Daily Engagements.—CENTRAL REGISTRY for TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

"Miss Rossi writes with grace, humour, and vivacity."
The Speaker.

LESSONS by CORRESPONDENCE.—The art of Literary Composition, like other arts, cannot be acquired, because it is the expression of the artist's personality.

But, like every other art, it rests on a basis of knowledge, and of principles which may easily be acquired.

The system of instruction is adapted to meet the requirements of each correspondent. A subject is set for a composition of a given length, which is returned with marginal comments and corrections, and, in addition, a couple of sheets giving reasons for each correction, and practical advice.

MSs. already written may be substituted for the subject set, and will be carefully criticised.

Fee, payable in advance: Twelve lessons, Three Guineas; or a trial course of three, One Guinea.

Miss Rossi, 32, Moumouth Road, Bayswater, London, W.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 15, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Cloth elegant, price 4s. 6d.

ATTEMPTS IN VERSE.

By CHARLES H. HOOLE,
Student of Christ Church, Oxford.

RIVINGTONS: 21, King Street, Covent Garden, London.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d. post free.
CONVICTED OF HEROISM. A Tale of John Penny, Martyr, 1559—1593. By HERBERT M. WHITE, B.A. Illustrated by Frank H. Simpson.

"Excellent, unusual grasp of events, nobility of ideal, vividness, and grace of style."
Rev. ARCHIBALD DUFF, D.D.

Twenty-first Thousand. Limp cloth, price 6d., post free.

OUR PRINCIPLES: a Congregationalist Church Manual. By G. B. JOHNSON.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHERD, Limited,
21 and 22, Farnival Street, Holborn, W.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

No. 282.—AUGUST, 1900.

THE LESSONS of the WAR: a Proposed Association.

"ORDINARY BUSINESS PRINCIPLES." By Sir JAMES BLYTH, Bart., Sir WEMYSS REID, Sir ANDREW FAIRBAIRN, Sir JOHN WOLFE BARRY, K.C.B., ALFRED HARMSWORTH, Major McCRA, and HENRY BIRCHINGHOUGH.

OUR INFANTRY. By the Right Hon. the EARL of NORTHBROOK.

HOW to BREED HORSES for WAR. By WILFRID SAWEN BLUNT.

MISSIONARIES in EGYPT. By ARNOLD WARD.

THE NEW COMMONWEALTH. By ALBERT GRADAM BERRY (late Secretary to the Australian Federal Delegates).

THE SLOW GROWTH of MORAL INFLUENCE in POLITICS. By the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of HEREFORD.

THE IMPERIAL NOTE in VICTORIAN POETRY. By J. A. R. MARBRIOTT.

NOTES on PLAYERS and OLD PLAYS. By FREDERICK WEDMORE.

THE SMALL INDUSTRIES of BRITAIN. By PRINCE KROPOTKIN.

AN AMERICAN VIEW of the BOER WAR. By EDWARD J. HODGSON.

SOME UNSEEN STARS. By the Rev. EDMUND LEDGER (Gresham Lecturer on Astronomy).

IN the BYE-WAYS of RURAL IRELAND. (Concluded.) By MICHAEL MACDONAGH.

THE NEWSPAPERS. By Sir WEMYSS REID.

THE CHINESE REVOLT. By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.

VENGEANCE and AFTERWARDS. By EDWARD DICKEY, C.B.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

SPORT in WAR. By Major-General

R. S. S. BADEN-POWELL. Profusely Illustrated by the Author. 1 vol., 3s. 6d.

The Morning Post.—"General Baden-Powell is a keen sportsman and a lively writer, and is well seen in both capacities in this little book, which is brightly illustrated from his own sketches."

THE SOUTH AFRICAN CRISIS.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN CONSPIRACY:

or, The Aims of Afrikanerdom. By FRED. W. BELL, F.S.S. 1 vol., 2s. net.

The Times.—"The matter is one of great importance, and the volume serves a useful purpose in bringing the known facts, and the argument to be deduced from them, within the reach of all."

SECOND IMPRESSION.

THE RISE and FALL of KRUGERISM:

A Personal Record of Forty Years in South Africa. By JOHN SCOBLE, the Times Correspondent in Pretoria prior to the present War, and H. R. ABERCROMBIE, of the Intelligence Department, Cape Colony. Uniform with the "Transvaal from Within." 1 vol., 10s. net.

The Daily Express.—"A most timely book, and one well deserving the serious consideration of all public men."

WHY KRUGER MADE WAR. By J. A.

BUTTERY. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. net.

THE RUSSO CHINESE FRONTIER.

INNERMOST ASIA. By Ralph P.

COBBOLD (late 60th Rifles). With Maps and numerous Illustrations, from Photographs. 1 vol., 21s.

The Graphic.—"This is an exceedingly important as well as an extremely interesting volume. During his travels the author necessarily came into close contact with both Chinese and Russian officials."

NATURE'S GARDEN. An Aid to Knowledge of Wild Flowers and their Insect Visitors. By NELLE BLANCHAN. With Coloured Plates and many other Illustrations, photographed direct from Nature, by Henry Troth and A. R. Dugmore. 1 vol., 12s. 6d. net.

The Standard.—"Nature's Garden" is not only one of the most important, but one of the most beautiful of recent contributions to the Literature of Flowers. We may say, without prejudice to the labours of his predecessors in the fascinating field, that he has contrived to satisfy the most exacting test of excellence."

VILLAGE NOTES. By Pamela Tennant.

Illustrated from Photographs. 1 vol., 6s.

Mr. W. L. COURSEY.—"Mrs. Tennant's book has all the charm of the quaint country she describes. It is full of lumpy things, of descriptions full of a grave and quiet tenderness."

FICTION.

VOICES in the NIGHT. By Flora Annie

STEEL. 6s. Twelfth Thousand.

The Standard.—"A worthy successor of 'On the Face of the Waters.' It is a grave contribution to thought concerning India, as well as an excellent story."

BOWERY TALES:—"MAGGIE" and

"GEORGE'S MOTHER." By STEPHEN CRANE. 5s.

The Illustrated London News.—"Stephen Crane knew the Bowery very well, and in these stories its characteristics come out with the realism of Mr. Arthur Morrison's studies of the East-end. Both are grim and powerful sketches."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE RED BADGE of COURAGE. With cover in colours drawn by R. CATON WOODVILLE. Popular edition. Price 6d.

THE VOICE of the PEOPLE. By Ellen

GLASGOW, Author of "Phases of an Inferior Planet." 6s.

AFRICAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENT.

By A. J. DAWSON. 6s.

The Athenaeum.—"The country is evidently described from personal knowledge and with that sympathy which is the only key to understanding. The book is strong meat—but we thank him for it, and hope he has not exhausted Morocco."

Twenty-fifth Thousand.

EXHIBITION PARIS, 1900. A Practical

Guide. Price 2s. net, sewed; 2s. 6d. net, cloth. Postage 1d. Sold inside and outside the Exhibition.

The Academy.—"THE Guide to Paris."

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON in the TIME of the DIAMOND JUBILEE

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co. Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING; A. W. KINGLAKE; and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE of WIGHT.

BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & PESTINOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading Hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., LTD.

The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers'.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

In cloth gilt, price 3s. 6d.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S NEW NOVEL.

THE MARRIED MISS BINKS.

By the Author of "The Truth Tellers," "The Binks Family."

"As quaint and as funny as ever... Full of lively dialogue and brilliant flashes of wit... A series of clever character sketches."—Yorkshire Herald.

"A book to be secured at the earliest opportunity."—Weekly Dispatch.

"A well-connected plot with a most dramatic climax."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

AN EYE for an EYE: a Mystery. By

WILLIAM LE QUEUX, Author of "Wiles of the Wicked."

THE GODDESS; a Demon. By Richard

MARSH, Author of "The Beetle," "In Full Cry," &c.

THE SHIELD of his HONOUR. By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE, Author of "My Official Wife," &c.

THE FLICK of FORTUNE. By Thomas

PARKES.

F. V. WHITE & CO., 14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

UNWIN'S GREEN CLOTH LIBRARY.

6s. each.

A selected List of the Volumes in this Series.

- The RAIDERS. By S. R. Crockett.
- THE LILAC SUNBONNET. By S. R. CROCKETT.
- THE GREY MAN. By S. R. CROCKETT.
- THE HERB MOON. By John OLIVER HOBBS.
- EVELYN INNES. By George MOORE.
- TALES of UNREST. By Joseph CONRAD.
- PACIFIC TALES. By Louis BECKE.
- RIDÁN the DEVIL. By Louis BECKE.
- THE EBBING of the TIDE. By LOUIS BECKE.
- ARDEN MASSITER. By Dr. WILLIAM BARRY.
- MOONLIGHT. By Mary E. MANN.
- THE PATTEN EXPERIMENT. By MARY E. MANN.
- THE TWO STANDARDS. By Dr. WILLIAM BARRY.
- WAS it RIGHT to FORGIVE? By AMELIA E. BARR.
- The OUTLAWS of the MARCHES. By Lord ERNEST HAMILTON.
- ALMAYER'S FOLLY. By Joseph CONRAD.
- THE SCHOOL for SAINTS. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.
- RODMAN, the BOATSTEERER. By LOUIS BECKE.

UNWIN'S Popular Copyright NOVELS.

2s. 6d. each.

List of the Volumes in this Series.

- TROOPER PETER HALKET of MASHONALAND. By OLIVE SCHREINER.
- GINETTE'S HAPPINESS. By "GYP."
- THE STICKIT MINISTER. By S. R. CROCKETT.
- A WINNING HAZARD. By Mrs. ALEXANDER.
- EFFIE HETHERINGTON. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.
- HALF ROUND the WORLD for a HUSBAND. By MAY CROMMELIN.
- BY REEF and PALM. By Louis BECKE.
- PRISONERS of CONSCIENCE. By AMELIA E. BARR.
- MARGARET FORSTER. By GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.
- BROWN, V.C. By Mrs. Alexander.
- THE ROMANCE of a MIDSHIPMAN. By W. CLARKE RUSSELL.
- THE PLAYACTRESS and MAD SIR UCHTRED of the HILLS. By S. R. CROCKETT.
- THE OVERSEAS LIBRARY.
Paper, 1s. 6d. each; cloth, 2s. each.
NEW VOLUME JUST READY.
- TALES of the PAMPAS. By W. BULFIN (Cré Bruno).
- OTHER VOLUMES IN THIS SERIES.*
- THE IPANE. By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.
- THE CAPTAIN of the LOCUSTS. And other Stories. By W. A. WERNER.
- IN GUIANA WILDS. By James RODWAY.
- THE WELLSINKERS. By Ethel QUIN.
- A CORNER of ASIA. By Hugh CLIFFORD.
- NEGRO NOBODIES. By Noel de MONTAGNAC.
- A WIDE DOMINION. By Harold EINDLOSS.
- AMONG THE MAN-EATERS. By JOHN GAGGIN.
- LITTLE INDABAS. By J. Mac.

CRITICAL STUDIES.

A SET OF ESSAYS.

By OUIDA.

7a. 6d.

CONTENTS.

Gabriel D'Annunzio—Georges Darien—The Italian Novels of Marion Crawford—Le Secret du Précepteur—L'Imperieuse Bonté—Wilfrid Scawen Blunt—Joseph Chamberlain—Unwritten Literary Laws—Auberon Herbert—The Ugliness of Modern Life—The Quality of Mercy—The Decadence of Latin Races—Alma Venesia.

SKETCHES OF IRISH LIFE.

BY A NEW WRITER.

NEIGHBOURS. Being Annals of a Dull Town. By JULIA M. CROTTIE. 6s.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS SERIES.

NEW VOLUME.

NORWAY. By Professor Boyesen. With a Chapter by C. F. KEARY. Fully Illustrated, and with Map and Index. (Cloth, 5s.

FOR LOVERS OF POETRY.

THE POETICAL WORKS of MATHILDE BLIND. Edited by ARTHUR SYMONS, and with an Introduction by RICHARD GARNET, LL.D., C.B. Green cloth, with Helio-gravure Frontispiece, 7s. 6d.

THE WELSH PEOPLE. Their Origin, History, Laws, Language, Literature, and Characteristics. By JOHN RHYS, Principal of Jesus College and Professor of Celtic in the University of Oxford; and D. BRYNMOR JONES, Q.C., M.P. With 2 Maps. Second Edition. Cloth, 16s.

READY SHORTLY.

FAMOUS BRITISH REGIMENTS.

By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS. Fully Illustrated. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of a

QUACK. By S. WEIR MITCHELL, Author of "Hugh Wynne," &c. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

A NEW RELIGIOUS NOVEL.

ALLEN LORNE. By Alexander McDougall. 6s.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1475. Established 1869.

11 August, 1900.

Price Threepence
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE publishing of books has practically ceased, and we must wait till the end of September for the steady flow to begin again. Not that the issue of books ever stops altogether—for no week in the year is without its stray volumes of theology and fiction—but important books must wait for what publishers believe to be more favourable (though more crowded) times. War books continue to be issued, but the response is not keen. We fear that even the Origin of the Anglo-Boer War Revealed, by C. H. Thomas, formerly Orange Free State burgher, will not fire the reading public, or even Miss Marie Corelli's A Social Note on the War. Perhaps General Baden-Powell's book on Mafeking will rouse them.

THE sub-title of Miss Marie Corelli's pamphlet on the war is Patriotism or Self-Advertisement. The distinguished authoress must have blushed when she read the advertisement that is heralding her new book throughout the country. It is called The Master-Christian, and it is dedicated "to all those churches who quarrel in the name of Christ." Here are a few gems from the advertisement:

One of the most remarkable books of recent years.

In vigour of style, in daring of conception, in tenderness and pathos, and in its wide appeal, it presents features of extraordinary interest.

It is impossible to sketch the outlines of this romance, and it is enough to say that it deals with the great problem of humanity and religion—the eternal struggle between the spirit and the flesh.

It will appeal with an irresistible attraction to the Roman Catholic, to the Anglican, to the Nonconformist; to the agnostic and the bigot; to the worldling and to the religious.

It puts into articulate language the inarticulate thoughts of the majority of mankind.

We shall see.

THE decision of the House of Lords, by a majority of four Law Lords to one, that a reporter is entitled to copy-right in the speeches he reports may be good law, but, to the lay, literary mind, it is certainly not common sense. The effect of the decision is admirably put in the following letter which, the Echo says, Mr. Lane received soon after the result of the case:

DEAR SIR,—Since the reporter has been adjudged the owner of copyright in a speech, may I draw your attention to the fact that there are many speeches made annually by various speakers which would have considerable value as literary productions.

As a verbatim author I beg to offer you the next half-dozen speeches to be made by the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Balfour, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Burrell, Mr. Asquith, and Mr. John Morley. They could be brought out as a volume of copyright literary essays, and as there appears to be no necessity for stating by whom the speeches were made, I, as the author, would of course stipulate that my name should appear on the title-page.

We hope this letter will follow the four Law Lords to their moors.

IN spite of Mr. Andrew Lang's protests, the method of inducing distinguished readers to supply "cheap copy" persists. Mr. Frederic Dolman visited the studios of St. John's Wood and Kensington, and persuaded certain painters to tell him which they thought were the greatest pictures in the world. The result, with reproductions of the pictures, is given in the Strand Magazine. Thus:

Sir L. Alma Tadema...	Raphael's "Disputation as to the Sacrament."
Mr. W. P. Frith	Titian's "Sacred and Profane Love."
Sir W. B. Richmond...	Holbein's "Jeweller Morett."
Mr. F. Goodall }	Tintoretto's "Miracle of St. Mark."
Mr. E. A. Abbey }
Mr. Phil Morris.....	Velasquez' "Surrender of Breda."
Mr. Storey	Gainsborough's "Lady Mulgrave."
Mr. B. W. Leader	Turner's "Ulysses."
Mr. G. F. Watts	Raphael's "Sistine Madonna."
Mr. G. H. Boughton...	Titian's "Bacchus and Ariadne."
Mr. Marcus Stone	Millais's "Vale of Rest."
Mr. J. M. Swan.....	Rembrandt's "Lesson in Anatomy."

THE Netherlands South African Railway Company have commenced an action for libel against Mr. FitzPatrick, on account of certain statements contained in his volume, The Transvaal from Within, and also against Mr. William Heinemann, the publisher. Mr. Hawksley will conduct the case of the defendants.

ONE of the new autumn papers is to be called The Leader. It will aim "to make Ireland Irish." Here are a few extracts from the prospectus:

The ideal Ireland which the Review will strive to help to bring about is one which will eventually express itself in its native language, which will not only be a self-governing but a self-contained nation, drawing its inspirations from native sources, possessing its own native outlook on all phases of life, and, while willing to assimilate from outside, determined to slavishly imitate no other nation.

Its methods for helping on the attempt to realise this ideal will be practical. It will face facts as they are, however humiliating; and the actual Ireland, and not the Ireland of dreamers and romancers, will be always kept in view. Though convinced that no real Ireland can exist until Irish is reinstated as the national language, this Review, being practical, will be almost wholly written in English, for the promoters recognise the fact that Ireland has allowed herself to become almost completely English, and we must proceed from what is to what ought to be.

This Review will face everything. Its contributors will include very many of the ablest Irishmen of the day. Shams will be mercilessly ridiculed. Those responsible for "superior English education" will get no peace until they give an Irish education.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS has been staying at Marienbad, where he has been in consultation with Mr. Tree on the subject of his new play "Herod." It will be called "Herod the King," not "The King of the Jews," and will follow "Julius Caesar" at Her Majesty's Theatre.

NEXT Saturday (the 18th) the copyright of Balzac's novels will expire. The present holders, Messrs. Lévy, paid 80,000 francs to Balzac's widow for this copyright in 1865 (thirty years after Balzac's death) and for thirty-five years they have enjoyed the monopoly.

BALZAC's dealings with his publishers were not of a brilliant business order. Under the description, "A Cruel Contract," the Author gives the terms of a specimen bargain entered into by Balzac. This is the Hubert contract, the document of which is in the possession of the Vicomte de Lovenjoul.

In this contract "M. Honoré Balzac" engages to supply (under the pseudonym of Lord R'Noone) a certain sieur Grégoire Hubert, libraire au Palais Royal, with four volumes for publication, entitled Clotilde de Lusignan, for the sum of 2,000 francs. This liberal remuneration is to be received as follows: 500 francs in notes payable at a year's date; 500 francs in notes (payable six months later) at the moment when twelve hundred copies of the work in question shall have been sold. The remaining 1,000 francs are to be paid in notes, likewise dated six months hence—whenever sieur Grégoire Hubert shall be unable to produce on the author's demand more than a hundred copies of this first edition!

But the final article in this iniquitous treaty carries off the palm for munificence. It expressly states that:

"In this sum (of 2,000 francs) is included the cost of the advertisement of the said work, which M. Balzac binds and engages himself to have inserted in the journals below mentioned (or in those which may replace them should they be suppressed), viz., the Constitutionnel, the Journal des Débats, the Courrier, the Miroir, the Quotidienne, and the theatrical papers. The advertisement shall each occupy at least half a column in the body of the journal; and shall be placed either beside the article 'Paris,' or immediately after." To reimburse him for this outlay, the author is entitled to six copies gratis of his own work.

Comment, adds the Author, is superfluous, and it suggests that it was under the financial strain produced by this barbarous treatment that Balzac wrote: "Creditors know how to find us much better and more promptly than our friends. For the sake of a little sum they often come to a place where others do not come for the sake of a great affection."

IN writing on the new American historical novelists a little while ago, we remarked on their mechanical patience in "getting up" their topography and local colour. Mr. Charles Major, the author of When Knighthood was in Flower, doubtless shares these industrious qualities, and a "proof" of it is given with much circumstance by an American contemporary as follows:

When Mr. Charles Major was in London recently, for the first time, he wagered a whitebait dinner with an English friend that he could walk from St. Paul's to the Tower unguided, taking the most direct route, and naming the streets travelled. After they had eaten the whitebait, and the Englishman had paid the bill, Mr. Major confessed to his marvelling host that while writing When Knighthood was in Flower he had been compelled to make a map of that part of old London, and in doing so he studied Stow's Survey with great diligence, working out from the text, block by block, the journey through Cheapside and Billingsgate to the Tower.

But this is an occasion for smiles. The idea of working out the most direct modern route, "block by block," from St. Paul's to the Tower in Stow's Survey is worthy of an American enthusiast; but they do not so learn the way about New York. Stow seems to have served Mr. Major uncommonly badly; for the most direct route from St. Paul's to the Tower is the straight line formed of Cannon-street, Eastcheap, and Great Tower-street. We can understand the route including Billingsgate, because the whitebait had to be bought; but it was the American who should have paid for it!

WHAT is the psychology of a reading craze? What causes scores of thousands of readers to rush for the novels of Miss Fowler, Miss Cholmondeley, Miss Corelli, and Mr. Hall Caine, and then fling them aside, and forget them? What explains the boom of Trilby and the doom of Trilby? An American writer seeks the aid of scientific phraseology to explain these mysteries. He says: "Such phenomena indicate an interruption of the action of the higher brain centres and, in consequence, an undue activity of the lower brain centres"; and he thinks that a diffused hypnotic suggestion is at the bottom of the big sales enjoyed by novels of no lasting merit.

How else are we to account for the fact that tens of thousands of intelligent readers are found absorbed in books which are destined in a few months to permanent oblivion; that large editions of certain books are delivered to booksellers in advance of any legitimate demand; that a multitude of people accept without hesitation the judgment of newspapers as to the literary or artistic merit of books, whose opinions on other subjects would have no weight with them at all?

Admitting that fiction has its place as a means of literary culture, it would seem that most readers have ceased to exercise any rational choice and allow themselves to be controlled by their lower brain centres. . . . These crazes of the reading public are incident to an imperfect stage of development. As the higher centres become more highly developed, a rational choice will more effectively control the selection of reading. The literature which has established its claim to permanence will take its true place.

THERE is a characteristic article in The Contemporary on Eleonora Duse, by Mr. Arthur Symons, which is an amusing as well as interesting contribution to its subject.

Her eyes [says Mr. Symons] are like a drowsy flame. Her stillness is the stillness of one in act to spring. There is no transition from the energy of speech to the energy of silence. When she speaks, the words leap from her lips one after another, hurrying, but always in coloured clothes, and with beautiful movements. As she listens silently to music, she seems to remember, and to drink in nourishment for her soul, as she drinks in perfume, greedily, from flowers, as she possesses a book or a picture, almost with violence. I have never seen a woman so passionate after beauty. I have never seen a woman so devoured by the life of the soul, by the life of the mind, by the life of the body.

When she talks intently with someone whose ideas interest her, she leaves her chair, comes and sits down quite close, leans over till her face almost touches one's face, the eyes opening wider and wider, until one sees an entire rim of white about the great brown pupils; but, though she occasionally makes a gesture, she never touches one, never lays her hand on one's sleeve; remains impersonal, though so close.

Here are a few of Duse's words written down by Mr. Symons from memory:

"Do you remember what Flaubert, that little priest, said of Shakespeare? 'If I had met Shakespeare on the stairs, I should have fainted.' The people I would like to have met are Shakespeare and Velasquez.

"Could I live without the stage? You should not have said that. I have passed three years without acting. I act because I would rather do other things. If I had my will I would live in a ship on the sea, and never come nearer to humanity than that."

IN reference to the forthcoming Clarendon Press edition of the Imitatio Christi, Messrs. Methuen point out to us that the edition they publish is in all respects a "faithful" translation, and can therefore challenge comparison in this respect with future versions.

To the Library World Mr. Thomas Aldred, Librarian of St. George-the-Martyr Public Library, is contributing a useful list of Sequel Stories. The instalment in the August number ranges from H to S, and includes the following interesting entries:

HOWELLS, W. D.
Chance Acquaintance.
Their Wedding Journey.

HUGHES, T.
Tom Brown's Schooldays.
Tom Brown at Oxford.

HUO, V.
Les Misérables.
Fantine.
Cosette and Marius.
Jean Valjean.

HUYSMANS, J. K.
En Route.
The Cathedral.

JAMES, H.
Roderick Hudson.
Princess Casamassima.

LYTTON, LORD.
Ernest Maltravers.
Alice.

The Caxtons.
My Novel.
What Will He Do With It.

"Zicci" was Completed as "Zamoni."

MACDONALD, G.
Annals of a Quite Neighbourhood.
Seaboard Parish.
Vicar's Daughter.

Malcolm.
Marquis of Lossie.

Sir Gibbie.
Donald Grant.

Thomas Wingfold, Curate.
Paul Faber, Surgeon.

MACLAREN, IAN (J. M. Watson).
Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush.
Days of Auld Lang Syne.
Kate Carnegie.

MELVILLE, H.
Typee.
Omoo.

MEREDITH, G.
Sandra Belloni (same as Emilia in England).
Vittoria.

MOORE, GEORGE.
Evelyn Innes.
Sister Teresa.

OLIPHANT, Mrs.
Chronicles of Carlingford.
The Rector.
The Doctor's Family.
Salem Chapel.
The Perpetual Curate.
Miss Marjoribanks.
Phoebe, Junior.

"OUIDA" (Louise De La Ramée).
Princess Napraxine.
Othmar.

READE, C.
It is Never Too Late to Mend.
Autobiography of a Thief.
Love Me Little Love Me Long.
Hard Cash.

THE art of advertising a problem-novel appears to be thoroughly understood by the publishers of an American novel called The Redemption of David Corson. Being a purpose-novel, it is "destined to produce an aftermath of critical conflict." The advertisement proceeds with delightful naïveté: "One can give some idea of the cause of this inevitable storm from a outline of the story." But the tit-bit is the quotation of two opinions already given on the book:

Newell Dwight Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, writing in the Bookman, classes it with David Grieve, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, and The Damnation of Theron Ware, and finds in it "a strong, healthy, buoyant note." He says: "David Corson enters the scene clothed with the fascination that only the strong possess. He dreams, he sings, he sees visions of the future, he is tempted, he loves, he hesitates, he sins, he falls, he wakes with a shock of horror, he climbs slowly upward upon the rounds down which he descended, he conquers our admiration and our love."

Maunice Thompson, in an extended discussion of the book in another literary magazine, differs radically from the Bookman's review. He points out that the love between David Corson and Peepeta "is worked up to the highest pitch of passion," and that there has never been a novel in which it "is more vehemently described or more persistently kept before the reader. It does not follow," he adds, "that because God has made possible the redemption of a profligate, it is right to describe him in a dramatic story for fireside reading."

Do you not feel the storm, the aftermath, the conflict, and the rest coming? But why do they travel so slowly?

THE Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science for July contains an interesting and apparently exhaustive paper on "The American Newspaper." Facts and statistics are accumulated and arranged with great care, mainly with the object of showing what is the general moral tone of American newspapers. The space devoted to "vice and crime," to sport, society news, literature, &c., &c., is calculated and reduced to a percentage. But we do not think that we can quote the author's figures with any effect; the article must be studied as a whole. It conveys to the English reader a useful idea of the conditions of journalism in America. St. Louis and Cincinnati are now "the most notable centres of yellow journalism. These two centres keep remarkably close together in the table of percentages. Both stand high in illustrations, medical advertisements, and news of crime and vice; while they stand very low in letters and exchanges, editorials, literature, and retail advertisements. It is significant that Joseph Pulitzer, proprietor of the New York World, got his training in yellow journalism as manager of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch." The force of the expression, "training in yellow journalism," may be understood by a statement concerning a former editor of the St. Louis Globe Democrat, whose influence was felt far and wide. This editor defined the most successful newspaper manager as the man who best knew where hell was going to break out next, and had a reporter on the spot.

THAT "yellow" journalism is still largely in the hands of its few pioneers seems clear from the following statement:

If we were to count as yellow journals of the deepest dye those which give more than one-third of their space to yellow matter, we should find seven—four owned by W. R. Hearst, and two owned and one founded by Joseph Pulitzer. This fact, that the seven yellowest great dailies in the United States have been or are now under the control of one of two men, is an indication of the immense opportunity for the expression of individuality in journalism. The New York World and the New York Journal have an incalculable influence in the United States. During the late war they claimed a daily circulation of more than a million copies each, and they were hawked upon the streets of distant cities. Their influence does not arise from popular confidence in them, but is rather the influence of association and success. Everywhere, like omnipresent rowdies, these papers make themselves felt.

A Scribner's Magazine poetess, Miss Mary Young, has found a way of presenting the "teaching" of Omar in terms to which even Mr. A. H. Millar can take no exception. "How Granuy Reads Her Omar" is the title of a set of quatrains, which are a charmingly witty variant of the Rubáiyát. Out of six stanzas we take the liberty of quoting four:

VII.

Come, now! cheer up an' have a cup o' tea!
Things ain't so hard's you make 'em out to be
Be happy while you can: time ain't so long
But what it soon must end fer you an' me.

XIII.

Some wants the earth. Yes; an' there do be some That's everlastin' wantin' Kingdom Come—
You hang to what you've got, an' leave the rest
To them as ain't contented here at hum.

CL.

'Twon't pleasure me ter have you mourn fer me—
I'd rather yon'd be happy, as I be,
So when you pass my empty place, jest stop
An' laugh a little laugh fer me to see.

By the way, it is storied that the Shah, being spoken to recently about the Omar Khayyám Club, asked: "Who is Omar Khayyám?"

Bibliographical.

"I FANCY," I said last week, "that the latest bibliography of Mr. Swinburne dates as far back as 1887." I was thinking of separate publications, and now an esteemed correspondent informs me that some copies of the Swinburne bibliography (by Mr. Wise) contained in the second volume of Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century (1896) were struck off and issued separately, being now priced by booksellers at a guinea or more. My correspondent says of Mr. Wise's work that "though it contains one or two trifling errors in minutiae, and is not quite complete, it is a most valuable production, and a thousand times superior to that of Mr. Richard Herne Shepherd, to which 'The Bookworm' alludes." All the more reason that it should be published in the ordinary way, and at a price which would put it within the reach of persons with moderate incomes. The Sunday Times, by the way, has been making an amusing blunder in connexion with the recent sale at Sotheby's of certain first editions and autograph copies of Mr. Swinburne's works. "The books," says our contemporary, "included some of the poet's lesser known dramatic poems, such as 'Joseph and His Brethren'!" No doubt the allusion is to the edition of "Joseph" published in 1876 with a critical introduction by Mr. Swinburne.

Sir Henry Irving is responsible for a good deal of recent "chatter" about "Manfred." His hint to the effect that he might perhaps put that work upon the Lyceum stage has brought down upon him a small avalanche of pathetic entreaty. "For heaven's sake," the cry has been, for the most part, "don't produce 'Manfred'!" Mr. Clement Scott has declared that the revival at Drury-lane in 1863 bored him tremendously; but we know, from his Journal of a Playgoer, that Henry Morley was not bored by it. Moreover, in 1863 as in 1831, when first produced, the work was a success with the public. Roden Noel, one of the latest and most sympathetic of Byron's critics, admits that "the poem is virtually a monologue, though a hunter appears, and an old abbot"; but even more to the purpose is the judgment Byron himself pronounced upon his performance in a letter to Murray in 1817. Therein he described "Manfred" as "a kind of poem in dialogue in three acts, but of a very wild, metaphysical, and inexplicable kind; . . . the hero, a kind of magician who is tormented by a species of remorse, the cause of which is left unexplained. The first two acts," continued the poet, characteristically, "are the best; the third so-so; but I was blown with the first and second heats."

Mr. Newbolt, who is to edit the new monthly review, first came to the front, as we all know, as the author of the booklet of verse called Admirals All. That was in the autumn of 1897; but, rather more than two years previously, Mr. Newbolt had published a tragedy called Mordred, which, I am obliged to confess, I have not read (making, indeed, a point of not reading new tragedies—if I can help it!). Mordred, again, had been preceded by a little story from Mr. Newbolt's pen, entitled Taken from the Enemy (1892), one of Messrs. Chatto's series of "Handy Novels." In 1898, it will be remembered, came The Island Race, a volume of verse which included Admirals All; and it is to Mr. Newbolt, I believe, that we owe the Stories from Froissart, published by Wells Gardner last year. These, I think, embody all Mr. Newbolt's acknowledged contributions to literature, up to now.

WE are to have, it seems, a volume of reminiscences from Mr. Herman Merivale, who has just been discoursing in M.A.P. of "the days of his youth." The book should prove eminently readable, for Mr. Merivale has met many interesting people and seen many interesting things. As I pointed out some time ago in this column, Mr. Merivale has done little in the purely literary sphere, in which he was so well qualified to shine. It is as a dramatist, and especially as one of the authors of "All for Her" and "Forget-me-Not," that he will be remembered. His powers as a wit and humorist are best seen in "The Lady of Lyons Married and Settled," an extravaganza which, besides being full of admirable dialogue, contains lyrics which Mr. Gilbert might have fathered. Note, particularly, Claude's song in praise of the Darwinian theory, and the parody of "Sally in Our Alley." The former reminds one agreeably of Mortimer Collins's lines on the Positivists, which, by the way, came first.

Mr. Tighe Hopkins is to give us a volume of stories entitled The Silent Gate: a Voyage into Prison, and dealing with English prison-life to-day. It will be remembered that Mr. Hopkins is already the author of Kilmainham Memories: the Story of the Greatest Political Crime of the Century, and also of Dungeons of Old Paris: Story and Romance of Celebrated Prisons of the Monarchy and the Revolution. He bids fair to be recognised as a specialist in the history of famous "places of detention."

The appearance of the Areopagitica, and other prose by Milton, in the Temple Library, reminds one that the former work was reprinted so recently as 1898 under the editorship of Mr. J. W. Hales. Prior to that came the collection of Milton's prose which Henry Morley edited in 1889 for the Carisbrooke Library, which in its turn had been preceded by a cheap reprint in Cassell's National Library. Mr. Ernest Myers's selection from Milton's prose dates as far back as 1884.

THE ACADEMY has already announced the arrival in England of Mr. Henry Lawson, the Australian writer, author of While the Billy Boils and In the Days when the World was Wide. The first of these works was published in England, I find, three years ago; the other, apparently, has not been reprinted here, or, if reprinted, only recently. I fear that a good many of us have yet to make acquaintance with them.

Mr. Murray is going to issue in the autumn a half-crown edition of Darwin's Origin of Species. That will be a boon to many. The current (sixth) edition, originally published in 1891, is a post 8vo at six shillings (less discount).

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Tombs of the Writers.

Westminster Abbey. By G. E. Troutbeck. (Methuen. 3s.)

IN comeliness, and perhaps in completeness, Mr. Troutbeck's work must take the first place among small handbooks to the Abbey. We are convinced, too, of its accuracy. On page 210 the date of the death of Gay is given as 1782, an obvious misprint for 1732: no other error has caught our eye. Mr. Troutbeck gives more space to the history and architecture of the building than Mr. Hare in his well-known guide. But Mr. Hare has more anecdote and quotation. The Abbey lover will naturally possess himself of both books, and if he stow the twain in his pockets to assist his meditations among the tombs he will not be over-weighted. Our own regret, which is perhaps unreasonable, is that Mr. Troutbeck has not given us a bigger book, which would yet come within the description of pocket literature. A guide which should intervene between the ordinary small handbook and Dean Stanley's exhaustive but unpocketable work would surely have found a peculiarly warm welcome. With all his efforts and manifest ability to make his subject glow, Mr. Troutbeck's limitations of space are felt by the reader as heavy and thwarting barriers, and the more so because the book is written and printed in a manner which suggests a more literary and discursive treatment than is found in existing handbooks. We feel this in the pages devoted to Poets' Corner. We have not Dean Stanley's work by us at the moment, but we recollect the charm of the passages in which he shows us how the poets came to lay their bones in the Abbey, as members of a poetic family desiring to take their rest side by side. Chaucer was the first of our singers to lay his bones in Poets' Corner. His grey marble tomb, erected a century and a half after his death, is still the most beautiful and venerable object in this part of the Abbey. He had but a short journey to take from his bed to his grave, for his last days were spent in a tenement in the Abbey garden, on ground now covered by the Chapel of Henry VII. His last words, said to have been dictated on his death-bed, are quoted by Mr. Troutbeck, and should always be given in connexion with Chaucer's passing:

Here is no home, here is but wilderness.
Forth, pilgrim! forth, O beast, out of thy stall!
Look up on high, and thank thy God of all.
Control thy lust; and let thy spirit thee lead;
And Truth shall thee deliver; 'tis no dread.

Chaucer's grave was a magnet. Spenser, Drayton, Tennyson, and Browning lie near him. Spenser's first Latin epitaph, long superseded, contained the words:

Hic prope Chaucerum situs est Spenserius illi
Proximus ingenio, proximus et tumulo.

This inscription, set up by Anne Clifford, Countess of Dorset, was replaced in 1778 by an epitaph which, with all its beauty, lacks that suggestion of fellowship with the author of the Canterbury Tales. It runs: "Here lyes (expecting the second coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus) the body of Edmond Spencer, the prince of poets in his tyme, whose divine spirit needs noe othir wnesse than the workes which he left behind him." Francis Beaumont was the next poet to join his brothers. He had walked often in the Abbey, tasted its dust, and become enamoured of its riches:

Here's an acre sown indeed
With the richest, royallest seed;

Here are sands, ignoble things,
Dropt from the ruin'd sides of kings.

Drayton followed, and again an Anne Clifford was the giver of a poet's monument. Ben Jonson usually receives the credit of the epitaph, but Quarles may deserve it. It is the earliest poet's epitaph on a poet which remains in the Abbey. Mr. Troutbeck gives it thus:

Doe, pious marble, let thy readers knowe
What they and what their children owe
To Drayton's name, whose sacred dust
We recommend unto thy trust.
Protect his mem'ry and preserve his storye,
Remaine a lastinge monument of his glorie;
And when thy ruins shall diselame
To be the tresrer of his name,
His name, that cannot fade, shall be
An everlasting monument to thee

How this fellowship of the dead poets was felt in Elizabethan times is seen in the lines in which a forgotten poet pleads for a place for the bones of Shakespeare, who died in the same year as Beaumont:

Renowned Spenser, lie a thought more nigh
To learned Chaucer: and, rare Beaumont, lie
A little nearer Spenser, to make room
For Shakespeare in your threefold fourfold tomb.

To which—when Shakespeare's remains had been laid at Stratford—Ben Jonson replied:

My Shakespeare, rise, I will not lodge thee by Chaucer or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie
A little further off to make thee room.
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
And art alive still while thy book doth live
And we have wits to read, and praise to give.

It is delightful to think that Ben Jonson is in the Abbey. He had irradiated love and praise among his fellow poets at the Mermaid, yet his chances of joining them in the long fellowship of the grave were not of the brightest. Poverty and neglect darkened his latter days. Some premonition that he might be shut out of the noble company of the Voiceless seems to have haunted his mind. There is an Abbey legend that points to this. It is said that one day, being rallied by the Dean of Westminster about being buried in Poets' Corner, Jonson remarked: "I am too poor for that, and no one will lay out funeral charges upon me. No, sir, 6 feet long by 2 feet wide is too much for me; 2 feet by 2 will do all I want." "You shall have it," said the Dean. Apocryphal as the story sounds, its essential truth is supported by the fact that in 1849, when Sir Robert Watson's grave was being made, the Clerk of the Works "saw the two leg-bones of Jonson, fixed bolt upright in the sand, as though the body had been buried in the upright position; and the skull came rolling down among the sand, from a position above the leg-bones, to the bottom of the newly made grave. There was still hairs upon it, and it was of a red colour." Unfortunately the grave is not in Poets' Corner at all, as Jonson's bust (on the same wall as the monuments of Spenser and Milton) may lead the innocent pilgrim to believe. Mr. Troutbeck is careful to point out that Jonson's actual resting-place—and the original slab over his remains, with the words, "O Rare Ben Jonson" cut upon it—must be sought in the north aisle of the nave. The stone has been placed against the wall for its better preservation. Gifford says that a nobler monument was intended by Jonson's friends, but till this was ready nothing more was required than to cover his ashes decently with the stone which had been removed. While this was doing, Aubrey tells us, Sir John Young, of Great Milton, Oxfordshire, whom he familiarly calls Jack Young, chanced to pass through the Abbey, and, not enduring that the remains of so great a man should lie at all without a memorial, gave one of the workmen eighteenpence to cut the words in question. The subscription was fully successful, but the troubles which were hourly becoming more serious, and which not long after broke out into open rebellion, prevented the execution of the monument, and the money was returned to the subscribers.

The same words, "O Rare Ben Jonson," appear under the Poets' Corner bust, which is Jonson's real monument. Mr. Troutbeck might just have noted the fact that here the poet's name is spelt "Johnson." High up in his corner, near the door, Jonson looks down with a kind of satisfaction—a humble yet festive figure—on the sepulchres of the poets. Many of these cover men whom he knew and loved, and not one, perhaps, holds a heart to which he had given needless pain.

Jonson was succeeded in the poet laureateship to Charles I. by Sir William Davenant, whose grave is inscribed "O rare Sir William Davenant." Davenant's is one of the Abbey funerals that we can picture. Pepys writes on April 9, 1668:

I up and down to the Duke of York's playhouse, there to see, which I did, Sir W. Davenant's corpse carried out towards Westminster, there to be buried. Here were many coaches and six horses, and many hacknies, that made it look, methought, as if it were the buriall of a poor poet. He seemed to have many children, by five or six in the first mourning-coach, all boys.

Almost in the same year Abraham Cowley came to lie near Chaucer. He was gloriously interred, being "conveyed to Westminster," says Evelyn, "in a hearse with six horses and all funeral decency, near a hundred coaches of noblemen and persons of quality following; among these all the wits of the town, divers bishops, and clergymen." All the wits of the town and divers bishops—what a following! The coming of Dryden in 1700 was a great event in the annals of "Poets' Corner." The stories of a turbulent funeral are unpleasant and unauthenticated enough to be set aside. No poet has a simpler and nobler tomb than Dryden. He was buried so close to Chaucer that Chaucer's tombstone is said to have been sawn asunder in making the grave. At first he suffered the epitaph neglect from which Jonson was saved by a passer-by; and Pope drew attention to the homelessness of "Dryden's awful dust" in his epitaph for Rowe:

Beneath a rude and nameless stone he lies,
To which thy tomb shall guide inquiring eyes.

It is said to have been on this hint that Dryden's patron, Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire, erected a bust, which was soon replaced by the present one, a masterpiece of Scheemaker's. Dryden is one of those poets whose enmities needed the reconciliations of the Abbey. It is curious, nevertheless, that Shadwell's bust and Dryden's are removed as far from each other as possible, and that their faces are averted from each other's gaze in a way that is rather amusing when noticed on the spot. The grinding scorn of Dryden's lines—

And for my foes, may this their blessing be,
To talk like Doeg, and to write like thee—can hardly be forgotten in the Abbey. Next to Shadwell rests Dryden's far more dangerous critic, Prior, who ridiculed his reign at Will's Coffee House:

'Tis schism, a damned offence,
To question his, or trust your private sense.

Why is Prior so little remembered as a man? He must have been a delightful fellow, or he could not have spent so many evenings with Swift; the Diary to Stella is full of Prior. He was liker Horace than any poet we have bred, though he rather desired Horace's life than lived it. One wish of his needs no better expression than he gave to it:

Great Mother, let me once be able
To have a garden, house, and stable,
That I may read, and write, and plant,
Superior to desire or want;
And as health fails, and years increase,
Sit down, think, and die in peace.

Addison had preceded Prior to the Abbey by two years.

He was, so to speak, born to be buried in the Abbey. His piety, his learning, his wit, his predilections, and his achievements, fitted and entitled him to such honour. And his is the classic Abbey funeral. "On the north side of that Chapel," says Macaulay, "in the vault of the House of Albemarle, the coffin of Addison lies next to the coffin of Montague. Yet a few months; and the same mourners passed again along the same aisle. The same sad anthem was again chanted. The same vault was again opened; and the coffin of Craggs was placed close to the coffin of Addison." How one likes to add that a century and a half later, at the foot of Addison's statue in Poets' Corner, was laid the coffin of Macaulay. But it is, of course, in Tickell's grand ode that Addison's obsequies haunt literature:

How silent did his old companions tread,
By midnight lamps, the mansions of the Dead,
Through breathing statues, then unheeded things,
Through rows of warriors, and through walks of Kings!
What awe did the slow solemn knell inspire;
The pealing organ, and the pausing choir;
The duties by the lawn-rob'd prelate pay'd;
And the last words, that Dust to Dust convey'd!
While speechless o'er thy closing grave we bend,
Accept these tears, thou dear departed friend.
Oh, gone for ever! take this long adieu;
And sleep in peace, next thy lov'd Montague.

By such glorious burials has Poets' Corner been commended and ratified to the poets of England. Three centuries ago Fuller, seeing how Poetry was making herself a last home here, wrote:

Chaucer lies buried in the south aisle of St. Peter's, Westminster, and now hath got the company of Spenser and Drayton, a pair royal of poets enough almost to make passengers' feet to move metrically, who go over the place where so much poetical dust is interred.

How much more now, when even poets who do not lie here are represented by monuments in the spot which of all others in England is sacred to Poetry. Shakespeare, Milton, Gray, Thomson, Goldsmith, Southey, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Matthew Arnold, Scott, and many others who lie in English churches, or under the shade of yews, have their monuments here. There are, indeed, many names wholly missing. Neither Shelley's nor Byron's can be found. These exclusions can be understood in a narrow and obvious view; but will public opinion sanction them always? Keats's monument must surely come. Herrick and Sidney among the older poets are nameless, and minor poets so English as Crabbe and so rare as Landor; but to ask for monuments to these were to ask too much.

Romance and Banking.

Coutts & Co., Bankers, Edinburgh and London. By Ralph Richardson. (Stock. 7s. 6d.)

To look only at the back of this book and read Coutts & Co. is calculated to awaken a mingled train of reflections. It is a signature one likes to see on a cheque; but the name in a book suggests a tale of financial operations, long rows of figures and percentages that scarcely are calculated to provoke a violent human interest. Yet we are greatly mistaken if even the lazy general reader, lightly skimming the page for amusement, will not conclude before he is done that the title is the only forbidding thing about it. Mr. Richardson has brought much skill to the making of this book: a fine taste in selecting pictures; a style as sound as it is agreeable; and, above all, a keen sympathy with many phases of life and manners. The annals of any great banking house are likely to make good reading; but the family of Coutts has had so much to do with the familiar figures of the past and the present, that there is a special justification for drawing up this authentic account of it. Two of the most striking episodes are more or less generally known, but they are treated here very fully: one is the story of the pretty housemaid; the other that of the lady in the green mantle.

John Coutts, the founder of the banking house and Lord Provost of Edinburgh, had two sons, one of whom was the celebrated Thomas Coutts. Mr. Richardson skilfully disentangles his character from its contradictory aspects. He was a martinet in business; most precise in his dealings; prudent and yet bold when boldness was needed; a just, but strict, master. He was so punctual that people in the Strand could set their clocks from his habit of entering the bank at the stroke of nine. Yet he did not, in a metaphor, carry his ledgers home with him. When the day's work was done, the wealthiest banker of his age relapsed into a singularly cultured private gentleman, modest to the point of meanness in dress, but a lavish host, and a faithful, generous friend. His brother had in his service, to quote from a contemporary pamphlet, "a blooming young rustic," who was much admired for "the freshness of her complexion and the beauty of her features." She was also, we are told, "clean, industrious, and good-humoured." They always called her Betty as a housemaid, but her right name was Susan. With her Thomas fell in love, and in due time they were married and lived in St. Martin's-lane, where wit and fashion came a-visiting, and found little to censure in the servant-lass transformed to a lady. Her granddaughter is the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, the youngest of her children, Sophia, having married, in 1793, Sir Francis Burdett, Bart., M.P., the father of the Baroness. But that simple tale does not complete the romance of Thomas Coutts. The poor housemaid, who began by scrubbing the stairs of the bank, did not enjoy her new-found prosperity very long. She was for many years before her death, in 1814, afflicted with deafness and imbecility, the results of an illness. Thus deprived of her company, Coutts, naturally enough, took to his ancient bachelor habit of spending many evenings at the play: that is how he came to meet a theatrical star of the day, "the handsomest Audrey on the stage," Harriott Mellon. Her subsequent career is the best proof of her virtue; but she was what one would call a product of her time and environment. She was forty-five years younger than Mr. Coutts, and had never seen her father, her mother, after her birth, marrying a strolling player and musician, and her early memories being of the day when, at the heels of this Bohemian couple, she rambled through hamlet and village. Some charitable ladies, pitying her condition, sent her to school, whence she duly emerged to wear the luskin in booth and barn, and, finally, establish her fame as an actress. The interest she excited in Mr. Coutts appears to have been paternal; but these were days of scandalous newspapers, and the venomous scribes began to talk of "a certain rich banker's relish for melon," and "the celebrated actress who made a slip near an eminent banking house," and so on. About a month after his wife's death, to end this defamation, he proposed marriage to this actress. He had previously requested her not to act any more, the occasion being when she appeared as Audrey at Drury-lane "in a rather short petticoat revealing yellow silk stockings with black clocks." The public was enthusiastic, but "dear old Tom," as she called him, somewhat scandalised. He died at eighty-seven, leaving her all his money; and, five years later, she went again to the altar, this time as the bride of "William Aubrey de Vere, ninth Duke of St. Albans." She had no children, and at her death, in 1837, restored her fortune to the Coutts family, "her heiress being the Baroness Burdett-Coutts." Strolling vagabond, actress, rich banker's wife, Duchess—what an experience to go through, and leave at the end a really noble reputation!

Sir Walter Scott's "three years of dreaming and two of wakening" have, as he foresaw, already been chronicled, notably by Adam Scott in his book Sir Walter Scott's First Love, but the story of the girl in the green mantle comes in appropriately here since the poet's successful rival (his staunch and life-long friend too) was Sir William Forbes, of Pitsligo, eldest son of Sir William Forbes, banker at Edinburgh and apprentice and successor to Coutts & Co., of that city. "Down, down a hundred thoughts," wrote Scott when in the cloudy setting of his career Sir William Forbes stood by him in the hour of need. Keats used to maintain that the loss of Willamina Stuart shed the glory of pensive romance over all his subsequent literary work. It is a tempting theme the effect of grief's shock upon character, and many is the strong man who has repeated with a sense of awe the mystical sense of it dawning upon him: "Thou shalt lay the foundations in thy firstborn and in thy youngest son shalt thou set up the gates thereof." At the end of The Lady of the Lake Scott explains how he found distraction and consolation under the blow—

That I outlived such woes Enchantress is thine own.

Although we have touched only on those events that have been merely incidental to the history of this banking house, it ought to be said that the author has traced the career of the family with a lucidity beyond praise. The critical moments in its fortunes are vividly and dramatically described. Almost as much is owed to good luck as good guiding. On disastrous Black Monday (June 8, 1772) when "in Edinburgh the fallen banks lay thick as leaves in Vallombrosa," a quidnunc set it abroad that £2,000,000 in specie had arrived at Coutts's Bank from London—the sum being, in point of fact, only £3,000, and distracted shareholders drew what money they could from every other concern and poured it into the only one that seemed safe!

Apart from such exciting episodes the history of the bank leaves a very pleasant impression of men, very independent it is true and bull-necked, yet at the same time cultured, kind, generous, charitable, fit all of them to be kith and kin of the gentle lady whose name is a household word loved and revered almost as much as is that of the Queen herself.

Authorised Confessions.

A Day in the Cloister. Adapted from the German of Don Sebastian von Oer, O.S.B., of St. Martin's Abbey, Beuron, by Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B., of St. Thomas's Abbey, Erdington. (Sands.)

A BOOK written about monkery by a monk, and bearing an archbishop's imprimatur, is suspect. One does not hope to find it in any true sense a human document, or from it to learn aught of the heart that beats beneath the habit and the voiceless tragedies that pulsate in the Great Silence. Benedictine history one divines to be a good deal more picturesque than it shows in these placid pages: the story of souls rent by doubt and terror; of imperious instincts batted down, of energies boxed up; of spirits sunk in sloth, voracious of small pleasures, jealous of inconsiderable dignities; of mere negations with brains of melted butter;—on the other hand, of simple sterling souls, pious and practical, and here and there of a hero of the supernatural life who, through much tribulation, has won his unitive way into the holy of holies, to a peace that is not merely the cessation from strife, but the intelligent, sensitive fruition of God.

True, we could hardly demand to be taken so deeply into confidence; but that does not preclude a certain resentment at the showman's resolute appeal. Aren't we picturesque? he seems at every turn to demand. We feel that there is in this bid for admiration a certain manque de tact. The Benedictine Office books and the Rule are accessible; the great houses offer a generous hospitality to any who may desire to know of the doctrine whether it be of God; men fitted by temperament to be observers and interpreters have found in the monastic life a worthy subject for their art. Yet here must this English monk drag from the proper obscurity of its native German a flagrant réclame that, for style and manner, would do credit to the promoters of a provincial "hydro."

The monk's lot is to be a freewill offering, and by the oblation of himself to merit the forgiveness of his God, and to win for himself the grace of a happy death. And the anxiety to ensure this particular favour is so fervent as to have given rise to the tradition that in a certain abbey (not named) "three days before the death of a religious a white rose was found in his place in choir; he who found it took it up silently, and prepared himself for death." The signs of the religious vocation are, says St. Benedict in the 58th chapter of his Holy Rule, to be judged by four tests:

- (1) Whether he who knocks at the door of the cloister truly seeks God; (2) whether he be zealous for the work of God; (3) whether he be desirous of obedience; (4) whether he be prepared for humiliations and contempt.

The novitiate, which lasts a year, is initiated with elaborate ceremonies that conclude with the washing of the novice's feet by the abbot. The solemn profession, its natural sequel, is still more dramatic. The accumulated ingenuity of centuries has left nothing to the imagination. The new religious is put fairly to bed in his coffin while the Mass proceeds, and is roused at the moment of Communion by the voice of one who assumes the rôle of the angel of the resurrection. Henceforth he is bound to the recitation of the Divine Office, in which many hours of the day and night are spent. That function is essentially dramatic.

The whole choir turn, bend, kneel, rise up as one man, with a rhythmic regularity inspired by the most lively devotion.

"Inspired by the most lively devotion!"—inspired by tradition, habit, routine; more or less of devotion may accompany the customary observances. Indeed, the author shambles on:

St. Bernard once saw an angel writing down the prayers of the monks, some with letters of gold, some of silver, others of black ink, or colourless water, according as they differed in value before God. But it is always a consolation for the weak and faltering to know that their prayer, united with and borne up by the strong, will reach the ear of God; just as their voices, chiming in with the rest, are wafted upwards in one common harmony. It is as when the eagle bears its young aloft upon its outstretched wings to accustom them, by degrees, to behold the sun.

It may be; we take the liberty to doubt it. But let us return to our monk. At some time or other he is ordained priest. Then, in addition to the singing of the Office, he celebrates day by day the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. Here is a dramatic moment of the day:

The sacristy door opens and a company of priests come forth, vested for Mass, their heads covered with the white amice, to the different altars, which are already lighted up. At twelve different points, on twelve altars of the Abbey Church, the same drama is being enacted. . . . To the eye of faith each altar becomes a Calvary; we hear the blows of the executioner's hammer, and the sighs of the Crucified, the little bell rings, and lo! His holy Body is there, lifted up between earth and heaven.

The monk's most important intercourse with the outside world has the confessional for its channel:

The confessional in the monastery is a place of special grace, and as such is highly valued and greatly sought after by pious souls. Many, too, frequent it who have long resisted the warning call; there many a hardened heart is touched, and many a sacrilegious [i.e. incomplete] confession repented of and repaired. Oh! if we could but see, as with the eyes of his good angel, how that sinner who but now, defiled as a leper, slowly and hesitatingly entered the tribunal of penance, has come forth cleansed in the Blood of the Lamb, and radiant in the white robe of innocence! . . . These are miracles of grace, such as are daily wrought in silence, and are but little known to the outer world.

When he is not in the chapel or the refectory, or taking recreation in the garden, the father is in his cell.

Naturally this "workshop for spiritual exercise," this place of refuge for the monastic priest is strictly guarded and watched over by the customs of the cloister, since it is to it that he returns, as the dove to the Ark, because in the outer world he can find no place for the sole of his foot. No visitor may enter it without special reason, and the express permission of the Superior; even the brethren can only speak together briefly at the half-opened door. If anyone must be admitted, a little slide in the door is pushed back, and the room thus becomes at once an open one. This slide is meant to represent to the inmate of the cell the ever-present eye of God [inasmuch as it may be blinded with a turn of the wrist?]. . . . A simple bed befitting a monk, a writing-desk, a washing-stand, a cupboard, a table covered with the necessary books, one or two chairs, and a small prie-dieu, form its furniture; a crucifix, and pictures of the Holy Mother of God, our Holy Father St. Benedict, and the inmate's patron saints, are its ornaments. At the entrance hangs a holy-water stoup, which is replenished every Sunday morning by freshly-blessed water. This is carried all over the house by two acolytes, and with the words "Ecce aqua benedicta" they refill each stoup, the inmate replying, "Sit mihi salus et vita."

Father Camm, or Father von Oer, conducts his readers through the house and presents him in spirit to the various officials. Of the Cellarer, upon whom devolves the care of the community larder, he takes leave in such terms of pleasantry as these:

His head may well throb and ache under his grey hair, so we will go away quietly, with a heartfelt petition that St. Joseph, the heavenly Cellarer of all monasteries, may bear him in mind and be ever well-disposed to help him.

"Heartfelt!"

There are customs handed down from a remote antiquity, and conserved in a spirit of veneration for a great past, which, described in the self-satisfied jog-trot of the guide-book, give an impression of senile decay. Take, for example, this:

We may see that young father who, for having made a slight disturbance, has gone to kneel down in the middle of the Frater, until the Abbot gives him the sign to permit him to rise. And we see yonder one of the older fathers, a venerable monk, on his knees; what can he have done amiss? The Abbot gives him a sign, he rises, bows, and another takes his place, and, if we see aright [there is something peculiarly distasteful—and, as it were, early-Victorian—about this mirthful device by which the narrator seeks to be in touch with the tourist], he has in his hand the pieces of a broken plate. Then we remember the accusations in Chapter. Monastic property is God's property, and any damage done to the least thing must be atoned for. Here is, then, the due performance of the penance imposed at Chapter.

The "Chapter of Faults," to which allusion is here made, assembles day by day, and before it the monks are expected to accuse themselves of their exterior faults against monastic discipline. This, of course, is another thing than sacramental confession in which theological sins are, by monks as by all the faithful, secretly confessed to a priest.

His self-accusation [we read], together with the sentence it calls forth, gives both edification and instruction to all the brethren, each of whom smites his breast in secret, and applies the reproof of the Abbot to himself.

Upon his deathbed the monk still treads in the well-worn way of precedent. Note the words in italics:

The last sacraments have been administered to the sick monk, with all their impressive rites; he has been laid, by his own desire, on consecrated ashes spread upon the floor in the form of a cross; the whole convent is kneeling, inside or just outside the room, in quiet prayer; he holds the crucifix and the rosary in one failing hand, and they place the blessed candle in the other. With scarcely audible voice, he begs the convent to pardon any annoyance or scandal he may have given. Then the Abbot, at his earnest entreaty, gives him leave to die.

It seems a happy point at which to take leave of a book the publication whereof, we think, is to be regretted for the sake of the great Order that, with insincere rhetoric, pious commonplace, and slipshod, unscholarly English, it lays open to ridicule.

The Empire Maker as Orator.—An Impression.

Cecil Rhodes: his Political Life and Speeches, 1881-1900.
By Vindex. (Chapman & Hall.)

OUT of this stout tome each reader can build up for himself Mr. Cecil Rhodes as he speaks to the world, and the portrait at the beginning will help him in the task. Mr. Rhodes seems to be a big man, with square, massive shoulders, on which is set a head that has something leonine about it. The face is inscrutable, the jaw square and inflexible, and the eyes have the look of one who sees things far away, and who is used to gaze across a continent, and not merely across a street. His friends say that Mr. Rhodes is occasionally almost boyish in manner, but there is no trace of it in the portrait.

The empire builder is evidently not an orator in the ordinary acceptance of the term. There are no graces, no "frills" about his speeches, which are straight and to the point, and give one the impression of a man who has no time to waste on mere verbiage. In his spoken words we have no hint of the senior classical scholarship with which he ended his school days, any more than in his person we see a trace of the chill which he caught when rowing at Oriel, Oxford, a chill which settled on his lungs and sent him out to South Africa to die, as his medical attendants thought. His words are conversational, and plainly come on the spur of the moment. "No one ever accused me of preparing a speech, though no doubt it is the proper thing to do," he says in one of his speeches. And yet there are simple, homely phrases in his public utterances which have become familiar quotations, such as "From Cape Town to Cairo," "All that English, that's my dream," "Unctuous rectitude." In 1883, when speaking of the country to the north, he described Bechuanaland as the "Suez Canal of the trade" of Cape Colony, and in the same speech he defined the policy to which he has held for twenty years through evil report and good report: "I believe in a United States of South Africa, but as a portion of the British Empire." That phrase was uttered in 1883, and it is the keynote to the book. It runs through all the speeches in thought if not in word, and it is the aim and object of his whole life.

Five years later he amplifies the idea in the words: "We must endeavour to make those who live with us feel that there is no race distinction between us; whether Dutch or English, we are combined in one object, and that is the union of the states of South Africa, without abandoning the Imperial tie." Here we have the cause of the antagonism between Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Kruger in the words "the Imperial tie." Little touches in these speeches suddenly reveal the speaker and throw a light on his character. For example, when Mr. Hofmeyr, the most deadly opponent of England in Cape Colony, proposed that members of the Cape Legislature should be obliged to wear black, in imitation of the Pretoria Volksraad, Mr.

Rhodes remarked: "I am still in Oxford tweeds, and I think I can legislate as well in them as in sable clothing."

An answer which shows his plain common sense. Again, when a peddling retrenchment was proposed, he said, "Mere retrenchment of salaries will not meet the case. You may cut off the salaries of a few poor clerks here and there, but you are not going to meet an enormous deficiency in that way"—a remark which might frequently be addressed to the House of Commons with equal force.

Reading through these speeches the prescience, or, as he himself would probably say, the power of looking ahead, which Mr. Rhodes possesses is vividly brought home by a sentence in his speech on the Bechuanaland Settlement in 1885: "Do you think that if the Transvaal had Bechuanaland it would be allowed to keep it? Would not Bismarck have some quarrel with the Transvaal, and without resources and without men what could they do? Germany would come across from her settlement at Angra Pequena. That would be some excuse to pick a quarrel—some question of brandy or guns or something—and then Germany would stretch from Angra Pequena to Delagoa Bay." The book is a big one, but it is worth reading if only for the discovery of the keynote to the statesman's public life: "I believe in a United States of South Africa, but as a portion of the British Empire."

Fiction.

Some American Heroines.

Unleavened Bread. By Robert Grant. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

Blix, a Love Idyll. By Frank Norris. (Richards. 3s. 6d.)

As the Light Led. By James Newton Baskett. (Macmillan. 6s.)

WHEN a man seeks to define the charm of woman he finds that his task is synthesis rather than analysis. Clothes become her in a literal as well as a colloquial sense, the grace of nature is inwoven with the grace of artifice so cunningly that he cannot separate them. She is concealed by that which expresses her and expressed by that which conceals her. Her many moods (though some be doubtless products of calculation and design) by their very variety hint at a spontaneity in which her beauty persuades him to believe. In the end it is easier to abandon the attempt to define her and to take out of Celia's mouth the exclamations which offended Rosalind in "As You Like It": "O wonderful, wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful! and yet again wonderful, and after that, out of all hooping!"

But in this indefatigable age even glammers are classified, and women, though never to be wholly explored, can be mentally segregated.

She of America may be profitably studied in the three novels before us, for it is safe to say that, in each case, by dint of the author's knowledge of her environment, she could not be mistaken for a native of any other land than her own. In Blix and in Selma, the heroine of Unleavened Bread, two extremes confront one another, but both are products of the democratic spirit. Blix is woman strengthened by liberty to love better, more helpfully; Selma is woman hardened and falsified by ambition till she becomes, if the phrase be admissible, a sort of leech or parasite of the democratic spirit. In depicting Selma Mr. Grant has produced a work of art so symmetrical and sincere that it deserves also to be called a work of science. She has a secret perception that republicanism consists in the existence of a place for Selma at the top of American society whence she can look down on the aspiring friends whose presumption she despises. Thrice was she married; but each time the husband was but a stepping-stone. The offence of her first husband against her, though solitary and contritely regretted, found her inexorable. She had neglected him for a Congress of Women's Clubs, and he pleaded his loneliness. "Here," she said, slipping off her wedding-ring, "this belongs to you." It was, of course, her "soul" that revolted, but she promptly married, after her divorce, an architect of delicate talent, whom she would have made play Andrea Del Sarto to her Lucrezia. Upon his death she married a third time, the bridegroom being a lawyer—a man of straw, but imposingly stuffed. Him we see mounting the political ladder of the United States as Congressman, Governor, and Senator. It was Selma who made him Senator. It was done at the sacrifice of his honour as a gentleman. "The eternal verities are concerned," she said. That was Selma's way. She canted her way through everything to gain position and notoriety. A social evening was nothing to her unless she could recite "O why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" She was incapable of the maternal feeling. Her second husband more than once detected her "looking at the babies with a wistful glance. She was really admiring their clothes, yet the thought of how prettily she would have been able to dress a baby of her own was at times so pathetic as to bring tears to her eyes, and cause her to deplore her own lack of children as misfortune." Selma was lovely, but the awful vulgarity of her soul would creep out to defile it despite her cleverness. The varnish of a new American town is smelt in her; it is the spoor-scent by which we track her. She is convinced of her own worthiness and the virtue of the quack-loving energy which is hers. Wherefore the author, while doubtless disliking her extremely, can but leave her seraphically "penetrating the future even into Paradise." For ourselves we may truly say that not "Bel-Ami" himself, whom in feminine, respectable fashion she more than a little resembles, leaves in the wake of his crowning triumph quite so implacable an odour as this same Selma, uncynical and chaste though she be.

Gladly we turn to Blix, who is loved by her author with a Pygmalion-passion, which vivifies without a prayer to the gods. He is never tired of showing the strength of his visualisation of this daughter of San Francisco. She wore instead of a belt "the huge dog-collar of a St. Bernard." In its way that's as good a touch of domestic life as the painting of Amy's boots in Little Women. Our eyes rise from the dog-collar to the "high tight band of white satin" which she wore round her throat, and then they see the "honest yellow hair," and the "sloe-brown, glittering little eyes." She induced a tenderness "for all the good things of the world," and she set to work to manufacture a man out of her conceited, fiction-spinning lover. She cured him of gambling and of promise-breaking. To her indirectly he owed his best inspiration, a story too good to be retailed as a sketch. Shop—literary shop—is a dangerous element to introduce into fiction. This, too, was made in a shop, the reader is apt to think. But Blix triumphs. Because she is so tender, so gay, so truthful; because she preferred comradeship to the philanderings of lukewarm love, we forgive the fanfare which announces her final awakening. "The moment that had been in preparation for the last few months, the last few years, the last few centuries, behold! it had arrived." It was a moment that came after innumerable holidayings with her lover. Listen to her as she sits on a log within sight of "the old fort at the entrance of the Golden Gate," "clasping her hand upon her knees, and rocking to and fro":

"Oh, Condyl, and you thought of a lunch—you said it was shoes—and you remembered I loved stuffed olives too; and a book to read. What's it?—The Seven Seas. No, I never was so happy. But the mouth-organ—what's that for?"

"To play on. What did you think—think it was a can-opener?"

Neither Blix nor Selma could have fully understood Nannie Dittmer of As the Light Led. She was sectarian and stated her grievance against her lover thus: "What'd he want to go and make a Methodist of himself right in my face for?" She attracts the reader's attention at an early stage by pinching a notch out of the wing of a fly to make it match the other. "I can't stand a one-sided thing," she remarked. She was a very sensitive girl, and when her lover visited her at school, "kind of country-like—pants in his boot-tops and all that," as one of her companions observed, she flouted him dreadfully, not knowing that his mother was dying. But she was clever and recognised the weakness of a showy man. "He heightened the burnish of many things, but he was not part of them. . . . He could not stretch himself and make a dead scene quiver into life." Of these three heroines she is the most surrounded by the properties of romance, though Blix ends with a most candid creak of optimistic machinery. Nannie is nearly frozen to death; she has brain-fever; there is a prairie fire, a cattle pest. The author is a poet in his way, yet "where were heroisms without catastrophes?" he seems to ask. It would be hard to say if, in the language of a character in Blix, Mr. Smith's story is "a snorkin' good" one, but it is certainly interesting and gracious. It contains, by the way, some extraordinary dialect.

Here we must leave our women. None of them is the woman of Charles Dana Gibson's pencil and Mrs. Burton Harrison's pen. We imagine them to be less hotel-seasoned than theirs. They are Americans, and they are heroines. Cosmopolis knows none such.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE WEB OF LIFE.

BY ROBERT HERRICK.

Medical students should enjoy this story by the author of Literary Love Letters. Other readers must decide whether they can stand the atmosphere of a Chicago hospital, the jargon of operation and diagnosis, and problems of medical ethics. There is, of course, the relief of love interest. (Macmillan.)

A GIFT FROM THE GRAVE.

BY EDITH WHARTON.

We have already related the curious difficulties encountered in giving this novel a title. Mrs. Wharton, whose story, The Greater Inclination, attracted much notice, has now written an interesting story on the ethics of publishing private letters. The hero finds that his possession of sacredly intimate letters from his deceased friend, Margaret Aubyn, places money, almost wealth, in his reach. When he has anonymously published the letters, he finds that his action is execrated by his own wife and friends, while each day increases his royalties and—the certainty of his detection. An interesting study of conduct. (Murray.)

THE FLICK OF FORTUNE.

BY THOMAS PARKES.

We confess to a weakness for the novel that feelingly persuades us what it is. Entirely readable in its way, this story opens at the sentence: "For the present there was nothing but joy. All weakness, all shortcomings, all self-reproach was forgotten. When the Vicar and Jack entered the dining-room where Mrs. Harcastle and Nell sat writing, with the indifference born of perfect confidence, everything else was drowned in a chorus of laughter and sobs. The Vicar felt out of place, and, after a few broken words of perfunctory blessing, fled back to his study." (White & Co. 6s.)

THE GODDESS: A DEMON.

BY RICHARD MARSH.

More red-hot melodrama. "The Woman Who Came Through the Window" is a charming chapter-heading. She doesn't know who she is, or where she has come from, or whether she walks in her sleep, or why she is covered with blood, or why soap and water are offered to her. There seems to be a Hindoo idol ahead. It is all capital reading for Margate. (White & Co.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Byron as Self-Critic.

SIR HENRY IRVING's design to produce "Manfred" at the Lyceum is, at any rate, interesting. It stirs up old poetic experiences, and recalls a glamour which refuses to fade in any literary lumber-room to which men, in their pride of new things, may have consigned it. There will be much new talk about Byron, and we should like to know who is better worth talking about in these depressed days. It may be that we shall all think better of Byron's poetry, finding not only that it is "good in parts," but that the good parts are very good indeed—facts which were never in doubt, but which are much obscured. Only the other day we heard a critic speak of Byron's poetry as a dead thing; and there was something in his calm, merciless dismissal of a once powerful force, of a once far-shining name, which touched our loyalty. Are men thus deceived? Can poetry which has once profoundly stirred a people, a continent, sink into the nothingness that deserves a shrug? We trow not. We remember that Macaulay, writing in the Byronic period, peered into the future which is our present, and tried to read our thoughts about Byron. He gave it up; but he said in his fine perorational way, that when all deductions had been made by the next generations of readers there would remain much in Byron's poetry which could perish only with the English language. If that is the truth—and we are much inclined to think it is the truth—then the present state of Byron's reputation is curious. Broadly speaking, his poetry is not read. Well, that is nothing. It was argued with great skill a few months ago that Browning is not read deeply by more than an infinitesimal percentage of cultivated readers. Is Shelley widely read? We think not. But the world calls back its mighty men of song when it has need of them; and we are by no means sure that such a call is not going forth to Byron. If it be so, it will be the sanest and kindest and justest call that he has yet received from his countrymen. It is not for nothing that Mr. Murray is issuing Byron's poems and Byron's letters side by side. Never before has such an opportunity been given to see the man and the poet steady, and see them whole; and unite them in stereoscopic solidity. There must be thousands of readers to whom Byron's letters, as they are now being republished with additions, are as lamps to his works. They suggest the real relations between Byron and his poetry; they light up the sources—the inferior but perfectly intelligible sources of his inspirations—and leaving much clear that has been dark, and separating much that has been confusedly mingled, they permit—perhaps for the first time—a really clean estimate to be made of Byron's executive literary powers. If this at all represents the situation; if Byron is about to be judged again with kinder and clearer eyes, then this project of producing "Manfred" at the Lyceum Theatre may be welcomed as a factor and stimulus in the movement.

As for the chances of "Manfred," in the box-office point of view, we hazard no predictions. There are exclamations and sneers in the air. "Manfred" is no stage-play—a fact on which Byron himself laid enough emphasis to last for all time; and yet it has twice been staged in London and—has succeeded. In Sir Henry Irving's hands this "dramatic poem" will at least yield fine recitation and splendid scenery; and we have known these two ingredients to make a good dish. To look at the backgrounds of "Manfred" is to foresee Sir Henry Irving's spectacular triumph.

ACT I.: Scene I.—Manfred alone.—Scene, a Gothic Gallery.—Time, Midnight.

ACT II.: Scene I.—A Cottage amongst the Bernese Alps. Scene III.—The Summit of the Jungfrau Mountain.

ACT III.: Scene I.—A Hall in the Castle of Manfred.

And so on. What of "Manfred" as poetry? We have not set out to weigh its pretensions; our purpose is to show how Byron himself weighed them. It is certainly a very curious coincidence that this improbable revival of "Manfred" is announced at the very time when those who love good reading are fastening on the fourth volume of the new edition of the Letters. For therein is the story of "Manfred," told by Byron, its author, to Murray, its publisher; and that story we purpose to give, as much as possible, in Byron's words. It is curious that Byron's first mention of "Manfred" begins with the statement that he had forgotten it. Writing from Venice on February 15, 1817, he says:

I forgot to mention to you that a kind of Poem or dialogue (in blank verse) or drama, from which "The Incantation" is an extract, begun last summer in Switzerland, is finished; it is in three acts; but of a very wild, metaphysical, and inexplicable kind. Almost all the persons—but two or three—are spirits of the earth and air, or the waters; the scene is in the Alps . . .

After sketching the plot in a couple of sentences, Byron hastens to damn his play as a play:

You may perceive by this outline that I have no great opinion of this piece of phantasy: but I have at least rendered it quite impossible for the stage, for which my intercourse with D[rury] Lane has given me the greatest contempt. I have not even copied it off, and feel too lazy at present to attempt the whole; but when I have, I will send it you, and you may either throw it into the fire or not.

Three weeks later the first act of "Manfred" has gone to Murray, and Byron writes in the wake of his consignment:

I sent you the other day, in two covers, the first act of Manfred, a drama as mad as Nat Lee's Bedlam tragedy, which was in twenty-five acts and some odd scenes.

The second and third acts were sent within a few days. In the following reference it is interesting to notice Byron's continued inability to give a precise name to "Manfred":

In remitting the third act of the sort of dramatic poem of which you will by this time have received the two first (at least I hope so) . . . I have little to observe, except that you must not publish it (if it ever is to be published) without giving me previous notice. I have really and truly no notion whether it is good or bad; and as this was not the case with the principal of my former publications, I am, therefore, inclined to rank it but humbly. You will submit it to Mr. G[ifford], and to whomsoever you please besides.

All this uncertainty did not obscure Byron's vision as a business man:

With regard to question of copyright (if ever it comes to publication), I do not know whether you would think three hundred guineas an over-estimate; if you do, you may diminish it: I do not think it worth more; so you may see I make some difference between it and the other.

We shall see presently how Byron comes to grips with Murray about the price of "Manfred"—a subject on which all vagueness disappears. Meanwhile he chatters to Tom Moore about the origin of the poem. His Swiss tour with Hobhouse had been the nursery of its dark imaginings:

I kept a journal of the whole for my sister Augusta, part of which she copied and let Murray see. I wrote a sort of mad Drama, for the sake of introducing the Alpine scenery in description: and this I sent lately to Murray. . . . I suppose they have arrived.

They had arrived. There is correspondence; Byron continues to warn Murray of its doubtfulness:

I repeat that I have not an idea whether it is good or bad. . . . The price will show you I don't pique myself upon it, so speak out. You may put it on the fire if you like; and Gifford don't like.

By the second week of April matters have so far progressed that publication is assured; and there is talk of proofs. Byron writes:

As for Manfred, it is no use sending proofs; nothing of that kind ever comes. I sent the whole at different times. The two first acts are the best; the third so so: but I was blown with the first and second heats. You must call it "a poem," for it is no drama, and I do not desire to have it called by so Sotheby-ish a name—"a poem in dialogue," or—Pantomime, if you will; anything but a green-room Synonymie; and this is your motto—

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Meanwhile his literary conscience has become remorseful about his third act:

The third act is certainly damned bad, and, like the Archbishop of Grenada's homily (which savoured of the palsy), has the dregs of my fever, during which it was written. . . . I would not have it published as it is on any account. The speech of Manfred to the Sun is the only part of this act I thought good myself; the rest is certainly as bad as bad can be, and I wonder what the devil possessed me.

So the third act is returned to Venice, and re-written. In sending the new version to Murray, Byron remarks that it "will at least prove that I wish to steer very clear of the possibility of being put into scenery." Meanwhile the question of price had revived with the progress of the poem through the press; and we have a grand onslaught on Murray. Of such there are many in this volume—all joys to read. Is there not in the following letter, demanding his price, the very forthrightness, grip of essentials, and mastery of working words, that is the making of all Byron's best stanzas?

Do you mean to say that it ["Manfred"] is dearer or shorter than Mr. R.'s Jaqueline? or than my Lara? or than The Giaour? or the Bride? Or do you mean to say that it is inferior to these as Poetry? or that its dramatic form renders it less susceptible of profit? I will tell you that to you, from its being the first poem of mine in that form, it must to a certain degree be more advantageous, as far as an object of curiosity. . . . You are to print in what form you please—that is your concern; as far as your connection with myself has gone, you are the best judge how far you have lost or gained—probably sometimes one and sometimes the other, but when you come to me with your "can" and talk to me about the copy of Manfred as if the "force of purchase would no further go," I say unto you verily, it is not so; or, as the Foreigner said to the Waiter, after asking him to bring a glass of water, to which the man answered, "I will, sir,"—"You will!—God damn—I say, you must!" . . . So there's for you. There is always some row or other previously to all our publications: it should seem that, on approximating, we can never quite get over the natural antipathy of author and bookseller, and that more particularly the ferine nature of the latter must break forth.

Of course, Byron got his money; Murray was no luckster. The poem was soon out, and the reviewers fell to. Byron—ill-served, as he always was, in the matter of news—tried to pick up the course of things. He writes to the peccant Murray:

With regard to the critique on Manfred, you have been in such a devil of a hurry, that you have only sent me the half: it breaks off at page 294. Send me the rest: and also page 270, where there is an account of "the supposed origin of this dreadful story"—in which, by the way, whatever it may be, the conjecturer is out, and knows nothing of the matter. I had a better origin than he can devise or divine, for the soul of him. You say nothing of Manfred's luck in the world; and I care not—he is one of the best of my misbegotten, say what they will.

Not yet had Byron so much as seen a copy of his poem; and when it did arrive there was fork-lightning for Murray:

The copies of Manfred and Tasso are arrived. . . . You have destroyed the whole effect and moral of the poem by omitting the last line of Manfred's speaking. ["Old man! 'tis not so difficult to die"]; and why this was done, I know not. Why you persist in saying nothing of the thing itself, I am equally at a loss to conjecture. If it is for fear of telling me something disagreeable, you are wrong, because sooner or later I must know it. . . . I have, however, heard good of Manfred from two other quarters, and from men who would not be scrupulous in saying what they thought, or what was said; and so "good-morrow to you Master Lieutenant."

And so a good-morrow to—"Manfred" at the Lyceum.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

FRENCH young men are assuredly in strange contrast with Anglo-Saxon youth. M. Demolins has written an enthusiastic volume to prove the superiority of the latter. This superiority is by no means so emphatic, so general as the excellent M. Demolins believes. Each race might give the other more points than the other is likely to fancy. For instance, here is an intellectual prize many an intelligent English youth would be glad to work for and proud to obtain: a travelling scholarship. A brilliant young Frenchman I know writes me from Paris that he will shortly start on a voyage round the world, having obtained the liberal sum of six hundred pounds (75,000 frs.), for that purpose. An anonymous endowment of one of their universities permits of five young men obtaining this valuable and really splendid scholarship. Now it may be delightful, healthy and moral to train a band of Anglo-Saxon barbarians to play cricket and football, win all sorts of triumphs in the field of sport, but I own myself to a sneaking regard for the studious and intellectual French lad. He is far more interesting to talk to, and his head is freshly filled with a mass of theories and ideas unknown to his athletic brother across the Channel.

On the other hand, alas! there are pitfalls for him which the healthier animal escapes for his salvation. No land on earth can produce a more utterly odious form of young man than France, if we are to judge the product by modern fiction. I never open a new French novel without misgiving. I dread the eternal cad of twenty, with his multiplicity of mistresses, and still greater multiplicity of fugitive loves. I dread the long, wearisome discussions between these youths over absinthe and cigarettes, on sensual philosophy, which seems to be the only philosophy they understand or care about. I dread above all the bestial interviews these misguided authors call "love scenes," relations containing every vile ingredient of life but love. Then there is the revolting perversity that only intellectual youth can tumble into, and which makes you feel that imbecility is a virtue. The world we know gained some admirable verses from Baudelaire's singular and fascinating "Fleurs de Mal," and we may not deny that deep down, underlying the bragging vanity of vice, the superficial vulgar perversity of the man, was a chord, capable when touched of noble response to the sentiment of infinite pity, of charming and gracious tolerance. Think of the ugly and brutal picture the average pen would make of a drunken ragman, and then remember Baudelaire's beautiful, sympathetic, and generous little poem on that gross theme. It is too long for entire quotation. But here is the staggering unfortunate, wandering along an old faubourg, "unbosoming himself in glorious projects":

Il prête des serments, dicte des lois sublimes,
Terrasse les méchants, relève les victimes,
Et sous le firmament, comme un dais suspendu,
S'enivre des splendeurs de sa propre vertu.

These poor creatures—worried with domestic troubles, with poverty, broken by work, tormented with age, a mere mass of ruins—are not destitute of poetry in their degradation. He paints them in two magnificent verses. They, in their imagination,

Reviennent, parfumés d'une odeur de futailles,
Suivis de compagnons, blanchis dans les batailles,
Dont la moustache pend comme de vieux drapeaux,
Les bannières, les fleurs et les arcs triomphaux
Se dressent devant eux, solennelle magie!
Et dans l'étourdissante et lumineuse orgie
Des clairons, du soleil, des cris et du tambour,
Ils apportent la gloire au peuple ivre d'amour.

How rare it is to see perversity paid for with such lines! And yet the account of Baudelaire with his succeeding generation is a long one. To the writer of these superb and noble verses most of the horrors of decadent French literature are due. The odious moral perversity which disfigured his life, his speech, his intellectual production, became a fashion, and many a book, as well as many a life, upon the boulevards would have been different if it had not been for the famous legacy of the Baudelairean spirit. To him do we owe the youth whose ambition it is to make the bourgeois "sit up," or "épater le bourgeois." What else could be the influence of the "master" who dyed his hair blue and went to call on Maxime du Camps to épater him? Whose joy lay in offending and shocking, and whose pride was to appear hateful! "Have you ever eaten the brains of a little child?" he once asked an unfortunate bourgeois. "It is excellent," and started on a story which began: "After I assassinated my poor father—"

I am reminded of Baudelaire and his pernicious example and influence by a book lately perused—La Petite Angoisse. It is a literary book, not destitute of style nor of intellectual feeling; with, towards the end, a certain distinct sentiment of the latent grandeur of mere unintelligent humanity, that acts and suffers with unconscious heroism, as fishermen and firemen act. The pity is, one must wade through so much vulgar and needless sensualism to reach this finer element.

Two young men meet along the Corniche, and, being Provençals, titled and wealthy, become comrades. They go through the usual tall talk of philosophising youth, and, what is infinitely more trying, what the French novelist regards as the indispensable experience of youth. Their loves are hideous, and one is thankful to find that they are unhappy in them. The marchionesses and countesses they encounter are such as we are too sadly familiar with, and it is not until we get to the end of the book, and are heartily sick of all these empty worldlings, that the clown enters on the scene, and brings with him a breath of humanity. The poor beggar teaches the youths what they did not understand—the beauty of sympathy and pity of common life. They become his disciples, and in helping him help themselves to grow into honest men. One says to the other: "I feel that fugitive loves are no longer worthy of us; since I have known the clown I have learnt to respect myself." This is the redeeming feature of M. Gilbert de Voisins' very French novel.

H. L.

Things Seen.

Sport.

BEING a Bank Holiday, the rain began in the morning; it was still falling when, in the early afternoon, I walked across the fields to the Lock, to throw a condoling glance on the boating parties. Bedraggled, top-coated, mackintoshed, they shivered on their way through the Lock. Soon I turned from the damp spectacle and crossed over to the weir pool, where a soaked fisherman sat on the stone wall eyeing his float. By his side sat a companion, a landing-net across his knees. He also peered at the float, to which pieces of weed and straw clung. The rain drizzled, the sky hung low and leaden, the trees dripped, the wind lashed the water into patterns, but the fisherman's eyes never moved from the float. "Much sport?" I asked. "They're biting!" he said in a solemn whisper. I touched his basket with my toe: it was articulately light. The drizzle changed into a strident downpour. I left the fishermen to their sport, returned home, and sat before the fire till close upon sunset. Then I went forth again, for the rain had ceased.

The swallow stopt as he hunted the fly,

I remarked to myself.

The snake slipt under a spray,
The wild hawk stood with the down on his beak
And stared, with his foot on the prey,
And the nightingale thought—

At this point I broke off, quoting no more that day, for there by the weir pool was the fisherman—still watching his float. Patient, sanguine, admirable man! The basket, I am sure, had not been touched. A feeling of delicacy urged me to refrain from his neighbourhood. I joined a man with a peaked cap who was leaning against the gate-beam. "Has he had any sport?" I asked. But the words had hardly left my mouth when the float ducked. The fisherman shouted, the rod bent, the line quivered, and the man with the landing-net clambered over the parapet. A few seconds later, and the fisherman was holding aloft a little gleaming fish. "Throw it back!" The command came from the official in a peaked cap, who stood by my side. "Throw it back, I say!" he repeated in a louder voice; "it's under size." There was a flash in the air, and the water sucked back the little startled fish. The rain began again. The fisherman looked at the sky. "We've still got twenty minutes of daylight," he said, stamping the water out of his boots. He put a fresh piece of dough on the hook, and once more cast forth his engine of destruction upon the troubled waters.

The Dancers.

WAITING in a little half-deserted harbour of Fife for the evening ferry-boat, I lazily watched a battered old brig unloading timber with an elaborate leisure. Her bald white name was strangely lettered, like writing seen in a mirror; and her black, seamy sides were hoary with barnacles. She made one dream of the Baltic—frozen lands and seas—romance—mystery. It was very still. In the hold near the water level a cavern slowly disgorged immense logs, each pausing to have its chain slipped off by a man who stood on a raft letting them slip quietly into the water and float away. Between times he watched three placid old Scotsmen fishing from the quay, their six legs a-dangle. Near them a young woman in a green petticoat leaned against a post knitting. Presently she began to dance, quite slowly, turning and swaying about; and very soon a man ran down the gang-plank towards her, tossing his arms above his head. When they met, behold, a mad waltz on a pierhead in the sunset, and never a friend to lilt them a tune! Soon, parting again on a sweep and a turn, they were darting hither and thither like swallows, and setting to each other with arching arms. A full quarter of an hour they danced, and seemed to feel no weariness, till, even stronger in my mind than the delight of watching them, was a fear lest they should stop. No one else paid them the smallest heed. The three old fishermen smoked peacefully, hauling up gleaming "podleys" without a glance behind; nor was the man on the raft less stolid at his work. Lights began to throw wavy paths across the water, and it grew dark as we steamed slowly out into the river. In a few minutes they had mingled with the haze of night, still dancing.

Some Letters of Stephen Crane.

MR. JOHN N. HILLIARD sends to the Literary Supplement of the New York Times one or two extracts from some fine letters of the late Stephen Crane, which prove what a conscientious, determined literary artist he was.

The following passage is from a letter written shortly after the publication of The Red Badge of Courage, which, of course, came after George's Mother and Maggie (the two Bowery tales just reissued by Mr. Heinemann):

The one thing that deeply pleases me in my literary life—brief and inglorious as it is—is the fact that men of sense believe me to be sincere. Maggie, published in paper covers, made me the friendship of Hamlin Garland and W. D. Howells; and the one thing that makes my life worth living in the midst of all this abuse and ridicule is the consciousness that never for an instant have those friendships at all diminished. Personally, I am aware that my work does not amount to a string of dried beans—I always calmly admit it. But I also know that I do the best that is in me, without regard to cheers or damnation. When I was the mark for every humorist in the country, I went ahead; and now, when I am the mark for only 50 per cent. of the humorists of the country, I go ahead, for I understand that a man is born into the world with his own pair of eyes, and he is not at all responsible for his quality of personal honesty. To keep close to my honesty is my supreme ambition. There is a sublime egotism in talking of honesty. I, however, do not say that I am honest. I merely say that I am as nearly honest as a weak mental machinery will allow. This aim in life struck me as being the only thing worth while. A man is sure to fail at it, but there is something in the failure.

That is a fine ambition for a young writer to cherish. And it is the letter of a man without illusions. Stephen Crane seems to have seen with washen eyes from the very first. Children of a country wherein reverence is discouraged have a better chance to do so than some of us.

On another occasion he wrote:

I did little work at school, but confined my abilities, such as they were, to the diamond. Not that I disliked books, but the cut-and-dried curriculum of the college did not appeal to me. Humanity was a much more interesting study. When I ought to have been at recitations I was studying faces on the streets, and when I ought to have been studying my next day's lessons I was watching the trains roll in and out of the Central Station. So, you see, I had, first of all, to recover from college. I had to build up, so to speak. And my chiefest desire was to write plainly and unmistakably, so that all men (and some women) might read and understand. That, to my mind, is good writing. There is a great deal of labour connected with literature. I think that is the hardest thing about it. There is nothing to respect in art save one's own opinion of it.

And here is a longer passage from a letter written after Stephen Crane had won his place and had retired to England to settle for a while. The letter begins with references to the reviewers of The Red Badge of Courage:

They all insist that I am a veteran of the Civil War, whereas the fact is, as you know, I never smelled even the powder of a sham battle. I know what the psychologists say, that a fellow can't comprehend a condition that he has never experienced, and I argued that many times with the Professor. Of course, I have never been in a battle, but I believe that I got my sense of the rage of conflict on the football field, or else fighting is a hereditary instinct, and I wrote intuitively; for the Cranes were a family of fighters in the old days, and in the Revolution every member did his duty. But, be that as it may, I endeavoured to express myself in the simplest and most concise way. If I failed, the fault is not mine. I have been very careful not to let any theories or pet ideas of my own creep into my work. Preaching is fatal to art in literature. I try to give to readers a slice out of life; and, if there is any moral or lesson in it, I do not try to point it out. I let the reader find it for himself. The result is more satisfactory to both the reader and myself. As Emerson said: "There should be a long logic beneath the story, but it should be kept carefully out of sight." Before the Red Badge of Courage was published, I found it difficult to make both ends meet. The book was written during this period. It was an effort born of pain, and I believe that it was beneficial to it as a piece of literature. It seems a pity that this should be so—that art should be a child of suffering; and yet such seems to be the case. Of course there are fine writers who have good incomes and live comfortably and contentedly; but, if the conditions of their lives were harder, I believe that their work would be better. Bret Harte is an example. He has not done any work in recent years to compare with those early California sketches.

Crane concludes with the old, old lament:

Now that I have reached the goal I suppose that I ought to be contented; but I am not. I was happier in the old days when I was always dreaming of the thing I have now attained. I am disappointed with success, and I am tired of abuse. Over here, happily, they don't treat you as if you were a dog, but give everyone an honest measure of praise or blame. There are no disgusting personalities.

When one looks back at Crane's short life, packed as it was with action, his output of work seems curiously large. And when one considers how good in its way everything he published was—how tense, and studied, and complete—this output assumes a very serious air. To die at thirty-one and to have done so much with one's talents is a great achievement. It is possible that his work was done; that as he grew older he would have lost the desire, the zest of writing, would have asked himself: "Is it worth while?"—that paralyzing question. The sardonic in his nature would have had time to develop and might have stifled further energy. This is merely conjecture, of course. Meanwhile his work exists for our admiration and pleasure, and as a noble example to young authors in a hurry.

Stephen Crane's Whilomville Stories, those studies of boy and child life which he wrote with such intense interest towards the close of his brief life and believed in so thoroughly—he told Mr. Alden, the Editor of Harper's Magazine, that his best was in them—will be issued in book form very shortly. We are also to have his Irish novel, and two collections of short stories—Wounds in the Rain and The Monster. And there is a series of studies of great battles also to be published.

Correspondence.

Style.

SIR,—Mr. Isidore Ascher, in his interesting letter upon the above subject in this week's ACADEMY, contradicts himself, I think, in more places than one. He pillories a statement of mine—"It [i.e., style] is synonymous with literary intellect, brain, thought"—as being "absolutely wrong and misleading"; he then goes on to say that style is "only a verbal garb of thought"! I think he endeavours to separate—as many others do—the literary form of intellect from the literary form of expression: I hold that they are one and the same thing, and absolutely indivisible. That is what I meant when I said that no man can be a stylist who has no brains. Mr. Ascher apparently seeks to prove that there are two qualities concerned in the matter; and it will be seen that he only bowls himself out when he attempts to do so. He also characterises as "absolutely wrong" the statement that style is the expression of individuality; and then says "an author of distinction has generally a distinctive style"! I cannot see that his argument will hold water.

It is certainly true that style may require development. It is next to impossible for a boy of eighteen to write like a mature Ruskin, for instance. One has to play the "assiduous ape" for a period, no doubt. But all the time he is absorbing the art of others, is he not building for himself a brain, a literary intellect—in short, a literary individuality? All his subsequent writings are the expression of the individuality he has acquired—the matured individuality, be it said; for the germ must be existent. ("You cannot thrash a still-born donkey into life," as Mr. Le Gallienne says.) The means whereby the writer matures his latent individuality have no effect or influence upon him beyond that of the watering-can on a rose-bush. Individuality is strength; the individual stylist is essentially himself. He retains his own particular identity throughout the whole course of his development. The "assiduous ape" part of the business is only the waking up, the extra horse up the hill. Once on the brow, the wide, level heath is before him. Henceforth he is himself, both in his life proper, and in the life he lives in his writings.—I am, &c., ARTHUR COLES ARMSTRONG.

August 6, 1900.

SIR,—It would seem that the recent correspondence on the above subject must have already exhausted all there is to be said as to its nature, its quality, and its acquirement; yet—to judge from some of the remarks preferred—the main point of discussion appears really to be, not how to cultivate style, but what is style?

Mr. Ascher, in last week's ACADEMY, is, perhaps, as near the mark as anyone in defining style to be "just a mode or manner of expression and nothing more." But why "and nothing more"? In my opinion the definition would be more correct if "something" were to be substituted for the "nothing" of Mr. Ascher's concluding phrase. The question of style surely involves wider issues than the mere "mode or manner of expression"; otherwise, I fear that managed mannerisms and inherent insipidities of literary expression would mark the level of a distinctive style of this nature.

I think, therefore, that the "something more" required is, if I may so term it, the literary afflatus that breathes into words the spirit of life and produces "style."—I am, &c., ERNEST H. HARRISON.

Streatham, S.W.: August 4, 1900.

SIR,—The history of this correspondence cannot be altogether without amusement to those modest readers who never compete for the weekly guinea. "One having literary aspirations" wanted hints for cultivating style; and no less than forty-four persons, out of the goodness of their heart (and perhaps with the tail of their eye on the aforementioned remuneration), attempted to furnish a complete working plant for the manufacture of style on a scale unlimited. I regret, as a literary aspirant myself, that only eleven of the letters were published.

The letter which gained the prize gives but cold comfort after all. It tells us that style, per se, does not exist, and that you cannot be a good stylist without brains; but of how to acquire brains there is not a hint. In the next issue of the ACADEMY a correspondent takes exception to this pronouncement. Next comes a reply from the prize-winner wherein he compares himself, and all other writers on style, to a bald-headed gentleman who went to gather honey without his hat; which is a dark saying. He also informs us that he is an authority on what is good for him to eat; which is enviable and interesting, but throws no great light upon the subject.

Then, after the other literary aspirant and I have been puzzling for two weeks over how to get brains, he coolly tells us "if a man has brains it does not necessarily follow that he is or should be a literary man—a statement that cuts both ways." Ay, a right two-edged sword I'faith!

Another week passes and then somebody else says that all the other people had been calling style things which it wasn't; and he assures us that, shown up in its true colours, 'tis but "a mode or manner of expression and nothing more." I have no doubt the other literary aspirant also tore his hair at this point. I had always suspected style to be a man's character oozing out at his finger-tips and so getting into his pen; but now I am beginning to think it is a mere trick of composition which might be purchased from a recognised stylist for a reasonable sum.—I am, &c., S. W.

SIR,—My innocent little note to you has given some correspondents the opportunity of displaying the rudeness of their style. In proof thereof, read the following: "Without having the least wish to infer that you are deficient in general intelligence, will you!" &c. "Your present style resembles your handwriting, which is—pardon me—somewhat immature." I disagree entirely with Mr. Armstrong; and so do you, Mr. Editor, for your postcard to me gave hints about the cultivation of style. Three other letters from professors in our Universities who teach style are also against Mr. Armstrong. Style to me is the coat my thoughts wear. It is, therefore, independent of what Mr. Armstrong says I lack—"literary intelligence." The illiterate farm servant has style, as well as, say, Mr. Armstrong. The coat must fit the thought. Here is the difficulty. How am I to make the cloth into a decent, West End fashionable coat?

The style is the man: let it be so. Suppose the man is vicious, then the style is likewise. How can I change this vice into virtue? By changing the man? How is it done? It is nonsense for one of your correspondents to say, "This is not, alas! a matter for hints"; or worse nonsense to say, "Have you anything to say or to write that the world in the least desires to hear, or would be the better of hearing? If so, you will find yourself able to say it without any manufactured style." I have before me over a dozen statements by well-known literary men who say the reverse. Let me give one. It is found in The Art of Fiction. The writer is W. E. Norris:

The beginner, in order to be a successful beginner, has to acquire a style. . . . But why talk about acquiring a style? It seems doubtful whether an equal number cannot—if only they will condescend to take the necessary pains—learn how to write. Rules indeed there are for him—cut and dried rules, relating to accuracy of grammar and punctuation, avoidance of involved sentences, neologisms, catch phrases, and the like; but these will not take him the length he wishes to go. . . . He may be advised to dissect, to analyse, to search patiently for the secrets of proportion, of balance, of rhythmical, harmonious diction. . . . So, having studied, he will be able, like the débutante, to be natural, and will have gained possession of a style which will, at any rate, be correct and his own.

Mr. Editor, I hope you will not allow this supreme question of "how to cultivate style" to be shelved by such half-truths as "Le style c'est de l'homme."

As Mr. Armstrong is to keep an open eye for my development, my honest innocence being distinctly interesting and refreshing, I had better add I am the author of several books, and expect, when this question of "style" is rationally thrashed out, to publish a few more.—I am, &c.

July 25, 1900.

THE INQUIRER.

Herbert not Herrick.

SIR,—As you are still on the subject of quotations, may I ask for explanation of a curious misquotation, or perhaps quoted plagiarism, which appeared in one of your "Things Seen" in the ACADEMY of July 21. I did not call attention to it at the time as I felt sure you would have a pile of such calls.

The lines were :

But I was up ere break of day,
And brought my flowers along with me.

In George Herbert's lovely Easter verses you will find :

But thou wast up by break of day,
And brought'st thy sweets along with thee.

—I am, &c., A. S.
August 4, 1900.

[The writer of that "Things Seen" spent an hour seeking to verify the quotation in Herrick. He thanks "A. S." and apologises to Herbert.]

"A Dream Satanic."

SIR,—While regretting that the perusal of a few chapters of my Great Game should have given Mr. G. S. Layard—your last week's correspondent—nightmare, I fail to see any connexion between his "dream satanic" and my little work.

"No private duty is so paramount but that a man may neglect it in the service of the State."

Sir, I give it up; and intend, in the second edition of The Great Game, adding a chapter headed "The Nightmares of the Century."—I am, &c.,

EDWARD SPENCER.

Gresham Cottage, Ewell:
August 4, 1900.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 46 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best sketch of 200 words, or less, under the title "The Street I Know Best." The response has been large, the performance creditable. But many descriptions are marred by some extravagance, some little touch which one feels is needlessly overdone. One might walk often in Whitechapel High-street without seeing "drunken sailors stagger along singing criminal songs." This is the Whitechapel one reads about, but does not see. There is some vague over-writing too: "Grotesques are silhouetted on frowsy blinds" tells us nothing (about Wykeham-road), and the diction is affected. We prefer ease and clearness to more ambitious writing that misses its mark; and, after some hesitation, we award the prize to Mr. Arthur Macdonald Cuttell, 7, Princess-street, Leicester, for the following, though the sketch is marred by its rather cheap satire on afternoon calls:

THE STREET I KNOW BEST.

The street I know best drives a long straight line of macadam and flagstones, and a double line of linden trees, through a suburb that was so recently a village that, at this juncture, one can hardly tell whether it has the air of a stockbroker in Arcadia, or of a rustic in Pall Mall. The old manor house still stands, and the "village church" still points its squat spire at heaven. But all else is suburban villa of the bay-window or garden order, built of red brick and virginia creeper. No children play in the roadway now, but morning and evening there are processions of silk-hatted men—men carried away by the up-train at dawn and returned at night—while in the afternoons women drive up in barouches, paying calls and boring each other fearfully over saving cups of tea. At the bottom of the street a crossing-sweeper daily sits in state upon a throne of brick-wall and railings, and notes our goings and our comings, besides levying tribute on the passer-by. And at night, as I look out across the way, our surgeon's blood-red lamp gleams eerily through a network of green linden leaves.

The three best sketches after the above are perhaps these:

WHITECHAPEL HIGH STREET.

Whitechapel High Street is neither narrow nor ill-lit; the buildings are substantial and newly painted; the shops are big and their windows display as great a variety of cash-ticketed articles as any exacting shopping woman need wish for. Drawn up in the centre of the roadway are a score of huge waggons all laden with fresh sweet hay—for there is a haymarket in Whitechapel. The carts are manned by stout, rough, kindly countrymen, too, who lounge about, chiefly favouring the doorway of the "Red Lion Inn," where the ale is known to come from Romford. But—alas, there is a "but"—the air, despite the hay, is filled with a foul smell of over-baked bread and terrible fumes that spring with tiger-like strength from sausage and onion depôts. A noise as of an army that is angry because deprived of its weapons is prevalent, even the younger women, whose voices might be low and soft, are unduly turbulent; drivers of lumbering vans shout hoarse and vehement oaths at patient, panting horses; drunken sailors stagger along singing criminal songs; dishevelled women and unwashed children abound, and on most of the faces that pass there is evidence of battle within. [C. C., London.]

COMMONPLACE.

It is a short, narrow street; you could go down it in twenty strides, and cross it in six. It contains a baker's dozen of buildings, of different heights and styles, mostly gloom. It has existed longer than the Queen has worn her crown; but age has brought it no honours. Like a man with a past, its glory is all in bygone days. Two justices of the peace and the town coroner had offices in it. The lower end building on the right side was a ladies' high school; and in those days dainty feet tripped its pavement all day long. Respectable physicians resided in its houses, and it was then equal with the proud square it runs into. Now, however, it would be positively an ugly street, were it not for the bank's new premises at the top left-hand corner, which do for its appearance what a fine hat does for that of a lady with a shabby dress. During rainy seasons its gutters leak, and one imagines it to be shedding tears over the departed glory of its buildings, now attorneys' offices, a c. byard, and a grocer's shop thrown in. [A. S. W., Preston.]

OUR STREET.

It curls around the shoulder of the old town walls with a southern sweep from east to west; and for centuries, beneath the starlight, and from dawn to afterglow, has seized all largesse of sky and air. Its rugged stones are the home of snapdragon and gillyflower, with mosses and lichens, and much else of gracious greenery. The vine and fig-tree flourish here, and ever and for ever the Severn sings beside them.

The fine reserve of Pugin trained these quiet lines of the cathedral—gray sister to the rose-red ramparts. Brightly the lamp burns ever within its Sanctuary, and the unconscious street is dedicated to perpetual love and praise.

Time has dealt kindly with the houses along our way, and veiled their grim Georgian gentility with a tenderness of leafage and blossom: while, goodly and fair, high above the rest, for all men to see, stands the house reserved for the Lords of the Law of England—"the Judge's Lodging."

No, that motor-car was not pretty. Ping-pang go the bells of the cyclists as they flash past into the darkness!

Children and birds are a-bud: night is falling upon the old town walls.

Meanwhile the lamp burns on.

[A. D., Shrewsbury.]

Among other sketches of merit are the following:

IN EAST ANGLIA.

It is the main street of an East Coast fishing town, around which are gathered all the tenderest associations of early youth.

A mile and a half it extends, flanked on either side by houses of unequal height, whose red roofs deepen to a richer glow at sunset. I love every seaman who strides along its pavements. I know its shops by heart. The toy shop on the right (as you enter the town) kept by Mrs. Stevens, who will never realise that I no longer require a spade, a bucket, a kaleidoscope, or a sixpenny butterfly net, proudly displaying these commodities whenever I enter for a chat about old times; Reading's, on the left, whither we repaired for Aldeburgh buns (hot) and lemonade after bathing; the jeweller's, whose window is ever full of brooches and necklaces of amber picked up by our fishermen; Martini's (the draper's); the post office; the butcher's; the fish shop; Mrs. Self's, noted for "brandy balls," great shiny golden marbles that you must pop into your mouth whole. Then Ford's, which we used to patronise for pear drops, acid drops, liquorice, and "black-jack" (sticky stuff rolled in bits of newspaper).

Ah, happy days of childhood!

[H. F., Devon.]

SUBURBAN.

It is a broad, open street, and recalls nothing of the little riverside village of former days. Only a few years ago it was still rural, with grassy spaces where the widow's hens flapped and clucked, and laid the occasional egg. Now all is changed, and the only relic of quaintness is the finger-post at one end: "To Westminster and London."

The houses are modern, and so for the most part are their inmates. Most modern of all are the members of the Ladies' Club—fearfully and wonderfully modern, even, it is whispered, to the smoking of cigarettes. The playwright, the editor, the navy authority, the musical critic, all are modern; the lady guardian and the portrait painter modern too. Of the old villagers but three remain: the man of leisure, and the professor, and the old clergyman who, of a summer evening, still keeps the village habit of standing at his door, from which vantage ground he loves to engage the passer-by in amiable conversation. To enquire after the new drama, or gently banter the editor about that unconfirmed telegram, is his neighbourly custom; and, one may hope, they are not too modern to appreciate him. [E. D., Chelsea.]

WHERE ALMOND TREES BLOSSOM.

It is called Jamalkhan. It runs from Badamtali, where the almond trees blossom in spring, through shady bamboo groves where lurk brown-roofed cottages of Creole-Portuguese, past the Sital Jharna—the "cool spring" of perennially gushing water, past the three snowy domes and slim minarets of the Quadam Moharak Mosque with its terraced cemetery, the Campo Santo of our dour Puritan Mussulmans. As I drive daily to my work, brown Portuguese maidens (the very tiny ones scantily wrapped in tattered and dingy night-gowns) bow gravely to the passing sahib. Their hidalgo origin (however remote) forbids a salaam or the friendly hob of a curtsey. White clad Hindoos tramping to the holy shrine of Sitakunda, yellow robed Buddhist monks seeking the khyong below Cyclone Hill file past. A half-caste Feringhee dings his bicycle bell as he glides by, and, a moment after, my horse shies at a dusty nudity of a fakir telling beads by the roadside. Now I make room for a funeral—a dead Hindoo borne, with shrill cries of Hari bol, to the burning place beyond Gol Pahar. Now an elephant, mahout on neck, swings past, hungry for breakfast in the succulent jungle beyond Pahartali. [J. D. A., Ealing.]

WHERE DANTE WALKED.

The street we know best need not be necessarily one that we most often frequent. All the ideals, education, and aspirations of half a lifetime may go towards the fixing of the one supreme impression, the one unfading spectacle which we recognise as always having been a part of our truest selves—the place of our thoughts. And not in the mere reality of its picturesqueness, its wealth of fair houses, sculptured towers, and bridge-spanned river, is it most truly ours, but in the certainty that when the evening sun was turning the river to a golden flood, and giving a deeper note to the cypress-crowned hills, that Beato Angelico lingered there and saw visions of angels in the rose, and gold, and white, and that Dante's eyes flashed back the splendour before Beatrice passed him by and denied him her salutation. And yet, perhaps, it is all more intimately ours, more at one with the knowing or unknowing that knits it to our hearts. When night has fallen, when the domes and towers are telling dark against a pale sky, and the purple black of the bridges is repeated in their dark reflections, making it impossible to tell where reality ends: when the moon, touching the water, turns it to liquid light, and in the west is glowing a great star. [K. E. B., Birmingham.]

SQUALID.

All day long the street lies festering under a London sun. Heavy traffic roars over its cobbles, and—clapper-clap—its indefectible meat-tin surges backwards and forwards under my window; for a Board school faces me.

Marshaled beside this pioneer of culture the Gothic end of a cheap chapel flaunts the allurements of a Coloured Lady and Pleasant Sunday Afternoons.

By nightfall the process of incubation is complete. The dingy houses come to life. Grotesques are silhouetted upon frowzy blinds. The forms of youth and maiden cluster in shadowed doorways. Under the street lamps, befringed, unwholesome lads lie in wait for the shrieking fies of half-grown girls that waver along in their poor finery, soliciting and repelling solicitation. From four public-houses streams the grey glare of incandescent gaslight, and ballad music of the tearfully sentimental sort; while the piano-organists neutralise each other with contradictory tunes. It is merry times in Wykeham-road.

But down a passage there is a court; and in the court a tumult. There, I think, they stow away the bodies of the women who scream "Murder!" when the lights are out. [S. B. T., London.]

IN CORK.

Level here, among the shops; but there, beyond the bridge, it climbs resolutely, smiling, to the skies one almost fancies, seeing it end, of evenings, in a solitary point of light that apes a star.

The pavement billows, rugged: the car-stand, streaming down the centre, overflows illicitly, impetuously, in two and threes of sharp-sighted jarvies; but the green electric trams unflinchingly move on, stolid in arrogance of mechanism. And the people loiter—loiter intolerably!

The statue is being further elevated. The memorial to Father Mathew; on both sides of it (the street widens here) shine gorgeous liquor-shops, for ever guarded by the "corner boys," squalid lotseaters, whose dream no Peeler dreams of breaking. One quay leads to the theatre; across the bridge there confront the "Apostle," shamelessly, the posters of the music-hall.

On fine mornings, the valley of St. Patrick-street smiles clear in sherry-coloured sunlight. A quaint gaiety of its own it has—the bright, untidy Irish street; poverty-stricken, diminutive, sordid almost, for travelled eyes; yet what a maze of maddening movement, brilliancy, vitality, for the visitors that, some of them, are come up from tracts of turf-land, or the sea—come up for market-day, holiday, Lady-day! [G. C. M., Cork.]

Other replies received from: M. M. B., St. Andrews; A. H., Durham; H. A. M., Bristol; F. W. S., London; Z. McC., Whitby; A. S. H., Dalkeith; F. A., Weymouth; F. von S., London; A. G., Reigate; E. R., London; Miss P., Norwich; M. J., London; G. E., Dewsbury; G. E. P., London; A. M. S., Great Bookham; J. M. S.-Y., Manchester; O. S., Twyford; H. R. S., Newcastle-on-Tynes; Mrs. N., London; A. V., London; Mrs. D., London; E. B., London; E. B., Liverpool; L. M. S., London; G. W. H., West Didsbury; R. H. P., Derby; G. H., Anglesey; L. F., Manchester; E. H. H., Streatham; A. M. B., London; H. B. S., Culrain; A. W., London; Mrs. C. C., London; S. S. M., Edinburgh; Miss R., Goathland; R. H. G., London; M. F., London; Mrs. R., London; E. R. S., Croydon; D. G. W., Yorks.

Competition No. 47 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best sketch entitled "The Author I Like Least." Deceased authors alone should be chosen; and we hope for reasonably vigorous, not embarrassing, criticisms. Length not to exceed 200 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, August 14. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Fricker (Dr. Karl), The Antarctic Regions. From the German. (Sonnenschein) 7/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Blashill (Thomas), Sutton-in-Holderness (Stock) 6/0
Myer (Isaac), Oldest Books in the World (Kegan, Paul) net 30/0
Thomas (C. H.), Origin of the Anglo-Boer War Revealed (Hodder & Stoughton) 3/6
Williams (Thomas), Life of Sir James Nicholas Douglass (Longmans) 3/6
Nieboer (Dr. H. J.), Slavery as an Industrial System (Nijhoff, The Hague)
Archibald (Mrs. G.), Joel Dorman Steele: Teacher and Author (Gay & Bird) 5/0

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Chambers (Rev. Arthur), Man and the Spiritual World (Taylor)
Drury (B. S.), Neo-Christian Epistles (Sonnenschein) 2/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Shuckburgh (E. S.), The Letters of Cicero, Translated into English. Vol. III. (Bell) 5/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Eversley (T. Fitz-Evan), The Trinidad Reviewer (Robinson Printing Co.)
Davidson (H. C.), Gardening Chart: A Guide to the Cultivation of the Year's Vegetables (Warne) net 1/0
Linton (Edward F.), The Flora of Bournemouth, including the Isle of Purbeck (Commin) net 8/6
Adair (F. G.), A Walk through the Zoological Gardens (Sands) 3/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Temple Classics. Tully's Offices. Trans. by Roger L'Estrange (Dent) 1/6
Cundall (J. W.), London: A Guide for the Visitor, Sportsman, &c. (Greening) 0/6
Loch (Henry Brongham), Personal Narrative of Occurrences during Lord Elgin's Second Embassy to China in 1860. 3rd Edition (Murray) net 2/6
Krause (Alexis), China in Decay (Chapman & Hall) 5/0
Pennell (Mrs.), Over the Alps on a Bicycle (Uwinn) 1/0
Fogarty (Elsie), Shakespeare's "As You Like It," Adapted for Amateur Performance in Girls' Schools (Sonnenschein) net 2/6
Douglas (R. K.), China (Uwinn) 5/9

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

WILFRID M. VOYNICH.

CATALOGUE No. 2 may be had on application,
price 2s. 6d., at

1, SOHO SQUARE, W.

15th and 16th CENTURY BOOKS; AMERICANA;
8s LOST or UNKNOWN BOOKS.TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references.
Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

CITY of BOMBAY.

APPOINTMENT OF EXECUTIVE HEALTH OFFICER.

The Municipal Corporation of the City of Bombay are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of EXECUTIVE HEALTH OFFICER. The Health Officer is expected to devote his whole time and attention to the duties of his office, and must be a legally qualified medical practitioner. In making a selection preference will be given to applicants who possess the Diploma in Public Health, and who have had administrative experience in the sanitary work of a large city.2. The appointment will be for five years, and will be renewable, from time to time, for further five-yearly periods, at the discretion of the Corporation and with the sanction of Government. The incumbent is liable to removal during his term of office only for misconduct or neglect or incapacity for his duties, and on the votes of not less than two-thirds of the members present at a meeting of the Corporation.3. The minimum monthly salary of the appointment is at present fixed by law at Rs 1,200 and the maximum at Rs 1,500.
The Corporation have requested the Bombay Government to amend the Municipal Act by raising the minimum and maximum to Rs 1,500 and Rs 2,000 respectively, and Government have expressed their willingness to introduce legislation for this purpose at an early date. At the rate of 1s. 4d. per rupee, which may be taken as a practically constant value, these latter sums would represent £100 and £133 6s. 8d. respectively per month. Applicants should state the minimum initial salary (in rupees) within these limits which they are willing to accept.4. Information regarding the leave and pension rules can be obtained on reference to Messrs. William Watson & Co., 7, Watloo Place, London, S.W.5. Applications, which should be accompanied by a statement of age, of past service and experience, and of present physical fitness, should be addressed to the Municipal Commissioner for the City of Bombay, care of John Lithby, Esq., Local Govt.
Board, Whitehall, London, and should be forwarded with a covering letter, so as to reach Mr. Lithby not later than the 25th August, 1900.W. L. HARVEY, Municipal Commissioner for the City of Bombay.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances, 2%
when not drawn below £100.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2½% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post
free.

FRANCIS RAVESCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.

Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON"

GEORGE HERIOT'S TRUST.

HERIOT WATT COLLEGE.

The Governors are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the office of PRINCIPAL of the HERIOT WATT COLLEGE EDINBURGH.The College exists for the purpose of providing Technical and General Education for the industrial classes, and the Principal to be appointed shall devote his whole time to the duties of the office.Subject to the approval of the Governors the Principal shall exercise a general supervision over the teaching in the College, and shall have under his control the arrangements and hours of classes, and, generally, the whole organisation, discipline, and arrangement of the College.A copy of the Calendar, which gives full particulars of the various classes, will be supplied on application.The Principal must be a Graduate of some University of the United Kingdom.

Salary, £750 per annum.

Applications, with thirty copies of Testimonials (limited to fifteen in number), to be lodged with the undersigned on or before 1st September next.

PETER MACNAUGHTON, S.S.C.,

Clerk to the Governors.

20, York Place, Edinburgh,
27th July, 1900.ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 24th, 1900—viz., Two Senior Open Scholarships, value £75 each, will be awarded to the best candidates (if of sufficient merit) in not more than three nor fewer than two of the following:—Chemistry, Physics, Zoology, Botany, Physiology, Anatomy.Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £50, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty-one years of age (if of sufficient merit) in not fewer than three of the following:—
Botany, Zoology, Physiology, Physics, and Chemistry.The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of June, 1900.The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION—DRAUGHTSMAN
IN THE HYDROGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE AD-MIRALTY (17-25, 6th SEPTEMBER).This is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission,
London, S.W.

J. G. CHANCELLOR, M.A. (1st Class,

Classical Tripos), late Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, PREPARES PUPILS for the UNIVERSITIES and
all Preliminary Examinations, at his Residence, Cross Deep, Twickenham, Middlesex, a fine old house beautifully and healthily situated on the Thames.LATEST PUBLICATIONS OF
THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.PROCEEDINGS of the ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON, 1900, Part II., containing Papers read at the Scientific Meetings held in March and April, 1900. With 12 Plates. Price to Fellows, 9s.; to the Public, 12s.To be obtained at the SOCIETY'S OFFICE (3, Hanover Square, W.), or through any Bookseller.

ONGAR GRAMMAR SCHOOL, 30 miles from London. Commercial training, 30 guineas, including land and books. Reduction for brothers. Playing fields 30 a.ces. Bracing air. Gravel soil. 200 ft. above sea level. Milk and vegetables from own farm. Best and unlimited. Covered playground, swimming bath, cricket, tennis, fishing, workshop, gymnasium. See Prospectus.—

Address Dr. CLARK. Names received for Next Term, Sept. 12th.

COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, WIESBADEN.

—For the Higher Training of Boys of the upper classes who have left school and are destined for a Mercantile career.—
For Prospectus and Syllabus of the commercial course, apply to the Principal, FRITZ HOMANN, 14, Mainzerstrasse, Wiesbaden.

MERCHANT TAYLORS' SCHOOL.

A VACANCY WILL OCCUR at CHRISTMAS NEXT in the OFFICE of HEADMASTER to the Merchant Taylors' School, by the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Baker.All applications and copies of testimonials from candidates for that appointment (who must have graduated in honours at either the University of Oxford or the University of Cambridge, or in Holy Orders of the Church of England, or intending to take them without cure of souls, and shall not exceed 40 years of age on December 25, 1900), must be sent to the CLERK of the MERCHANT TAYLORS' COMPANY, Merchant Taylors' Hall, Threadneedle Street, E.C., on or before Saturday, September 24th next.
The duties will commence after the Christmas holidays. Any further information required, and forms of applications, may be obtained by application to the Clerk of the Company.CHILDREN'S COUNTRY HOLIDAYS FUND.

10, BUCKINGHAM STREET, STRAND, W.C.

33,700 poor London children sent into the country for a fort-night's change of air in 1899. All but the poorest parents pay some part of the cost of the holiday.Funds urgently needed for this summer's work. Contributions will be gratefully received by the Hon. ALFRED LITTLE-TON, Q.C., M.P., Treasurer of the Fund.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BESTENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUB-SCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.).

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in
TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY,
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SUR-
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Cloth elegant, price 4s. 6d.

ATTEMPTS IN VERSE.

By CHARLES H. HOOLE,

Student of Christ Church, Oxford.

RIVINGTONS: 34, King Street, Covent Garden, London.

An American Transport
in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered
Transport in the Crimean War.....
The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods
of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the
Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1476. Established 1869.

18 August, 1900.

Price Threepence

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE fear expressed in some quarters that we are fast becoming a nation of novel readers and little else need not be regarded very seriously. Quiet readers of good books, old and new, travel along on the road they have chosen undistracted by wars, hot weather, or the newest fiction. They live quiet lives in quiet streets. The fiction readers and writers hustle one another and cry in the marketplace: hence the disproportionate attention given to them. Nevertheless we, as a nation, do read an enormous number of novels, and the autumn publishing lists show that there will be no falling off in the supply. To those already announced, the following, to be published by Mr. Heinemann, may be added: The Lane that had no Turning, by Gilbert Parker; The Mantle of Elijah, by I. Zangwill; Jack Raymond, by Mrs. Voynich; The Image Breakers, by Gertrude Dix; The Lady of Dreams, by Una L. Silberrad; The Provençale, by T. A. Cook; The Hidden Model, by F. Forbes Robertson; besides new novels by Hall Caine, Miss Robins, Cassandra Vivaria, and Sarah Grand.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS'S play, "Herod the King," which Mr. Tree will produce after "Julius Cæsar," is in no sense religious; no Biblical persons appear, nor are they referred to, beyond a sense generally felt of someone about to come and reign over Judæa. This prophecy forms a sort of impending doom, and causes Herod vague uneasiness. The story is of the almost insane passion of Herod the Great for his wife Mariamne. Herod having, for political reasons, caused her favourite brother to be killed, found that this political murder had estranged from him the love of Mariamne. Finding that she, whom he madly adored, had suddenly grown cold to him, his passion became a madness, fed continually by his mother and sister, who hated Mariamne for her arrogance. At last he was induced to order her death, after much vacillation, and to some extent for political reasons. But, though he had given order for her death, so strong was his infatuation that, when she was dead, he continued to nourish the idea that she still lived. As Herod alone stood between Judæa and the Roman legions, it was all-important that he should be humoured in his delusion, as, if he once realised the fact of his wife's death, he would go mad. The latter part of the play deals with this situation—the whole Court endeavouring to distract the King's mind from a reality, in order that he might still be capable of governing.

MR. WILLIAM NICHOLSON leaves England on Saturday to fulfil a three months' engagement with Messrs. Harper & Brothers. He will make portraits for Harper's Weekly of the principal figures in the coming Presidential election.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. are bringing out Profit Sharing between Employer and Employee, by Mr. Nicholas Payne Gilman, a work which has attracted much notice in America in the last ten years. Mr. Gilman bases his arguments on a careful study of all the experiments made in Europe and America. He gives a long account of Leclaire, the "father of profit-sharing."

WE have permission to print the following portion of a letter addressed to Mrs. Stephen Crane by Mr. W. D. Howells:

Hamlin Garland first told me of Maggie, which your husband then sent me. I was slow in getting at it, and he wrote me a heartbreaking note to the effect that he saw I did not care for his book. On this I read it, and found that I did care for it immensely. I asked him to come and see me, and he came to tea and stayed far into the evening, talking about his work, and the stress there was on him to put in the profanities which I thought would shock the public from him, and about the semi-savage poor, whose types he had studied in that book. He spoke wisely and kindly about them, and especially about the Tough, who was tough because, as he said, he felt that "everything was on him." He came several times afterwards, but not at all oftener than I wished, or half so often, and I knew he was holding off from modesty. He never came without leaving behind him some light on the poor, sad life he knew so well in New York, so that I saw it more truly than ever before. He had thought wisely and maturely about it, but he had no plan for it, perhaps not even any hope without a plan. He was the great artist which he was because he was in no wise a sentimentalist. Of course I was struck almost as much by his presence as by his mind, and admired his strange, melancholy beauty, in which there was already the forecast of his early death. His voice charmed me, and the sensitive lips from which it came, with their intelligent and ironical smile, and his mystical, clouded eyes. Inevitably there was the barrier between his youth and my age that the years make, and I could not reach him where he lived as a young man might. I cannot boast that I understood him fully; a man of power, before he comes to its full expression, is hard to understand. It is doubtful if he is quite in the secret himself but I was always aware of his power, and nothing good that he did surprised me. He came to see me last just before he sailed for England the last time, and then he showed the restlessness of the malarial fever that was preying on him; he spoke of having got it in Cuba. But even then, with the sense that we were getting at each other less than ever, I felt his rare quality. I do not think America has produced a more distinctive and vital talent.

The Gateless Barrier, by Lucas Malet, which has been published this week, is introduced by the following extract from the writings of Lafcadio Hearn. It is called, oddly enough, "Preface":

What is the book?

According to the Japanese pronunciation of the Chinese characters of the title, we call it Mu-Mon-Kwan, which means "The Gateless Barrier." It is one of the books especially studied by the Zen sect, or the sect of Dhyāna. A peculiarity of some of the Dhyāna texts—this (story) being a good example—is that they are not explanatory. They only suggest. Questions are put, but the student must think out the answers for himself. He must think them out, but not write them. You know that Dhyāna represents human effort to reach, through meditation, zones of thought beyond the range of verbal expression; and any thought narrowed into utterance loses all Dhyāna quality. . . . Well, this story is supposed to be true; but it is used only for a Dhyāna question. . . .

THE mystery of the authorship of those pleasant books, Elizabeth and Her German Garden and A Solitary Summer, is reported to have been "swept aside." The writer is stated to be no other than Princess Henry of Pless, whose brother, Mr. George Cornwallis West, married Lady Randolph Churchill last month. The New York Critic gives the information, and it adds:

It would be superfluous to say that the Princess Henry is clever. One need only read her books to be convinced of that. They strike a new note in literature, and one that rings strong and true. For a young woman without any special training to master such a delightful literary style is certainly remarkable. Such books as the German Garden make life worth living.

This is an odd way of supporting the truth of the announcement. "Princess Henry of Pless wrote these books," says the Critic; "if you doubt her cleverness, read them." Yes, but their merits do not prove she wrote them; they merely prove that the person who wrote them is clever. We do not know whether Princess Henry of Pless wrote these books or not; very likely the Critic is right, but we should like some confirmation.

MARCEL PRÉVOST has been talking to an interviewer about the French novel of the next century. In the course of his remarks, as reported by the Paris correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, M. Prévost said:

The most noticeable change that has come over the French novel of quite recent years is its increasing seriousness. The theory of art for art's sake, dear to Flaubert and to those who came immediately after him, has fallen into disrepute. The French novelist of to-day is troubled about many things. Social and religious questions pre-occupy him; he has become a writer with a purpose. Even the veterans have been touched by grace—if grace it be. Huysmans, who wrote Les Soeurs Vatar and Au-va-l'eau, has come to write La Cathédrale, and the author of L'Assommoir is also the author of Fécondité. The strongest of the younger men have all of them a serious bent. Striking examples are Maurice Barrès, who would work out according to his lights the political regeneration of his country, and Paul Adam, who is profoundly interested in social problems.

M. PRÉVOST defends the pre-occupation of modern French novelists with the failures of marriage, the P.M.G. correspondent reporting and commenting as follows:

He considers that society being based upon marriage, breaches of the matrimonial contract are of necessity a matter of grave moment, and as such furnish the novelist with rich and most legitimate material. His contention may be indisputable so far as it goes, but it would be more to the point if he could convince us that the writers referred to have been accustomed to take a view in any way serious of the connubial misadventures which form their staple theme. Marcel Prévost is of opinion, however, that there will be less harping in the future on the breaches of a certain commandment. He even thinks that the love interest in general is destined to fall into the background, but not that women will on this account play a smaller part in the novelist's pages. The change will be that the more serious interests of the sex will come to the front. He threatens us, in a word, with a further crop of those Feminist novels of which there has been so prolific an output of late. But it may be that he has the enthusiasm of the neophyte. Being a recent convert to Feminism, he perhaps over-estimates the interest taken in women's rights by the world in general. He further predicts that the French novel is likely to become longer, in consequence of the difficulty of treating serious topics in brief. The three-volume English novel has ceased, he says, to seem ridiculous to Frenchmen. He is, perhaps, unaware that in England the three-volume novel is a thing of the past. It would be strange, indeed, if the monster were to reappear in Paris after having received its quietus in London.

By way of supplement to THE BOOKWORM's Ibsen note, printed in a recent issue of this journal, it may be mentioned that in 1876 appeared a translation by Catherine Ray of "The Emperor and the Galilean: a drama in two parts." In 1879, or thereabouts, appeared privately Translations from the Norse, by a B. S. S., who, we believe, was Mr. Andrew Johnson, late M.P. for South Essex. The volume, which was printed by John Bellows, of Gloucester, contains the first act of "Catiline" (spelled "Cataline" throughout), "Terje Vigen," a story in verse and prose, some lines from "Brand" on charity, "The Little Tell Tales," "The Eiderduck," and a "Lullaby"—all from Ibsen. A very odd translation by T. Weber of Nora appeared at Copenhagen in 1880. Here is a fragment from it:

KROGSTAD: If it were so why did you then write to me a such letter as you did?

MRS. LINDE . . . If I were to break with you it was also my duty to extirpate with you all your feelings for me.

Mr. Archer's fine translation of The Doll's House was first published by Mr. Unwin in 1889, who issued Mr. Edward Garrett's Brand in 1894.

POETRY, it is well known, can pay handsomely. Mr. Edwin Markham, the author of The Man with the Hoe, is said to have drawn an income from his poetry "far in excess of even the president of the largest college in the world." Mr. Markham has another volume of poems in hand, and a "boom" in America is assured.

THE American section of the Paris Exhibition includes a complete bibliography of pamphlets and books written by negro authors, carried out with great thoroughness by Mr. Daniel Murray, of the Congressional Library, under the direction of the librarian of Congress, Mr. Herbert Putnam. The following account of this work is given in the Chicago Times-Herald:

In Mr. Murray's preliminary list of books and pamphlets by negro authors there are 1,100 titles and about 1,200 writers. These beginnings have been found mostly in Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Washington. The pamphlet literature is particularly interesting, as showing to what extent coloured men became thinkers and scholars in days when it was a crime to teach negroes to read and write. These people without a country and without favour not only became educated, but what they wrote contributed greatly to the political, religious, and social questions of the day. Many of these earlier writers were educated in the West Indies. Much of their writing exhibited excellence of the highest order.

The chief characteristic of nearly all of this early writing by negro authors was seriousness. There was but little fiction, poetry, or humour. How to destroy slavery and bring freedom and equality to the enslaved was the burden of most of the first negro authors. With the conquest of slavery negro authors lost their most inspiring theme. Since that time a very few men and women have gained name and fame as contributors to American literature.

COMING to individual works, the Times-Herald remarks:

George W. Williams's History of the American Negro, in two large volumes, is an interesting and valuable compilation. Bishop Payne's History of the A. M. E. Church, Anna J. Cooper's essays, A Voice from the South, Frederick Douglass's wonderful autobiography, the more recent publications by Booker T. Washington, Prof. Du Boise, and the lives of Phillips and Sumner by Archibald Grimké, and the literary productions of Paul Laurence Dunbar and Charles Chestnut, are representative of the best things contributed to American literature by negro authors. These later books are what might be called the first productions of the negro in freedom. It is the first literary utterance of the negro who has been to school. It is also prophetic of what may be expected. It is a promise that authorship of a most interesting and valuable kind will develop in the course of the progressive life of the race.

THE Publishers' Circular takes exception to certain statements in our recent article on the future of the six-shilling novel. Thus it airily remarks:

The value of our contemporary's opinion on the question in general may be inferred from the circumstance that it seems to think the ordinary profit of a bookseller on a six-shilling novel is fourpence.

To this we reply that the ordinary profit on a six-shilling novel is fourpence. Very few booksellers (none except those who order in thirteens, twenty-sixes, &c.) get more. They pay 4s. 2d. and sell at 4s. 6d. The Publishers' Circular continues:

How is success or partial success to be estimated? After this fashion: "Let a man," we are told, "write a novel which sells only two thousand copies, and he will find half a dozen firms anxious to accept all risks and pay him from £75 to £100 on account of royalties upon delivery of the MS. of his next novel. Even if a novel sells but a thousand copies, thus clearing its first edition, the author may in future choose his publisher from several, and obtain from £30 to £50 in advance on his next MS." To make them generally accurate these statements require considerable modification and qualification.

No modification or qualification is necessary. We wrote of actual facts, and we can give the names of authors and publishers, and all details. Finally, we may remark that the Publishers' Circular distorts one of our arguments when it quotes us as saying that "another publisher . . . said it would be a good thing to return to the thirty-one-and-six figure." We wrote "bookseller," not "publisher," which quite alters the point.

QUALMS of incredulity—we know not why—mar our enjoyment of some stories told in a paper called the Gem about literary predilections in high places. Lord Salisbury, in addressing recently the members of a literary club of which he is president, is said to have related the following story:

One book has always fascinated me, and on more than one occasion has drawn me out of bed very early in the morning. This is Dumas' Monte Cristo. A few months ago I was staying at Sandringham. I had my favourite with me, and about half-past four in the morning I got up and went into the beautiful grounds, and sat down for an hour or two to be "carried away" by my book. I had been reading for about half-an-hour when I heard someone say, "What! are a Prime Minister's duties so heavy that he must needs be up so early in order to study?" I turned, and saw the Prince of Wales. I showed him the book that had drawn me out so early, and he said laughingly that he would read such an apparently fascinating book. Three weeks afterwards he said to me: "Monte Cristo drew you out of bed at half-past four in the morning; I may say that it drew me out of my bed at four in the morning."

The Gem goes on to tell us that the Princess of Wales is a great admirer of Mr. Hall Caine's novel, The Christian, concerning which Her Royal Highness said to the Dean of Winchester:

"The Christian is to me a most impressive book. The hero, John Storm, may have been a mistaken enthusiast, but enthusiasm, even though it be mistaken, is surely better than intolerable, placid indifference. Kings, princes (yes, and even princesses), peers, and people must be enthusiasts if they wish to benefit their country one little bit."

Nor do these revelations exhaust the Gem's stories. The Archbishop of Canterbury's tastes in reading were made known recently, it seems, to "a lady visitor at Lambeth." Dr. Temple said:

"When I was a curate, I used to devote all my spare time to reading Homer, Virgil, and the noble ancient classics. When I was a vicar I used to devote all my spare time to talking about these noble classics. Now I am an Archbishop I am a privileged person, and I devote some of my precious time to reading—Rudyard Kipling.

You think Rudyard Kipling somewhat strong for an Archbishop, perhaps? Madam, Rudyard Kipling 'rings strong,' but he invariably 'rings true.'"

The Archbishop of Canterbury, by the way, was never a vicar. Lastly, the Duke of Devonshire is reported to have said:

"I would sooner by far spend a few hours reading Mill's Logic—and very pleasant hours they would be, too—than in reading any work of fiction or romance. However, one novel has for many years had a great influence over me—I mean Mrs. Humphry Ward's Robert Elsmere. The hero, Robert Elsmere, is a character that will live and teach for years to come."

It is not often that we see a catalogue of such out-of-the-way literature as one which has just been issued by Messrs. Maurice, of Bedford-street, Covent Garden. It is a catalogue of "The Literature of Occultism and Archaeology"; and it is divided under such awesome headings as Alchemy, Astrology, Chiromancy, Magic and Witchcraft, Mystics and Oracles, Platonism, &c. The following titles will give an idea of this remarkable catalogue:

HIGGINS (Godfrey) ANACALYSIS, an attempt to draw aside the Veil of the Saitic Isis, or, an inquiry into the Origin of Languages, Nations, and Religions. 1836.

SECRETS REVEALED, or an Open Entrance to the Shit Palace of the King, containing the greatest treasure in Chemistry never yet so plainly discovered, composed by a famous Englishman, Anonymous, or Eyræneus Philaletha Cosmopolita, who attained to the Philosopher's Stone, from the Latin of John Langius. 1669.

TRIUMPHAL CHARIOT of ANTIMONY, by Basil Valentine, with the Commentary of Theodore Kerckringius, the Physician, translated from the Latin edition of 1685, with Biographical and Critical Introduction, engraved title and plates of Alchemical vessels. 1893.

DEVIL WORSHIP IN FRANCE.—A Record of things seen and heard in the Secret Societies according to the Evidence of Initiates, by A. E. Waite. 1896.

BARRETT (Francis) The Magus, or Celestial Intelligencer; being a complete System of Occult Philosophy, containing the Antient and Modern Practice of the Cabalistic Art, Natural and Celestial Magic, &c., showing the wonderful effects that may be performed by a knowledge of the Celestial Influences, the Occult Properties of Metals, Herbs, and Stones, and the application of active to passive principles, curious engravings, magical and cabalistical figures. The rare original edition with coloured plates of demons, &c. 1801.

READERS of the Westminster Gazette are disputing on the nature of the Roundel as distinct from the Rondeau. Mr. Swinburne long ago defined the Roundel as follows:

THE RONDEL.

A Roundel is wrought as a ring or a starbright sphere,
With craft of delight and with cunning of sound unsought,
That the heart of the hearer may smile if to pleasure his ear
A Roundel is wrought.

Its jewel of music is carven of all or of aught—
Love, laughter, or mourning—remembrance of rapture or fear—

That fancy may fashion to hang in the ear of thought.

As a bird's quick song runs round, and the hearts in us hear—

Pause answers to pause, and again the same strain caught,
So moves the device whence, round as a pearl or tear,

A Roundel is wrought.

A correspondent of the Westminster Gazette quotes also the late Mr. Gleeson White's preface to his "Canterbury Poets' Ballades and Rondeaux" as follows:

The Rondel, Rondeau, and Roundel, a group having a common origin, are now to some extent classified by each accepted variety using one form of the common name to denote its shape, but this division is purely arbitrary and a modern custom.

The variety most generally known now as the Roundel is that which follows Mr. Swinburne's model.

A LARGE illustrated édition de luxe of Hans Christian Andersen's Fairy Tales has been in course of preparation for some years in Denmark, practically under the auspices of the Danish Government. An English translation will be published by Mr. Heinemann. The illustrations, by Hans Tegnier, have been engraved on wood.

THE first number of Mr. Clement Scott's new weekly paper, The Free Lance, will be published on October 6. The drama "will be attended to by myself."

A LITTLE while before his death, Richard Hovey wrote for the Saturday Evening Post (New York) the following lines. They were quoted in the last issue of our contemporary for the first time:

What need have you of praising? Could I find
Some lonely poet no one praises yet,
I rather would choose him, that he might know
A fellow-craftsman knew him, marked him, loved.
But you—the whole world praises you. What need
Have you of any speech I have to give?
Yet for the craft's sake I must not be dumb;
And for the craft's sake you will pardon me.
But I had rather meet you face to face,
And talk of other and indifferent things,
And say no word of all that I would say (Praise and thanksgiving for your splendid song, Praise and the pride of the Empires of the Blood),
But leave you, silent, as we English do—
And you would know, and you would understand.

Bibliographical.

"WANTED, a new edition of the Works of Samuel Richardson"—that is the latest cry from the depths of the earnest reading population, and one wishes that one could administer consolation to those thus lifting up their voices. But have they any idea of what they are asking for? Do they realize that Richardson was one of the most verbose of authors, rivalling in his way the "interminable romancers" born over-sea? To reprint all Fielding and all Smollett is easy work; but to reprint all Richardson —! It is a long time since that feat was attempted. It has been essayed only once, for example, during the past twenty years—namely, in 1883, under the auspices of Mr. Leslie Stephen. During the same period Clarissa Harlowe, Pamela, and Sir Charles Grandison have each appeared in two editions. Clarissa was reprinted by Mr. Dicks (in an abridged form, I take for granted) in 1890. In 1893 it was reprinted (also in an abridged form) by Messrs. Routledge, who reproduced it in that shape last year. Pamela (abridged, I presume) was reprinted in 1891 both by Mr. Dicks and by Messrs. Routledge. Of Sir Charles Grandison there was an edition (abridged?), with illustrations from the original copper plates, in 1886. Five years ago there was an edition, in two volumes, of Letters Selected from Sir Charles Grandison—yet another abridgment.

I venture to think that Richardson gaius by editing of this sort. Marvellously clever as is his minute method, there are occasions on which he repeats himself unnecessarily and unfortunately. He is not an author of whom it is desirable to reproduce every word. In so saying, I am glad to have "Omar" FitzGerald on my side. Writing in 1868 about a magazine article on Richardson, he says of Clarissa: "The reviewer admits that it might be abridged; I am convinced of that, and have done it for my own satisfaction. . . . I am sure I could (with a pair of scissors) launch old Richardson again: we shouldn't go off the stocks easy (pardon nautical metaphors), but stick by the way, amid the jeers of Reviewers who had never read the original; but we should float at last." It is a pity that FitzGerald never wielded that pair of scissors to practical purpose. It so happens, however, that an abridgment of Clarissa was made by E. S. Dallas, of the Times, and published in 1868 in the form and guise of an ordinary three-volume novel. It would be interesting to know what measure of public support this received. Did the public take to it, or did they leave it severely alone? I forget; though I remember thinking that the abridgment had been skilfully performed.

Talking of FitzGerald, I have to thank Col. W. F. Prideaux for bestowing upon me one of the fifty privately-printed copies of the Notes for a Bibliography of Edward FitzGerald, which he contributed in the first place to the columns of Notes and Queries. The Notes have been corrected where necessary, and their compiler has since printed a four-page "Postscript," conveying some additional information. Notes and Postscript together make up a bibliography of FitzGerald which is, I should say, practically complete. It is, moreover, one of the most readable as well as useful of bibliographies, for the author, going beyond mere technicalities, supplies a condensed history of every one of the publications he records. Of the Rubāiyāt, by the way, he says comparatively little, wisely referring the reader to the book by Mr. Heron-Allen, in which the history of FitzGerald's best-known work is given in full detail. I thoroughly agree with Col. Prideaux that it is "a matter of regret that the attention of the world should be concentrated" upon FitzGerald's version of the Rubāiyāt, "a poem which, noble in expression as it is, throws but a dim sidelight upon the real nature of the man." I also join in "the hope that cheap editions of the lesser works of FitzGerald may, within a short time, be issued to rank on one's shelves with the 'Golden Treasury' edition of the Rubāiyāt."

It is announced that the forthcoming new edition (the second) of Mr. Swinburne's Rosamund will be enriched by a "dedicatory poem." I have reason to believe that that poem is addressed to Mr. Swinburne's cousin, Mrs. Disney Leith, a lady whose stories for children (such as Mark Dennis and The Chorister Brothers) were once very popular, and who, so lately as 1897, published an account of Three Visits to Iceland. In one of her volumes Mrs. Leith had the aid of Mr. Swinburne as contributor; but that is a subject to which I shall return anon. Meanwhile, I may say that the new book of lyrical poems by Mr. Swinburne, announced the other day, must not be looked for yet awhile.

The announcement of Mr. Murray's Monthly Review has naturally recalled to many memories the existence, last century, in this country of a Monthly Review which had considerable vogue and influence—"a periodical work giving an account of, with proper abstracts of, and extracts from, the new books, pamphlets, &c., as they come out." This Review began in 1749, the first series (consisting of eighty-one volumes) ending in 1789. By and by came "enlarged" and "improved" series, extending from 1826 to 1845, and running to sixty volumes. To the first series Ayscough made an index, completed in 1796. The most recent use of the title for a purely literary periodical seems to have been made in 1856-7 in the case of The Modern Review of Literature, Science, and Art, which ran to twenty-nine numbers.

It is interesting to know that we shall soon see a new edition of Pierce Egan the elder's Life in London; or, The Day and Night Scenes of Jerry Hawthorn, Esq., and Corinthian Tom. This, when first published in 1821, excited a large measure of public attention, and led to the publication of a key to it, as well as to the production of burlettas, extravaganzas, and so forth, founded upon it. It was reproduced in 1823, but has not been so often reprinted as might have been expected. I fancy Mr. J. C. Hotten's edition of 1870 must have been the latest. (In the following year, by the way, came from an anonymous hand a Finish to the Adventures of Tom, Jerry, and Logic.) Egan's Life of an Actor was reprinted so recently as 1892.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Skirmishers of Song.

Poems for Pictures. (Macqukeen.)

The Choice of Achilles, and Other Poems. (Frowde.)

A Gallery of Farmer Girls. (Lincoln, Nebraska, U.S.A.: Kiote Publishing Co.)

THE multitude of lesser singers have at least this value—that, like scouts and skirmishers thrown forward before a main army, they show in what direction the poetry of the age is advancing. Looked at in this light, the lesser verse now before us is not encouraging. It would seem to show that the wave of song has spent its force, that it no longer has any determined direction; nay, one might fear it is ebbing, leaving behind it a multitude of little pools, having no common connexion but that they variously derive from the once influent tide of poetry, not traceless even in its reflux. True, that our robust English song has always shown a healthful and energetic individualism; it has never followed the Latin or Celtic attraction towards clustering into schools: only when the eighteenth century effaced the very understanding of the thing called poetry, did a single model become universal. But perhaps the impotence of uniformity is better than the impotence of disintegration. All variety is not luxuriance. The numerous germs of decay should not be confounded with the numerous germs of life. Multitudinous are the spores of the living plant, and multitudinous are the spores of its corruption. Now, the diversity of these lesser poets is almost wholly imitative and derivative diversity; the organic tissues of former poetry breaking up into parasitic life.

To this there are exceptions; and, curiously, these are mainly exceptions from a metrical standpoint. There are traces of a distinct reversion to that early metre, dependent upon pause taking the place of omitted syllables, the very law of which has become forgotten in modern poetry, though it still lingered in Elizabethan poetry. Though its law has not been recovered, modern poets, beginning from Coleridge and Mrs. Browning, have increasingly endeavoured to write it by ear. Coventry Patmore enunciated its main principles, though he did not study their application; Mr. Robert Bridges and Mr. T. C. Oman, have done much towards elucidating its law, which still remains imperfectly grasped. But the attempt to write it by ear is evidently on the increase. It has been made with more or less success by others than Mr. Robert Bridges, conspicuously by Irish lyrists, such as Mrs. Hinkson; and that universal experimenter in metre, Mr. Swinburne, has employed it to a slight extent in a poem or so.

Its most prevalent and best evangelist, among the poets under notice, is Mr. Ford M. Hueffer, in his Poems for Pictures. That he uses this form of metre deliberately is shown by his sub-title, And for Notes of Music. In other words, he wishes you to read his metre with pauses or rests, akin to the rests in music. Such also is (practically) the principle of Mr. George Meredith in Love in a Valley. Theory varies largely, where theory has been put forward; but practice has been increasingly upon the same lines, which are really a reversion to antique metrical laws. And, therefore, Mr. Hueffer's metrical experiments have a cumulative interest. Doubtless they have to some extent been suggested by his knowledge of music. But we should not so prominently cite them were they not companioned by a genuine poetical quality, which of itself is sufficient to secure attention. There is an open-air note about his poems which does not need the quotation (in the poem we are about to instance) of the Romany Rye to tell us that he is a lover of Borrow. Here it is, "The Gipsy and the Cuckoo":

Tell me, brother, what's a cuckoo, but a roguish chaffing bird?

Not a nest's his own, no bough-rest's his own, and he's never good man's word;

But his call is musical and rings pleasant on the ear,
And the spring would scarce be spring

If the cuckoo did not sing
In the leafy months o' the year.

Tell me, brother, what's a gipsy, but a roguish chaffing chap?

Not a cot's his own, not a man would groan

For a gipsy's worst mishap;

But his tent looks quaint when bent

On the sidesward of a lane,

And you'd deem the rain more dreary

And the long, white road more weary

If we never came again.

Would your May-days seem more fair

Were we chaps deep read in books,

Were we cuckoos, cawing rooks,

All the world cathedral closes,

Where the very sunlight dozes,

Were the sounds all organ-pealing, psalm and song and prayer?

But though Mr. Hueffer's ear is excellent, he lays a perplexing burden on the reader, because he has not grasped the theory of his metre. The second line of the above poem is really two lines (a line equivalent to eight accents followed by a line equivalent to four), and should be so written that the reader's eye may assist his ear. Or else Mr. Hueffer should adopt some mechanical means of indicating the chief pauses—for this is a metre dependent on pauses. If the lines were of uniform metrical length (though of differing syllabic length) this were not needful; but when Mr. Hueffer varies at will the actual accentual length of his lines, the reader requires some guide by which the eye may suggest the ear. Only a very trained student of metre would be likely to follow correctly the metrical intention of this poem, with all its capricious ebb and flux. Other poems are yet more difficult in this respect. Here is another, with the same smell of the free grass about it.

THE GIPSY AND THE TOWNSMAN.

Pleasant enough in the seed time,

Pleasant enough in the hay time,

Pleasant enough in the grain time,

When oaks don golden gowns;

But the need time.

The grey time,

The rain time,

How bear ye them,

How fare ye then,

When the rain-clouds whip over the gorse on the downs,

How bear ye them, how fare ye then?

We lie round the fire and we hark to the wind

As it wails in the gorse and it whips on the down,

And the wet-wood smoke drives us winking blind;

But there's smoke and wind and woe in the town

Harder to bear

There than here in the saddest month of the weariest year.

In this ringing poem few will decipher the intended rhythm of the last line. To bring this out it should have been written in two lines, the second beginning after "here." As it stands, there is not even a comma after "here," to indicate the strong pause which is evidently designed. Mr. Hueffer more than once handles dialect with excellent effect. In the following example there is a true simplicity of pathos:

THE SONG OF THE WOMEN.

A WEALDEN TRIO.

First Voice.

When ye've got a child 'at's whist for want of food,

And a grate as grey's y'r 'air for want of wood,

And y'r man and you ain't nowise not much good;

Together.

Oh—
It's hard work a-Christmassing,
Carolling,
Singin' songs about the "Babe what's born."

Second Voice.

When ye've 'eered the bailiff's 'and upon the latch,
And ye've feeled the rain a-trickling through the thatch,
And y'r man can't git no stones to break nor yit no
Sheep to watch—

Together.

Oh—
We've got to come a-Christmassing,
Carolling,
Singin' of the "Shepherds on that morn."

Third Voice (more cheerfully).

'E was a Man's poor as us, very near,
An' 'E 'ad 'Is trials and danger,
An' I think 'E'll thioik of us when 'E sees us singiu' 'ere;
For 'Is mother was poor like us, poor dear,
An' she bore Him in a manger.

Together.

Oh—
It's warm in the heavens, but it's cold upon the earth;
An' we ain't no food at table nor no fire upon the hearth;
And it's bitter hard a-Christmassing,
Carolling,
Singin' songs about our Saviour's birth;
Singin' songs about the Babe what's born;
Singin' of the Shepherds on that morn.

As a final example of Mr. Hueffer's range, and the charm with which he can use his special type of metre, let us quote this dainty poem:

A LULLABY.

We've wandered all about the upland fallows,
We've watched the rabbits at their play,
But now good-night, good-bye to soaring swallows,
Now good-night, good-bye, dear day.
Poppy heads are closing fast, pigeons circle home at last,
Sleep, Liebchen, sleep, the bats are calling;
Pansies never miss the light, but sweet babes must sleep at night;
Sleep, Liebchen, sleep, the dew is falling.
Even the wind among the quiet willows
Rests, and the sea is silent too.
See soft white linen, cool, such cool white pillows
Wait in the darkling room for you.
All the little chicks are still, now the moon peeps down the hill,
Sleep, Liebchen, sleep, the owls are hooting,
Ships have hung their lanterns out, little mice dare creep about,
Sleep, Liebchen, sleep, the stars are shooting.

Altogether, Mr. Hueffer is a poet of distinct accomplishment and appeal, a poet of personality.

We cannot say so much of Mr. A. Gray Butler. In his Choice of Achilles, and Other Poems, he is graceful and sensitive, without reaching the level of inevitableness that marks authentic poetry. Thus he is in "Sunt Lachrymæ," of which we give the final stanza:

But song more sweet shall never twine
The rose and one in one short line;
Or more pathetic give to grief
An outlet, for a moment brief,
To loose awhile the captive woe
Whose prisoned drops refuse to flow;
And, like a draught of myrrh in wine,
To mix in tears an anodyne;
Than in, that world's epitome,
Sad Virgil's sweet "Sunt lachrymæ."

But in one poem he (like Mr. Hueffer) handles dialect; in this case, however, with comic effect, something after the manner of Tennyson's "Northern Farmer." It is worth citing.

HODGE: "THE NATURAL MAN."

It's nateral to wish for land in them as hasn't any;
It's nateral to think a pound is happier nor a penny;
It's nateral to try and get, and gettin' not to lose it;
An' mighty nateral 'avin got for your own good to use it.

It's nateral for them who's up to keep down them that's under;
How cum that other way about 'as ollers been my wonder;
That other way of lyin' down for others to pass over;
Like openin' gates for nayburs' cows to cum and eat yur clover.

Yer talk of kindness, love and all: it sounds that mighty grand;
I knock a thistle on the 'ead when I've a stick in 'and;
Yer call me Hodge; my name is Jones; there's Joneses
by the score
In churchyard there; they ollers were a stiddy sort, an'
shure;

But yer've two things we 'aven't got, the money an' the gab;
Yer see, yer cum before us, zur, 'i the fine old game of grab.
It's our turn now. 'Tis well for you to tork o' men as brothers,
We'll do it too, as well as you, when we're a-top of others;

But now I do as I'm dun by, with less o' sweet than sours:
I loves men—wal, a little bit, an' out o' bizness 'ours.
Yer like to see another's crop as blooms when yur's is blighted;
I doan't care who is't suffers 'rong as long as I am rited.

Yer say, I should to others do as I wud be done by;
Well, zur, if you've a nag to sell, 'ere's wun as wants to buy:
Tell me 'is tricks, 'is age, an' wind, an' why 'is legs is swellin',
If 'e's the oss yer say 'e is, then, man, why are ye sellin' ?
No, zur, down 'ere in Hagglinton we counts an' 'onest man
Is wun as ollers gets the most, an' gives the least 'e can:
He'll sweat an' haggle, sware 'e won't, brake off, an' go
'is way;
But giv'n 'is 'and, an' sed 'is wurd, he'll never brake 'is say.

Of dialect entirely—American dialect—is Mr. Schnyler W. Miller's A Gallery of Farmer Girls. Mr. Miller has observation, dramatic feeling, homely simplicity—everything needful for his task—except the power to sing. His sketches would be improved were they frank prose. They are by no means all concerned with women, as might be thought from the title. Here is a typical specimen:

LOVE AND DUTY.

It's been the derndest slowest afternoon
I've seen for more'n a month. It ain't because I've worked so awful hard. I ain't plowed half
What any other fellow'd done, I s'pose.
The team's all right; the ground's a-workin' fine;
The field's a-needin' plowin', too. You'd think
I'd keep 'em goin' lively, but, by jing,
I jest can't do it. When I turn around,
Down at the other end, there, next the house,
Or stop a bit to clean the shovels off,
Jest like as not I'll fool around and take
Three times as long's I really ought to do.

A fellow shouldn't act jest this-a-way
An' waste the whole endurin' afternoon,
An' keep a-lookin' all the time to where,
Down to the house acrost the pasture-lot,
She's visitin' oud folks.

Altogether, one gets the impression that recent verse is at its strongest when it touches earth. The plein air school, which has been so powerful in modern painting, seems also to have an increasing force in modern verse. And that is no bad thing. But of the present endeavourers in that line, incomparably the best is Mr. Hueffer.

A Splendid Plagiarist.

LIBRARY OF ENGLISH CLASSICS.—The Travels of Sir John Mandeville. With a Bibliographical Note by A. H. Pollard. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

SIR JOHN MANDEVILLE has been rashly called "the father of English prose." If this grandiose title must needs be bestowed, it belongs to King Alfred. The prose of Mandeville's Travels is excellent in its long-ago way; it is crisp, expressive, and fruity; and it is the vehicle of ideas and statements which amuse us by their romantic simplicity. That is all. If any literary fatherhood is to be ascribed to Mandeville, he might with some truth be called the father of English plagiarism. For a more audacious conveyer does not haunt the glimpses of libraries. It is probable that the very name Mandeville is the alias of a writer who travelled only in his fourteenth-century armchair, and saw foreign parts only through books. There is nothing in these travels through the East that compels us to believe that "Mandeville" was himself the traveller. Of course he would have us believe it; he tells us how

I, John Mandeville, Knight, . . . that was born in England in the town of St. Alban's, . . . have been long time over the sea, and have seen and gone through many diverse lands, and many provinces and kingdoms and isles, and have passed throughout Turkey, Armenia the little and the great; through Tartary, Persia, Syria, Arabia, Egypt the high and the low; through Lybia, Chaldaea, and a great part of Ethiopia; through Amazonia, Ind the less and the more, a great part; and throughout many other Isles that be about Ind; where dwell many diverse folks. . . . Of which lands and isles I shall speak more plainly hereafter, . . . and specially for them that will and are in purpose to visit the Holy City of Jerusalem and the holy places that are thereabout. And I shall tell the way that they shall hold thither. For I have oftentimes passed and ridden that way, with good company of many lords. God be thanked.

Unfortunately, this fair speaking has been exploded by scholars. The personal touches to be found in this popular travel book of the Middle Age are few, and never are they convincing. Whole passages can be traced to, or rather identified in, the writings of other travellers. The directions as to the best route to the Holy Land have been traced to William of Aix. The account of the Holy Land itself seems to owe something to a German work by William of Boldensele, written in 1336. The strange stories of India and China are demonstrably lifted from the pages of Friar Odoric, a Franciscan monk, who dictated an account of his travels through Asia in 1330; or from those of John de Plano Carpini, who was an ambassador of Pope Innocent IV. to China in 1246. Other depredations, well known to the literary police, might be catalogued.

In Mandeville's behalf it should be remembered that travel literature only became exact as travel became general. In his day a traveller was a man who had entered Dream Land. To the readers of the fourteenth century travels were imaginative literature, and were loved in that character. Mandeville, understanding this, seems to have edited other men's travels for the market. Defoe did much the same thing, though with infinitely greater skill, for the eighteenth century; and even in our day unknown Australia has been exploited by a traveller whose story of exploration has been shown to be daring romance. These invented, Mandeville only borrowed. To be sure, he painted the lilies and gilded the fine gold that he annexed. Friar Odoric tells us that in a certain island of the East there is a huge mountain "whereupon the inhabitants of that region do report that Adam mourned for his son Abel the space of five hundred years. In the midst of this mountain there is a most beautiful plain, wherein is a little lake containing great plenty of water, which water the inhabitants report to have proceeded from the tears of Adam and Eve: howbeit I proved that to be false, because I saw the water flow in the lake." The qualifying statement which we italicise is the only part of this narration which Mandeville does not appropriate. To show him at work, we will give the ensuing sentences of the two narratives:

FRIAR ODORIC.

The water is full of horse-leeches, and blood suckers, and of precious stones also: which precious stones the king taketh not unto his own use, but once or twice every year he permitteeth certain poor people to dive under the water for the said stones, and all that they can get, he bestoweth upon them, to the end that they may pray for his soul.

MANDEVILLE.

And in the bottom of that lake men find many precious stones and pearls. In that lake grow many reeds and great canes; and there within be many cocodrills and serpents and great water-leeches. And the king of that country, once every year, giveth leave to poor men to go into the lake to gather them precious stones and pearls, by way of alms, for the love of God that made Adam.

Again, Odoric describes a certain "abundance of fishes" that come to a country called Tathalamasin, and abide three days, during which they are caught in unlimited quantities; and how they are believed to come to do homage to the Emperor; all of which Mandeville copies into his book when writing about Java. And whereas Odoric adds: "There be tortoises also as big as an oven," Mandeville turns the tortoises into snails, and makes them as big as houses. Such comparisons could be multiplied to almost any extent, and they are made peculiarly easy to the reader of this edition; for, as Mandeville's book was not long enough to fill a volume in this series, Mr. Pollard has printed, at the end, from Hakluyt, three of the narratives to which Mandeville is most indebted—viz., those of Carpini, William de Rubruquis, and Odoric.

It is pretty evident that Mandeville enlarged the original plan of his book. In his preface he places the Holy Land in the forefront of his design, and his first chapter begins with the words: "In the name of God, Glorious and Almighty! He that will pass over the sea and come to land to go to the city of Jerusalem . . ." It is in this portion of his work, too, that Mandeville shows most originality. It is admitted that he may have visited Palestine. His borrowings only became flagrant when he leaves the lands of Scripture and travels farther toward the rising sun. The first sixteen chapters of his book may be read with delight for their revelation of the spirit in which a fourteenth century traveller visited Palestine, and the objects which satisfied his mood. The most sacred relics, the most exact sites, and legends of circumstantial impossibility are presented on every hand. The calmness with which Mandeville accepts this or that story is only equalled by the sageness with which he rejects or modifies another. He finds the cross of our Lord at Constantinople, and His seamless coat, and the sponge and reed of the crucifixion, and one of the nails; and rejoicing in these he reproves some men who "trow that half the cross that Christ was done on be in Cyprus, in an abbey of monks, that men call the Hill of the Holy Cross: but it is not so. For that cross that is in Cyprus is the cross in which Dismas the good thief was hanged on. But all men know not that."

At Constantinople also he found the half of the crown of thorns, made, he tells us, of "jonkes [rushes] of the sea." He says:

And I have one of those precions thorns, that seemeth like a white thorn; and that was given to me for great speciality. For there are many of them broken and fallen into the vessel that the crown lieth in; for they break for dryness when men move them to show them to great lords that come thither.

You never know when Mandeville will say a sensible thing, or when he will repeat a gorgeous absurdity. When he is writing of the Red Sea it seems certain that he will romance about its name. But no; he tells us, as might a modern Sunday-school teacher: "That sea is not more red than another sea; but in some place thereof is the gravel red, and therefore men clepen it the Red Sea." And yet on the next page he will have it that the monks of the church of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai, procure their lamp oil by the following "miracle of God":

The ravens and the crows and the choughs and other fowles of the country assemble them there every year once, and fly thither as in pilgrimage; and everych of them bringeth a branch of the bays or of olive in their beaks instead of offering, and leave them there; of the which the monks made great plenty of oil. And this is a great marvel. And sith the fowls that have no kindly wit or reason go thither to seek that glorious Virgin, well more ought men then to seek her, and to worship her.

We find Mandeville writing with patience and knowledge about the North Star, and deducing from it the roundness of the earth. "And wit well that . . . the lands of Prester John, Emperor of Ind, be under us." But this does not save him from the blunder of placing Jerusalem in the midst of the world, which "men prove, and shew there by a spear, that is pight into the earth, upon the hour of midday, when it is equinox, that sheweth no shadow on no side."

In Mandeville's company, or the company of his originals, we visit a hundred holy spots: the Sepulchre, where "there is a lamp that hangeth . . . and on the Good Friday it goeth out by himself, and lighteth again by himself at that hour that our Lord rose from death to life"; Calvary, where we see the pillar "that our Lord Jesu was bounden to when he was scourged"; the rock Moriach, on which Jacob slept when he saw the angels ascend and descend on the celestial ladder; the bath of our Lord in which "was wont to come water from Paradise, and yet it droppeth"; the gate "where through our Lady went, when she was with child, when she went to Bethlehem"; the place where Peter's monitory cock crew; the elder tree that Judas hanged himself upon; the vessel in which our Lord washed his disciples' feet; and the stone on which he often sat and preached, "and upon that same he shall sit at the day of doom, right as himself said." Such simplicities cannot lose their charm.

These were the traditions of the day; Mandeville did but repeat or embellish them. It is when he travels into Ind, and to "many other isles that be about Ind, and to far Cathay, that he becomes a marvel-monger on his own account. He tells us that the king of the island called Dondun, in the Malayan region, has fifty-four great isles under him, each ruled by a king. These islands appear to be set apart for the nurture of monstrosities. Mandeville runs over some of their specialities in terms which might well throw the directors of Barnum's into ecstasies of coveting:

In one of these isles be folk of great stature, as giants. And they be hideous for to look upon. And they have but one eye, and that is in the middle of the front. And they eat nothing but raw flesh and raw fish.

And in another isle toward the south dwell folk of foul and of cursed kin that have no heads. And their eyen be in their shoulders.

And in another isle be folk that have great ears and long, that hang down to their knees.

And in another isle be folk that have horses' feet. And they be strong and mighty, and swift runners, for they take wild beasts with running, and eat them.

And in another isle be folk that go upon their hands and their feet as beasts. And they be all skinned and feathered, and they will leap as lightly into trees, and from tree to tree, as it were squirrels or apes.

And in another isle be folk that go always upon their knees full marvellously. And at every pace that they go, it seemeth that they should fall. And they have in every foot eight toes.

Particularly interesting at the present moment is Mandeville's account of China. After describing certain wonderful models of peacocks and fowls which are made to flap their wings on golden tables for the amusement of the Great Chan (the Emperor of China), he queries whether it be done by craft or necromancy, and then adds a shrewd and curious sketch of Chinese character. Here is the passage:

And whether it be by craft or by necromancy I wot never; but it is a good sight to behold and a fair; and it is great marvel how it may be. But I have the less marvel, because that they be the most subtle men in all sciences and in all crafts that be in the world; for of subtlety and of malice and of farcasting they pass all men under heaven. And therefore they say themselves, that they see with two eyes and the Christian men see but with one, because that they be more subtle than they. For all other nations, they say, be but blind in cunning and working in comparison to them.

We have but skimmed Mandeville's dish of marvels. To his new readers, who will be many if an excellent edition can attract, we leave his reports of the glories of the Soldan of Babylon, for whom he says he fought against the Bedouins; the wealth and wisdom of Prester John, "whose bed was of fine sapphires, bended with gold, for to make him sleep well, and to refrain him from lechery"; and of the hills of gold in Trapobane which were guarded by crafty pismires, "great as hounds."

Mr. Pollard has met the special needs of this volume by going somewhat beyond the "Bibliographical Note" which is the editorial feature of each volume in this admirable series of tall red books. The ascertained facts about "Mandeville" and his life are given, and the doubts indicated; and the studious reader is referred with all emphasis to Mr. G. F. Warner's superb edition of Mandeville in the Roxburghe Club publications. Mr. Warner, by the way, wrote the life of Mandeville for the Dictionary of National Biography.

A Suburban County.

A History of Surrey. By Henry Elliott Maldeu, M.A. (Stock. 7s. 6d.)

As a county Surrey has been completely overshadowed by London. "It is not," as the author very truly says, "a district naturally marked off as the home of a people or tribe such as Sussex, which lay between the forest and the sea, with woods and marshes defining the limits of its coast-line in the west and east. It is not like Cumberland or like Cornwall, the last relic of a Welsh kingdom; nor like Northumberland, nor like Chester, frontier districts of peculiar history." At present it is simply a delightful rural suburb of London, combining a beautiful diversity of scenery with facility of access. The history of the county for this reason, though by no means lacking in interest, is somewhat loose and disjointed, and does not naturally group itself round a centre. Yet in character, and even in aspect, Surrey has undergone many changes. During the Roman occupation, or at least for the greater part of it, it seems to have been a pleasant, ungarrisoned district, little subject to disturbances that were common elsewhere. The great forest called Andredesweald, which covered Sussex and a part of Kent, as well as the Surrey clay and greensand, probably attracted the sporting Roman nobles to use it as a residential and hunting district where they could erect their villas, race their horses on the downs, and chase the tall deer and other wild inhabitants of the woodland. Surrey was to them essentially what it is to the wealthy Londoner of to-day.

Under other circumstances Southwark might have become the county town, perhaps even the capital, but at an early period the north side of the Thames began to overgrow the south. Very soon the "Surrey side" obtained the "unenviable reputation it still possesses. There was a wild riverside population, who held that debtors were free from arrest in the Clink and Mint. The liberty of Clink was under a peculiar jurisdiction, that of the See of Winchester, and the Mint was so-called on account of a Mint set up by Henry VIII. Southwark possessed other advantages for the shady person. If a gentleman had to surrender to the catchpole, there was nowhere in England where he could be so sure of having his comfort attended to as at the King's Bench prison. There was a coffee-house within the walls, and it took no large price to purchase a right to "the liberties," that is to say, freedom to consort with the various men of "blood and misfortune" who, because they had pinked their man in a duel, lightened the pockets of a fat alderman on one of the many heaths, or been detected in less genteel crime such as—"convey the wise it call"—sought and found sanctuary there. Further, down to the reign of Henry VIII. vice was allowed to fester in licensed houses, and it was the scene of bear-baitings, mummeries, and other amusements that the virtuous city rulers banished across the river. It was the home of playhouses and players, and, as might be expected, a constant attraction to those who wrote for them. William Shakespeare owned a house, called the Boar's Head, in the Borough High-street, hard by the east end of St. Mary Overie; his brother Edmund, himself an actor, and following in the footsteps of William, died in Southwark, and was buried in what then was the church of St. Saviour. Fletcher caught the plague, died, and was buried in the same parish, and the burial of "Philip Massinger, a stranger," is recorded in the registers.

Talking of actors and dramatists, we cannot help thinking that "Grim, the collier of Croydon," might have helped the author to find local colour for the Surrey of those old days. Grim followed what must have been a common calling in times when by coal was of course meant charcoal; to distinguish it the other was at first called sea-coal:

"A lard!" exclaims Grim, "but do you think that will be so? I should laugh till I tickle to see that day, and forswear sleep all the next night after. Oh, Mr. Parson, I am so halter'd in affection that I may tell you in secret, here's no body else hears me, every time I come to London my coals are found faulty; I have been five times pilloried, my coals given to the poor, and my sacks burnt before my face."

That is the collier's life in little, and it was the facility for burning charcoal, and as a consequence being able to work the iron trade, that made Surrey prosperous during the Middle Ages. This in its turn led to a wasteful destruction of the forest trees for the purpose of supplying the blast furnaces. Æsthetic persons complained of the ensuing ugliness much as they now complain of that of the Black Country.

Few readers [says our author] labour through the 30,000 alexandrines of Drayton's Polyolbion. Those who do so will pick up some curious bits of information in the wilderness of commonplaces. One of the best known extracts from his work is that in which he deplores the destruction of the Wealden Forests in Song 17. He describes the treeless downs laughing to see the Weald reduced to the same condition as themselves.

To-day the Weald is as beautiful as ever. Grim the Collier has departed, and with him Clack the Miller and all the band of sooty ironworkers. Fresh and fair are the woods once more, and the yaffle's wild cry seems to protest that this tale of smoke and labour is only an idle legend. After that, is it too much to hope that some time in the coming centuries even the Black Country will again blossom as the rose.

No history of Surrey would be complete without touching on its amusements; and the grave historian describes the origin of the Derby and the beginnings of the famous cricket club with as much care as he bestows on Roman road and tessellated pavement. "The sport of running horses" followed naturally on the discovery of medicinal waters at Epsom. Mr. Parkhurst, lord of the manor, built an assembly room in 1690, and in the early summer months—our London season—numerous visitors came from the Continent sometimes as well as from London and the whole of England to drink the waters and to enjoy cock fighting, dancing, gambling, horse racing, and rustic sports, such as cudgel-playing, foot-racing, and catching a pig by the tail." It was in 1753 that this fashion received a shock from which it never recovered. Dr. Richard Russell in that year may be said to have invented sea-bathing, and the inland watering-places began to be forsaken for the coast. The assembly room and other fashionable surroundings of the well were pulled down in 1803, when those who wished to take the waters had deserted Epsom for Cheltenham and Tunbridge Wells.

From the variety of topics touched on it will be seen that Mr. Malden has written his history in no merely dry-as-dust spirit, but has made a successful effort to picture life in the many phases it has passed through on the weald and downs of Surrey. The book is a valuable addition to local history.

The New Liberalism.

Liberalism and the Empire: Three Essays. By F. W. Hirst, G. Murray, and J. L. Hammond. (Johnson.)

THE growing belief that a General Election is at hand will probably cause many to scan the pages of this book with interest. If anyone could find a stirring cry or creed for the Opposition many of us who stand aloof from active political partisanship would be glad, for various reasons. But these essayists are not very adroit at their craft. They lavish too much abuse on Mr. Chamberlain. It may be deserved or not, but his is a reputation that abuse has no power over. The Conservatives used to exhaust the language of vituperation on him in his Radical days, but the average British elector paid as little heed then as he does now. Besides, the main lines of his South African policy have been endorsed by Lord Rosebery and Sir Edward Grey, whose names, by the by, and the Liberal Imperialism they advocate, are not mentioned in the book. Their line would probably be that the war was grossly mismanaged by Her Majesty's Ministers who are now basking in a glory reflected from the true hero of the last nine months, Lord Roberts. But to call up the spirit of Gladstone in order to make an indiscriminate assault upon the policy that led to the war is, to say the least, very weak strategy, and it is still further enfeebled by a childish attempt to ignore the most popular and influential members of the Liberal Party. We, however, hasten to leave this somewhat hackneyed controversy in order to discover what else is on the bill of fare.

One fact soon becomes plain: while the Conservatives have been in power it is notorious that they have done nothing for the peasantry, the most neglected, the worst paid, and the most discontented class in the community. Nor have they made any attempt whatever to check that desertion of the country for the town that is sapping the life of England. But on this the programme makers are dumb, so that as far as useful agrarian reform is concerned there is not one party to mend another with. It was especially unconscionable of Mr. Hirst to glide past the question without raising his eyes, for he has a great deal to say about naval expenditure, and one potent reason for maintaining a large fleet is that we have now become dependent on foreign countries for the greater portion of our food supply. The nation that could intercept our shiploads of wheat and mutton could starve England into surrender. Other proposals—that of establishing a protective tariff, for instance, or building imperial granaries—are impracticable. It is difficult to suppose that the author can possibly believe in a long-continued peace with the vacant places in the world being almost taken up and the nations engaged already in a stern struggle for the supremacy in commerce. His protest against the inflated and none too able budgets of the last few years are entitled to sympathy, and will get it from the British taxpayer, but we do not quite follow him when he argues that it is right to grumble at Imperial taxation but that it should be a pleasure to write cheques for local rates—that is to say, provided their incidence was readjusted. Nor will his assault on the fat publican and the rich brewer excite any vast indignation. This country bestows rewards without proper discrimination. We offer Mr. Hirst an example: A couple of years ago two Lancashire brothers, after two decades of resolute and often most disappointing work, that broke down the health of one of them, succeeded, by an ingenious system of cross-fertilisation, in establishing various new breeds of wheat, barley, and oats much more productive than their predecessors. Surely they deserved well of their country if ever men did! Yet the reward is denied them. You cannot patent a breed of wheat, and seed from the new corn is raised and sold by anyone. How very much more carefully we protect the man who brews a special beer or stout! Where Mr. Hirst is weak is in construction. There are many things wrong, our Licensing system among them, in this imperfect world; but it is of little use dwelling on them unless a way that is clearly better can be suggested. This, too, is a question that will never be settled on party lines: you cannot say that one set of politicians more than another is responsible for the prosperity of the beer trade. In regard to journalism, Mr. Hirst makes a proposal that ought to gladden the hearts of literary men. After asking "How can a poor man, preserving his independence, write for the press?" he suggests that "the whole staff of a journal should share in its ownership, and those who write should exercise control over its policy." Excellent! A share in the ownership is just what the poor writer would like.

Mr. Gilbert Murray holds forth on "The Exploitation of Inferior Races" in a somewhat one-sided manner, since he fails to take into account the benefits conferred on them. His great point seems to be that the employment of natives has many of the characteristics of slavery, and that in the South African mines there is much degradation, corruption, and vice. They cannot be much worse in these respects than our own coalpits were at the beginning of the Queen's reign, and the progress made there ought to prevent us from altogether losing hope. On the whole, we are somewhat puzzled to understand how he is going to hew a plank for the Liberal platform out of this grievance. He has made out a capital case for a philanthropic mission or the establishment of a society for preventing cruelty to natives, but the political bearing is not self-evident. As to Mr. Hammond, he is the rhetorician of the party, and lays about him as follows: "All that has made this Commonwealth great and strong is the work of Liberalism"—in fact, his composition is more for the hustings than the library; the suggestiveness of the book comes from the other two.

A Doctor in India.

Recollections of My Life. By Surgeon-General Sir Joseph Fayrer, Bart. (William Blackwood & Sons.)

A MEDICAL man who has spent the best years of his life in the East, who has been through the terrible experiences of the siege of the Residency of Lucknow, and who accompanied the Prince of Wales on his visit to India, should have plenty of reminiscences to satisfy even the most exacting in this class of bookmaking. When we add that Sir Joseph Fayrer had a fancy for investigating snake poisoning, it is evident that any book he may write should be full of interest. But, unfortunately, Sir Joseph has not the pen of a ready writer; he makes as little of his experiences as it is possible for man to make, and his reminiscences are in no degree dependent on the manner in which he relates them. But the author has one redeeming point: he is an unconscious humorist, and now and then tells a funny story without apparently seeing any joke himself. For instance, this account of the young doctor and the general has a vein of humour which is not lessened by the dry, matter-of-fact way in which the story is told. The incident occurred in a field hospital in Burmah in 1852:

Here I got my first experience of sunstroke and the mode of treatment, which consisted mainly in douching with cold water, and rousing the prostrated energies. One of the worst cases was that of Brigadier Warren, who was brought in quite insensible, and seemed likely to die. I had him well douched with cold water from the mussacks, gave him stimulants, and finally roused him by switching with a sweeper's broom. He came round, was much prostrated for a time, but ultimately recovered. He was always grateful, and whenever we met in later days always alluded to my having saved his life.

This simplicity is the saving grace. But Sir Joseph Fayrer occasionally saw the joke, though he does not endeavour to bring it out in print. For example, speaking of an action in Burmah, he says:

I must mention an amusing incident that happened during the action. Colonel A. Boyle, R.A., who was Commissioner at Moulmein, had come round, and was acting as a volunteer. He was wounded, and with several others was brought to be attended to. On being asked where he was wounded, he pointed to the leg. I took hold of the trouser and said to someone by me: "This must come off." He immediately called out, in great agitation: "You shall not cut off my leg, sir! I am Colonel Boyle." I explained that it was only the trousers that had to come off, that the wound might be examined.

There is nothing to quote in the account of the siege of Lucknow. Sir Joseph's remarks are valuable, no doubt, but they have all the dryness of an official document. From 1859 to 1872 the author lived in Calcutta, and now and then we get glimpses of remarkable people whom he met. At the great Durbar in Agra, in 1866, he saw much of the famous Shah Jehan Begum, who was a well-known character in India in those days:

The old lady was very clever and astute, and considered a very able ruler; she was very faithful to us during the Mutiny. She was plainly dressed, and had a common woollen comforter round her neck, which was worked in her own orphan asylum. This comforter she was very fond of, and, later on, at the Grand Durbar, she wore it over her blue satin robes of the Star of India. When we complimented her on having been made a G.C.S.I., she said: "Ham aur Victoria donon admix knight hain" (I and Victoria are both Knights).

Unfortunately, the good things in this book of reminiscences need much search. There is too much unimportant detail which swamps the narrative as a whole, and matters which are treated of in other works, such as the Prince of Wales's visit to India, are given as though no other record existed.

Other New Books.

SHAKESPEARIANA.

THE flood of Shakespeare books which burst upon us a year or two ago has stayed its course. Mr. Frank Harris's Shakespeare the Man is still to seek, and the last few months have produced little that is memorable. The student will, perhaps, claim an exception for William Shakespeare: Prosody and Text, by B. A. P. Van Dam and C. Stoffel (Williams & Norgate). This is a learned and exhaustively minute account, firstly, of Shakespeare's prosody, and, secondly, of the condition of the existing sixteenth and seventeenth-century texts of the plays. It will require the careful attention of every future editor of Shakespeare; but the general reader will naturally be content to take the results of these arduous researches at third hand. Prof. Goldwin Smith's Shakespeare the Man (Toronto: G. N. Morang & Co.) is the sort of magazine article which every able writer, who has won his reputation in some other department of literature, thinks it necessary to write, at least once in his life, about Shakespeare. The Professor does not seem to be well acquainted with the recent developments of the higher Shakespearean criticism. He sets out with the desire "to find traces of the dramatist's personal character in his dramas," and he finds them by the ancient and discredited method of ascribing to the poet himself utterances of dramatic interest garlanded at haphazard from the plays. It is a slight and hopelessly unscientific piece of work. Still more inconsiderable is Dr. Harold Ford's Shakespeare's Hamlet: a New Theory (Elliot Stock). Dr. Ford thinks that the dramatic interest of "Hamlet" lies in the struggles of the hero's better self, or conscience, against the temptation to seek revenge against his father's murderer:

It is a play of the conscience, i.e. delineating the character of a man in whom the visible workings of conscience may be seen powerfully dominating his life and conduct, repelling the subtle forces of evil arrayed against it to a successful issue.

Then the play is not a tragedy at all, for the "successful issue" is a triumph, and no failure. Dr. Ford's theory does not err from any excess of subtlety in interpretation. And how does he get over the fact that ultimately Hamlet does kill Claudius?

DONATELLO.

BY HOPE REA.

This volume stands high in the series to which it belongs. Miss Rea has already made her mark by a sympathetic book on Tuscan Artists, and has succeeded in hitting just that combination of technical knowledge and æsthetic demonstration which is proper to a popular monograph. That Donatello is the one Italian sculptor of sufficient originality, and, above all, sufficient strength, to take rank as a precursor of Michael Angelo we agree. At the same time, we feel that Miss Rea has laid rather undue stress upon the rugged, realistic side of his temperament, as compared with that which led him to seek, first and foremost, the beautiful. Is the "Zuccone," after all, more characteristic of the man than the "Annunciation" of Santa Croce? And even when such doubtful works as the "St. Cecilia" are taken by a severer criticism from the master, there are still enough examples of his work—the singing gallery in the Opera del Duomo, the altar panels at Padua, the pulpit at Prato—in which the sheer delight in beauty is the dominant characteristic. We do not quite know why, both in the text and on the title-page, Miss Rea should call Donatello "Il Maestro di chi sanno." The phrase is "Il Maestro di color che sanno," and it belongs to Aristotle, and Tennyson has already misapplied it once. (Bell & Sons.)

THE ETHICS OF ARISTOTLE. EDITED BY JOHN BURNET, M.A.

The English student of the "Ethics" is very much better equipped now than he was a decade ago. Bekker's text and Grant's somewhat old-fashioned commentary have given way to the fine critical text of Prof. Bywater and the full and learned Notes on the Nichomachean Ethics of Prof. Stewart. To these must now be added the present edition, which is well fitted to become the standard textbook for "Greats" men. Prof. Burnet has already made his mark by an excellent volume on the Early Greek Philosophers. The chief features of his Ethics may be briefly summed up. The text, which is not identical with Prof. Bywater's, rests upon the editor's independent revision of Bekker. The commentary consists of a general introduction setting forth some new views on the character and intention of the Ethics and its relation to Aristotle's philosophical work as a whole, an introductory analysis to each book, and a series of foot-notes, which, though not rivalling Prof. Stewart's "notes" in fullness, are probably as much as the ordinary "Greats" man will require. Mr. Burnet also prints a number of parallel passages from the Eudemian Ethics, a very valuable addition. The main object of the introduction is to lay stress on the point, of which Mr. Burnet makes much, of the "dialectical" character of the Nichomachean Ethics. That is to say, he regards the work, not as a scientific demonstration from accepted first principles of a philosophy of conduct, but rather a preliminary attempt to arrive at such first principles by dialectic, which means for Aristotle as for Plato the discussion and analysis of the deliverances of the ordinary consciousness, with the view of discovering what it is that these imply. This view of the nature of the Nichomachean Ethics, which is a somewhat new but growing one, naturally determines and colours Prof. Burnet's exposition throughout. The book, though bulky, is printed on light paper, and is singularly pleasant to handle. (Methuen.)

Fiction.

The Voice of the People. By Ellen Glasgow.
(Heinemann. 6s.)

Phases of an Inferior Planet was a clever book, and this book is both clever and very ambitious—as every novel must be ambitious which pretends to embrace the whole life of a man from the cradle to the grave. The fault of The Voice of the People is that it is too long. We do not mean that its length is excessive in any absolute sense, nor that the author digresses unduly from the theme which she has set herself; nor do we mean that the book is dull; it never is dull. We mean that much of it is unimportant and inessential. In the pretty and diverting scenes of white and black life at sleepy Kingsborough, the home of Nick Burr, that born lawyer and politician and State Governor, this triviality of observation is especially felt. It has a weakening effect on the story as a whole. The original projective force of an author is strictly limited by nature, and if the author tries to spread that force over too large an area, the result must be, in a measure, to render it futile. Miss Glasgow's faculty of observation needs discipline. It is too busy, too fussy, and a great deal too fanciful—fanciful where it should be imaginative. She often does not observe the right kind of thing. She trifles, and gives rein to mere fancy. And gradually she passes into a condition, a mood, which, without conscious intent, twists and contorts life into something untruthfully pretty—something emasculate and feebly emotional. When her hero and heroine approach the passionate climax of their lives, this is what occurs, according to Miss Glasgow:

Then, by a curious emotional phenomenon, she seemed to be suddenly invested with the glory of the sunset. The goldenrod burned at her feet and on her bosom, and her fervent blood leaped to her face. The next moment he staggered like a man blinded by too much light—the field, with Eugenia rising in its midst, flamed before his eyes, and he put out his hand like one in pain.

"What is it?" she asked quickly, and her voice seemed a part of the general radiance. "You have been looking at the sun. It hurts my eyes."

"No," he answered steadily, "I was looking at you."

She thrilled as he spoke, and brought her eyes to the level of his. Then she would have looked away, but his gaze held her, and she made a sudden movement of alarm—a swift tremor to escape. She held the sheaf of golden-rod to her bosom and above it her eyes shone; her breath came quickly between her parted lips. All her changeable beauty was startled into life.

"Genia!" he said softly, so softly that he seemed speaking to himself. "Genia!"

This may be truth, but it is truth falsified, scarcely recognisable beneath its envelope of fanciful and quasi-maudlin "intensity." We insist on this aspect of Miss Glasgow's novel, because it is characteristic of much modern fiction. The writers of such fiction should undergo a course of Balzac. In many respects The Voice of the People is admirable. The style is generally distinguished, and the dialogue, though too plentiful, is life-like and effective. The sketches of negro character are excellent. Miss Glasgow has a wide knowledge of life and manners; the novel seems to be her true vocation, and one is bound to accord to her that serious consideration which is only accorded to a serious artist.

The Chicamon Stone. By Clive Phillipps-Wolley.
(Smith, Elder & Co. 6s.)

THIS book does not call itself a novel, but it is presumably issued as a novel, and strictly it is a novel. Most readers, however, would prefer to describe it as an Alaskan travel-book disguised as a novel. There are two kinds of stories—those which need telling and those which tell themselves. The Chicamon Stone is of the latter variety: it is a record (rather than a tale) of adventure in search of an incredibly rich "ledge" of gold-bearing earth, and Mr. Phillipps-Wolley narrates as though he were talking to an entranced circle round the fire on some night of his return from the Arctic slope. There is no literary finesse, no virtuosity of penmanship, no elaboration of prepared climaxes, but just plain, simple telling; the events told do the rest. Serene in the consciousness of having something to say, the speaker goes steadily forward, while his hearers alternately hold breath and breathe again:

"Hold fast now!" he cried; "if you fall off you dead sure!"

My nails went into those logs. I would have held on with my teeth if there had been anything to hold on to.

"Now!" he cried; and with one strong stroke he shot right out into the boil of waters.

For a moment the thing spun round, then he got control of it again for a moment; I saw him stand up, and once or twice he leaned over, and drove his paddle in, making the crazy craft jump, as we just grazed a rock round which the white water boiled. Meanwhile, the banks and trees raced by. We were standing still, it seemed, whilst all nature was galloping up-stream faster than an express train could go.

Suddenly there was a fearful shock; I was thrown clear of the raft; some one caught me by my shirt, and, for a moment, I felt my legs sailing away down-stream without my body, and the next I was lying seared and panting, half in half out of the water; but out of the current anyway. Joe was lying beside me, as spent as I was, and our raft in two pieces was just going out of sight round the next bend.

Can you not catch the emphasis and gesture of the speaker at that phrase, in two pieces?

The book is in many respects valuable, and in all respects interesting. The descriptions of Indian life, of river-voyages, of the coming and going of an Arctic winter, and of all the marvellous phenomena of the gold-trail, are done in a manner which is at once artless and effective. Some of the more dramatic chapters, too, such as the Indian slaughter, the execution of Luke, and the final scene with the blind "siwash" have a genuine thrill in them. The Chicamon Stone is without any sort of pretension. It probably contains a great deal more fact than fiction. In the best sense it is a "plain tale," a tranche de la vie. It has a documentary value beyond its artistic value. It is curious to note how the remotest lands, the most hidden islands, the most inaccessible interiors, are being brought into the domain of fiction. The pioneers first, then the novelist!

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE GATELESS BARRIER.

BY LUCAS MALET.

THIS new novel, by the author of A Counsel of Perfection and The Wages of Sin, is of the supernatural species. No attempt is made to explain the apparition of a very charming ghost with whom Laurence falls in love. A genteel form of what is known as occultism hovers about the tale like the aroma of lavender in a press, but it does not penetrate to the other side of the Atlantic, where Laurence has left his wife, Virginia, "true to her somewhat artificial conditions, to her own canons of good taste and self-respect, to that singular clause of the social creed which declares the thing unsaid also non-existent." (Methuen. 6s.)

ON PAROLE.

BY MINA DOYLE.

A novel of a long separated husband and wife. We have a prologue, we begin the story, and then we go back ten years to a time when "all London knew that the beautiful Mrs. Armstrong had eloped with Signor Ladelli, the great tenor of the Frivolity Company." They meet again on a "wild night" when "the wind blew in wild gusts and one solitary pedestrian . . ." Their reconciliation is brought about by an interesting train of incidents and a vicar's wife of unusual charity. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

THE DEAN'S APRON.

BY C. T. WILLS
AND GODFREY BURCHETT.

The middle-aged literary parson who has finished a great theological work, and forthwith tumbles into a deanery and a love affair, is fairly familiar in fiction. To Dr. Hyslop is entrusted the congenial duty of breaking the present Dean's matrimonial intentions to Nunchester society. The probable effect of the news on the "stuck-up Plowden girls and their mother" interests him vastly, and at last he is able to say: "I am authorised, nay commissioned, to—un—ah—well—break it to Nunchester. It concerns our mutual friend, Dr. Fleete." "He hasn't been doing anything wrong?" cried Mrs. Plowden in a hopefully expectant tone. "And oh, Dr. Hyslop, if he has, remember that the girls are here." There is plenty of amusing gossip about "the ladies of the cathedral clergy." (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Jargon of Criticism.

WITH the return of hot weather, the dearth of new literature, and the appearance of holiday luggage in Chancery-lane, we have no inclination to be profound. Authors are now resting from their critics, and critics are following other game than authors. Decidedly, it is a time to talk at large on the first subject that crops up in a deserted workshop. It happens that we have received a neat booklet, in a red paper cover, entitled A Catalogue, with Descriptive Notices and Reviews, of Works of Fiction Published by Chatto & Windus. It is an interesting and, we may add, an imposing list; and as the mere record of one publishing firm's dealings in modern fiction it is worth study.

About two hundred and fifty novelists are presented, and their works run far toward a thousand. But what holds us is the array of press-notices. A critique of some length is attached to every book; and thus, with its 128 closely packed columns, the catalogue is a veritable museum of criticism. As such we have found it to be interesting, depressing, and amusing in turns. It is as though the critics who are now rusticated had left damning evidence behind them of the way in which they dispatch their work when they are in a hurry. Seriously, there foams up out of this innocent and enterprising catalogue a jargon of criticism that terrifies. If it were only a jargon! But we think that no reviewer who reads through these hundreds of "press notices" of modern novels can rise from the perusal with his faith in the matter and methods of current criticism strengthened. A confirmed habit of agreeableness, an inveterate tendency to find something pleasant to say of a book at all costs, is perhaps the feature which strikes us most. Books that can be praised outright are praised extravagantly; but all books are praised. It will be said that published press-notices are necessarily favourable, and that the unfavourable are suppressed. But an hour's experience of this interesting catalogue will enable the reader to generalise safely on the data given. Messrs. Chatto & Windus have selected and edited their notices with fairness and candour; but the fact remains that every novel they have published has found favour in some critic's eyes. The energy with which critics work to make a book sell is something of a revelation. We dare not count the number of novels which have "not a dull page" in them; or the number of novels which "no reader will lay down until he has reached the end." This much belauded ability to hold the reader, which we believe to be a far cheaper quality than is commonly imagined, is insisted on with curious emphasis. "The book is interesting from start to finish." "Few people will lay it aside unfinished after they have once read the first few pages." "Told with unflagging vivacity." "Keeps the interest of the reader well sustained." "The atmosphere of mystery is not dispelled until the final page." "Keeps the reader on the qui vive." The power to grip is attributed to hundreds of books; it is praise which a novel may have for the asking. But this does not prevent a critic writing of a now forgotten novel: "It is perhaps the chief triumph of the book that the reader leaves off with his appetite whetted instead of dulled." From such commendation the critics easily advance to the point of saying that a book will not only be read through, but will be read "more than once," "over and over again," "many times, and each time with delight," &c., &c.—expressions which would have to be called insincere and ridiculous if their use were not obviously accounted for by the confession of one critic, who, after laying down a story by a lady novelist, remarks: "With the impression fresh upon our mind, we have for it nothing but praise." Again we read: "The book is good from beginning to end. . . . No praise can be too high for it. It is a gem." This is evidently thrown off in the heat of a first satisfaction such as may inspire a reader's praise as he hands a story to his sister, but ought never to govern a critic's judgment. Mere readableness in novels seems to be the quality uppermost in the minds of most critics. The expression "eminently readable" is soon broadcast through their columns. Solely because a story is "bright and picturesque," "breezy," "exciting," "vividly written," "absorbing," "engrossing," or because "we find ourselves longing to read the last chapter before we are half-way through the first"—you are implored to send to Mudie's for the book, or earnestly advised—as a special measure—to buy it, and put it on your shelves. The truth is, there has grown up a weltering jargon of criticism in which empty and extravagant phrases abound, and in which words and opinions are not to be taken at their face value. When it is written of a novel of no importance that it "proves the possession by the author of abilities and learning equal to anything in fictitious literature," why do we not all rush to the nearest bookseller? Because we know the value of the words. We know the ring of that amiable jargon, and we count out the change accordingly. The critics are no more to blame than the public. They do their best. A hundred things—and habit above all—compel the adoption of high adjectives and low standards. Phrases form themselves and stick, judgments accumulate like moulds. We believe that if it were possible to prohibit, from the first of October next, the use of a hundred critical clichés, duly scheduled, the benefit to criticism would be great. Critics would be compelled to think, where now they only tie on labels. Such a schedule might include the following phrases, which we quote from actual reviews:

Eminently readable.
Will be devoured with zest.
The pathetic tenderness of which Mr. — has the secret.
Leaves little to be desired.
Leaves nothing to be desired.
Deft writing.
Deft handling.
The interest never flags.
Vivacious.
We defy anybody to read it with a gloomy countenance.
The approval of lovers of letters.
Full of telling pages.
Tangled skein of incident.
Ingenuously woven plot.
A real creation.
Sprightly.
The most exacting reader.
Few will be able to lay it aside.
Told with extraordinary force and fire.
Criticism is disarmed.
It is much too late in the day to criticise Mr. —.
A book to read.
Distinctly a book to read.
A book on no account to be missed.
Enthralling.
Pervaded by a powerful realism.
Genuinely clever.
We can truthfully say.
A strong story.
A really strong story.
Admirably sustained.
Enough of startling incident to suffice for half-a-dozen novels.
Convincing.

Fraught with interest.
 And older folk may read it with equal pleasure.
 Intense realisation.
 Wonderfully fresh description.
 Not a dull page.
 Breezy.
 We wish for it a large circle of readers.
 Will commend itself to the thoughtful reader.
 Singularly pathetic.
 Remarkably impressive.
 Touchingly true.
 Mr. — has the happy knack.
 Delicious.
 It seems almost a desecration to add anything to so fine a book.
 The author's playful wit and fancy find full scope.
 It is written.
 Miss — has a brilliant future before her.
 A bright, readable story.
 Will while away an hour.
 This powerful writer.
 Facile.
 The author's terse and powerful style.
 The author's well-deserved popularity.
 As pleasant a tale as one could wish to read.
 It is a gem.
 It is perfect.
 It is a superb work of art.
 It is a story that we cordially recommend.

We do not say that all the expressions in the above list are vicious; but we think they are all abused, and should be given a rest. A wholesale deprivation of stock phrases would at least compel the invention of new ones, and this process, slow and difficult as it must be, might suggest a scale of eulogy, and the creation of certain classes of novels in which critics could praise a book within understood limitations. With an increase of seriousness it should become impossible to applaud a novelist in the following terms:

This sprightly author has the happy trick of inventing coherent plots, and padding them out with intelligent, unaffected dialogue.

Truth, which should come from the agreement of critics is now, as often as not, discovered in their contradictions of each other. "Not a trace of padding," and "Mr. — never has to rely on padding" are said in praise of A's novel and B's, but when C's comes along you are calmly told: "The book has a very sufficient story, there is a good deal of humour in the character parts, and the 'padding' is new and amusing." The want of system and standards in ordinary reviewing makes itself felt at every turn. Novels are praised because they are not like other novels of a totally different kind. "In all her books there is a healthy absenteeism of ethical purpose, and we have derived more pleasure from them than probably the most earnest student has ever obtained from a chapter of Robert Elsmere": that is the sort of thing. How can a simple-minded student discover the attitude of criticism to the "novel with a purpose" by comparing such a judgment as that with the following sentence on one of the late Mrs. Lynn Linton's novels: "The reader will not fail to admire the author, who . . . has not spared herself in her resolution to produce a story which should have its lessons for those who are wise enough to learn them." We italicise two words.

Here we make a delightful discovery. The truth about novels in general may be sucked from the honeycomb of praise bestowed by the industrious critic on novels in particular. He will praise each novel, but he is nothing loth to abuse the "general run" of novels. The effect in a collection of hundreds of criticisms is funny. You read: "In days when sane and healthy literature threatens to become extinct, Mrs. Alexander's novels are doubly welcome"; and before you stretch hundreds of notices of "healthy" novels — fragrant as a field of lavender swayed by the flattering wind!

But so truth will out. While the critic hugs the individual writer, he kicks backward savagely at the safe crowd. "It is positively refreshing to read so thoroughly good and consistent a story," he says, while the circumambient and universal air is full of the praises of "thoroughly good and consistent" stories. "Mr. —'s work is always brimming over with the milk of human kindness, sparkling with gay wit and quaint humour; and thus doubly refreshing to a public jaded and depressed with the rampant 'realism' in recent fiction." And yet we read of "searching realism," "wonderful realism." It goes without saying that realism and romance are praised with complete impartiality, or are set off against each other whenever that is convenient. Since praise must be given, and given in a hurry, we are told that a novel is "full of a quiet pathos that is rare in English fiction"; and we look back, to find that English fiction fairly reeks of "quiet pathos," "unforced pathos," &c.

The truth is, that the ordinary critic has not time to criticise; he is too often content to seize a few characteristics of a general and non-committal kind, and fling them on paper in phrases that are ready to hand. "If," writes one critic, "we were to sum up our criticism upon this novel in one sentence, we should comment upon the structure of the plot, the conception of the several characters, the minute knowledge of French life and manners, and the quiet and sometimes subtle humour of the style. . . ." Alas! even that one marvellously comprehensive sentence was never written.

Things Seen.

The Geese.

THE front of the village stores was gay with horses' sun-bonnets. They fluttered in the morning breeze, and I paused to regard the uncommon sight. Presently the proprietor of the shop came along. He could not walk very quickly as he carried four geese, two in each hand. Their legs were tied together, and having hung them, heads downward, on the railings adjoining the shop, he gave me "Good-morning." "That sight," I said, indicating the horses' sun-bonnets, "is characteristic of our times. We did not always show such pity for dumb creatures." The proprietor wiped his brow. "Yes, folks are kind," he answered. "You'd be astonished, sir, at the number of men who buy bonnets for their horses out of their own pockets. Live and let live, that's what I say." With that he took a large knife from his pocket, opened it, and made a deep incision in the neck of each goose. The blood streamed down, and then for some minutes trickled upon the bright grass, while the birds made convulsive movements, dying so slowly that I was moved to say: "That hardly seems to me to be the right way to kill them." "Oh, yes, sir," he replied, wiping his knife, "they're much tenderer killed that way." "I was thinking of them, not of us," I said.

The Fleet.

THE fleet was anchored in the bay. As the train rounded the curving line of coast, we all looked eagerly across to where the ships lay, with the red Devon cliffs as background, and beyond the blue waters of the Channel. It was all beautiful, but the significant feature was the fleet — the great battleships with their big guns and accoutrements of war, the flag-ships, the armoured cruisers, and the gloomy little torpedo-boat destroyers low in the water, with their black funnels showing like vicious, angry snouts above the waves.

A man facing me talked to his companion, a foreigner, of third-class cruisers, of swiftest armour-clads, of steam-steering gear, and the superior advantages of turbine-drivers, but the technical details went unchallenged. "The last naval estimate—twenty-five millions sterling—not a penny less, and I tell you yet the cheapest army in the world—without doubt—"

The loud voice went on complacently, but the foreigner was gazing with wide eyes at the stately line out on the sunlit sea, as though he would imprint it upon his mental vision. He did not speak until we had left the coast behind, and were speeding inland through the sleepy, luxuriant pastures.

"You have many, very many remarkable sights"—his accent was very foreign—"but when I come to think of England, I will always have one picture of the great warships as I see them now to-day in my mind—I will think of it so, the quiet sea, and then the ships."

His gestures matched his accent, and were quite un-British; but, although we smiled, we were content that he should remember England—thus!

Correspondence.

Style.

SIR,—If I am not trespassing on your space, I trust you will allow me to reply to your correspondents who have impugned my ideas about style.

Mr. Armstrong in his clever but illusive remarks cannot understand why I separate thought from its verbal expression, which are as wide apart as the poles are asunder. Surely fixed or flitting ideas, in order to be intelligible, must be transmuted into coherent written or spoken words. Unexpressed ideas have no import or meaning whatsoever. To all intents or purpose they may be non-existent, in spite of Oliver Wendall Holmes's musical regret for those dumb singers:

Few, few can touch the magic string,
And noisy Fame is proud to win them,
Alas! for those who never sing,
But die with all their music in them.

It seems to me an utter fallacy on Mr. Armstrong's part to maintain that the literary intellect and its expression are indivisible. He might just as well assert that a symphony by Beethoven and its interpretation by an orchestra are indivisible. If no one existed to translate the music for our ears, the music might just as well have not been composed. But there is no need to prove what is palpable and self-evident.

And how can style be an expression of individuality? Perhaps the handwriting may betray it, or as your humorous correspondent "S. W." observes: "a man's character oozing out at his finger-tips and so getting into his pen." But I cannot understand how any mode of verbal expression can indicate the individuality of the writer. Great authors are estimated by their thought and not by its expression. Matter and not manner directs the judgment, and the real individuality may not impress itself anywhere. For instance, it is not the discordant and often rugged style of Carlyle's French Revolution that proclaims his genius, but his knowledge of the times, his insight into the characters of the co-existent men and women, the nice adjustment of causes leading to effects, his realistic panorama of events—all these things have stamped the work with his potent individuality. His contorted style is of no importance and cannot guide us in the least.

Mr. Harrison, quoting my definition, "a mode or manner of expression, nothing more," would substitute "something" for nothing, which he afterwards designates as the "literary afflatus"; but I must remind him that the afflatus rests in the idea, and not in its verbal interpretation. It is quite possible to clothe a grand or an original thought in feeble, jangled, or even incorrect language; but the experienced or gifted literary artist can always set the jewel in a fitting and beautiful casket.

In conclusion, I repeat that style is only a verbal garb of thought; and if it meant what is usually ascribed to it, there would be no need of expletives to qualify it. To be able to acquire the literary grace of exquisitely moulded sentences, the harmony of felicitous phrasing, there is need of practice, patience, repression, natural bent, and, above all, an acquaintance with the masters of thought and expression.—I am, &c., ISIDORE G. ASCHER.

That Wager.

SIR,—As one of the parties to that wager Mr. Charles Major made, when recently in London, that he could walk from St. Paul's to the Tower unguided, naming the streets travelled, I happen to know that Mr. Major won his wager fairly, and that the American contemporary you quote must have misquoted him. What Mr. Major undertook to do was to follow the route he took Mary Tudor in When Knighthood was in Flower when she went secretly to the Tower to consult the Jewish soothsayer Grouche. This route was by way of Billingsgate and Upper and Lower Thames-streets, and Mr. Major found that, relying on Stow's Surrey, he had worked out the journey without any deviation from the actual topography. The statement, "taking the most direct route," very naturally afforded you a brief "occasion for smiles." I may add that Mr. Major, who is an eminent Indiana lawyer, was then visiting London for the first time.—I am, &c.,

JAMES MACARTHUR.

20, Belsize-road, N.W.: August 10, 1900.

[We were certainly misled; and the details kindly given by Mr. MacArthur are new to us.]

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 47 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best sketch entitled "The Author I Like Least," not exceeding 200 words in length. Competitors have lodged heavy indictments against a number of authors, and the list is certainly not without its surprises. On the whole we think that the criticism of Lord Lytton, by Mr. Alfred Edward Wright, Inverinate Villa, Attadale-road, Inverness, deserves the prize; and a cheque has been forwarded to this competitor. Mr. Wright won the prize in our Invented Quotation a fortnight ago. His essay is as follows:

LORD LYTTON.

There was a time when I admired the novels of Bulwer Lytton; but I was young then, and have found reason to qualify my former opinion. In the constructive work of fiction he is an artist; but his characters have little attraction, possibly because they are not very human. His style is inflated—sounding always the top note of his compass, which is, therefore, limited; his thought is never deep; his moral teaching has not the ring of visible sincerity; and his men and women add nothing to our knowledge of human nature. In short, he is conventional but versatile; clever without depth; and resultlessly interesting. His characters do not take a living shape within the mind. He painted no men who keep a secure hold of the imagination, like Dugald Dalgetty, Major Pendennis, and Micawber; no women so vivid and distinct as Becky Sharp, nor so charming and lovable as Di Vernon. We feel that his novels are the work of a brilliant, but not profound intellect; that they contain more of the head than the heart; and are ideal with a fatal tendency towards the melodramatic. They yield a certain pleasure in the reading, but it is without any abiding result.

POPE.

A moorland solitude braces one to the utterance of heresies, and I hereby confess that I have never cared greatly for Pope. His frigid platitudes, his superabundant antithesis, the jingling cadences with which he replaces the broken music of Milton and the Elizabethans—all these repel me. I know that great men admire him; but their admiration is less, I think, for the poet than for the satirist, the philosopher, the wit—or, at most, for the skilled contriver of couplets whose inimitable terseness and neatness have made them immortal. To my own fancy, Pope is the Polonius—I use the name with all respect—of the literary stage. He is a Polonius in his prime: clever and cynical, a shrewd but superficial observer of manners and men, a retailer of everyday wisdom. Content for the most part with the lower levels, he rises at rare moments—as Polonius did—to heights which show that he too has been touched by the divine afflatus. But in the main, he lacks, as I think, the essentials of poetry—insight, passion, “the consecration and the poet’s dream”; and, thinking thus, I can but repeat my confession, and subscribe myself a heretic.

[M. A. W., London.]

“THOMAS INGOLDSBY, ESQUIRE.”

Were I compiling, as M. Zola did, a list of “Mrs. Harries,” I should set down first and foremost Richard Harris Barham, Canon of St. Paul’s, that “homo unius libri.” What popularity the so-called Ingoldsby legends enjoyed (and perhaps still enjoy), if popularity consists in numerous editions, and a place on many a drawing-room table in the ‘Fifties and ‘Sixties! Barham’s method is to me detestable. Ludicrous rhymes, vulgar slang, and jocular comments are used freely on legends that in the eyes of a vast section of Christendom demand either silence or reverent treatment. “Thomas Ingoldsby” is the “Yorick” of the early Victorian period, with much of the hasty double-entendre of Laurence Sterne. That liberal-minded critic, Richard Hengist Horne, in A New Spirit of the Age (1844), characterises Barham thus: “Licentious works which are unredeemed and unextenuated by any one sincere passion, and are consequently among the very worst kind of influences that could be exercised on a rising generation. The present age is bad enough without such assistance, wherefore an iron hand is now laid upon the shoulder of Thomas Ingoldsby, and a voice murmurs in his ear: ‘Brother!—no more of this!’”

[R. F. McC. H., Whithy.]

LORD MACAULAY.

Once, when a company of literary men was gathered together at breakfast, Samuel Rogers rose and remarked, that as Macaulay was coming presently, if anyone had anything to say he had better say it at once. In that remark Rogers had, it seems to me, allotted to Macaulay his place in literature as well as his place in society. Macaulay is the “pushful person” in literature, the blatant demagogue who gains, by shouting, a position which would never be accorded him otherwise. His style is florid and bombastic, he has no restraint, and when dealing with controversial questions he is intolerant to a degree. His public life seems to have affected his literary work, for the tricks of the public orator are always noticeable in his eloquent periods. The bracketed “Loud cheers,” “Renewed applause,” and so on, seem to be omitted in error.

One may give reasons, but really dislike has little to do with reason. I am compelled to recognise Macaulay’s intellectual brilliancy and literary cleverness, but I dislike him none the less because of either. My reason tells me he is blatant and over-rated—no more; my instinct, or prejudice, call it what you will, says he is altogether hateful.

[F. W. S., London.]

GOETHE.

What a farrago is Meister’s Apprenticeship! A child’s method of tale-telling: a schoolboy’s outlook upon life; an old man’s endless and inconsequent digressions! The story stands on its head to begin with. It reaches its highest pitch of emotional intensity in the first few chapters. What follows is a chain of barren and unrelated incidents, linked together by the most monstrous coincidences, and tapering off at the end into absolute puerility. The characters are indicated at the outset with some appearance of discernment, but the conduct of the story tends to anything rather than their elucidation; and they begin to lose their grip from the moment they are introduced. Of that study of the development of character promised by the story’s title it contains, in point of fact, no inkling. Wilhelm’s apprenticeship finds him weak—it leaves him abject.

As for the portentous excursions into moral philosophy, nowhere could their high-sounding emptiness be more irritatingly out of place than sandwiched between the episodes of a story from beginning to end of which no one clearly acts from a generous motive.

[S. H., London.]

JANE AUSTEN.

Her wonderful diction, her clear delineation of character, her matchless finish of detail, I admire immensely. Yet I admire her but a little. To me her fault is want of affection towards her characters. They are puppets in her cold hands—analysed, dissected, and exhibited—perfect reproductions of models thoroughly understood. She never felt for her noblest character one touch of pride, nor had for her lowest one pitying sigh. In her cynical reserve, she did not come near to loving the sinner, hating the sin. Conventionality put an impassable barrier between her and sentiment, hiding from her rather the splendid struggles of ambition and independence than moving the world, and binding her with genteel social law. The littleness of those around her narrowed her powerful mind, and hardened her sympathy. Her last character—Gentle Anne Elliott—“had been forced into prudence in her youth; she learnt romance as she grew older.” Perhaps something akin to this was the secret of her authoress, for Anne is more tenderly treated than any of her predecessors. If this be so, it was also, too late. How great is the “might have been” had Jane Austen but commenced when she wrote finis.

[G. W., Hull.]

The other disliked authors are condemned on the following among other grounds:—

VIRGIL.—“How many hours I have wasted in copying out his hexameters.”

[T. C., Buxted.]

SMOLLETT.—“His works bristle with coarse satire, attack, and innuendo.”

[A. M. C., Leicester.]

POPE (2).—“His constant satire is so trying, and his sneer so deadly. His contempt for women is an unforgivable defect.”

[Mrs. Von S., London.]

POPE (3).—“Pope has no sympathy with his fellows.”

[E. R. C., Devon.]

LORD LYTTON (2).—“Lyttton’s style is florid . . . his characters are theatrical . . . his plots melodramatic, and his incidents impossible.”

[L. V. S., London.]

ROCHEFOUCAULD.—“Combines with many qualities that I admire the defects I most abhor. . . . Not a great nor a good man.”

[Miss R., London.]

WORDSWORTH.—“One is not interested in the palpitations of his heart at the sight of daffodils.”

[S. Y., Cambridge.]

DICKENS (1).—“He represents to me a man of caricatures.”

[J. C. H., Godalming.]

DICKENS (2).—“Extravagant types; uninteresting as individuals.”

[E. M. S., London.]

DISRAELI.—“The discordant note of artificiality.”

[Miss P., Norwich.]

THACKERAY.—“Thackeray must have had a heart, but it was not always in the right place.”

[G. H., Anglesey.]

DARWIN.—“The man whose writings leave me the most unpleasant train of thoughts.”

[G. E.-P., London.]

THE AUTHOR OF “LITTLE HENRY.”—“The one about whom I have felt most bitterly.”

[A. M. P., London.]

THEODORE HOOK.—“His novels display a total lack of the qualities which make good works of fiction.”

[A. S. W., Preston.]

Competition No. 48 (New Series).

WE offer a prize of One Guinea for the best depreciation of summer holidays in the manner of Elia. Length not to exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed “Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.,” must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, August 21. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Story (Alfred T.), Golden Deeds of the War (Newnes) 6/0
 Colquhoun (Archibald R.), Russia Against India: the Struggle for Asia (Harper) 5/0
 Holyoake (G. J.) and Scotton (Amos), The Jubilee History of the Derby Co-operative Provident Society, Ltd., 1850-1900 (Co-operative Printing Society)

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Selwyn (Adm. J. H.), Biblical Chronology (Bagster) 3/6
 Drummond (Henry), Stones Rolled Away (Bagster) 3/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Gray (Eleanor), A Modern Prophet, and other Poems (Kegan Paul) 5/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Hartog (W. G.), Cours de Grammaire Française Élémentaire (Black) 1/0
 Alge (S.), Une Joyeuse Nichee. By Mme. E. de Pressensé. Dent & Co. net 3/6
 Krusch (Dr. W.), The Technical School French Grammar Murray 2/6
 Gregory (R. A.), Elementary Physics and Chemistry (Macmillan) 1/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Phillimore (W. P. W.), Pedigree Work: A Handbook for the Genealogist (Phillimore)
Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute. Vol. XXXI. (The Institute) net 1/0

"This new novel by 'John Oliver Hobbes' is a triumph of intellectual creativeness, and it has held me captive from cover to cover."—C. K. S., in The Sphere.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

6s.

(In Unwin's Green Cloth Library.)

6s.

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME EARLY REVIEWS:—

"This brilliant novel is written with a distinction unfamiliar in contemporary fiction."—Spectator.

"A book that everyone will talk of."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mrs. Craigie's characters—even the most introspective—are, however, so well drawn that it is difficult to have too much of them."—Daily News.

"A piece of writing that shows a very adroit mastery of many elements."—Athenæum.

"The bold experiment again succeeds, and its success is a thing on which Mrs. Craigie may be especially congratulated."—Globe.

"'Robert Orange' is a remarkable book."—Standard.

"Its comedy is alive with the brilliant, half-cynical observation of character."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Almost a remarkable, as it is certainly a most conscientious, study in emotion."—Westminster Gazette.

"There is no possibility of considering this remarkable book in any other light than as the complement of the equally remarkable book which preceded it. It is, probably, one of the most subtle essays on man ever written by a woman."—The World.

"The average novel reader may jib at certain pages of 'Robert Orange,' but the whole book is an interesting and powerful piece of work by a lady novelist possessing a rare individuality."—Anglian Daily Times.

"'Robert Orange' is in the air, and it is impossible to get away from it. Moreover, not to have read it is to confess to being 'out of the movement.'"

Daily Express.

"A notable achievement in literary art.....It is a most interesting story, and it is interesting, not so much for anything the characters of it do, or even say, but for the characters themselves, and for what they feel, for the emotional, the inner life of them.....The one demand we have a right to make of a novelist is that he shall interest us. That John Oliver Hobbes has done, and done thoroughly."—Sunday Special.

"A most entertaining book.....There is no novelist living, except George Meredith, who can equal Mrs. Craigie in the power of making striking and interesting personalities live in their work."—Speaker.

"Rarely can it be said of the sequel of a novel that it equals, much less surpasses, its predecessor, but such a compliment is certainly due to 'Robert Orange,' the new romance in which 'John Oliver Hobbes' continues the history of the hero already familiar to readers of 'The School for Saints.'"—Echo.

"Light the book is, with never a thought of levity; 'smart,' if that is to be the word, with no hint of either vanity or vulgarity, with no strain after paradox, no paltering with truth. To say of people that they are very good is often tantamount to saying of them that they are very dull. That, no doubt, is because we live in an imperfect world. This book, at any rate, gives no quarter to such a reproach. It is the work of one whose wit is as alert as her orthodoxy is openly declared."

Tablet.

"'The School for Saints' was good, but 'Robert Orange' (Fi-her Unwin), unlike most sequels, is better."—Star.

"'Robert Orange' is a sequel to 'The School for Saints,' and a worthy sequel; but it may be read very well, by a slight exercise of the imagination in the concluding chapters, as a single production, and, so read, it will produce an abiding impression on any thoughtful mind.....'Robert Orange' is an eminently religious book, but it is conspicuously bright also; it is political, but it is also witty; it is philosophical, but it is also shrewd; it is an artistic collection of character studies, but they are all human, and nearly all of individual and original type. But it has action also; in it many love stories run their troubled course simultaneously."—Country Life.

"Perhaps 'Robert Orange' may best be classed as being worthy to be placed among those works that we keep, not those that we send back to the lending library; and for such there is always room."—Sunday Times.

"The great quality of this book, however, as that of most of Mrs. Craigie's other books, is that, whether in romance or comedy or analysis of character, it is always the opposite of the commonplace—not with the cheap effects of paradox, but because the author has an eye for colour and for contrasts, and a spontaneous brilliancy of expression. One is so weary of laborious contrivances of adventure, of conventional pictures of 'Society'—the members of which are supposed to spend all their time in restaurants making rapid repartees—of superficial and happy-go-lucky psychology. Or one would be weary if one read them. Mrs. Craigie's books are stimulating, provocative, always distinguished, and always interesting. And this one is, I think, the best of them."—G. S. STREET, in The Londoner.

"It will be appreciated by those who recognise the beauty and literary charm of Mrs. Craigie's work.....It is a book to read, and cannot fail to add greatly to Mrs. Craigie's reputation as a writer of exceptional ability."—Christian World.

"Its literary accomplishment is remarkable; and the book, showing its author at her best, cannot fail to be widely and eagerly read."—Scotsman.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

BOOKS ABOUT China, Mongolia, and Japan.

SOUTHERN CHINA.

By Rev. J. MACGOWAN, of the London Mission, Amoy. With 77 Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

"The description of the scenery round about Hing Kong and the open ports of Amoy, Canton, and Foochow is delightful, the sketches of European life faithful, and the appreciation of Chinese character just. A feature of the book is its many high-class illustrations."—Pall Mall Gazette.

RAMBLES IN JAPAN:

the Land of the Rising Sun, by Rev. Canon TRISTRAM, D.D., LL.D. With many Illustrations by Edward Whymper, from Photographs and Sketches. 8vo, 10s. 6d., cloth, gilt top.

"Dr. Tristram is an experienced traveller, keen in observation and kindly in appreciation, an accomplished field naturalist, and an enthusiastic collector of things rare or beautiful both in nature and art. These qualities have stood him in good stead during his visit to Japan."—The Times.

THE AINU OF JAPAN:

the Religions, Superstitions, and General History of the Hairy Aborigines of Japan. By the Rev. JOHN BATCHELOR, C.M.S. With 80 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s., cloth boards.

"Mr. Batchelor's book is valuable as being the first which treats at any length of this strange people."—Pall Mall Gazette.

AMONG the MONGOLS. By James

GILMOUR, M.A., of Peking. With Engravings. 2s. 6d., cloth, gilt.

"No one who begins this book will leave it till the narrative ends, or doubt for an instant that he has been enchanted by something separate and distinct in literature, something almost uncanny in the way it has gripped him, and made him see for ever a scene he never expected to see."—The Spectator.

MORE ABOUT the MONGOLS. By

JAMES GILMOUR, M.A., of Peking. 5s., cloth.

"The experiences of a devoted missionary, whose gift of circumstantial narration has not inaptly been likened to Defoe's."—The Times.

OLD WANG: the First Chinese

Evangelist in Manchuria. A Sketch of his Life and Work, with a Chapter on Native Agency in Chinese Missions. With a Portrait and Illustrations. By JOHN ROSS, Missionary of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. 1s. 6d., cloth.

GILMOUR and his BOYS. By

RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Illustrations. 2s. 6d., cloth, gilt.

The book is largely made up of the letters written by James Gilmour to his two boys, between 1886 and 1891. They describe many of his self-denying labours in Mongolia, they are full of strange and interesting incidents, and they tell, in his own graphic style, the story of his life and work from day to day.

FOR HIS SAKE. A Record of a

Life Consecrated to God, and Devoted to China. Extracts from the Letters of ELsie MARSHALL, martyred at Hwa-Sang, China, August 1, 1895. With Portrait. 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

"A more fitting title could not well have been chosen for the intensely interesting volume of letters of Miss Elsie Marshall."—The Record.

GILMOUR of MONGOLIA: his

Diaries, Letters, and Reports. Edited and Arranged by RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth.

"We gladly welcome another notable addition to the number of impressive and fascinating missionary books—a volume fit to stand on the same shelf with the biographies of Paton and Mackay."—British Weekly.

AMONG the DARK-HAIRED

RACE in the FLOWERY LAND. By SAMUEL B. DRAKE, of the Baptist Mission in North China. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth boards.

GLANCES at CHINA. By the

Rev. GILBERT REID, M.A., of the American Presbyterian Board. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s., cloth.

Published by

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY (INCORPORATED),

55, Paternoster Row, London.

JARROLD & SONS' LIST.

OF SPECIAL INTEREST AT THE MOMENT.
A REALISTIC STORY OF PERIL IN 6s. THE CHINESE CAPITAL. 6s.

SECOND EDITION.
THE CAPTIVE OF PEKIN.

6s. By CHARLES HANNAN. 6s.

With 25 startling Illustrations of Chinese Torture Fieids by A. J. B. Salmon.

Manchester Guardian.—"A sensational story of more than ordinary power."
Morning Post.—"Of strong dramatic real sm. Chin-Chin-Wa is the most striking figure of this powerfully written and absorbing story."

THE CAPTIVE OF PEKIN.

6s. By CHARLES HANNAN. 6s.

With 25 realistic Drawings by A. J. B. Salmon.

Times.—"Told with great vividness. The reader's interest does not flag from beginning to end."

Sheffield Daily Telegraph.—"A remarkable story....intensely exciting from cover to cover."

New Novel by Maurus Jokai, the famous Hungarian Novelist.

FOURTH EDITION.
DEBTS OF HONOR. By Maurus

JOKAI. With a specially Engraved Portrait of Dr. and Madame Jókai, Author of "Poor Plutoerats," "Black Diamonds," &c. 6s.

St. James's Gazette.—"A series of pictures, stirring, sorrowful, and gay, but always beautiful."

Daily Telegraph.—"Of much force and pathos, and Jokai's inimitable pen, vivid, fiery, humorous, never fails to stir and to attract. Full of life and incident."

Exciting Detective Stories.
IN TIGHT PLACES. By Major

ARTHUR GRIFFITHS, Author of "Forbidden by Law," &c. 6s.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"A lively and varied series of stories of cosmopolitan crime, with plenty of mixed adventure and sensation. Such stories always fascinate, and Major Arthur Griffiths knows how to tell them."

A Humorous Holiday Book.
BUNCE the BOBBY and the BROADS. A Humorous Holiday on the Broads. By FRITZ ZORN. With 45 laughable Illustrations by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

First Review.
"Handled with humorous touch. A very readable and entertaining volume. Just the thing for idle hours at the seaside or on the Broads themselves."—Morning Herald.

By H. Rodolph De Salis.
NORFOLK WATERWAYS A

Guide to the Navigable Waterways of the Norfolk Broad District. Compiled after a Personal Survey of the whole, by HENRY RODOLPH DE SALIS. 1s. net.

Daily Standard.—"A concise summary of solid information as to the rivers which will be found invaluable to the boating man." London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 & 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S

LIST.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE SECOND EDITION OF

AN EYE FOR AN EYE:

A Mystery.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX,
Author of "Wiles of the Wicked."

"Well told, and holds the interest from the first chapter to the last."—Black and White.

"Full of verve and sharply realised incident."—The Academy.

"Mr. Le Queux excels in invention."—The Globe.

A ROMANCE OF ANARCHY.

BROTHERS of the CHAIN.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,
Author of "Briton or Beer?"

THE GODDESS: a Demon.

By RICHARD MARSH,
Author of "The Beetle," "In Full Cry," &c.

The SHIELD of his HONOUR

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE,
Author of "My Official Wife," &c.

THE FLICK OF FORTUNE.

By THOMAS PARKES.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,
14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THIRD EDITION READY.

The "OVERLAND" to CHINA

By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN,
Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Society.

With Illustrations and Maps.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 11s.

The Daily Chronicle says: "We trust Mr. Colquhoun's book will be very widely read. It is full of exact information set forth in most readable fashion, and it appears at a moment sensationally opportune."

CHINA IN TRANSFORMATION.

By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN.

With Maps, Plans, &c. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s.

The Times says: "Replete with every information." The Saturday Review says: "A most valuable summary of the situation."

THE BREAK-UP of CHINA.

With an Account of its Commerce,

Currency, Waterways, Railways,

Army and Navy, and Politics.

By

Admiral Lord CHARLES BERESFORD.

With Maps, &c. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

ALONE IN CHINA.

By JULIAN RALPH.

Crown 8vo, cloth, with many Illustrations, 6s.

The Daily Mail, June 26, 1900, says: "Mr. Julian Ralph's book, 'Alone in China,' is a standard authority."

RUSSIA AGAINST INDIA.

A New Book on the Struggle for Asia.

By ARCHIBALD R. COLQUHOUN.

Crown 8vo, with Maps, 5s.

FICTION.

LOVE and MR. LEWISHAM.

By H. G. WELLS,

Author of "The Wheels of Chance."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Daily Telegraph says: "By far the most fascinating piece of work Mr. Wells has given us."

A GAY CONSPIRACY.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS,

Author of "The Red Republic."

Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Scotsman says: "The most fascinating of Mr. Chambers's productions."

The World says: "A clever and entertaining production."

The Speaker says: "Clever and readable.....A great success."

The LOVE of PARSON LORD

By MARY E. WILKINS,

Author of "A New England Nun," "Jerome," &c.

Cloth, Illustrated, 6s.

The Daily News says: "A touching story, in Miss Wilkins's charming style."

The Speaker says: "There are few writers whose work has such distinction as Miss Wilkins's."

HARPER & BROTHERS, 45, Albemarle Street

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1477. Established 1869.

25 August, 1900.

Price Threepence

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THERE is a rumour afloat to the effect that Count Tolstoi is contemplating a tour through Germany, France, and England. Whether this journey is to be undertaken for the purpose of gathering material for new deliverances, or merely as a somewhat original form of recreation for a man just verging on his seventy-second year, is not suggested. One had imagined the great Russian to be a figure immovable, having affinity with granite rocks. Perhaps the mountain, represented by a callous Europe, having declined to listen with sufficient seriousness to the Prophet, the Prophet is now coming to the mountain.

THE expiration of the copyright in Balzac's novels has already produced its sensation in the book market. The house of Ollendorf has begun the issue of a complete series of Balzac's novels in a superior format, and with illustrations, at the regular price of 3 fr. 50 c.

THE Oxford University Press, which is exhibiting in three different groups at the Paris Exhibition, has gained the unique distinction of being awarded three Grands Prix—one each for Higher Education, Bookbinding, and Oxford India Paper.

THE proposal to place a medallion portrait of John Ruskin in Westminster Abbey, at a cost of £500, may be said to have been criticised in advance by Ruskin himself. He had no patience with the jumble of monuments in the Abbey—the “incoherent fillings of the aisles at Westminster,” as he called them. It is suggested by a correspondent of the Times that the purchase of a cliff or hill-top, and its preservation from the jerry-builder, would be a mere appropriate memorial. We think it would be.

MISS BRADDON's new novel, The Infidel, is announced for publication in September. As the sub-title indicates, it is “a story of the Great Revival.” The author lays her scene during the period of the religious movement of the last century. John Wesley and his followers may be said to form the mainspring of the tale; but the central interest lies in the strong and not altogether guiltless love of one of the new religionists for the beautiful but infidel heroine.

AN alteration has been made in the inscription placed on the pavement in front of St. Paul's. At first it ran: “Here Queen Victoria returned thanks to Almighty God for the sixtieth anniversary of her reign, June 22, 1897.” The inaccuracy of the word “reign” having been pointed out, the word “accession” was substituted. But this involved the taking up of a granite block. A misprint in stone is a serious matter.

IT is well that a writer so personal and fearless as Ouida, and so trenchant in expression, should occasionally enter the critical arena. Her new volume of Critical Studies, which we shall shortly review, contains articles on such widely differing personalities as Gabriele D'Annunzio, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Wilfred Scawen Blunt. One article, on “Unwritten Literary Laws,” is a piece of candid and merciless criticism. Ouida complains, for instance, that in obedience to such an unwritten law, an author either expands or reduces his book to certain limits without regard to art. “The brevity or length of a literary work can have nothing to do with its beauty or excellence.” In the matter of plagiarism, that old sore, Ouida has an enlightening experience of her own to narrate. A glaring theft from Puck appeared in a London periodical:

The name of a lady was put at the end of it, as that of the author. Of course, I wrote to the editor, expecting, despite previous experiences, to receive apology and reparation. I misunderstood my generation. The editor wrote back, with airy indifference, that the lady who had produced this shameless piracy had never read Puck. To my citation, in reply, of the words of the Emperor Julian, “If it be sufficient to deny, who will ever be found guilty?” and to my objection that an appropriation of an entire section of a novel could not by any possibility be otherwise than an intentional theft, this model of editors replied not at all.

Can such things be?

WE have remarked several times of late on the growing difficulty of finding titles for books on which no previous claim exists. Mr. Robert Cromie draws our attention to the fact that the title of Mr. W. E. Henley's new book of patriotic song, For England's Sake, was borne ten years ago by a book written by Mr. Cromie himself, and bought by the public to the extent of 8,000 copies. That the imitation was unconscious there can be no doubt; and Mr. Cromie will doubtless console himself with the fact that Mr. Henley has done honour to this title, which—“for England's sake”—should, perhaps, not be too continuously appropriated to one book.

THE beautiful early Georgian house on Windmill Hill, Hampstead, known as Bolton House, occupied for fifty years by Joanna Baillie, has had a tablet affixed to it by the Society of Arts. It will be remembered that Sir Walter Scott was a frequent guest here during his occasional London visits. Scott's opinion of Joanna Baillie's dramas was so high as to seem extravagant in these days. This tribute to Joanna Baillie's fame is interesting at the present moment, as being coincident with the revival of the practice of publishing plays in book form. It is but a few weeks since we reviewed Miss Lucy Snowe's Three Stage Plays.

WITH regard to the mention of Miss Corelli's book, The Master Christian, in our issue of the 11th inst., in which we quoted some passages from the advertisement of the book, Messrs. Methuen wish it to be known, in fairness to Miss Corelli, that this advertisement eulogy of the work emanated entirely from themselves. Miss Corelli had no knowledge of its existence until she saw it in the advertisements.

A COPYRIGHT performance of a play entitled "The Master Christian," founded on Miss Marie Corelli's forthcoming novel of that name, was given at the Grand Theatre, Leeds, on Saturday afternoon. The parts were enacted by members of Mr. William Greet's "Sign of the Cross" Company. The play is in four short acts and eleven scenes, and the characters number thirteen. The first act is set in Paris and the remaining three acts in Rome. The list of characters is as follows:

Cardinal Felix Bonpré.....	A Priest of the Church of Rome.
Abbé Verguinaud	A Priest of the Church of Rome.
Cyrillon Verguinaud, otherwise } "Gys Gaudit"	A Socialist.
Aubrey Leigh	An English "Christian Socialist" writer.
Monsignor Gherardi.....	A Priest attached to the Papal Court.
Prince Sovrani	An Italian, Angela Sovrani's father.
Florian Varillo	An Artist, betrothed to Angela Sovrani.
Marquis Fontenelle	A Frenchman.
Victor Mirandin	A French Actor.
Ruspardi	An Italian Captain.
Angela Sovrani.....	A famous Artist.
Comtesse Hermenstein	Angela's friend.
Jeanne Richaud	A Soubrette, Mirandin's mistress.

WHILE the economics of the novel are engaging the attention of some observers, others are asking whether the novel, as a literary form, is in a healthy state. The Outlook has addressed several questions in this sense to publishers. To the question, "What canon or standard, if any, do the publishers of to-day look to in selecting fiction for issue to the public?" Mr. Murray replies as follows:

No work of fiction can really be judged until it has been out, say, six or eight years.

No book written to suit a passing fashion, and coloured with the tint of some ism or psychological "question of the day" (as a cook colours jellies and cakes), is ever likely to have permanent value.

If anyone wishes to test the books of to-day, let him or her keep up a close acquaintance with, e.g., Robinson Crusoe, the "Waverley Novels," Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot. It is extraordinary how much modern work crumbles under this test.

The first of these maxims strikes us as too sweeping; moreover, it seems to be contradicted in part by the second and third maxims. However, Mr. Murray has just published a capital novel in Miss Wharton's A Gift from the Grave, and it is by the Novel that the Novel will be regenerated. Mr. Heinemann says that the questions put to him raise many doubts in his mind, and, frankly, he has no confidence in answering them. Messrs. Kegan Paul say:

As for telling your readers the canons by which fiction should be judged, that is a large matter. From a publisher's point of view, one test alone is adequate. No novel ever attained success which was not based upon human nature, which did not make some direct and poignant demand upon human sympathy. Literary distinction—ineestimable in itself—is insufficient to popularity. The touch of nature is paramount. Where the literary expert can confess himself to have been carried ex cathedra into the atmosphere of emotional impression, he may be fairly sure that he has got hold of a MS. which requires a second consideration. Without that impression he may almost as safely decline the book at once.

THE New York Nation considers that the ideal biography of Ruskin does not exist, and it gives its reasons in the following outspoken manner:

In the first place, he who would explain Ruskin will have to face the necessity of dealing with a delicate matter in his life; we mean what most of the obituary notices have called his "divorce." . . . His marriage was legally annulled. The younger Millais, in a note to his biography of his father, states, without mentioning the name of the husband, that his mother's first marriage was annulled (we quote from memory) "for reasons recognised alike by State and Church." In other words, the marriage was pronounced void after several years because it had never been anything but nominal. This fact has to be mentioned because it throws a flood of light on Ruskin's exaggerated horror of sensuality or of anything even distantly approaching it; and this horror accounts for much of his hatred of the Renaissance, for his love of ascetic and monkish art, for his lack of sympathy with the art of ancient Greece, and for much else. Neither in his faults nor his virtues, his strength nor his weakness, was Ruskin distinctively masculine. He could be lavishly generous, but he could not be calmly just; he could be extreme in enthusiasm, as in denunciation, but he could not be reasonable. He was whimsical, petulant, paradoxical. He had a pretty gift of seemingly logical argument to justify opinions adopted at the behest of emotion. He was positive, dogmatic, subtle, with a conviction that what he liked was right, and that what displeased him was morally wrong, and that the salvation of the world depended upon its recognition of the truth of his preaching. In all these things he was less man than woman, and less woman than priest.

MR. ERNEST C. WRIGHT, who is a Pietermaritzburg reader of the ACADEMY, sends us a cutting from a Queens-town (Cape Colony) paper, which is supposed to represent recent additions to the local library. As he remarks, the list seems to belong to the horrors of war:

Knights of the Crop, Henryk Sienkiewicz.
Looking Backward, Edward Bellamy.
Magic of the Desert, The. W Smith Williams.
Master Craftman, Walter Besant.
Minx, The, "Iita."
Next Crusade, The Robert Cromie.
Out-siders, R W Chambers.
Puritans, The, Arlo Bates.
Shadow of Allah The, Morlen Roberts, and Max Monterole.
Sporting Sketches, Nat Gould.
Three men on the Brummel, Jerome K Jerome.
Tracked and Takers, Dick Donovan.
Two in Captivity, Vincent Brown.
Voices in the Night, T A Steel.
West End, The, Percy White.
Worshipper of Image, The, Richard Le Galliwie.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SECTION B.

Baden-Powell, The Song of, H Begbie.
Blackeney (Robert) Autography of a Peninsular War, Julian Slurgis.
Bourgeoisie Memoirs of Sergeant, Cottin and Henauls.
Wanton—Life of, A H Beesley.
How, Bishop Walsnam, F D How.
Stevenson Robt Lonsis, L Cope Comford.
Under Queen and Schedwe, Sir Walter Mieville.

SECTION C.

Foreign Carts and Foreign Homes, AUF.
France, I E C Bodley.

SECTION C.

Leading points in S African History.
Our navy for a thousand years Capt S Eavelley Wilmot.
Records of Cape Colony 1793—1805—5 vols G McCall-Theal.
Records of Eastern Africa—1506—1668—4 vols.
N B Works in this section belong to the Preference Library and are not issued but by special permission.

Should we ever find ourselves in Queenstown we shall make straight for the Preference Library and there inquire for a better.

A LITTLE while ago Miss Cholmondeley was asked by her own publishers, in the interests of many inquirers, to give the source of the motto to Red Pottage: "After the red pottage comes the exceeding bitter cry." The following reply was received:

Miss Cholmondeley, in answer to Messrs. Harpers' inquiry of May 23, regrets to say she does not know where the motto comes from—"After the red pottage," &c. She remembers jotting it down in her note-book years ago, but when she turned to it she found to her surprise that she had not added the author's name, which in nearly every other case she had been careful to do. She thinks it may be found in the sermons of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom.

A correspondent of the Globe now points out that the exact words of the motto, which are founded on two familiar texts in Genesis, are to be found in a sermon by Dean Farrar, entitled "Selling the Birthright," which was published in his volume, Everyday Christian Life.

THE Eastern Counties Magazine and Suffolk Note-Book (Jarrold) is launched this month by its editress, the Hon. Mary Henniker. It will have a quarterly issue, and its aim is to serve as a repository or commonplace book of country lore. The first number pleases us; it has the bright miscellaneous air proper to a magazine of this class. The following explanation of the term "Silly Suffolk," though not new to us, is interesting:

This is no term of reproach to the county, as the following extract from Skeat's Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language (p. 436) will show:

"Silly (modern English), originally 'timely'; then happy, lucky, blessed, innocent; lastly, simple, foolish. Anglo-Saxon, Sælig, gesælig, timely. Derived from Anglo-Saxon sæl, time, season, happiness. Cognate forms are: Dutch, zalig; Icelandic, sæll; Swedish, säll; German, selig, blest, happy; Mæso-Gothic, sels, good."

To be quite conclusive, the writer should show us that the county was called "silly" before the meaning of the word took a turn for the worse.

THE suggestion that the thirty-one-and-sixpenny three-volume novel should be revived in the interests of book-sellers and publishers is being discussed with some heat and variance. A publisher has declared to a representative of the Daily Chronicle: "Nobody wants the guinea-and-a-half three-decker back again; least of all Mudie's and Smith's, who were its undoing. The three-volume novel is a relic of the past; as well try to revive the old-fashioned pamphlet." The Daily News thinks that "the abolition of this form has done a really valuable service to literature." Against these views "C. K. S." records, in the Sphere, his conviction that "the abolition of the three-volume novel has done unqualified mischief." "C. K. S." evidently considers that the three-volume novel acted as a kind of waste-pipe for trivial literature:

The three-volume novel was read principally by the woman of superfluous leisure; the majority of young people never opened them. What money they had to spend on books they spent on first-class fiction that had survived the test of time, or on good biography and history. Witness the excellent sale which obtained for the "English Men of Letters" series, for the cheap edition of Mr. Froude, and so on. All this kind of thing has fallen into the background in every bookseller's, and the moment you enter a bookshop it is assumed that you have come for this or that six-shilling or three-and-sixpenny novel. The result is that, in proportion to the number of readers, the younger generation is not reading half as strenuously as its elder brothers and sisters of ten years ago.

By coincidence we print this week an article on "This also is Vanity," in which the literary seriousness of ten years ago is favourably contrasted with present "listlessness," though from a different standpoint.

OUR recent article on "The Omar Cult" has been reproduced in full by a New York paper, whose readers are left to form their own judgment on the views expressed therein. The same readers will probably read in the same paper the advertisement of a new edition of the Rubaiyat which is being pushed with great empressement by a New York firm of publishers. In the announcement we are told that not to know one's Rubaiyat is nowadays to argue one's self unread. It is a poem which, if once taken up, will ever be lovingly returned to; the insinuating music of its lines if once heard will echo repeatedly through the heart. No library is complete without it, and he who has not yet perused it has foregone one of the greatest pleasures to be gained by contemplative reading.

After this one is hardly prepared for the insistence on the necessity for illustrations. It seems, however, that the illustrations hitherto supplied to the Rubaiyat have been "more decorative than thoughtful, more specimens of artistic designing than elucidations of an almost unfathomable philosophy." A young lady artist, of California, has undertaken these needed elucidations, and a point is made of the fact that she has done line drawings and not the brush drawings preferred by Mr. Elihu Vedder. Altogether we soon reach the valley levels of advertisement, and we do not quarrel with the confident prediction that this edition of Omar's "marvellous Oriental masterpiece" will "be a credit to the Sign of the Lark."

MR. H. G. WELLS's appreciation of the late Mr. Stephen Crane in the current North American Review is a very interesting pronouncement of one story-writer on another. Mr. Wells heartily deplores the meddlesomeness of the modern public—"as violently experimental with its writers as a little child with a kitten"—which sent Crane to Greece and Cuba as a war correspondent. He had already written the best war book of his time in his armchair. When he went to Cuba he left at home the inspiration which had served him so well and took with him the fragile physique which was to serve him so badly. Happily, by an accident, the expedition resulted in The Open Boat, which Mr. Wells regards as the crown of all his work. In considering that work as a whole Mr. Wells thinks that Mr. Crane's position in English literature will be found to be "singularly cardinal." He was the last of a number of writing Cranes, men who wrote crabbed little theological treatises inspired by a Puritanical ideal and a dying impulse. Crane had shed all that before he was born, and Mr. Wells sees him as a pioneer:

He began stark—I find all through this brief notice I have been repeating that in a dozen disguises, "freedom from tradition," "absolute directness," and the like—as though he came into the world of letters without ever a predecessor. In style, in method, and in all that is distinctively not found in his books, he is sharply defined, the expression in literary art of certain enormous repudiations. Was ever a man before who wrote of battles so abundantly as he has done, and never had a word, never a word from first to last, of the purpose and justification of the war? And of the God of Battles, no more than the battered name; "Hully Gee!"—the lingering trace of the Deity! And of the sensuousness and tenderness of love, so much as one can find in The Third Violet! Any richness of allusion, any melody or balance of phrase, the half quotation that refracts, and softens, and enriches the statement, the momentary digression that opens like a window upon beautiful or distant things, are not merely absent, but obviously and sedulously avoided. It is as if the racial thought and tradition had been razed from his mind and its site ploughed and salted. He is more than himself in this; he is the first expression of the opening mind of a new period, or, at least, the early emphatic phase of a new initiative—beginning, as a growing mind must needs begin, with the record of impressions, a record of a vigour and intensity beyond all precedent.

AN interesting work on Surrey local history, by Mr. H. St. John Bashall, will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock very shortly, entitled The Oak Hamlet. It will give the history of the village of Ocham, with much curious information concerning its early condition and personal associations. In the account of Ocham Church an inventory of church goods in the time of Edward VI. is given, and also a list of the rectors from 1300 to the present day.

A CORRESPONDENT of "Notes and Queries" has found the following inscription on the frontispiece of a second-hand copy of Quarles's "Emblems" which he picked up recently:

Sarrah Littleford her Book
God give her Grass therein to look and not to Look but understand for Larning is Bettr then hous or Land when
Land is gon and money
Spent then Larning
is most Exolent.

Bibliographical.

A WRITER in the Londoner has been quoting R. L. Stevenson's rhapsody on the advantages and disadvantages of being born a Caledonian. "The happiest lot on earth is to be born a Scotsman. . . . Somehow life is warmer and closer," and so forth. One is reminded of a certain cynical essay, in Friends in Council, on "The Arts of Self-Advancement," beginning: "In the first place, it is desirable to be born north of the Tweed," a gibe hardly worthy of the genial inventor of the lawyer Ellesmere, into whose mouth Sir Arthur Helps put all the concentrated essence of his worldly experience. "You must at least contrive," said Ellesmere, "to be born in a moderately-sized town, somewhere. You thus get the advantage of being favoured by a small community, without losing any individual force. . . . Contrive at least to be connected with some small sect or community, who may consider your renown as part of their renown, and be always ready to favour and defend you." Assuredly it is of no use simply to be born in England, for no Englishman helps another simply because he is English. In England, the effectual freemasonry is that of the public school, the university, and the county—mere England, as a birth-place, hardly counts.

Mr. Robert Buchanan, it appears, was fifty-nine last Saturday; but why celebrate the fact? I thought these things were done in decades, not in odd numbers. Assuredly we have here a hint that the erewhile young Scots poet has passed the limit of middle age. I have myself, in this column, drawn attention to the early and excellent work done by Mr. Buchanan as a poet. Then came his labours and vogue as a novelist; next, his labours and vogue as a playwright. There was a day, too, when he promised to be a really effective literary critic. I have before me his Master-Spirits, published in 1873—rather more than a quarter of a century ago. It is not a very memorable volume, but it exhibits some very creditable enthusiasms, as in the article on "The Good Genie of Fiction"—Dickens. Especially may we note the section headed "Scandinavian Studies," with its essay on "Björnson's Masterpiece." Mr. Edmund Gosse usually gets the credit of being the first to interest the present-day English public in contemporary Scandinavian writers; but his Studies in the Literature of Northern Europe came two years after Mr. Buchanan's Master-Spirits.

By the way, at the end of Master-Spirits I note advertisements of The Poetical Works of Robert Buchanan (3 vols.) and of the Miscellaneous Prose Works of Robert Buchanan (2 vols.). In 1873 Mr. Buchanan was only thirty-two years of age, yet here we find him bringing together his Works. It seems only the other day that Mr. William Watson gave us his Collected Poems: he was then just forty. He was thus more modest than Mr. Buchanan; but, really, how can our present-day men of letters look for a long career when they take so much pains to put themselves on the shelf when they are not even "medieval"?

Apropos of the controversy re "rondel" and "roundel," it is noteworthy that Mr. Austin Dobson, in his "Note on Some Foreign Forms of Verse" (contributed to Latter-Day Lyrics in 1878), says nothing about "roundels." The rondel, he holds, is a modification of the triolet, and the rondeau a modification of the rondel; but concerning the "roundel" he is silent. Is this not because the roundel had yet to be born among us? It was not until 1883 that Mr. Swinburne published his Century of Roundels. In that century he included a poem on what he called "an old roundel, translated by D. G. Rossetti from the French of Villon." By this he evidently means the "Lai, ou plustost Rondeau," which is not a "roundel" at all, but simply a rondeau compressed. Unless Mr. Swinburne can point to some foreign original of the form he calls a "roundel," we must accept the theory that the form was invented by himself, on the basis of the "Lai" aforesaid and others like it. Moreover, in writing the "rondel" Mr. Swinburne has had but few followers—among them, Mr. Arthur Symonds and Mr. Samuel Waddington.

It was almost inevitable that Mr. F. G. Kitton should follow up his little book on The Novels of Charles Dickens with a companion volume on Dickens's Minor Writings. The former, published three years ago, confines itself strictly to the subject announced in the title, and obviously, therefore, Mr. Kitton has a large field to cover in the latter. The Sketches by Boz, the Uncommercial Traveller, the short stories, the Child's History of England (reprinted so lately as two years ago), the Pictures from Italy, Sunday Under Three Heads, and, I suppose, the things Dickens did for the stage—these, and others, all call for treatment. And from Mr. Kitton, in this direction, careful and accurate work is to be expected, for his devotion to the topic is nothing new. It is fourteen years or so since he produced his bibliography of Dickens—Dickensiana—which is the basis, no doubt, of the two booklets which now stand to his credit in "The Book-Lover's Library."

I suppose that the Table Talk by Dr. Johnson which is to form the next volume of the "Bibelots" series will consist of matter freshly selected by the editor, Mr. Briscoe. The notion has some approach to novelty, for it is about sixteen years since the Table Talk of Johnson was last exploited. In 1884 it appeared in Mr. Unwin's centenary edition of the Life and Works, and also in a little volume of Johnsoniana, Opinions, &c. Three years later came Dr. Birkbeck Hill's selection from Johnson's Wit and Wisdom, which would naturally include, though not necessarily be confined to, his Table Talk.

A literary weekly says that a story by Miss Betham-Edwards, called The Lord of the Harvest, is announced for the autumn season. As a matter of fact, it appeared last autumn; and now, apparently, it is to be translated into French, for the benefit of our "lively neighbours." Miss Betham-Edwards and the French have a mutual liking for each other; she has written charmingly about them, and the very least that they can do in return is to translate her books, and then buy them.

I read in one of the "tit-bit" papers that "one good lady is said to treasure still the flounce of a dress" which the late Duke of Coburg "accidentally trod on and tore" when on a ceremonial visit to Lerwick, N.B., in 1882. One thinks at once of Calverley's lines:

A clod—a piece of orange-peel—
The end of a cigar—
When trod on by a princely heel,
How beautiful they are!

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Glory that is Cricket.

Talks with Old English Cricketers. By A. W. Pullin ("Old Ebor"). (Blackwood & Sons.)

MR. PULLIN'S book happens to be a very good one; but were it only half or a quarter as good it would still serve, it would still stimulate and charm, because to a reader who loves cricket it is filled from first page to last with the symbols of entertainment. Many a political speaker wins a fine reputation as a sagacious orator by merely punctuating his rapid remarks at wise intervals with the names of his party's heroes. Similarly a writer on cricket may be as foolish as he will provided that he is lavish enough with the good names: Emmett and Ulyett, Daft and Lohmann, Alfred Mynn and George Parr, Carpenter and Hayward, Freeman and Grace—each name setting up a crowd of memories, until the reader is hypnotised into believing the book a great feat. There are many automatic literary successes of this kind in which the reader really does all the work, is really the writer. But as we have said—and it must be made very clear—Mr. Pullin's success is not of this kind: Mr. Pullin's success is genuine and admirable; yet a reader with the true zest might still have found his book a delight had the author worked less enthusiastically to make it so.

Mr. Pullin's method has been very simple. He has called in a friendly way on a score or so of the surviving heroes of the 'fifties, 'sixties, and 'seventies, has chatted with them, asked them leading questions, guided their memories into the right channels, and then has set down the result very easily and genially and very modestly. In each chapter it is the cricketer whom we see: Mr. Pullin self-effacingly pulls the curtain aside and intrudes not at all. Few men could have performed the task so efficiently and dexterously, and probably no one is better equipped with knowledge of the game and enthusiasm for it. It is this enthusiasm which makes the book something more than a mere readable volume. It is literature too, as valuable and true a piece of the literature of cricket as anything yet written. Flesh and blood are in these pages.

To read Mr. Pullin, however, is not to be wholly enchanted. Regrets will come stealing in, regrets for a day when matches were fewer, and innings were shorter and smaller and yet more glorious, and cricketers were simpler, and pitches were less perfect, and Lord's was not like a race meeting, and a hundred was called a hundred and not a century, and there was no county championship, and no evening paper réclame, and no London County, and W. G. played for Gloucestershire, and the interval for tea (for tea!) was unknown. Think of Alfred Mynn taking an interval for tea, and think of Fuller Pilch's surprise if he should alight upon a paper which (as a paper did last week) applied the head-line "A Bad Start" to the score of an innings which reached 117 for two wickets. There was a time when 117 was a decent score for a whole side. It is not difficult sometimes to wish for that time again.

Not only has cricket lost many of its old simplicities, it has lost its characters too. In the late process of levelling up, or levelling down, individuality has suffered. Where is our Tom Emmett to-day? Where is our bowler to bowl fifty-five wides in one year—and take a hundred wickets for less than ten runs apiece? Around Tom's name many good stories cluster and will ever cluster. It was Tom who warned an encroaching point: "If I were thee, mister, I'd stand a little farther back, because when I hits there I hits — hard." It was Tom who, when bowled first ball by a lob, made the classic series of answers to the commiserator in the crowd. "How was that, Tom?" "Don't Tom me." "Well, Mr. Emmett, how was that?" "Don't Mr. Emmett me." "Then what shall I call you?" "Call me a — fool." Tom Emmett, after his active cricket was over, became a professional bowler at Rugby, where he stayed several years. He now coaches at Leicester, and long may he wave! Some Rugby amateur—why not Mr. Norman Gale?—ought to make a collection of Rugby Emmettiana.

Some of Mr. Pullin's best stories were told him by the Rev. E. S. Carter, one of the great fraternity of cricketing parsons, who used to make scores and take wickets for Oxford and Yorkshire, and also in Australia. It was of Mr. Carter that "young Tom" Hearne made the conclusive reply to the question, "Can this Mr. Carter play?" "You drop him a short 'un to the off, and see what he'll do with it." Mr. Carter was once batting against Crossland, then the Lancashire terror. "Now, Crossland," said Mr. Hornby, "don't use any bad language, the gentleman's a clergyman." Crossland bowled away, mute and gentle, until he put in a shooter and ended the innings. Then his tongue found itself again. "I downed his old pulpit that time," he said. Mr. Carter asserts that to Tom Emmett belongs the credit of first remarking—on a bad voyage—that he thought they'd forgotten to put the heavy roller on: a joke borrowed by every seafaring cricketer since.

Pooley's is another great name in the game. Like other cricketers before him, Pooley, who kept wicket for Surrey in the days of Southerton and Jupp, has known reverses; and he is now an inmate of a London workhouse. Says Mr. Pullin, "Pooley's fists are mere lumps of deformity. Every finger on the two hands has been broken; so have the two thumbs." Jem Mace once asked to be introduced to Pooley: "Pooley," he said, "I would rather stand up against any man in England for an hour than take your place behind the wickets for five minutes." Pooley's opinion of modern cricket is not too favourable: "Why, a man ought almost to keep wicket blindfold now," he remarked after a visit to Lord's. Mr. Pullin's pages, indeed, bear more heavily upon the dangers of cricket than is perhaps reasonable; but it must be remembered that grounds were not in the 'fifties and 'sixties what they are now. He also writes of faster bowlers than we now have—George Freeman, for example, who once laid low all three stumps with one ball, and Harvey Fellowes, who performed the same rare feat. He writes also of harder hitters than we have now, for neither Mr. Jessop nor Albert Trott has quite the power of Mr. C. I. Thornton. It was told of Southerton, the slow bowler, that he used to lie awake at night wondering what he should do if Mr. Thornton hit the ball straight back to him. But the great cause of bumps and bruises was bad wickets. Daft once went in to bat against Platt at Lord's with a towel round his head, so fiery was the pitch. In the same over Platt had given Summers the blow on the temple to which he succumbed. But this is nothing compared with George Anderson's stories of how a covey of partridges went up from the pitch during a match, and how Fuller Pilch would come armed with a scythe.

One of the saddest things in the book is the conviction held by more than one of the speakers—Alfred Shaw among them—that bowling is not so good to-day as it used to be. Probably Rhodes is as good a slow bowler as need be asked for, but Rhodes stands alone. There is no galaxy of talent, as the advertisements have it. We certainly have no Tom Emmett in 1900. Tom assured Mr. Pullin that he never bowled a wide on purpose, and we must believe him. His wides were crafty off-balls in which the craft was excessive. Hear Tom on the matter:

I found that off-ball of mine very useful. I have got wickets with it when I could not get them no matter how straight I bowled. If a man did not step well across with his left foot, and let his bat go as well, he was sure to make a "chip hit." The man who used to nonplus me more than anyone in playing that off-ball was Mr. Murdoch. He used to plant his left well across, and didn't he hit it! Of course when you get to know a man like that you don't let him have such a ball—you hang out the danger-signal. But it's all a matter of head-work. What's the use bowling a straight ball at a batsman when he plays it as if with the sharp edge of a knife? If you can bowl an off-ball and then suddenly send down a straight one, you may catch a man napping. . . . There is as much art in bowling a crooked ball as a straight one, and I honestly tell you I never bowled a wide on purpose.

Beside this piece of craft let us put Alfred Shaw's testimony:

When I was bowling I would not give a batsman his hit. I would make him play back or forward until he would be saying to himself: "I have been here a good while now; I will try to get a run." Then I would give him a slow one on the off-side, and nine times out of ten he would have a smack at it. When a man keeps bowling short on the off-side a batsman would be a fool to hit it. Lohmann used to say: "What's the use bowling at the wicket?" My answer was: "Keep bowling at the wicket, and then give him one on the off-side occasionally."

And Mr. David Buchanan says of modern bowling: "The fault I find with many bowlers of the present day is that the ball comes from their hands too often like a bit of lead. It ought to come as if it had a fiend inside it, which works the mischief immediately it touches the ground."

Against the present dearth of great bowlers—bowlers to carry on the traditions of George Freeman and Alfred Shaw, Southerton and Emmett, A. G. Steel and Peate—we can put a plethora of great batsmen. Probably no one, always excepting W. G. Grace, ever was so fine a bat as Ranjitsinhji, and it is doubtful if Hayward could ever have been excelled. And then come some of the aging Titans: Shrewsbury and Gunn, Mr. Stoddart and Abel—still superb artists. While the younger men of notable proficiency are very numerous: Mr. R. E. Foster, Mr. C. B. Fry, Mr. J. R. Mason, Mr. G. L. Jessop, Mr. P. F. Warner—these are masters. Very able batting has, indeed, taken the place of very able bowling. The day of the bat is here. Probably only by decreasing the bat's width, or heightening and widening the wickets, will the ball resume its own; which is a rather melancholy reflection. For our own part, we should like to try running out every run as a first step towards equalisation; and change the size of bat or wicket only if that failed.

The Fascination of Prison.

The Silent Gate: a Voyage into Prison. By Tighe Hopkins. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

Why are people fascinated by descriptions of prison life? Much good psychology might be expended on the answer to this question. The mere strangeness of prison, apart from its punitive features, is a powerful lure. Prison is more foreign than China, more remote than the Falkland Islands, and, to most of us, more virgin than the virgin forest. It is a world designed and controlled by man. The sway of accident, the interplay of trifling forces, and all the incalculable impulsions and accidents which make the doings of a free day incalculable seem to be eliminated in prison. As a day is appointed, so it passes. The reign of law may be cold, repulsive, cruel; but it is as absolute as anything can be on earth. A bell strikes, and, striking, is obeyed. A footstep approaches, and, approaching, is understood. Scales and rules and uniforms and blue paper and silence are the simple machinery of a life where chance hardly enters, and where whim and passion are crushed like grass on gravel. And the spectacle is fascinating to men and women who year after year, and for all their lives, endure a liberty which no turnkey mitigates and no manacle suspends. It is to be feared, however, that there is something else, something less pleasing, in the public mind. It may be doubted whether the reader of stories of prison and the detection of crime can acquit himself of a tinge of cruelty. Burns thought that even a devil can hardly take pleasure in the squeals of sinners. No more does the governor of a prison. It is the outsiders who do the gloating. It must at least be said that pity for the condemned murderer or for the oakum-picking burglar has never interfered with the success of stories of crime.

It is to Mr. Hopkins's credit that in his hands prison life is interesting in its strangeness and touching in its humanities. He knows the routine, the slang, the habits, the tricks, the punishments, the darker shades and brighter gleams of life in Her Majesty's prisons. He can gratify the curiosity of the man who rides past Newgate every morning on his 'bus, and sees nothing of its life but its pigeons, or the railway passenger who sees the turrets and low walls of Wormwood Scrubs turning and fading in the dusk. And he can do this without hardness. The sketch in this book called "Turkey" is an excellent and humorous study of ordinary prison life. Turkey, or John James Turk, was but fifteen years of age, when he snatched a watch from an old gentleman. He is overjoyed to find himself standing in the prison yard with six other prisoners, all his elders. Henceforth he can talk with old cracksmen and mugsmen, in the purlieus of Drury-lane, on terms approaching to familiarity. And in the meantime his self-respect is enormously increased by finding himself the only lad in a prison full of experienced criminals. In the first few minutes after his arrival he eyed with rapture the steel gates and the solid walls. The warders, "with keys and bâtons in their belts and unspeakable authority in their beards, froze him with delight. He remembered his first pantomime, as viewed from the gallery, and felt like it." Nor did his three months pall on Turkey. Every circumstance of prison life interested him and kept him cheerful. His bed and food were luxury compared with anything he had known; he joked, he liked his clothes, he upset all decorum with his bright face, he puzzled the whole prison. "When pulled up short, his language was of the Dials—fruity; but the warder who wrote his name down for report generally wiped it off in the evening." Turkey's happiness was only marred when the doctor ordered some stupid mitigation of his punishment. Thus, when he was ordered light work in the garden, he was seriously offended, and stood out vigorously for his full rights as a criminal; to exert himself to break the rules, and then be put off with some perfectly nominal punishment, was intolerable to Turkey. At last he found employment in the paper room, the Eldorado of the prison, where old ledgers, blue books, and the sweepings of Government offices had to be sorted. The sorters were generally rewarded by "finds" of the most delectable kinds—scraps of tobacco, cigarettes, novels, pencils, penknives, and what not. Turkey became a purveyor of such trifles to his fellows; but one day, tumbling on the stairs, he let fall a faggot of pencils.

"Halt, there!" said the warder of Turkey's party, when they reached the landing, and Turkey was haled from the ranks. Searched on the spot, he was found to be a mere museum of smuggled goods. They were shaken from his shirt, they were sorted from his socks, they were sifted from his shoes. Conviction, in a word, was flung at him in the lump.

The gentry of the party who were to have fingered this plunder felt some amount of distress, but the situation had its humorous side, which no one appreciated more than Turkey.

"Reg'lar brimmin' over wif quiet fun, ain't it, gents?" he observed.

But it was an awful offence, and Turkey slept that night in a punishment cell. The authorities took counsel concerning him, and the governor decided that he must be brought before the visiting magistrates. So, when those "avenging Solons" came—a whole bench of them—they heard all about the wickedness of Turkey, who, in due course, was introduced to them.

"Should you like to be birched?" asked the chairman, when the cause had been considered.

Turkey looked as if his dignity were a little hurt by the suggestion, but he responded softly:

"Well, gentlemen all, it ain't for a pore criminil like me to stand agin the rools. If it's birchin', it's birchin'."

"We can have you birched on the spot," observed the chairman.

But the culprit had taken stock of the court, and gathered that it was mainly with him.

Drawing the back of his hand across his mouth, he said sweetly:

"Fact is, yer worships, I bin throo' it. Done me bit 'o birchin' at the School. It wouldn't, so ter say, be nuthin' new to me."

The crowning sensation of Turkey's sojourn was his love affair with a lady whose window overlooked the exercise yard. The whole prison knew of it; they enjoyed it in the open, and meditated on it in their cells. If the story of Turkey is a capital "humour" of prison life, as the story of "The Release of Benjamin Cudd" is a revelation of its grimmest side, other stories in the book please us less. We think that Mr. Hopkins commits a rather grave literary mistake in mixing with these faithful stories such Poesque and impossible narratives as "The Master Key of Newgate," "The Singular Conduct of C 53," and "Princess Trubetskoi." These stories are merely melodramatic impossibilities, and have no place side by side with the others. What is worse, the blend of accurate delineation of prison life with wild invention is found within the same story. In "The Master Key of Newgate" Mr. Hopkins supposes that when Newgate ceased to be a regular prison the last Newgate prisoner, a doctor charged with murder, was left in the building under the care of one aged warder. Given this situation it was easy to tell a grim story; but then the situation is absurd. In the story of C 53 we have a prisoner of such mesmeric power that with a single glance he can strike a warder into "a state of cataleptic rigidity," while from his cell a "subtle unponderable force" spreads through an English prison of to-day, terrorising warders and afflicting prisoners with deafness, dumbness, and insanity. This will not do at all. There are three genres of prison stories: the historical, which Mr. Hopkins treated admirably in his book, The Dungeons of Paris; the realistic, which he achieves in several of these stories; and the Poesque, in which he can do pretty things. But these styles must not be mixed; Mr. Hopkins cannot be a prison expert and a soaring melodramatist in one and the same book, and we hope he will not again essay such a feat. It is unnecessary to say that this book is well written. An Idler in Old France and Lady Bonnie's Experiment had qualities of style which Mr. Hopkins was not likely to lose or carelessly abandon.

The Other Pole.

The Antarctic Regions. By Dr. Karl Fricker. With Maps, Plates, and Illustrations in the Text. Translated by A. Sonnenschein. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

BEFORE taking flight altogether from a much explored world, Mystery—as far as she is a geographical entity—has entrenched herself in a narrow circle about the Southern Pole. There she may yet withstand a long siege, for, hampered by the results of accurate observation, we know far less about her secret places than was known long since by the ancient cartographers in the light of a sweet unreasonableness that guessed, and was satisfied with what it guessed.

In short, the Antarctic Pole is a place with a past of meagre romance. This book of Dr. Fricker's embodies that past. It is an exhaustive account of what had been done up to the time of its going to press—a line which excludes the valuable results of the Newnes expedition. Long before Tit-Bits, in the days of Claudius Ptolemy, the Aristotle of his art, Terra Australis figured handsomely as the complement of a contorted Africa and Asia, with them perfectly land-locking the Indian Ocean. The circumnavigation of Africa by Vasco da Gama was a blow to this theory; but Terra Australis survived it—as, indeed, is testified by the name of Good Hope bestowed upon the continent's southernmost extremity. Schöner's globe of 1533 shows Terra Australis, "recenter inventa sed nondum plene cognita," as picturesque in outline as any continent fresh from the hand of Nature. Boldly outfacing inconvenient discoveries, the map-maker, alone with his compasses and graters, did but deepen his inlets, widen out his bays, and diversify his headlands; minded to convince, as it were, by the sheer force of intrinsic probability; as though he would appeal: Is it possible that nature, having a free hand to make continents, should have left unmade so nice a continent as this?

When Cook, in 1738, finally demonstrated that the Terra Australis must follow Atlantis into the limbo of exploded myths, the cartographer bounced to the opposite extreme and declared, as did Florien in the eighteenth century and Peterman and Peschel in this, that the Pole was surged over by a boundless sea, in which the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Indian Oceans mingled their waters. The result of Cook's explorations, so far as Terra Australis is concerned, are thus summed up:

Cook . . . proved the absence of a southern continent . . . and at the same time the preponderance of water in the southern hemisphere. . . . He was the first to bring a report of the completely polar character of these apparently desolate ice-clad islands, destitute of all vegetation, as he was the first to relate the dangers of the great southern polar ocean, covered with ice and innumerable icebergs . . . — 'countries condemned to everlasting rigidity by Nature, never to yield to the warmth of the sun, for whose wild and desolate aspect I find no words: such are the countries we have discovered: what, then, may those resemble which lie still further to the south? It is reasonable to suppose that we have seen the best, being the most northerly. Should anyone possess the resolution and the fortitude to elucidate this point by pushing yet further south than I have done, I shall not envy him the fame of his discovery; but I make bold to declare that the world will derive no benefit from it.'

That such daring spirits were found is a familiar fact. Bouvet, Balleny, Enderby, Graham have called after their own names the rare outcrops of inhospitable shore. Dumont d'Urville's sketches illustrate this volume. Here are portraits of Gottlieb von Bellingshausen and Charles Wilkes; and among a hundred others you have here the doings of James Clark Ross, the discoverer of that volcanic belt of mountainous land which bears the name of the Queen. If any man, says the German author, deserves to be regarded as the hero of Antarctic Exploration, surely it is he:

In the domain of science, the results of Ross's travels constitute not so much a revolution as the first accurate data for modern geographical reasoning, to say nothing of our extended knowledge of the distribution of land and water in the Antarctic regions. The principal task, that of reaching the southern magnetic pole, remained undischarged. . . . On the other hand, Ross succeeded in determining and locating this pole with extreme accuracy; and, moreover, the magnetic observations constantly and conscientiously carried on in the most difficult and adverse circumstances, afford such a mine of information that to this day our knowledge of the magnetic conditions of the higher southern latitudes is almost exclusively drawn from it.

The grim monotony of his dangerous way for hundreds of miles along the great ice barrier was varied by moments of more importunate peril:

Just as Ross, warned by the small driving blocks of ice, had made every arrangement for rounding to during the night, a large iceberg was seen through the heavy snow shower ahead of the Erebus, and close to it. The vessel was immediately turned, but the next moment it was seen that a collision with the Terror was unavoidable. The Erebus lost her bowsprit and topmast through the shock, and the two ships, entangled by their rigging, were violently dashed against each other in the huge breakers raging and foaming against the berg. At length the Terror got clear; and, finally, the Erebus was extricated, by an extremely hazardous experiment, from her perilous situation, where her yardarms were actually striking the face of the iceberg. Scarcely had this been accomplished when a second berg was seen to be quite close; but by another skilful manœuvre the ship was brought through the channel between the two bergs, and under their lee, where the Terror had already rounded to in safety. At daybreak it appeared that the ships had safely escaped through the only opening in a chain of icebergs extending right across the horizon.

That the history of Ross's achievements is so little known, and that the public interest in them is so slight by comparison with the enthusiasm that is greedy for news of the North, is partly accounted for by the absence of a human object for Antarctic search. Whatever may be found in that region—and no one expects to find anything precious—man is absent from a land that by no essay of ingenuity could be taught to support him. For the climate is considerably more rigorous than that which characterises the corresponding region of the northern hemisphere. The explanation of this is based upon the fact that whereas the sun shines vertically upon lands on the north side of the equator 186 days in the year, the southern countries are shone upon vertically only 179 days. The summer sun is nearer indeed, and therefore hotter, in the south; but it is further off in winter, which again is a longer season than with us. It will not, of course, be supposed that this exhausts the subject. Indeed, the complete explanation is not yet forthcoming. Of this, as of the questions suggested by the configuration of the ice and the still scanty indications of the geological formations, Dr. Fricker treats at length.

The Founder of the Zoo.

Sir Stamford Raffles. By Hugh Edward Egerton, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

WITH but few exceptions, the life histories of the Builders of Greater Britain are tragedies, and that of Sir Stamford Raffles, the man who gave Singapore to the Empire, and founded the Zoological Gardens in London, must be counted in the majority. Sir Stamford was born in 1781, and entered the service of the old John Company in 1795. Like so many men who have done great things, he suffered from poor health. His life in the East was little less than a martyrdom, and in 1822, at the age of forty-one, he was "a little old man, all yellow and shrivelled, with his hair pretty well blanched." Raffles was a furious worker; his ordinary work would have more than satisfied an ordinary man, but, somehow, he found time to gain a European reputation as a savant, and to make invaluable collections and reports about the natural history of the islands round Sumatra and Java. He was, in fact, the very type of the man whom officials at home detested even more at the beginning of the century than they do now. The easy-going clerk in London likes a man who causes no bother and who makes graceful concessions, upon which a humanitarian gloss can be put if awkward questions are asked. Raffles was a man who worked hard for the Company and England, and he frequently got severely snubbed for his pains. Happily, in the matter of founding Singapore, he got his way, but the building up of the British Empire has always been the story of a constant struggle between strong men on the spot and feeble men at home.

Of the acquisition and surrender of Java there is no need to treat here; the island is only an item in the Empire which we have conquered and given away in the last hundred and fifty years. But on Raffles' return home, in 1816, he had an interview with Napoleon at St. Helena, which is not without interest. Captain Travers describes the interview:

On our approaching Napoleon turned quickly round to receive us, and, taking off his hat, put it under his arm. His reception was not only not dignified or graceful, but absolutely vulgar and authoritative. He put a series of questions to Mr. Raffles in such quick succession as to render it impossible to reply to one before another was put. His first request was to have Mr. Raffles' name pronounced distinctly. He then asked him in what country he was born? How long had he been in India? Whether he had accompanied the expedition against the island of Java? . . . All these questions were put with great rapidity, and, before replied to, he turned round to Captain Garnham and myself, asked our names, and what service we had seen. . . . On his making a slight inclination of the head, we prepared to take our leave, and on making our bow we parted. Napoleon continued his walk and we returned to the house.

In March, 1818, Sir Stamford Raffles returned to Bencoolan as Lieut.-Governor, and in the following year founded the new settlement at Singapore. He was extremely anxious to find a spot which could be made a counterpoise to Batavia, where the Dutch concentrated all the trade of the Far East in their own hands. It is difficult nowadays to realise the fact that eighty years ago little Holland claimed the monopoly of the Far East. The Dutch were the most powerful nation in India, having 15,000 troops and a large fleet. Raffles was determined that England should not be cut out of the lucrative trade, and he managed to open the way without shedding a drop of blood, though unsupported by ministers at home, and criticised, snubbed, and censured by his chiefs of the East India Company. Dutch dominion meant monopoly; the goal of Sir Stamford was free trade, and he won the victory alone and single-handed. It became absolutely necessary to find a place which should serve as a headquarters for English trade, and Sir Stamford hit on Singapore.

"But for my Malay studies [he says] I should hardly have known that such a place existed; not only the European but the Indian world was also ignorant of it. . . . It is within a week's sail of China; still closer to Siam, Cochin China, &c.; in the very heart of the Archipelago, or, as the Malays call it, it is the navel of the Malay countries." . . . In a despatch of over forty pages to the Supreme Government, Raffles explained, and justified, the acquisition of Singapore. It had been necessary "to obtain a post which should have a commanding geographical position off the southern entrance of the Straits of Malacca; which should be in the track of our China and country trade; which should be capable of affording them protection and of supplying their wants; which should possess capabilities of defence by a moderate force; which might give us the means of supporting and extending our commercial intercourse with the Malay States; and which, by its contiguity to the seat of the Dutch power, might enable us to watch the march of its policy, and, if necessary, to counteract its influence."

All this Singapore has done, and has most amply fulfilled Raffles' prophecy that one free port in those seas would eventually destroy the spell of Dutch monopoly. But few people in those days realised what the port was to become, and, sad to relate, Sir Stamford did not live to enjoy the fruits of his labours. Early in 1824 he set sail for home, but the ship caught fire two days after starting, and Sir Stamford lost all his valuable collections, and, indeed, everything that he possessed, he and his family barely escaping with their lives. He reached England, however, in the same year, and hoped to settle down at Highwood, near Hendon. But the John Company in 1826 formally demanded the repayment of £22,200 which he was said to have overdrawn during the term of his rule in the Far East. This no doubt shortened Sir Stamford's life. On July 4, 1826, he was seized with an apoplectic fit, and died the next day, prematurely aged and worn out before completing his forty-fifth year.

Mr. Egerton has hardly made as much of his subject as it deserves, but, on the whole, he has done his work well. He might, perhaps, have given a little more space to the founding of the Zoological Gardens in 1825. The book is furnished with an index, which gives everything of importance and adds much to the value of the work. A reproduction of the fine bust of Sir Stamford by Chantrey is the frontispiece to the volume.

What is Africa ?

African Nights' Entertainment. By A. J. Dawson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

Little Indabas: Stories of Kaffir, Boer, and Natal Life. By J. Mac. (Unwin. 2s. 6d.)

THESE extremely diverse books will help by their diversity to give an effective impression of that enormous and lethargic unit among the continents, Africa. We speak of Africa, but in speaking we only use a name; there is no living idea behind it. What is Africa? It is a something that we cannot grasp. It is Rameses, the Shereef of Wazan, and Cecil Rhodes. It is the theatre of every known colonising system, from the atrocious ineptitudes of Belgium, under which an undersized man who would have kept ledgers in Brussels while away the time between meals by committing murder, to the haughty and abrupt sagacities of England. Virtually, Africa still endures in its pristine condition. None of these things moves that elephantine mass. The combined forces of Europe have scarcely yet begun to tickle the outlying parts of it. Judged in their relation to the whole African entity, such matters as Anglo-Boer wars, Morocco difficulties, and Egyptian occupations, dwindle to insignificant and ephemeral trifles. What are they to Africa? And that writers in Fleet-street should employ themselves in making literature out of these trifles must seem to the Pyramids very like a piece of youthful Europe's pertness. Nevertheless, the Pyramids notwithstanding, this literature must and will be made, and is being made in ever-increasing quantities. Certainly the field is about as inexhaustible as anything sublunary can be. Mr. A. J. Dawson's Moors have probably never heard of Mr. J. Mac's Dutch and Kaffirs, and will not hear of them for centuries to come: that is Africa.

For ourselves, qua connoisseurs in humanity, we prefer the Moor. He is an unspeakable beast, but he has the grand manner; he is perfectly picturesque, and he is a gentleman beyond the capacity of any Occidental. Mr. Dawson is a brilliant writer, but we think he is almost the least suitable of brilliant writers to deal artistically with the Moor. Keen and witty observation will not atone for lack of sympathy. And Mr. Dawson is not sympathetic. He regards the Moor and the entire spectacle of North Africa simply as an excuse for being very smart indeed, and for curdling the blood of the pallid Anglo-Saxon who happens not to have travelled that way. His favourite trick is to bring together a male African and a female European, or a male European and a female African, and then make the sparks fly. It is, of course, easy to imagine horrors when "a gently-nurtured English girl" (as the phrase goes) finds herself mated to either a nigger or a Moor. And Mr. Dawson does, indeed, love to savour those horrors. They are "too unpleasant to write or think about—much," he says; but he writes about them a great deal, and so you are compelled to think about them. He remarks that the relations between Daisy Tempest, aged nineteen, and her full-blooded negro husband, had reached "the shuddering stage," and he describes the shudder:

You can see it if the husband comes into the room suddenly and walks up to her chair. It is a long, in-drawing shudder, beginning at the ankles, and running upward until it unfolds the hauds, and they quiver in the lap. Then the shoulders take it from the wrists with a little convulsive twist, and crush it down finally into the fluttering bosom. Not pretty. But a moment's consideration will show you how inevitable, unless you are a good, innocent, racial-equality person. In which case, do not read this story, and, as you value your innocence, do not ever leave England, unless on a "personally conducted" tour.

The concluding sentences are a specimen of Mr. Dawson's not-too-subtle sarcasm. In "The Richard Merlin Document" he sets out to show that, in his virtuosity, he can be more horrid over the case of the Englishman and the Moorish maiden than over that of the Moor and the English maiden. This tale is a sinister and ghastly variant of a famous story of two lovers in Villiers de l'Isle Adam's Nouveaux Contes Cruels. It is one of the most appalling recitals that we can remember. We do not like it, and we shall not praise it. It decidedly produces an effect on the mind; so would an execution or a railway accident. The best story in the book is the first, "Annals of a Saintly House," in which the marriage of Muli Hassan Gharbi, the most holy of all shereefs, to Margaret Wycombe, is treated in a vein of true comedy, and the sentimental appeal carefully avoided. Margaret Wycombe knew her own mind, and bore herself superbly as a lady-shereef. The tale is full of fine gorgeous colour, and the descriptions of Hassan's wooing at Trouville, and his processional marriage-journey into the interior, are admirable examples of prose at once comic and highly picturesque.

Little Indabas begins with a brief introduction by Mr. Edward Garnett. Mr. Garnett has proved himself before to-day to be a wise and discriminating critic of fiction; but we think that he over-estimates the worth of Mr. Mac's book. He says:

That is the beauty of the document! It presents us, not with the fancy, idealised pictures of the writer who is drawing his conclusions to please his countrymen's prejudices, but with the bald, harsh outlines that curve off towards the truth that is unwelcome. The intelligent can always criticise the document when they get it; and the great, trustful Public!—well, the great Public can be trusted to murmur that the document of life is "queer" or "uninteresting," and doesn't seem quite to fit in with "what the newspapers say."

That is all very well. Yet we have failed to perceive the bald, harsh outlines curving towards the truth. There is a considerable amount of expecoration in the little volume, but Mr. Mac's insistence on the spitting propensities of the Kaffirs and South African Dutch does not appear to us to have much practical value in the presentment of racial character. Mr. Mac is a pessimist with a tendency to violence. His attacks on good, kind Exeter Hall are absolutely ferocious—so ferocious as to be farcical. He holds a very bad opinion of everybody in South Africa—Kaffir, English, or Dutch, or any permutation or combination of the three. His gifts as a writer are not remarkable: he lacks two things—experience and imagination. His scenes and his people are not realised for us. The least feeble tale in the book is "The White-Patched Kaffir," which recounts a duel of diplomacy and deceit between an Englishman and a Kaffir.

Meanwhile, Africa continues.

Other New Books.

THE CAMPAIGN OF 1815: LIGNY,
QUATRE-BRAS, WATERLOO.

BY WILLIAM
O'CONNOR MORRIS.

If it were not for the admirable index which crowns Judge O'Connor Morris's history of 1815, we should have been compelled to write of it as a superfluous book. As it is, however, we venture to think that it must take the place of the translation of M. Houssaye's masterly work, recently published and reviewed in these columns, as the standard history of Waterloo in the English language.

When two books identical in subject and scope and point of view are published within a few months of each other, it is necessary to indulge in the odious comparison, the bounden duty of the reviewer to give a casting vote. We cheerfully admit that until we turned the last page of Judge Morris's book we were in favour of M. Houssaye. After comparison of chapter with chapter, description with description, conclusion with conclusion, it seemed to us that there was little or nothing of any import in Judge O'Connor Morris's book which was wanting in the work of the French scholar, while M. Houssaye had clear claim to the honour of his untiring industry and original research, the results of which Judge Morris makes free use of, acknowledging his indebtedness frankly and generously. But both books are obviously works of reference intended for the student. Neither writer has the true historian's gift of breathing life into dry bones; neither history is inscribed to the general public or boasts elements of popularity. And so, other things being equal, there being no radical difference between the two books on the score of accuracy, or fairness, or completeness, the palm must be awarded to that which will prove most handy for reference, most useful for consultation. There can be no doubt as to which volume better fulfils these conditions. M. Houssaye's enormous collection of notes giving authorities and explanations and documentary evidence is crowded together at the end of the book, whereas Judge Morris has wisely compressed much similar matter into the text and has printed any further information at the bottom of the page to which it refers. And M. Houssaye's book is completely wanting in an index of any kind whatever, while it is the easiest thing to turn up any reference in The Campaign of 1815. There is no need to dwell on the advantage of such an arrangement: cela saute aux yeux.

The only differences we have noted between the two writers are, as already stated, of slight moment. Both M. Houssaye and Judge Morris seem to have read and marked every possible authority, and to have spent endless pains over compilation and comparison; but we are glad to find that the English writer does ampler justice to Mr. Ropes's excellent work, which has been the basis of all modern histories of Napoleon's campaigns. Both authors agree in the main features of their criticisms of the various plans of campaign and the actions of the various generals on both sides, but there is a difference of opinion with regard to the state of Napoleon's health on the fateful day of Waterloo, and here it appears to us M. Houssaye carries greater conviction. (Grant Richards.)

SCRAMBLES IN THE EASTERN GRAIANS.

BY GEORGE YELD.

The happy egoism of the Alpinist is a virtue unto itself. Man innocently revelling in the charm of seeming (if not of feeling) boyish is a refreshing spectacle. Mr. Yeld is no exception. He is the editor of the Alpine Journal, and an acknowledged authority on the Cogne Group. But one can imagine him saying thereanent—for he has a gift of felicitous quotation—"That is 'all my eye and Betty Martin'; I am a climber for the sake of the fun." And so, though he holds a brief for Mont Herbetet, which he avers, rather disputably, "has been defrauded of his rights" by the Grand Paradis, the Grivola, and the Tour St. Pierre; and though he is a bit of a botanist, noting many a beautiful flower disguised in latinity, it is primarily as the adult boy that he appeals to us. The scrambles were enjoyed, with Mr. Coolidge and others, during the years 1878-1897, and partook of the nature of explorations, as the exertions of Messrs. W. Mathews, J. J. Cowell, and others in the Grand Paradis district, left much to their successors in the way of "detailed examination of the various ridges and glaciers" (vide Ball).

For a specimen of the boyish element in the book take this passage: "One blanket between five! . . . We begin to arrange ourselves. 'Séraphin, have you a little stone for my head?' My humble request was followed by a roar of laughter, which sent us generally to our [extemporised mattress of] rhododendrons in a good humour." Or take this episode in an ascent: "François twice mounted on Sylvain's shoulder, and, to illustrate how absorbed he was in the work, I may relate that in one place, when I was standing close to him on a narrow ledge, and he was helping Sylvain up with the rope, he took a small handful out of my beard, which he had unawares included in his grip."

That guides, even if they do not, like Zurbriggen, write books, may have fine perceptions is evidenced by the following:

One day when I had finished my Capri Bianco too soon, François offered me some of their red wine; and when I objected that it would be robbing them for me to take it, he said: "Mais nous voyageons en frère dans les montagnes, n'est-ce pas?" Another day, when Sylvain and I were together in Val Tournanche, and regarding the Matterhorn, he said: "Comme il impose silence, le Cervin!"

The book is not free from the dull trivialities which abound in this class of literature, the index is meagre, and the proofs have been carelessly read; but it is a pleasant book, touched with culture, and well illustrated. One thing we can never understand: why the English Alpinist should persistently regard the tourist as a being of an inferior order to himself. Are they not both tourists? (Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

THE WALKERS OF SOUTHOATE. BY W. A. BETTESWORTH.

Strictly speaking, this is not a book at all: it is a family compilation, which had it been prepared a few years ago would have been privately printed. To-day, however, cricket is in the air, cricket is the thing, and the volume is, therefore, placed on the market. Not that it is not interesting; on the contrary, it is; but we cannot consider it a book. For one thing, too many persons have had a hand in the making—an author (Mr. Bettesworth), a general editor (Mr. Sachs), fifteen reminiscencers, and two contributors. For another thing, the arrangement is scrappy and not too clear. But the name of Walker is a great one in cricket, and there will doubtless be enthusiasts who will go through these four hundred and odd pages religiously enough. Our own opinion is that had Mr. Bettesworth worked longer at the task, and welded all the information laid before him into a short narrative not longer than Mr. Gale's memoir of "Bob" Grimston, he would have done better, and something good might have been added to cricket literature. We say with reluctance that, as a matter of fact, not all the Walkers merited a history at all. Mr. V. E. Walker and Mr. I. D. Walker pre-eminently did, and it is difficult to read too much about them. Of the others it is pleasant to know something, but a few pages would have been sufficient. Mr. V. E. Walker and Mr. R. D. Walker are still living. (Methuen. 16s.)

"THE HADDON HALL LIBRARY":

HUNTING.

BY J. OTHO PAGET.

Mr. Paget is an enthusiast with discretion, and knows his subject. Your true open-air sportsman (Mr. Paget very properly suggests that without open air the word sport is meaningless) nearly always has the faculty of holding attention: within his limits he is trained to the closest observation; he can afford to miss nothing; his brain and body are in absolute accord. Such men—and Mr. Paget is no exception—think straight, and say what they have to say with precision.

The greater part of the book is, naturally, concerned with fox-hunting and all that pertains to it. The breeding, rearing, and training of hounds are considered with a common-sense freedom from prejudice. Mr. Paget has no fads as far as his favourite sport is concerned, his idea being to get every ounce of value out of every creature concerned, from hounds to M.F.H., from fox to huntsman and whippers-in—every ounce, but no more. Each, in his kind, must be an artist: it is the artist's privilege to do his best; therefore hard work is essential. Fox-hunters may be born as well as poets, but both must learn the rules of the game; you can make neither. It is greatly to be hoped that the person who buys a couple of horses, pays his hunt subscription, and forthwith considers himself fully equipped, will read what an expert like Mr. Paget has to say before arriving at that desperate conclusion. His neck, perhaps, does not matter much, but farmers' hedges and fences and the comfort of the field do. "An M.F.H., to be perfect," writes Mr. Paget, "must embody all the virtues of a saint with the commanding genius of a Kitchener and the tact of a diplomatist." This is a true saying. The man who could always command his temper under the diabolical strain of an M.F.H.'s duties would be capable of going smilingly into any conceivable situation and coming out on top.

The chapters devoted to hare, stag, and otter hunting, though not so exhaustive, are much to the point. "There is no technical detail," says Mr. Paget "that is beneath the notice and study of any one who loves the sport he pursues." This might have been wisely set upon the title-page of his book. The most interesting illustrations are portraits of well-known huntsmen, with Tom Firr, late huntsman to Quorn, in the place of honour. Of him Mr. Paget writes: "I consider he was as near perfection as it is possible to find anything in this world." (Dent. 7s. 6d.)

THE DAY BY DAY COOKERY BOOK. BY A. N. WHYBROW.

A. N. Whybrow is a veritable Napoleon of the kitchen. He (or she) has provided menus for the breakfast, luncheon, and dinner of every day in the year, except "when February's days are twenty-nine." The book is for those who can afford to sacrifice honest yolks in order to enjoy that slightly bizarre dainty known as "stuffed eggs." It is, in short, a book for the West End, and as such it is really admirable. It shows remarkable versatility, and, at the same time, preserves a thoroughly British table. Accompanying the menus are concise directions for the preparation of the dishes enumerated in them. Our plebeian, but excellent, friend, Toad-in-the-Hole, is the one bright spot in an otherwise sombre luncheon on January 26, and he reappears on March 27. Oranges as an item for breakfast strike us as rather queer; but we have known reputable citizens to "begin with an apple," and even with a glass of hot water. (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

MURET-SANDERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIC GERMAN DICTIONARY.

An English-German dictionary on the lines of the monumental French-German work of Sachs-Villatte is at length an accomplished fact, and publishers and editors are to be congratulated on having produced a work that is in every way worthy of its great predecessor, and is destined, if we mistake not, to give a considerable impulse to the serious study of German in this country. To discuss the elaborate plan of the dictionary does not fall within the province of this paper, but some idea of its scope may be gathered from the fact that the abridged edition—for "Hand and School" use—runs to nearly two thousand closely-printed pages (11 in. by 8 in.) and weighs ten pounds.

Fiction.

Public Sacrifices.

Hilda Wade. By Grant Allen. With Illustrations by Gordon Browne. (Richards. 6s.)

Little Anna Mark. By S. R. Crockett. Ward, Lock. 6s.)

"My pensive Public, wherefore look you sad?" exclaimed the Brothers Smith in an immortal parody. If the public had an artistic conscience it should often be detected in the act of mourning the offences against art which it causes its brethren, the novelists, to inflict. Chief among these offences are the apotheosis of noise, the complication of the simple and the falsification of the real. For the distinguishing vices in the two romances before us the public is responsible, and if it is not pensive it ought to be.

For one of the authors, Mr. Grant Allen, is no more. Hilda Wade is his last novel. The brilliant empiricism that had in it something of the forthrightness of science utters its last word in the embodiment of a new type, a woman of an amazing memory and power of intuition who acted as a nurse in an English hospital though she was worthy to have entered "the pale of the Vrilya."

It is convenient to quote a short passage in this connexion:

It was Le Geyt's first luncheon-party since his second marriage. Big-bearded, genial, he beamed round on us jubilant. . . . The new Mrs. de Geyt sat at the head of the table, handsome, capable, self-possessed, a vivid, vigorous woman, and a model hostess. Though still quite young, she was large and commanding. Everybody was impressed by her. "Such a good mother to those poor motherless children!" all the ladies declared. . . . And, indeed, she had the face of a splendid manager. . . . "Hugo le Geyt seems to have made an excellent choice," I murmured. . . . "Don't you think so?"

[Miss Wade] glanced up at her hostess with a piercing dart of the keen brown eyes, held her wine-glass half-raised, and then electrified me by uttering, in the same low tone, audible to me alone. . . . these astounding words: "I think, before twelve months are out, Mr. Le Geyt will have murdered her."

Now, daringly improbable as is the supposition that such a pronouncement should issue from a lady-guest at a luncheon party, the scene thrills, and when the prophecy is fulfilled one is thrilled anew. Such a thrill does not arise from the fulfilment of arbitrary prophecies in fiction, as, for instance, when the Third Kalandar plays into the hands of the astrologers, by letting the knife drop into the heart of the Shaykh's son. Why? Because this tragedy is the result of causes not to be found in individuals but in destiny; and there is no game really worth watching in fiction that is settled by that deus ex machina.

To show that Hilda is the mouthpiece of Science, not of destiny, let us turn to Mr. Furneaux Jordan's Character as Seen in Body and Parentage, where may be found some curious generalisations on women of the type of Mrs. Le Geyt:

I came slowly to see [he says (we quote from the third edition)] that the skin of the assaulted women [brought into the Queen's Hospital, Birmingham] was often clear, delicate, perhaps rosy. Their hair growth was never heavy or long, and the eyebrows were spare and refined. Their upper spinal curves were so formed as to give a somewhat convex appearance to the back and shoulders.

They were, in short, naggers, hall-marked by Nature. The assaults were but violently logical tributes to the activity of what, for the gaiety of nations, we may be allowed to term their "Caudie" appendage. Such a lesson in the art of induction spurred Mr. Jordan on to visualising Lady Godivas and Sir Galahads of his own, by fitting appropriate bodies to the dispositions he imagined them to possess. The same lesson, as we see, inspired Mr. Grant Allen with the main idea of a long story of modern life. It must be admitted that, while the story remains under that inspiration, it is absorbing, when it departs from it it is tedious. Nowhere does Mr. Allen produce a more vivid effect than when Hilda lifts the grizzled end of a great professor's moustache, while he is unconscious, to show the cruel curve of his mouth. If only, the reader cries, the intellectual duel with the professor—which is the substance of the book—had been fought out in the laboratory, how satisfactory a book it might have been. But who is to believe in a professor who chases a hospital nurse in Africa and Asia, who plots her murder with Matabele cut-throats and Tibetan fanatics? And who can but regret the tameness with which a tremendous piece of sensation, borrowed from "The Case of M. Valdemar," falls into rank among the other properties that hold the stage at the melodramatic close of the story?

It was the public who spoiled Hilda Wade; it is the public who spoiled Little Anna Mark. Yet in the latter case it is probable that the public would plead "Not Guilty," for the public would scarcely see the reason for the curious piece of biographical falsification which Mr. Crockett has here accomplished. His story describes the adventures of a son of that Philip Standsfield, of New-Milns in Scotland, who in the reign of James II. was hanged for high treason and parricide. There is a long report of the affair in Howell's State Trials, to which Mr. Crockett directs the reader in a footnote. We at all events have taken advantage of the direction, and must express ourselves astonished that Mr. Crockett should have thought it worth while to bring a ruffian, whom Clio reports hanged and mutilated, to a mysterious "Isle of the Winds," thence to hurl him into a gaping volcano guarded (somewhat supererogatorily) by venomous snakes. Moreover, the sentence on the real Philip Standsfield asserts him "to have forfeited, amitted, and tint all and sundry his lands, heretages, titles, offices, tacks, steddings, routs, possessions, goods, and gear whatsoever pertaining to him, to our sovereign lord, to remain perpetually with his highness in property." Yet we find Philip the younger stepping into the estate as though King James had never been born. We see little point in the massacre of history. It is but fair to say, however, that Little Anna Mark is a story so full of heart and humour that, realising it is Mr. Crockett's twentieth work of imagination, we can but lift up our hands in praise of his staying powers. To begin with, Anna Mark herself, who figured in the State Trial (giving evidence at the age of ten) is, in Mr. Crockett's story, expanded into a truly delightful maiden. She is courage incarnate, and ever maintains her superiority over the hero, who, let us add, is free from the objectionable except in the initial effrontery which allows a child to set forth with much circumstance the life of a despicable parent. Gruesomeness reaches the high-water mark of intelligibility in the passage where an apprentice (named in the report of the State Trial) thrusts his sword through and through a packing-case which contains a live man. There the reader holds his breath. But yonder in the Isle of Winds and in Porto Rico, Illusion suspends her kind offices. We do not believe in Eborra of the "blood of kings" and his army of fers de lance; we do not believe in the shoal of devil-fish that carried the hero's craft to Porto Rico—Victor Hugo knew none of them, nor yet his travailleurs de la mer. We do not believe in the Grand Reunion on Mr. Crockett's Island. But we do believe in little Anna, while she is little, and hits "Bowie Fleemister on the elbow-joint" in order to persuade the hero, who is jealous of her accuracy of aim, that she is missing a bullock. And we believe in Mr. Crockett's Scotch, which is racy—racy, perhaps, as any now written, and well furnished with words that deserve the distinction of a glossary, though they do not balk the reader, who somehow manages to fit a meaning to most of them. Yet the fact remains that the public has vitiated Mr. Crockett's talent just as it vitiated Mr. Allen's. Science was enough to have supplied sufficing interest to a larger book than Hilda Wade. The bare painful facts of Standsfield's ignominious career offer foundations for a story rich with the wonder of life. Yet the public said "Give us Noise," and Noise was given unto them. But Reality hid her face.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE COURTESY DAME.

By R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

The fragrance of Mr. Gilchrist's story The Peakland Faggot is in this story of Old Derbyshire life, and of Anne Witchett—"a fine lady when she pleases, a country wench by nature"—the protégé of Lord Bostern. The story of the relationship of these two is as original as it is delightful. "Her birthday is in April," he said with a sigh, "and hers is an April fortune. An ideal April, mind you, Stan—infinity more sunshine than rain. But when there is rain, a real torrent." The story is dedicated to Mr. Eden Phillpotts. (Heinemann. 6s.)

TALES OF THE PAMPAS.

By WILLIAM BULFIN.

The excellent "Overseas Library" is slowly but surely pegging out its claims in remote fields. The West Indies, the Guiana wilds, Kaffraria, and portions of Asia have already yielded their volumes. Here we are taken to the pampas of South America, where we are presumed to know the meaning of pulperia, pingo, comadre, nino, and guapo. Ranch and camp life and hints of cattle trooping and revolutions give colour and substance to these racy stories, of which the first is concerned with a bad man, and the second with an enchanted toad. "Sailor John" was very unpopular. He was dishonest. He stuttered. He despised the Irish and the Guachos. He was a liar." (Unwin. 2s.)

THE SHADOW OF QUONG LUNG.

By DR. C. W. DOYLE.

"Of course, the best thing to do with Chinatown would be to burn it down." So says Dr. Doyle in his preface to this story, in which he sets forth the terrible condition of the slave girls in Chinatown, San Francisco. The term "slave girls" is curious; but Dr. Doyle proceeds: "The kidnapping of Moy Yen . . . can be matched by many cases that have actually occurred in Chinatown." Readers of Dr. Doyle's faithful transcriptions of life under the Himalayas, published under the title of The Taming of the Jungle, will not be inclined to suspect the author of exaggeration even when he is most forcible. (Constable. 3s. 6d.)

NEIGHBOURS.

By JULIA M. CROTTIE.

We have here just a score of short sketches or episodes of Tipperary village life, under such piquant titles as "The Sunday-Boy," "The Town in Danger," "The Delicate Tinker," &c. The whole spirit of the book seems to be indicated in the lines chanted by a voice in a room above O'Dell's drinking-shop:

Down the New Walk, in bonnets and shawls,
Down the New Walk go the three Miss Costigans,
Eliza's the best, for she is best dressed,
Oh, Eliza's the best of the three Miss Costigans.

(Unwin. 6s.)

THE WHISTLING MAID.

By ERNEST RHYS.

The period of this story, by the author of The Fiddler of Carne, is somewhere in the days of yore. We are concerned with the fortunes of a Welsh family, and in particular with the adventures of the gallant maid of Rhos, in her effort to bring aid to a beleaguered house. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

This also is Vanity.

I HAVE no doubt that writing is too much written about. But in these days, when literature is become a great amorphous craft, whose professors work in the open, and whose secrets are proclaimed from the house-tops, what is one to do? The future of literature can only be divined from its present state, and if that state is one of some confusion and blatancy one must still meet talk with talk, or take no part in the business. It happens that I am in the business; silence is not in my choice. My hands are imbrued in a dozen processes—need I name them?—of the writing trade. I like my work, and I am grateful for my bread and butter, and there you are! And yet there are things that trouble one in the night watches—things that must trouble every sincere writer who is doing his little best to sift and class and describe the myriad literature of the day. Other voices, of men immersed in the same work and of older experience, have been raised from time to time in discharge of convictions forced upon them by their toil in this immeasurable tangled vineyard of letters. One or two notable warnings have been given very recently. We have been told—I think with reason—that novelists can no longer hope to spread good quiet work over a lifetime and gather in a lifetime of appreciation. They must make a rush for it; and ten years of public favour is named as the prudent notch of their expectation. Soon, doubtless, there will be an un-written Septennial Act under which successful authors will be dismissed as surely as Parliament. Only it will be useless for them to seek re-election.

Another writer who knows predicts the wasting away of “literary” journalism under the assaults of the journalism of scraps, tit-bits, brevities, paragraphs, and pictures. He shows, indeed, that the process has already gone far. The other day I was talking with a literary friend—we are both young—about things in general; and, suddenly, without foreseeing it, we felt like graybeards when we looked back—how far do you think? Ten and twelve years. We amazed each other by the unanimity with which we perceived that a certain fog and listlessness has crept over the literary world since the last 'eighties. Just think of what was doing then. The National Observer may not fill in the memory quite the place that it filled in the eyes of its handful of purchasers; but what a bliss it struck upon the week. We were relatively poor then, my friend and I, and we recalled the fact that we clubbed our money week after week to buy the paper. How we shouted, and wrote each other notes about Mrs. Meynell's “Rejection” and Mr. Kenneth Grahame's “Orion” and Kipling's “Tomlinson,” and the trail of Henley over all. How we enjoyed the “you shalls,” and the discomfiture of Brixton. Then the Yellow Book: it is correct to laugh at it now, but it was a sign of life, a nursery of talent, and we all pricked up our ears when it struck the quarter. These were not the only stars that twinkled. Under Mr. Frank Harris the Saturday Review was a habitation of dragons. Mr. Hutton's mellow thunder still rolled in the Spectator. Mr. Bernard Shaw digressed in the Star. The Pall Mall Gazette had its poisoned pup. The Daily Chronicle was newly literary. Mr. Kipling was still only a literary man. Stevenson was alive. The cult of Omar had not tired us. Then there were the large-paper and limited edition and parchment crazes—foolish, perhaps, but not altogether so; they, too, betokened life, and if they are well ended, still, what has taken their place? All this was a little while ago. And now? Well, I read this sentence in my morning paper the other day: “Perhaps we are entering upon the period which many lovers of literature have desired, when, for ten years at a stretch, no good books will be written, and we shall have time to read again the supreme works of noble and more deliberate days.” I accept the sigh, but not the prediction. The millennium is as near as that decade in which only the “large still books” will be read. And—speaking in all selfishness—would it be a happy ten years for literary workers? “No good books will be published.” Nothing is said about the cessation of bad books. That host would still advance, and the literary journalist would be left to garrison the dismantled forts of criticism. I can conceive nothing more forlorn than to review the works of Brown, Jones, and Robinson for readers who refused to be withdrawn from Shakespeare, Pope, and the judicious Hooker.

The situation is impossible, I have no doubt; but only in degree. There is a truth to which I am chatting my way, I hope not too spreadingly for this month of demi-work, and it is just this. The writer is of all men the most starved of good reading. In the old days it was starvation of the body that threatened the literary man. It was of this that—to go no farther back—Byron and Lamb hinted in their converging and convincing counsel to the Quaker poet of Woodbridge. “Keep your bank, and your bank will keep you” were Lamb's words, if I remember them. To-day I would say to a bank clerk on the verge of Bernard Barton's mistake: “Fill your bookshelves, and your bookshelves will fill you.” It is the greatest folly to imagine that the “literary life” is favourable to the enjoyment of literature. In proportion as a young man has skill in reading he may be wisely warned to leave writing alone, or practise it only in the leisure of another occupation. If he loves literature in his heart, and if life seems to hold nothing better than deep armchair communion with books, let him stay at home, in his country town, and make himself a feast. There he may select and try the books of the day by real standards, and drink from his Bandusian spring of pure literature—his library. Short of great achievement, which I rule out, he is the true literary man who thus commands, and is not commanded by, literature. Here in the market-place there is neither time nor silence for reading. A working critic must deal, in varying degrees of thoroughness, with a couple of hundred new books a year. He is also beset with the literary news which heralds new books, recounts their progress, and tattles of their authors. He reads to write, he takes in that he may give out. Be his conscience never so sound, his efforts never so keen, he becomes a book-jobber. He may come to a most trained intelligence, and habituate himself in sincerity and carefulness; but, as the dyer's hand takes the dye, his mind acquires the motley and fast-fading hues of innumerable books which he cannot love. Hazlitt knew this. “The weaknesses and vices that rise from a constant intercourse with books are in certain respects the same with those which arise from daily intercourse with the world. . . . The same dissipation of mind, the same listlessness, languor, and indifference, may be produced by both. . . . The defects of the literary character proceed, not from frivolity and voluptuous indolence, but from the overstrained exertion of the faculties, from abstraction and refinement.” Now, I have never seen this view of the writing trade put before “literary aspirants” (by the way, the word aspirants is delightfully non-literary) whose infatuation for that trade rests largely on the notion that it offers unlimited opportunity to enjoy good literature. It does not. It offers unlimited opportunities of seeing new books and watching new reputations rise and fade—a very different thing.

I believe that the great readers have mostly been found outside the rank and file of writers, and enjoying much leisure. Montaigne had wealth and the stone, Johnson had his pension, Southey his salary, Lamb his India House, FitzGerald his cottage and boat, Amiel his professorship and his temperament. These are the great browsing readers whose names occur to one soonest. What reading by a literary man of to-day is comparable to theirs in depth, and width, and ruminative zeal? Perhaps some of them were gluttons, and their industry an idleness in disguise. But one must take examples. To read of their reading is delicious pain. Says Montaigne: "Those that lived about Virgil's time complained that some would compare Lucretius unto him. I am of opinion that verily it is an unequal comparison; yet can I hardly assure myselfe in this opinion whensoever I finde my selfe entangled in some notable passage of Lucretius." Says Amiel, on a day in his diary: "I have been reading, for six or seven hours without stopping, the Pensées of Joubert." Yet Amiel had his classes and lectures in the University at Geneva. Again, "I have been living for two hours with a noble soul—with Eugénie de Guérin. How many thoughts, feelings, griefs, in her journal of six years. How it makes one dream, think, live!" That is it—dream, think, live. I take down my Arnold who also read Eugénie, and I transcribe:

She had books too; not in abundance, not for the fancying them; the list of her library is small, and it is enlarged slowly and with difficulty. The Letters of Saint Teresa, which she had long wished to get, she sees in the hands of a poor servant girl before she can procure them for herself. "What then?" is her comment: "Very likely she makes a better use of them than I could." But she has the Imitation, the Spiritual Works of Bossuet and Fénelon, the Lives of the Saints, Corneille, Racine, André, Chénier, and Lamartine; Mme. de Staël's book on Germany, and French translations of Shakespeare's plays, Ossian, The Vicar of Wakefield, Scott's Old Mortality and Redguntlet, and the Princessi Sposi of Manzoni. Above all, she has her own mind; her meditations in the lonely fields, on the oak-grown hill-side of "The Seven Springs"; her meditations and writing in her own room, her chambrette, her délicieux chez moi, where every night, before she goes to bed, she opens the window to look out upon the sky—the balmy moonlit sky of Languedoc.

And I know a critic of the first rank who once said that he was afraid to leave town on a holiday for fear he should miss some literary intelligence! No, whatever happiness—and there is much of it—dwells in the writing trade of to-day, it is related to the fever and stress of literature, not to its serene and wide-seeing contemplation. I think it was precisely because he saw this that Arnold advocated the firm acquisition by the critic of a few of the finest passages of English literature to be used as portable standards or touch-stones. The suggestion was a confession. I have said nothing new, but the evil grows, and, as time flows on and one's pen with it, it is the more personally felt. I sometimes wonder whether I shall ever again be truly "entangled" in Plutarch, or "Lear," or Comus, or Don Quixote, or the Religio Medici, or The Heart of Midlothian. Or whether, when my last batch of books has been brought to me for review, I shall wave my paper-knife at the carrier and cry:

Come not to me again; but say to Athens
Timon hath made his everlasting mansion
Upon the beached verge of the salt flood;
Who once a day with his embossed froth
The turbulent surge shall cover.

W.

Things Seen.

By Request.

It was a warm, cloudy night in June. The chimes of a neighbouring church clock, borne lightly on the still air, had just announced a quarter before eleven. There was a tinkling of guitars and a trill of voices. In the corner of the Market Place—the corner where irregular, red-tiled houses are flanked by rustling elms and the church, grey and pinnacled—in the light before a tavern, stood the performers. There were four of them. They were young, and two—the singers—were girls. As the duet ceased the crowd gathered irregularly, and one of the singers—a fair girl with faded blue ribbon in her dusty straw hat—threaded her way, bag in hand, through the crowd. Many gave coppers and a cheering "Bravo" and "Well done," for the music was not that of the streets. As the other girl sang, two burly drovers came through the glass-panelled door. They paused and stood, hands in pockets, leering at the singer. The girl, unconscious of their presence, sang on:

And she thought
"It's fit—fit—fit—ter,
He should love my
Glit—glit—glit—ter,
Than his heart give away
To the butterflies gay,
Or the birds that
Twit—twit—twit—ter."

Presently the song ended. A man slouched out of the shadow and asked something of the girl. There was a muttered conversation and a thrumming of strings: then the man went back to his place in the shadow against the wall.

A few bars from the guitars preluded an old-time song—of vows, and lips, and tears—and the girl sang it with fervour. The man against the wall leant forward and the light from the tavern windows fell on his face: it told of hard living and excess. As the song went on the hard lines seemed to soften. The face of the singer was wrapt and earnest. She seemed to sing not to the crowd, but to something which had happened long ago; and, as one gazed, one forgot her shabby dress, and wide mouth, and straggling, wispy hair.

As the players strummed the finishing bars there was a flicker of lightning, and a few rain-drops fell sharply. Then the thunder muttered sullenly and they all four moved on. Some of the crowd followed; a few wished them "good night" and "good luck." The man who leant in the shadow against the wall had disappeared.

The Butterfly.

A SUNNY day among the fells and beckes. I sit by the clear, rushing stream, with its golden-brown lights and shadows and tiny waterfalls. The children wade, and balance themselves, laughing, on the slippery stones. A little maid of six or seven comes towards me; she has forget-me-not eyes and golden hair; her wet feet and legs glisten white in the sunshine; a pretty picture. She has something in her hand and is talking to it. I listen as she comes near. I hear her say softly: "You think you can get away, but I have you fast." I see that she holds a struggling butterfly between finger and thumb. "Poor butterfly," I say. "Won't you let it go? You are crushing it." The blue eyes look up at me—hard and cold as steel. "What do I care?" she says.

Correspondence.

The Jargon of Criticism.

SIR,—Your article on this subject should be useful to critics, and still more so to young authors, who are too apt to be unduly elated or depressed by current criticism.

Critics have two entirely different standards: one for known, the other for unknown authors. If any well-known, successful author doubts this, let him try the experiment of publishing anonymously, and afterwards compare the criticisms on his known and his unknown work. It will give him some measure of the value of modern current criticism. In each case he will find "high adjectives and low standards" enough; but with reference to his anonymous work, I question if he will find that "confirmed habit of agreeableness," or that "inveterate tendency to find something pleasant to say at all costs," which is usually meted out to known authors.

Some five years ago I published a novel, entitled Sheep or Goats; and desiring to ascertain what, apart from my personality, would be my merit as a writer of fiction, I assumed the pseudonym of "Valentine Delle," and I believe that down to this day my publisher is ignorant both of my name and sex.

The result was instructive, and I think young and budding authors may profit from my experiment.

Some forty reviews and notices came before me, from which I now make extracts. I use numbers merely to indicate that the extracts are from different journals.

To begin with, the work was said to be (1) a fine novel, very powerful, (2) told with great power, (3) to contain exquisite pictures of life, (4) some of them very human, and (5) not to bear the remotest resemblance to real life.

This was a little confusing.

But I also learned (1) that my novel should be widely and attentively perused, (2) that it would be read with interest and pleasure, (3) that it was a very readable novel, (4) that as a whole it was merely unreadable, and (5) that not even the most insatiable novel-reader cast away upon a desert island could bring himself to wade through it!

I felt still more confused when, on looking a little further into the reviews, I found (1) that my novel possessed undoubted merit, (2) was striking and remarkable, (3) a remarkable as well as meritorious work, (4) told with ever-growing interest, (5) suggestive and sometimes stimulating, and (6) wearisome and unnecessary.

But I was in a perfect cloud when I learned that (1) it was a notable intellectual novel, and (2) intensely stupid, (3) that it was aggressively modern and religious, and (4) old-fashioned and melodramatic, (5) that this excellent story had very full measure within its limits, (6) was a good specimen of the circulating-library novel, (7) a satisfactory piece of sound work, (8) carefully done, and yet (9) shapeless, and (10) odd and out of joint.

I certainly had not yet gained that clear conception of my work for which I had been looking, so I turned once more to the reviews to see what was said as to the characters in my work, and I found (1) that the novel abounded in striking and well-sustained characterisations, (2) some of the characters delightful in their quaintness, (3) brilliantly-drawn characters, (4) the Worpum family hit off in a delightful manner, (5) little better than the fine humour of the Worpums, and (6) that they were wholly impossible, (7) that the hero, Bertram, had a certain fascination, (8) had much fascinatingly paradoxical to say, (9) that the conflict in his character is portrayed not merely with imaginative sympathy but with real skill, (10) that he is a dreadful bore, and (11) a spineless, morbid creature.

What surprised me most, however, was the attention paid to myself personally. I had no conception that I was so interesting. Here is the portrait of Mr. Delle as sketched by his reviewers.

He has (1) a keen sense of humour, "not the new humour we are glad to say," (2) an obvious faculty for political satire, (3) has humour and observation, (4) has many observant touches, (5) fancy and invention, (6) not without ingenuity and cleverness, (7) his philosophy is charming, (8) he describes with no less force than lucidity, (9) has an eloquent pen, (10) he relates with great spirit and vigour, (11) is amiable, (12) cultivated, (13) his discussions are always interesting, (14) the tone of his reflections refined and sometimes poetical; yet in spite of all these charms, and though (15) his satire is "good-natured," I grieve to say (16) his fun is "ill-humoured," (17) he needs chastening, (18), is mercilessly prolix, (19) his attempt at literature is not yet to be justified, and, saddest of all, (20) he must have a bosom of triple brass!

After reading the above select extracts, I am sure your readers will be relieved to hear that Sheep or Goats is out of print, and that my stereotypes perished in an accidental fire at my publishers.—I am, &c.,

VAL. DELLE.

SIR,—Your timely article, "The Jargon of Criticism," is rather too hard on the poor reviewers. As a class they are overworked and ill-paid; and no sensible man will produce good work in exchange for poor pay—especially if he has to write anonymously. I have myself for some time been on the literary staff of a well-known daily, but in spite of the fact that I have reviewed a large number of books I have never received a penny for my services. I am permitted to keep the copies of the books I review, certainly; but as these rarely sell for more than one shilling each, I can hardly be blamed if I feel tempted to "scamp" my work and use stock phrases of little or no meaning. "Why, then, do you continue to work for such poor pay?" I hear you ask. Simply because I hope that my editor will, in the course of time, recognise the error of his ways and see fit to give me adequate remuneration. And, besides, I have reason to know that he is not, in this respect, different from other editors: they all have the same system. A year or two ago I sent out applications to a large number of provincial papers offering my services as reviewer of books. I stated my qualifications, enclosed specimens of my work, and hinted at remuneration. The result was a number of letters from the editors saying that at present they had no vacancy, but that they would put my name "on their books." And then they finished with a paragraph of this kind: "With regard to remuneration, we may say that it is not our usual custom to pay for work of this nature; we always have on hand a large number of applications from University and professional men who are willing to review books on condition that they keep as their own property the copies we send them." What answer could I make to letters of that kind? It is of no use to argue that the book reviewer would get better pay if he did better work. The truth of the matter is that the editors don't want good work: mediocre stuff satisfies them well enough, especially if they haven't to pay for it. Specialists are treated differently, I believe; these remarks of mine refer merely to reviewers of novels. I enclose my card and the name of the paper for which I review.—I am, &c.,

"MILES ENDERBY."

[We cannot endorse "Miles Enderby's" view that "no sensible man will produce good work in exchange for poor pay." A sensible man will always do his best.]

SIR,—A short time since one of your writers contributed two or three very interesting articles on curious and incorrect phrases which he found in the current dailies, and now in your leader you have impaled a selection of the stock expressions of the reviewers of novels.

There is one curious little expression very prevalent with newspaper writers upon which I think your opinion would be interesting. I mean, "to a degree," placed at the end of a sentence.

Does it mean anything at all? It might mean to an immense degree or to a degree not worth consideration.

I have seen it used in a leading article in a daily paper, and then in the "literary" column of the same paper. I found it in the late Harold Frederic's Market Place, and also in the paragraph sent in by a competitor for your prize only last week; and even one of your own writers, when reviewing the novel Owd Bob a few months ago (I mention it with trembling), finished by saying it was "doggy to a degree."

Can it by any possibility be justified as an idiom?—I am, &c., INQUIRER.

August 18, 1900.

[The expression, "to a degree," is inadmissible, and we regret its accidental appearance in our columns. The proper phrase is "in a high degree," "in a great degree," &c.]

Style.

SIR,—The discussion anent the above still "drags its slow length along," and did I not feel that the importance of the subject demanded a greater amount of attention than has yet been expended upon it, I should forbear to trouble you with further correspondence.

In the first place, I am at a loss to grasp the full significance of Mr. Ascher's remark, in which he reminds me "that the afflatus rests in the idea, and not in its verbal interpretation." It is true that I suggested a modification of his own definition of style, "a mode or manner of expression and nothing more"; and I strove to express my meaning as simply as I could by using the term "literary afflatus" to comprise the one other essential to a correct definition of style. But Mr. Ascher, while apparently accepting the term as applied to ideas, refuses to admit its presence in their expressed form; I assume, therefore, that, in his opinion, the sublimest works of literary genius do not derive their vitality from the beautiful raiment of their thought, but from the thought itself. This dissociation of ideas does not commend itself to me, even although Mr. Ascher, in a somewhat paradoxical sentence, assures Mr. Armstrong that thought and its verbal expression are "as wide apart as the poles are asunder." For my own part, I am content to believe that the immortality of Shakespeare, for instance, is due not to the thought alone, but to the idea allied to its expression, or, as Mr. Ascher would phrase it, to thought in its verbal garb. Arguing from an analogical standpoint, I can scarcely imagine that anyone would see no difference between a beautiful silk dress lying flat in its box and the same as worn by a lovely woman. There is, in fact, as much difference there as between Mr. Ascher's conception of style and mine. In the one case it is merely a lifeless raiment destitute of style, in the other a splendid robe transfigured and as though vivified by the living presence of its wearer.

I consider, therefore, that style is the verbal garb of thought breathed upon and transfigured by it, and this is what I mean by the term "afflatus." I quite agree with Mr. Ascher that it is "possible to clothe a grand or an original thought in feeble, jangled, or even incorrect language"; but I fail to appreciate why, therefore, the afflatus must be absent from style, considering that there are, as he says, expletives to qualify it.

It now appears to me that the assertion in my previous letter was rash and premature, and that Mr. Ascher is not so near the mark as I then imagined, for both Mr. Armstrong and "S. W." hold views more closely allied to my own.—I am, &c.,
ERNEST H. HARRISON.

Streatham, S.W. : August 18, 1900.

[This correspondence must now cease.]

Thackeray's Heart.

SIR,—It is lamentable to see one of your competitors complaining of Thackeray's heart not being in its right place. The following words, written by Jack Easel, Punch's old Roving Correspondent, are sufficient for my purpose—viz., to show that if ever man's heart was rightly placed, Thackeray's was :

Thackeray is often spoken of, by readers who don't understand him, as a cynic—and nothing else; as an author who took a warped and perverted view of human nature; as a sceptic in morality, and so forth. Good heavens! Why, there are passages in Pendennis, in Vanity Fair, and the Newcomes which could only have been written by a man with the highest sense of honour, of reverence for virtue, of sympathy with genuine sorrow and human weakness.—See "Our Square and Circle; or, the Annals of a Little London House," by Jack Easel (Smith, Elder, 1895).

The italics in the first sentence are mine. I can further say that I learned more of the latter half of English history after reading Esmond than I ever accumulated at school, and, what is more, have kept it fixed in my mind.—I am, &c.,
M. J.

[We are, of course, not responsible for our competitor's obiter dictum.]

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 48 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best depreciation of summer holidays in the manner of Elia. Many of the contributions we are sorry to say, would entitle the writers to confess with Elia: "I have no ear," neither his vocabulary nor cadences having been caught with accuracy. But it is the cadence that has defeated most candidates. We award the prize to Miss Winifred Pansell, 97, Oakley-street, Chelsea, for the following :

There is nothing, I protest, which damps the kindly spirits of your true lover of London so much as the advent of summer holidays. Why these annual excursions and alarms, these strange desertions of hearth, and home, and office? Simply, forsooth, because the nimby-namby citizen of to-day cannot exist without his "change of air." As if the rich, historic breath of Mother London, so subtly and variously composed and curiously perfumed, should not suffice for her ungrateful children, but they must needs fill their windpipes with the alien blast of sea or moorland!

Far be it from me, gentle reader, to pick a quarrel with holidays in the good antique sense of the word. Those old Holy-days, which the lamented Elia used to observe so piously at Christ's Hospital, were sweet and commendable in their nature; lasting just long enough to give the yowknors an airing, and send them back to their desks on the morrow with zeal renewed. But is there not something insidious in the long idlenesses in which Londoners now indulge? For, mark you, these leisure hours are all spent out of town, and herein lies the danger. Your gentle Cockney, who embarks for Margate with skin of purest saffron, must suffer a sea-change, and return anon with brickdust nose and freestone-coloured hands. And even so does the mind receive its colouring from the baleful change, acquiring, it may be, a lurking distaste for book-keeping, a lessened interest in "All the winners!" or even a diminution of that glorious self-complacency which is the Londoner's proudest birthright. Nay, there are cases where the very reason has been affected, and the deluded wanderer has come to love the "haunts of coot and hern" more—more, O ye gods!—than the sacred haunts of Samuel Johnson.

Other contributions are as follows :

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy."

But why not let Jack be dull? Among other popular fallacies, this saw is probably the invention of a fidgity pedagogue. Jack is none the worse for being dull. He is often much the worse—for others—when he quits work for play. If he must play, let him play in winter. These monster sylvan fetes at R—— arride me not. Doubtless they bring glist to the lessee of the woods, but Dryad and Naiad fly before the Bacchanal and Maenad. The approach of the creature is signalled by the gesticulations of a Yahoo. His hat, preposterously assumed, is an index of the disordered head piece below it. You can mark Jack's progress by the greasy envelopment of his nunccheon, dropped thoughtlessly on the moss-grown base of a statue. Watch him, trampling down rose and ranunculus, everywhere—

"From tube as black
As wintry chimney, or well polished jet,
Exhale mundanus, ill-perfumed scent."

Verily, as long as he lacks not his "Splendid Shilling" Jack will have his play; but put me in the secretest arbour, beyond ear-shot of his fife and drum: "in angello," as A Kempis hath it, "cum libello," in a nook with a book. Jack has no gust for such insipid delights. Let him work, say I, the live-long summer day, and be dull. Holiday quotha! What crapulous to-morrows! What dismal yesterdays! I mislike these unholydays. Let Jack work and be dull. The happier he, in the long run (sua si bona norit), without summer holidays. [R. F. Mac C., Whitby.]

The person that invented the theory of summer holidays—meaning by that delusive term an annual plunge into the unknown—ought to be branded as a public malefactor. No one has destroyed home life and embittered connubial bliss more effectually than has this misguided wretch. Next door to us some unhappy slave of the ring has just driven off in a fly with his wife and family. Well, perhaps, he cannot choose, but—go! Yet for the bachelor who deliberately takes his happiness in his hands, and leaves Town on the pretext of a summer holiday, there is no excuse. He is past praying for. Do you inform us that you seek rest and recreation? Can you find recreation in a glaring, blatant sea-side resort, unless, perchance, you are interested in the story of the Golden Fleece, as retold by hotel proprietors and lodging-house keepers? Can you hope for rest in those quiet out-of-the-way spots affected by some spirits? Nay, noise is not recreation, nor stagnation rest.

Whereas in London, never is it so delightful as when you are informed that every one has left Town. Then can you visit your club with unclouded brow, feeling assured that the club bore is far, far away. Then can you dress with a delightful disregard for convention, consulting only the thermometer and your own fancy. There are you sure of finding the waiters at your favourite restaurant smile upon you once again—now that the rush of the season is over.

So let us destroy this holiday-fetish worship, and whilst our friends are in the agonies of packing up, let us remain "like Teneriff or Atlas unremoved." [M. H., London.]

It is a mere pedagogue's fallacy that we must estimate year by year, and not rest content with hibernal holiday. My friend L. (most genial of naturalists) says that there exist (I had nearly written "live") certain molluscs, cold-blooded atomies, which suspend their vitality in summer lest their rapid juices be dried by the invigorating sun. In warm-blooded beings the humours of mind and body move more briskly the closer our climate approximates to that "warm South" whence is our primal origin, and summer is the season of our happiest and most fertile labour. Let the schoolmaster escape to bathing-machines or trout streams, from the uncongenial society of urchins and the intolerable recurrence of a dull curriculum. To him hoc totum numeris sit. But they whose tasks are more accordant with opulent midsummer, shall they quit the garden and library, whose every association is with happy fancies and sweetly responsive memories? Is our English summer so long or so fierce that we must hide our timorous heads in salt water like sluggish invertebrates? December is the time for jovial holiday, when the chilled blood demands generous cordials, and runs the brisker for the frolics of the Christmas hearth. Late summer, in the study as in the field, is the season of harvest, of labour which is no toil, of effort yielding quick and glowing result. Summer renews our studious youth, not, alas! for "playing holidays" (Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV. i. 2), but, at least, for the more placid happiness of congenial labour.

[J. D. A., Ealing.]

Holidays, saith the wise man, are an abomination—a pleasantly unpleasant breaking of the chain of even events—a whisk of light in the darkness which, when it hath sped, maketh the night the blacker, the heart the heavier, the pocket the lighter.

Have you not found it so, reader? Ye whose life-business is governed by routine; whose penates are ledger and letter-rack; whose brains are double-entry and whose emotions recur with the morning's mail—have ye not found it so? And all ye host of literati, lovers on wit and makers of phrases, whose chief joy of writing is that of endorsing the editorial cheque, whose heart jumps at the rat-tat of the postman, and whose sustenance lies in the faces and events of a great city—have ye not also found it so? To wander at will among leafy lanes, or by the seashore; to reign so long as thy poke is full, and then to resume thy restricted channel, were, at best, but an idle procedure. It is leaving town with a string to one's leg—a dreamy realisation of an, as yet, unattained reality. The agony of Tantalus were small next beside it: for, mercifully, unlike the holiday-maker, he tasted not his heaven!

If thy tastes incline thee country-wards, and thine avocation hath the regularity of Mark Lane, do as the writer doth. He taketh a plunge at the week-end. His gulps are sharp and incisive. He carrieth the London air with him, and returneth before he hath contracted disturbing foreign inclinations. Beyond physical benefit, he knoweth not that he hath been away. He contemplates not the apparent serenity of others—consequently he is at peace and doeth his duty the better. [H. A. M., Southend.]

Now that the whole world makes holy-day, it needeth some teacher to provide a remedie for such thoughtless expenditure of moments and means. You leave your beloved folios, the streets that have become to you as friends, the rural solitudes that administer peace to you, the soft bed in which you have chewed the cud of some pleasant dream, and, luckless wight that you are, are dropped down, folioless, amidst streets that eye you reproachfully, solitudes that to you are wild-nesses, and beds terrible as that of Procrustes. And along with all these discomforts you lose the advantages persons with business that they must do possess over those aimless creatures whose days are to them as a clean page on which they may write whatsoever they will. To one who, like myself, is shy of novelties, the presence of new surroundings—new furniture, new faces, and, worst of all, new books—is positive suffering. I love best to stay with things that to me have magic in them. I build my Eden about me, and it is preposterous to think that in the few hours of that consolatory interstice, St. Lubbock's Day, one can erect a similar tabernacle elsewhere. However much even its worshippers may enjoy the poor, gaudy day, think of the pain and trouble to get the human machine back into its old ruts. "Stale, flat, and unprofitable" seem now the means whereby its dole of sustenance is ground out to it. The hours of our uneasy liberty have expired, and we are sorry we forsook the well-worn path. [G. H. W., Neath.]

Other replies received from: T. W. C., Wandsworth; E. L. C., Redhill; G. C. P., Norwich; T. C. H., Godalming; T. C. T., Lewisham; E. B. D., Torquay; L. V. S., London; A. M. P., Hampstead; H. W. D., South Tottenham; E. H. H., Streatham; A. S. M., Holywood, co. Down; F. V. S., London; E. E., Cambridge; L. M. S., London; B. L. Chatham; "Grace Hope," Anglesey; F. W. S., London; A. M. D., Cambridge; E. E., Horsey.

Competition No. 49 (New Series).

ON our first page we refer to the proposal now on foot to erect a tablet to the memory of John Ruskin in Westminster Abbey. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best characterisation of Ruskin suitable to be inscribed under such a monument. Length must not exceed 100 words, but below that is quite optional.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, August 23. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Owen (John Wellington), "I Say unto You" (Melbourne: Melville, Mullen, & Slade) 7/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Wallace (Edgar), Writ in Barracks (Methuen) 4/6
Milham (Aubrey N.), In the Waiting Time of War (Swan Sonnenschein) 2/6
Doughty (Charles), Under Arms Privately printed 1/6
Ouida, Critical Studies (Fisher Unwin) 7/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Story of the Nations Series: A History of Norway. By Hjalmar H. Boyesen (Fisher Unwin) 5/9

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Dutt (William A.), Norfolk (Dent & Co.) net 4/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Sandeman (William), The Path of the Sun (Simpkin Marshall)

EDUCATIONAL.

Schmell (Dr. Otto), Text-Book of Zoology. Part II. (A. & C. Black) 3/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

The International Monthly. June and July numbers (Macmillan Com.) 25 cents

NEW EDITIONS.

Emerson (R. W.), Minerva Library: Complete Works (Ward, Lock) 2/9
Guide to Oman, Fort William, and the Western Highlands. 2nd Edition
Guide to Lynton, Lynmouth, Minehead, &c. 3rd Edition. (Ward, Lock) 1/9
Kingsford (W. E.), Assuan as a Health Resort. 2nd Edition (Simpkin Marshall)
Yorke-Davies (N. E.), Health and Condition in the Active and Sedentary. 5th Edition (Sampson Low)
Story of the Nations Series: China. By P. C. R. K. Douglas. 2nd Edition (Fisher Unwin) 5/9
Library of English Classics: Memoirs of Sir Walter Scott. By J. G. Lockhart. Vols. I. and II. (Macmillan) 3/3

* Ambrose Phillips's poem, from which the quotation is taken.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SOUTH WALES and MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The Council invites APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in HISTORY and ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE.

Applications, with testimonials, must be received by the undersigned not later than September 9th, 1900.

Particulars may be obtained on application to
J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Secretary and Registrar.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS.—

ASSISTANT in the NAUTICAL ALMANAC OFFICE of the ADMIRALTY (18-25), 13th SEPTEMBER.—FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.—DRAFTSMAN in the HYDROGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (17-25), 6th SEPTEMBER.

The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

SUPERIOR SCHOOLS for GIRLS.—

Miss LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND High-class BOARDING and DAY SCHOOLS in England and on the Continent.—CENTRAL REGISTRY for TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S

TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION.

Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
24I, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances.
2% when not drawn below £100.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand.
2 1/2%

STOCKS AND SHARES.
Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVESCROFT, Manager.
Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The READING ROOMS will be CLOSED from SATURDAY, September 1st, to WEDNESDAY, September 5th, inclusive, and the READING ROOM from MONDAY, September 3rd, to SATURDAY, September 2nd, inclusive.

E. MAUNDE THOMPSON,
Director and Principal Librarian.
British Museum, August, 1900.

GEORGE HERIOT'S TRUST.

HERIOT WATT COLLEGE.

The Governors are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the office of PRINCIPAL of the HERIOT WATT COLLEGE, EDINBURGH.

The College exists for the purpose of providing Technical and General Education for the Industrial Classes, and the Principal to be appointed shall devote his whole time to the duties of the office.

Subject to the approval of the Governors, the Principal shall exercise a general supervision over the teaching in the College, and shall have under his control the arrangements and hours of classes, and, generally, the whole organisation, discipline, and arrangement of the College.

A copy of the Calendar, which gives full particulars of the various classes, will be supplied on application.

The Principal must be a Graduate of some University of the United Kingdom.

Salary, £750 per annum.

Applications, with thirty copies of Testimonials (limited to fifteen in number), to be lodged with the undersigned on or before 1st September next.

PETER MACNAUGHTON, S.S.C.,
Clerk to the Governors.
20, York Place, Edinburgh,
27th July, 1900.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 26th, 1900—viz., Two Senior Open Scholarships, value £75 each, will be awarded to the best candidates (if of sufficient merit) in not more than three nor fewer than two of the following:—Chemistry, Physics, Zoology, Botany, Physiology, Anatomy.

Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty-one years of age (if of sufficient merit) in not fewer than three of the following:—Botany, Zoology, Physiology, Physics, and Chemistry.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of June, 1900.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc. Examinations of the University of London will commence on October 1st, and continue till July, 1901. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.

Fee for the whole Course, £21, or £18 18s to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Each, 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE of WIGHT.

BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICIELTH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

ABOUT THE MIDDLE OF SEPTEMBER.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Infidel.

New Novel

BY

M. E. BRADDON.

"Miss Braddon the queen of living English novelists."—Daily Telegraph.

"You would travel far before you reached the zone where the name of Braddon failed of its recognition. Miss Braddon is part of England; she has woven herself into it; without her it would be different. This is no mere fanciful conceit. She is in the encyclopedias; she ought to be in the dictionaries, a common noun, for she stands for something which only schoolboys need ask to be defined. So much for her position, in the national regard, to-day."—Academy.

London: SIMPKIN & CO., LIMITED.

NOW READY.—Price SIXPENCE.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

No. 215.—SEPTEMBER, 1900.—8vo.

ONE of OURSELVES. By L. R. WALFORD, Author of "Mr. Smith," &c. Chapters XXV, XXVI.

THE WOMEN of the SALONS.—III. MADEMOISELLE DE LESPINASSE. By S. G. TALLENTYRE.

KINGSHIP in the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By C. E. ROYLE.

BECKY and BITHEY. By M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. FRANCIS BLUNDELL).

A SECOND ESSAY IN DREAMS. By H. G. HUTCHINSON.

IN THE NAME of a WOMAN. By ARTHUR W. MARCHMONT, Author of "By Right of Sword," "A Dash for a Throne," &c. Chapters XX, XXII.

AT THE SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Cloth elegant, price 4s. 6d.

ATTEMPTS IN VERSE.

By CHARLES H. HOOLE,
Student of Christ Church, Oxford.

RIVINGTONS: 34, King Street, Covent Garden, London.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

NOW READY.

THE MASTER CHRISTIAN.

By MARIE CORELLI.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The demand for Miss MARIE CORELLI'S New Romance, THE MASTER CHRISTIAN, continues to exceed all precedent. The first number printed—75,000 Copies—is the largest on record, and Messrs. METHUEN have increased this by 25,000, making in all 100,000 COPIES printed before publication.

Messrs. METHUEN will publish next week A MASTER OF CRAFT, by W. W. JACOBS, with 12 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.; SONS OF THE MORNING, by EDEN PHILLPOTTS, crown 8vo, 6s.; and very shortly, SERVANTS OF SIN, by J. BLOUNDELLE BURTON, crown 8vo, 6s.; and THE FOREST OFFICER, by Mrs. FRANK PENNY, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

The following Novels have just been published, crown 8vo, 6s. each. THE GATELESS BARRIER, by LUCAS MALET; WINEFRED, by S. BARING-GOULD (with illustrations); THE STRONG ARM, by ROBERT BARR; THE SEEN AND THE UNSEEN, by RICHARD MARSH; THE SOFT SIDE, by HENRY JAMES; THE CONQUEST OF LONDON, by DOROTHEA GERARD; PATH AND GOAL, by ADA CAMBRIDGE; FOR BRITAIN'S SOLDIERS. Stories for the War Fund, by RUDYARD KIPLING, and Others. Second Edition. Edited by C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE. FITZJAMES, by LILIAN STREET. 3s. 6d.

"ENGLISH NELL."

SIMON DALE. By ANTHONY HOPE. Illustrated. Third Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition in the Press.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE WALKERS OF SOUTHGATE: being the Chronicles of a Cricketing Family. By W. A. BETTES-WORTH. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s.

DARTMOOR: a Descriptive and Historical Sketch. By S. BARING-GOULD. With Plans and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SIEGE OF MAFEKING. By J. ANGUS HAMILTON. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This is a vivid, accurate, and humorous narrative of the great siege by the well-known correspondent of The Times.

[Next week.

CHINA. By J. W. ROBERTSON-SCOTT. With a Map. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[Immediately.

This book of 200 pages contains a complete account of the history, races, government, religion, social life, army, commerce, and attitude to foreigners of the Chinese.

THE RELIEF OF MAFEKING. By FILSON YOUNG. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Immediately.

This book gives a spirited and vigorous account of the work accomplished by Mahon's flying column and its relief of Mafeking. It also relates the defeat of Colonel Villebois and his death, at which episode Mr. Young was the only correspondent present.

WITH THE BOER FORCES. By HOWARD C. HILLEGAS. With 24 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This highly interesting book is a narrative of the episodes of the Boer war by a correspondent with the Boer army. Mr. Hillegas was present at many of the most exciting and most dramatic episodes of the war. He was with the force which attempted to relieve Cronje at Paardeberg, was present during a considerable part of the siege of Ladysmith, at the battle of Colenso, at the surprise of Sanna's Post. His book, written with dramatic vigour, is a spirited description of the Boer methods, of their military strength, and contains vivid character-sketches of most of the Boer leaders, with whom Mr. Hillegas was on terms of fairly intimate friendship.

WRIT' IN BARRACKS. By EDGAR WALLACE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Mr. Edgar Wallace, a member of the Royal Army Medical Corps, is a follower of Mr. Kipling, and his ballads of soldier life and sufferings are well known in South Africa. They are spirited, pathetic, and true, and at the present time they should enjoy a considerable popularity.

THE LITTLE GUIDES.—Pott 8vo, cloth, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. By G. E. TROUTBECK. Illustrated by F. D. Bedford.

SUSSEX. By F. G. BRABANT, M.A. Illustrated by E. H. New.

[Shortly.

AGRICULTURAL ZOOLOGY. By Dr. J. RITZEMA BOS. Translated by J. R. AINSWORTH DAVIS, M.A.

With an Introduction by ELEANOR A. ORMEROD, F.E.S. With 155 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, W.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOTICE.—Mr. J. M. BARRIE'S
New Novel, TOMMY and GRIZEL, will be published in the early autumn. Price 6s.

Q's NEW WORK.

Mr. A. T. QUILLER COUCH'S
New Volume of Stories will be published under the Title of OLD FIRES and PROFIT-ABLE GHOSTS. Price 6s.

NOW READY, price 5s.

LANDSCAPE PAINTING in WATER-COLOURS. By J. MacWHIRTER,
R.A. With 23 Coloured Plates.

"With the sketches to refer to, Mr. MacWhirter's precepts and hints, based upon long and varied practice, will be completely intelligible to the veriest beginner, and the student who follows his directions will find that many apparently formidable difficulties can be easily surmounted. The book also includes an introductory chapter by Mr. Edwin Bale."—Globe.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 1s.

THE WALLACE COLLECTION at HERTFORD HOUSE. Being Notes on the Pictures and other Works of Art, with Special Reference to the History of their Acquisition.
By M. H. SPIELMANN, Editor of the Magazine of Art. With numerous Illustrations.

CHEAP EDITION NOW READY, price 6s., of
THE NEW FAR EAST. By ARTHUR DIÓSY, Vice-Chairman of Council of the Japan Society, London. With a new Introduction by the Author, giving his conclusions in regard to China as a result of his recent visit to the East.

"All who want to gain a practical knowledge of China and Japan, and the various inner workings that have preceded the present crisis, should read Mr. Diósy's work; and the ease and brightness of his style invest even the driest of statistics with interest."—World.

Sixpenny Editions of Celebrated Novels.

THE MAN in BLACK. By STANLEY WEYMAN. [Ready shortly.]

FATHER STAFFORD. By ANTHONY HOPE. [Now ready.]

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION BROUGHT DOWN TO THE LATEST DATE.

Messrs. CASSELL & CO. have the pleasure to announce the publication of a

NEW EDITION in FORTNIGHTLY PARTS
price SIXPENCE,

OF THEIR GREAT SERIAL,

THE QUEEN'S EMPIRE.

The First Edition, published in the year of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, had a larger sale than that obtained by any similar work. The New Edition, which is now about to appear, has been most carefully revised by Mr. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P., and a number of New Pictures illustrating the growth of the Empire in recent years have been added to it. There is no other work extant that can compare with this for the completeness of its representation of the British Empire in all its manifold features.

Part I. ready SEPT. 19.

Orders now received by all Booksellers.

A LIST of NEW and FORTHCOMING
VOLUMES for the Season will be sent free on application to

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED,
Ludgate Hill, London.

FOR the SECOND and CONCLUDING PART of CAPTAIN HALDANE'S

"HOW WE ESCAPED FROM PRETORIA,"

See

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE

For SEPTEMBER. Price 2s. 6d.

OF THE FIRST PART OF THE NARRATIVE

The Spectator says: "It is as exciting a narrative as anything in Dumas."

Punch says: "Since he read 'Monte Cristo' my Baronite has not come upon anything more stirring."

The Number also contains:

THE VALLEY OF ENCHANTMENT. By Sir HERBERT MAXWELL.

AFTER WILLIAMS IN MANITOBA. By C. HANBURY-WILLIAMS.

LORD JIM: A SKETCH. By JOSEPH CONRAD.

RODDY MOR THE ROVER. By AUTHOR OF "FATHER O'LENN."

CHINA. I SOME NEEDS OF THE NAVY.

THE OLD GOLF AND THE NEW.

MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD.

THE WAR OPERATIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA: X.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

ON SEPTEMBER THE NINETEENTH.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Infidel.

New Novel

By M. E. BRADDON.

London: SIMPKIN & CO., LIMITED.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S LIST.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE SECOND EDITION OF

AN EYE FOR AN EYE:

A Mystery.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX,
Author of "Wiles of the Wicked."

"Well told, and holds the interest from the first chapter to the last."—Black and White.

"Full of verve and sharply realised incident."

The Academy.

"Mr. Le Queux excels in invention."—The Globe.

A ROMANCE OF ANARCHY.

BROTHERS of the CHAIN.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,
Author of "Briton or Boer?"

THE GODDESS: a Demon.

By RICHARD MARSH,
Author of "The Beetle," "In Full Cry," &c.

The SHIELD of his HONOUR

By RICHARD HENRY SAVAGE,
Author of "My Official Wife," &c.

THE FLICK OF FORTUNE.

By THOMAS PARKES.

F. V. WHITE & CO.,
14, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Cloth elegant, price 4s. 6d.

ATTEMPTS IN VERSE.

By CHARLES H. HOOLE,
Student of Christ Church, Oxford.

RIVINGTONS: 34, King Street, Covent Garden, London.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

CHINA. CHINA. CHINA.

THE LONG-LIVED EMPIRE.

By ELIZA R. SCIDMORE.

With a Portrait of the Empress-Dowager and over 50 other Illustrations.

Extra crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"The most brilliant and interesting picture of the long-lived Empire we are acquainted with.... Her knowledge is great, her power of pictorial writing remarkable, and her style is full of light and grace."

70,000 Copies

Have been Sold in England and America

JAMES LANE ALLEN'S NEW NOVEL,

Author of "The Choir Invisible" (213th Thousand).
Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

The Increasing Purpose.

A Tale of the Kentucky Hemp-Fields.

A FRIEND OF CÆSAR.

A Tale of the Fall of the Roman Republic.

By WILLIAM S. DAVIS.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

THE WEB OF LIFE.

By ROBERT HERRICK.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

World.—"A powerful story."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for SEPTEMBER.

- 1.—ANTHONY'S FORTUNE. By ARTHUR BECKFORD. Conclusion.
- 2.—A STUDY in the PERSIAN APPARATUS. By WILFRID SPARROY.
- 3.—IMPRESSIONS OF KLONDIKE. By C. C. OSBORNE. I.
- 4.—THE TALE of a TUSKER.
- 5.—A GIRL-GRADUATE of SPAIN.
- 6.—THE SONGS of ERIN. By A. P. GRAVES.
- 7.—THE CORSCAN at HOME. By CHARLES EDWARDS.
- 8.—A CLOISTER LILY.
- 9.—MADAME GRAND. By J. J. COTTON.
- 10.—A NEW POLITICAL ERA. By C. B. ROYLANCE KENT.

NOW READY.—Price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

Contents of No. 478, for SEPTEMBER.

Opening Chapters of a New Story by RIODA BROUGHTON, entitled POES IN LAW.

- 2.—MILTON as SEEN in his SONNETS.
- 3.—A FRIEND of MASTER FRANCIS.
- 4.—A BATCH of FAMOUS LOVE-LETTERS.
- 5.—THE GARDENER'S DAUGHTER.
- 6.—LA MER DOUCE.
- 7.—THE GUNNER TRIUMPHANT.
- 8.—A COURT BEAUTY.
- 9.—CORBAN. By CONSTANCE SMITH. Conclusion.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post
free, 16s.

The SEPTEMBER NUMBER contains—
THE INFLUENCE of the WESTERN WORLD on CHINA.
By D. Z. SHEFFIELD, D.D.
THE REVOLUTION in CHINA and its CAUSES. By R. VAN BUREN.
THE THAMES from WAPPING to BLACKWALL. By Sir
WALTER BESANT. Pictures by PHIL MAY and JOSEPH PENNELL.
AMUSEMENTS of the PARIS EXPOSITION.—II. Theatres,
Panoramas, and other Spectacles. By JEAN SCHOFFER.
Pictures by ANDRÉ CASTAGNE.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The SEPTEMBER NUMBER contains:—
THE IMP and the ANGEL. Story. By JOSEPHINE DASKAL.
A BOAST FULFILLED. Jingle. By TUDOR JENKS.
PRETTY POLLY PERKINS. Serial. By GABRIELLE
JACKSON.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1478. Established 1869.

1 September, 1900.

Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE hitherto unpublished extracts from the Journal of Marie Bashkirtseff, now appearing in the Gentlewoman, begin with an entry in October, 1883—a date only some twelve months before the writer's death. It is, perhaps, hardly to be expected that any fresh traits of character will be revealed. Rather we may look for renewed poignancies in the expression of a nature whose vast ambitions could not find activities enough to satisfy it, and which was conscious that soon all activities must cease.

To-day I commence the model of my statue. I work now like a primitive; I am forced to invent the means. What I fear is to fall ill—I cannot breathe; I do not feel strong, and I am growing thin. At last this terrible malady is certain. I am consumptive. I would that it were imaginary . . . but, alas!

There is the old candour in her vanity. Take this:

I come in to dress; there is a little dinner this evening. I amuse myself in my hair-dressing. Instead of disordering it I leave the forehead frankly uncovered. Amid all these carefully draped heads it is a charming novelty. The hair twisted on top of the head and spreading naturally, and this magnificent brow, of which I did not suspect either the beauty or the nobleness, change me altogether. I become of an imposing candour; it seems to me that I am pontifical, or that I am descending from a throne.

There is also the occasional bathos inseparable from diaries. Writing of a day in the forest of Meudon, she permits herself to set down the feeble commonplace: "Nature is, indeed, beautiful." Perhaps a greater bathos is achieved by the appearance of this journal intime in the Gentlewoman. For it is strange to find the confessions of a tortured soul mixed up with millinery, "cosy corner chat," and "the Romney teagown I have imagined for you." But such is editorial enterprise.

WE are not surprised to find that the authorship of Elizabeth and Her German Garden and A Solitary Summer is now disclaimed, on behalf of Princess Henry of Pless, by the Daily Chronicle. Our contemporary's exact words are:

We are asked to contradict the rumour, of which so much has been heard, that the books Elizabeth and Her German Garden and A Solitary Summer are by Princess Henry of Pless. This request comes to us from an authoritative source, and is to be accepted in that sense. Now for the next pretty bubble to give some colour to a drab literary world!

We have pleasure in offering a "bubble" to fill the vacancy. A correspondent writes to us from St. Moritz-Bad, Engadine: "I am minded to demolish the foolish fable that the Princess Henry of Pless did or could write Elizabeth and Her German Garden. The authoress is the Countess Arnim, an Australian, married to the son of the famous ambassador whose encounters with Bismarck are matters of history. This you may accept as positive—not the invention of any New York Critic."

M. EUGÈNE RIGAL has issued from the house of Oudin, Paris, a study of Victor Hugo as an epic poet. It is a subject over which critics have made war: some have maintained that Hugo was incapable of the balance which the epic undoubtedly demands, others that in the epic he found himself. M. Rigal steers a middle course, concluding that Hugo was a great epic poet, sometimes in spite, sometimes almost by reason of, his faults. It is a dignified and worthy study of one side of a colossal figure in literature.

POOR Goldie! They now think of erecting a canopy over his flat tombstone in the Temple. The present tombstone was not supplied until 1860, and it is not even certain that it was then laid over the right spot. Goldsmith's biographer, John Forster, who, according to a correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, made diligent search in 1853, was not satisfied that he had found Goldsmith's true resting-place. Under these circumstances the idea of a canopy becomes less attractive, although, one confesses, it would be in keeping with Goldsmith's plum-coloured suit. Fortunately the Westminster Abbey bust of Goldsmith by Nollekens, placed in a spot chosen by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and graced by Dr. Johnson's Latin lines, is a satisfactory monument to the man who—as Mr. Zangwill has well remarked—wrote a poem that lives, a novel that lives, and a play that lives.

TALKING of men and monuments, what of Byron? An annual protest is made in the Times, on the anniversary of his death, against the exclusion of his name from the marbles of the Abbey. But not here alone may the literary pilgrim expect some recognition of Byron's fame, and find none. In a capital article on Byron's Letters in last week's Pilot, Mr. Everard Hopkins remarks:

At Oxford you may turn aside from the everyday sights and sounds of the street into a little temple of silence within the precincts of University College, where our greatest living sculptor has given an immortality in marble to the dead body of Shelley, unmarred by any sea change and cast up here by the tide of time. Around the dome that overarches his bier his own words, traced in letters of gold, catch and lose the softened light of the English day. The unquiet spirit of Byron still waits at the portals of his Alma Mater for such a welcome and for such a shrine.

TOPOGRAPHY, in our day, has ceased to be a record of facts solely, and has concerned itself with "the spirit of place." The facts must be seen through the personal medium—take colour from the point of view. A novelist will take infinite pains, not only to be accurate in niceties of detail, but also to inform his detail with the subtleties of his theme. This may, of course, be overdone, and a book become a mere landscape with figures; but the tendency is one greatly to the advantage of true art. Topography is too vital to be a mere thing of names and dates. Those who remember Mr. Henry James's Portraits of Places will welcome the announcement from Mr. Heinemann of A Little Tour in France from the same pen. The book is to be a personal record of journeyings in Touraine, and will be fully illustrated by Mr. Joseph Pennell.

THE Outlook continues to deal with the "canons and standards" which should govern the criticism of novels. To last week's issue Mr. John Long contributes a long and good article, in which he insists on the necessity for knowledge in the reviewer:

All criticism worthy of the name is comparative. The competent critic should have a thorough knowledge of all the masterpieces of literature, and he ought to know what it is in them that has caused them to become masterpieces. When he reviews any book, he ought to see as in a vision all that has been yet accomplished on the lines followed out by the writer; and he should, above all things, be a perfect grammarian himself and a master of literary analysis. Of how many of the multitudinous reviewers of to-day can it be justly said that they come up to this definition? Half of them know next to nothing about literature as a concrete whole, and they bring not knowledge, but ignorance, and its resultant, prejudice, to bear on the work before them, even when otherwise they happen to be honest. To illustrate my meaning, to review properly such a book as Conan Doyle's White Company, the reviewer ought to be perfectly well acquainted with everything of any consequence that has been done in Historical romance. In a word, we want knowledge above all things in the reviewer. This is recognised in everything else.

A CORRESPONDENT of the same paper supplies the following recent example of the "jargon of criticism," and challenges his readers to supply the missing words:

—'s new story, "—," would alone suffice to establish — reputation among the very best of our novelists, whose works English readers would not willingly let die. This story of "—" is simply charming. It is true to life, genuinely humorous, and powerfully pathetic. — is worthy to march side by side with our dear old "Cod Colonel," Thomas Newcome. Than this no higher praise can be bestowed.

MR. ANDREW LANG does not share Mr. Arthur Symonds's admiration of the work of a certain young poet, lately deceased. Writing in the New York Critic, Mr. Lang asks: "What is a 'decadent,' in the literary sense of the word?" and replies: "I am apt to believe that he is an unwholesome young person who has read about 'ages of decadence' in histories of literature, likes what he is told about them, and tries to die down to it, with more or less success." Turning to the most recent example of such a life, Mr. Lang says:

In the Fortnightly Review for June appears an article on a young gentleman recently dead, whom I shall call X. We learn that X. "was undoubtedly a man of genius"—in the decadent line, I venture to presume. The songs of poor X are "evasive immaterial snatches," expressive of "a life which had itself so much of the swift, disastrous, and suicidal impetus of genius." Without having read all X's poems, and with only a fragment or two, in the Fortnightly article, before me as examples, I express no opinion about the genius of X. Only it does not seem to be made very manifest unto men. Little imitative things, sad épaves of a life wasted on ideals out of Murger and Baudelaire; old, old, outworn fallacies, and follies, and affectations, these appear to be what is left. The story is a worn piece of pathos. The ideas of life on which X ruined himself have been the ideas of hundreds of boys, of whom the majority laugh at their past selves in a year or two. If this kind of existence, if these sorts of productions, be decadent, surely even boys must see that decadence is rather a mistake. With all its faults, there is more to be said for muscular Christianity. However, on this head one need not preach to the Anglo-Saxon race, which is already converted.

A NOTED Sydney writer, Mrs. Julian Ashton, of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, died on July 15. Few among the many Australian literary women have attained greater distinction in her own life than Mrs. Ashton. Her keen analysis of books and writers in the "Literature columns" of the Telegraph was regarded by all book lovers as among the bright features of Colonial journalism. Her enthusiasm spent itself on such men as Ibsen, Ruskin, and Browning; but for others her probing criticism was yet tempered by kindly feeling and a just appreciation of the many points of view. Her late work has been entirely critical, though some years ago she contributed many finely written social essays above the signature of "Faustine" to the columns of the Metropolitan Press. The deceased lady was the wife of Julian Ashton, the best known among Sydney artists. Her age was forty-five.

IN the September Windsor Magazine Mr. Harry Golding deals with the finance of literary shrines. Burns brings a deal of "siller" to his native Mauchline:

In 1881 the Burns Cottage and about seven acres were purchased by the Monument Trustees for £1 000. A charge of twopence is made for admission. In the year ending September, 1898, the number of visitors was 36,500, only some 1,700 short of the number in 1896, the centenary of the poet's death. The numbers visiting the monument at Alloway were even greater, amounting to 49,589. For years past the annual total has always been well above 40,000. In July, 1898, there were no less than 2 558 in one day!

ARTEMUS WARD, it will be remembered, pronounced Shakespeare's tomb to be "a success." Apparently, it is precisely that. Mr. Golding's Stratford-on-Avon statement is long, but sufficiently interesting to quote:

It appears that in twelve months the total number of visitors to the Birthplace was 26,510. An admission fee of sixpence a head is charged, which yields the respectable sum of £662 15s. But this fee only entitles one to see the room in which Shakespeare was born, almost every inch of which is now scrawled over with the signatures of more or less famous men—mostly less; to inspect the room at the back, where a portrait of the poet is religiously screened, and to pass through the quaint old kitchen, with its open fireplace, where the poet may or may not have baked his chestnuts in the days of youth. To see the adjoining museum, with its many interesting curios, another sixpence has to be paid, and we find that about two-thirds of these visiting the Birthplace, or, to be exact, 16,539, also visited the museum. This gives us an additional £413 9s. 6d. Next in importance to the Birthplace is the beautifully situated church of the Holy Trinity, beneath the chancel of which Shakespeare is buried. The church is, of course, under the care of the Vicar, an enthusiastic Shakespearian, and the figures are not included in the Trustees' report. But a reliable estimate gives the number of annual visitors, apart from ordinary worshippers, as 23,000. A great number of these no doubt respond to the Vicar's appeal for help in the restoration and beautification of the church; but reckoning only the admission fees at sixpence a head we get the sum of £575. Within sight of the church, and also on the banks of the Avon, stands the Shakespeare Memorial. Now, it is somewhat curious to notice that of the 26,000 odd persons visiting the Birthplace only 13,085 or less than half, took the trouble to visit the Memorial. The fact is to be regretted, though it hardly concerns us here. 13,085 at sixpence brings us in another £327 2s. 6d. The house, New Place, to which Shakespeare retired when fortune had smiled upon him, was razed to the ground in 1759, and to-day only the carefully preserved foundations can be seen. This probably accounts for the fact that not more than 474 persons paid for admission, though the fee of sixpence includes admission to the adjoining museum, Nash's House, where a number of curios illustrating the customs and manners of the seventeenth century are to be seen. New Place, therefore, contributes only the insignificant sum of £11 17s. Ann Hathaway's cottage at Shottery, where the poet went a-wooing, is about a mile from the town, and is reached by a pleasant footpath. The cottage was recently purchased by the Birthplace Trustees for £3,000, and their report gives the number of visitors as 10,489, which at sixpence each yields £262 4s. 6d. Stratford, therefore, derives an annual income from admission fees alone of considerably more than £2,000.

MR. SYDNEY C. COCKERELL's suggestion, in Tuesday's Times, that the medallion portrait of Ruskin should be placed in the Turner room in the National Gallery, or in some other portion of that building, strikes us as very worthy of consideration. There the monument would seem at home, and it would derive interest, and the right suggestiveness, from its environment.

THERE is a very readable "Life Story of Rudyard Kipling" in the current Young Man. We have not met with the following story before, and if we had we should be inclined to quote it just the same:

One day, when Mr. Kipling was at work in his study in London, a gentleman opened the door. He had with him two schoolboys. Dialogue:

"Is this Rudyard Kipling?"

"Yes."

"Boys, this is Rudyard Kipling."

"And is this where you write?"

"Yes."

"Boys, this is where he writes."

"And before I had time to ask them to take a seat," says Mr. Kipling, "they were gone."

That is fame—proof, hall-mark, and all.

LAST week there appeared in the newspapers, under the title "Conan Doyle His Own Critic," an extract from a letter received from Dr. Doyle by a "literary admirer," who appears to have lost no time in communicating the letter to the press. The letter contained an interesting comparison by Dr. Doyle between his earlier and later work. Unfortunately, its publication was not desired by Dr. Doyle, who has protested against the use thus made of a private letter. We refrain, therefore, from any further indication of the trend of Dr. Doyle's self-criticism.

WHAT are our legislators reading in their holidays? We do not know, but Truth gives the following particulars on its own authority:

LORD SALISBURY: Retirement.—William Cowper.

LORD ROSEBURY: Quite Alone.—George Augustus Sala.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: Under which Lord? (Salisbury or Rosebery).—Mrs. Lynn Linton; Now or Never.—Richard Baxter.

LORD LANSDOWNE: The Secret Despatch.—James Grant.

LORD LONDONDERRY: Little Messengers.—George Mogeridge (Peter Parley).

MR. WALTER LONG: A Dog and his Shadow.—Robert Francillon.

SIR ELLIS ASHMEAD BARTLETT: The Myrrour of Modestie.—Robert Greene.

MR. CECIL RHODES: The Story of a Mine.—Bret Harte.

A contemporary makes several additions to this list, the best being:

MR. HALL CAINE: The Christian.—Hall Caine.

A LIBRARIAN contributes to the Publishers' Circular some amusing "Stray Thoughts of Humour from a Library Counter." His best reminiscences are these:

One dear soul once came in brimful of a desire to obtain a book that a friend had recommended—"a beautiful book, too"—but the title and author's name were a myth to her; all she knew about it was that it was about Monday. Repeated solicitation made her waver nothing; she was sure it wasn't about Tuesday or Wednesday, or any other day of the week. The poor mortal serving her did his best, but the book on "Monday," author unknown, came not to his mind, and the lady went her way sorrowful. A few days later, in she came, her countenance radiant as a sunlit poppy in a cornfield, and the librarian knew, with an instinctive thrill of delight, that the title was found which had been lost—it was Gloria Mundi! Another great source of fun is to be found among that class of subscriber, full of gush and with the instinct of the littérature oozing, so to speak, from their very fingertips, who can't read Marion Crawford, you know, because they really can't read books written by women, and who speak of Sydney Grier and John Strange Winter as "he." One could pass these trifling errors over were the joke not accentuated by their feivd declarations, to any stranger whom they deem fit subjects for their confidences, that their knowledge of authors, publishers' tricks, and book-sellers' little ways is wide and accurate.

THE New York Critic for August publishes a translation of Gabriele D'Annunzio's Hymns to the Heavens, the Sea, the Earth, and to Heroes. They are a little vague, these Hymns, a little laboured and elementary: the voice is too shrill. We quote from "The Miracle":

And from the summit of the heavens to the foundations of the Sea

resounded, flashed the solar word:

"Great Pan is not dead!"

The hair upon my head, the blood within my veins thrilled; the woods,

the standing grain, the waters, rocks, hearth-fires, flowers,
wild beasts.

"Great Pan is not dead!"

All things created trembled like a single leaf, like a single water-drop, a single spark,

at the lightning and the thunder of the word:

"Great Pan is not dead!"

THE Syriac Gospel discovered by Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson in 1892 in St. Katharine's Monastery on Mount Sinai was very carefully photographed by these ladies; and now, at the instance of Mr. H. R. Allenson, five copies of these photographs have been made up in book form, handsomely bound in parchment. Mr. Allenson kindly called at this office to show us a copy of the venerable pages covered with Syriac writing, of which the half-erased portion, the palimpsest, is a Syriac Gospel of the fifth century. We are surprised that the demand for these beautiful photographs has not necessitated a larger number of prints. One copy has gone to the Rylands Library at Manchester, one to the Westminster (Presbyterian) College at Cambridge, one to the University of Halle, and the remaining two copies are in the possession of Mrs. Lewis and Mr. Allenson.

AN entirely new "two-version" edition of the Bible will be published next month by Mr. Henry Frowde, Oxford University Press. The Authorised Version has been printed with all the differences of the Revised Version placed in the side margins, so that both texts can be read from the same page, while in the centre column are the indispensable marginal references. The Bishop of Gloucester, in a preface, remarks that this convenient and carefully-arranged combination of the two versions in one clearly-printed single volume of very moderate size will be welcomed by all students, and especially by all teachers; and he points out that the difficulties which have hitherto prevented the use of the Revised Version to the extent that might have been expected have been successfully overcome in the new edition. When the simple plan followed by the printers has been mastered, every difference between the two versions, including even punctuation, can be recognised with readiness and certitude. The "two-version" edition will be procurable with or without the Oxford Helps to the Study of the Bible.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Spectator tells a "new" good story of Tennyson. A lady sitting next to him at dinner referred to his lines—

Birds in the high Hall-garden

When twilight was falling,

Maud, Maud, Maud, Maud,

They were crying and calling.

"Beautiful description," said she; "one can almost hear the nightingales singing." "Nonsense, Madam," retorted Tennyson, in his abrupt manner, "they were rooks—rooks!"

THE JURORS of the Paris Exhibition have awarded a Grand Prix to the collective exhibit of books organised by the Publishers' Association, with the assistance of Sir E. Maunde Thompson, K.C.B., and Mr. F. Macmillan, for the Liberal Arts Sub-Committee of the Royal British Commission.

WE are glad to see that the sorry spectacle which Fleet-street has presented in the recent Chinese crisis is being noted, and its lessons made plain. To the Times correspondence on this subject "An Old Journalist" contributes some blunt truths. He says:

To-day the fact that a statement has been made by the papers justifies the inquiry whether there is any foundation for it; while, if it has appeared on a contents bill, it is at once dismissed as fiction. . . . The real disease is the mania for sensation—the apparent utter indifference of the greater portion of the public as to whether news is true or false, providing it be exciting. . . . I know reporters who have lost employment, not because they were inaccurate, but, on the contrary, because they were accurate, because they confined themselves to facts, because, in the words of an editor, "you utterly fail to show any imagination in your reports." The faculty of invention, of imagination, is thus deliberately encouraged by men who while they would be incapable of untruth in their own utterances, are too often willing to accept and to publish with their authority "good copy."

It is certain that editors recognise and deplore this state of things. The root of the evil is competition, which forces them into practices they abhor. What is needed is a code of procedure in dealing with news.

A HANDBOOK to the wonderful Wallace collection in Hertford House is already before the public from the pen of Mr. M. H. Spielmann. The book does not attempt a critical estimate of the works exhibited, although Mr. Spielmann says wise things by the way; its main object is to present pedigrees, comparative prices, and collector's facts. Messrs. Cassell publish the volume, which is illustrated.

Bibliographical.

EVERYTHING comes to those that wait—even a memorial slab on the houses which they have inhabited in this life. Of course they have to die first, and they must have done something notable at some time or other; but the slab will arrive in due course. The fact that Joanna Baillie lived in one house at Hampstead for nearly fifty years is now commemorated in this way; and one may hope that thereby her shade is compensated for the neglect into which she has fallen since her decease in 1851. Every one recalls Byron's dictum that "Woman, save Joanna Baillie, cannot write tragedy," and some may recall Miss Mitford's remark—"That Mrs. Joanna is a true dramatist, as well as a great poet, I, for one, can never doubt." Poor Miss Mitford! Her dramas are as dead as those of the woman she thus absurdly praised. What play by "Mrs. Joanna" lingers on the stage? What poem by "Mrs. Joanna" has found an abiding place even in anthologies? Her poems and plays are both buried for ever in the one-volume edition published in 1853.

In a "publisher's note" to the book on Norway just added to the "Story of the Nations" series, a short account is given of the life of the late author—Mr. H. H. Borgsen. Mr. Borgsen was a Norwegian who went early to America and mastered English, in which he wrote a number of works. I find that nine or ten of these have been issued in England by English publishers, while about a dozen others have been circulated over here through Anglo-American agencies. Of those which have had an English imprint, the following, I take it, are the best known: Tales from Two Hemispheres, a History of Norway (1886), Against Heavy Odds (1890), Essays in German Literature (1892), Boyhood in Norway (1893), The Works of Ibsen (1894), Essays in Scandinavian Literature (1895), and Norseland Tales (1895). Mr. Borgsen wrote fiction as well as criticism, and on the subject of Ibsen in particular he is well worth reading.

The simultaneous presentation of Charles II. on the boards of two London theatres should do something to create interest in the monograph on the witty but unwise king which we are to have before long from the pen of Mr. Osmund Airey. Mr. Airey is already well known as a writer on historical subjects. In 1886 he issued a list of Books on English History, which was followed two years later by a work on The English Restoration and Louis XIV. In 1892 he brought out a Text-Book of English History in three volumes, and in 1897 he edited a part of Burnet's History of My Own Times. As the biographer of Charles II. he has had few predecessors. The two-volume work on The Merry Monarch, which appeared in 1885, was avowedly popular in design and treatment, aiming at being readable more than anything else. In these cases it is difficult to know whether to deal with the king as man or as monarch—whether to dwell upon his personality or to enter upon a comprehensive review of his reign. The former is certainly the more engaging, if not in every respect the better, way.

The promised authentic narrative of the life of Paul Jones—otherwise John Paul—will certainly be acceptable. To most people he is known only, or almost only, as the central figure of Fenimore Cooper's novel, The Pilot. Very few seem to recollect that he was also the subject of a romance by Allan Cunningham, called Paul Jones—a tale stigmatised by James Hannay as "very bad." Not many more appear to be aware that Jones, or Paul, was an historical personage, and to these his adventures under the American, Russian, and French flags will come with delightful freshness. Meanwhile, however excellent the coming biography may be, it will always be by The Pilot that Jones will be longest and best remembered.

It will be pleasant to make acquaintance with M. Taine's notes on his visit to Scotland. His Notes on England, as translated by Mr. Fraser Rae, had a wide circulation here in the early eighties, reaching an eighth edition in 1885. There have also been English translations of his Journeys through France, his Revolution, his Modern Régime, his History of English Literature. This last, one remembers, was more suggestive than convincing. His comparison between Tennyson and De Musset was particularly futile.

Mr. Andrew Lang does not show much inventiveness in the titles of his Fairy Books. He is content to go on using up the names of the colours. He began, if I remember rightly, in 1889, with a Blue Fairy Book; then, in 1890, came the Red; in 1892, the Green; in 1894, the Yellow; and, in 1897, the Pink. Now we are to have the Grey! And the thing will go on, I suppose, until even Mr. Lang cannot find any more fairy stories to exploit—or any more colours.

A new volume from the pen of the "Amateur Angler" (Mr. Edward Marston) is always welcome, and his forthcoming book, An Old Man's Holiday, is sure of a hearty reception from a large section of the public. It was, I think, in 1884 that Mr. Marston first figured as an author, giving us his Amateur Angler's Days in Dove Dale. Then, in 1890, came his account of How Stanley Wrote His "Darkest Africa," and, in 1896, his second book of angling memories—By Meadow and Stream.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Criticism of Criticism.

Judgment in Literature. By W. Basil Worsfold. (J. M. Dent & Co. 1s.)

MR. WORSFOLD'S book deserves commendation for its subject-matter, if it does not contain much that is absolutely new. It is a thorough and thoughtful attempt to trace the progress of criticism, and harmonise the results obtained by modern critics so as to obtain a united teaching. Much labour has obviously been expended on the effort; and if Mr. Worsfold's conclusions do not always (as we think) go down to bed-rock, they are certainly worth examination. His greatest drawback (and it is an unfortunate one) is that he lacks the perspicuity, precision, and conciseness of expression so eminently desirable in treating subject-matter itself abstract and not easy to follow. His style is deplorably awkward, long-winded, verbose, and circumlocutory. It is less important, for his aims, that his literary taste does not always show itself of the finest order. There is, perhaps, somewhat too profuse a repetition, but this is a fault on the right side where the matter is not readily grasped.

We do not much love Mr. Worsfold's opening. He persistently uses the real as equivalent to the phenomenal, and such-like laxities of diction. The best done part of his book is, perhaps, the review of criticism from Plato to Victor Cousin, though its most important part is naturally that dealing with modern critical methods. From Plato, he shows, we derive the principle that art and morality are interdependent; also that truth (correspondence of the representation with the thing represented) is the chief merit of a work of art. Aristotle gives us much, notably the view that creative work presents universal rather than particular truth, the explanation and justification of tragedy; and those structural rules now set aside, with the corollary that structural perfection is the test of artistic excellence. For this Addison substituted the modern test of imaginative appeal, which was worked out in detail by Lessing and Victor Cousin. Particularly valuable is Cousin's principle that art is "the unconscious criticism of nature by the human mind," which rejects and selects among nature's facts. This is idealisation.

Many criticisms might be offered on portions of Mr. Worsfold's conclusions. Let us merely say that he is hasty in concluding from Plato's principle (above mentioned) that "the great artist must be a good man." The history of art refutes this. But he must aspire after good, in his best nature (which finds vent in his work), however his actual life may fall below his aspirations. And habitual failure to correspond in life with his ideals will ultimately react upon his power of noble work, though not at once. The flower blossoms in water long after it is severed from its nutrient root.

Descending to contemporary criticism, Mr. Worsfold declares that the judgment of literature by formal technical tests (after the manner of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries) is practically disused. "The practice of attempting verdicts upon new works of literature is still maintained in the ordinary criticism of the journals, but while there is much that is often both unbiassed and enlightened in these criticisms, it is well understood that the writers of these reviews or notices do not claim to give a binding verdict," anything but superficial criticism being prevented by the conditions of such writing. He goes, therefore, to the deliberate critics, and recalls certain principles at which they have arrived.

Wordsworth laid down the law that an original writer "creates the taste by which he must be enjoyed," and that the giving of pleasure by appeal to the imagination of the ordinary intelligent man is the test of creative excellence—a test outside any technical rule of judgment.

Matthew Arnold enunciated the principle that poetry is a "criticism of life," which is really involved in Cousin's statement that it is a "criticism of nature." The test, therefore, of poetry, says Arnold, is its interpretative power, appealing to the whole man (his emotional no less than intellectual nature), in which it is superior to science, which appeals solely to the intellect. With this go the conditions that there should be the "high seriousness" of absolute sincerity, and that it should be in conformity with essential morality. It must satisfy "the general sense of mankind as embodied in the principles of morality." Ruskin emphasises this last principle with regard to all creative art. It is the finished expression "of the joy or grief of noble persons for right causes." Again: "The fineness of the possible art is an index of the moral purity and majesty of the emotion it expresses." Swinburne lays down the opposite principle of "art for art's sake." Mr. Worsfold quotes Mrs. Browning as agreeing with him:

Whoever writes good poetry
Looks just to art.

But from another passage he quotes, asserting that poets are

The only speakers of essential truth,
Opposed to relative, comparative,
And temporal truths . . .
The only teachers who instruct mankind
From just a shadow on a charnel-wall,
To find man's veritable stature out,
Erect, sublime—the measure of a man;

it is clear that Mrs. Browning includes in "art" the element of moral nobility, and therefore is really at one with Ruskin. And when Mr. Worsfold opposes to Ruskin the maxim that moral worth cannot of itself endow a poet's work "with the characteristic charm of art," it must be answered that Ruskin never affirms so. He says that the nobility of art is determined by moral worth—"the fineness of the possible art," fineness here being manifestly equivalent to "nobility." "No vain or selfish person can possibly paint," he says again (somewhat too sweepingly), "in the noble sense of the word." And this is the true reconciliation of these opposing principles. Morality is not the principle of art; but, given the artistic spirit and adequacy of execution, the nobler the informing ethics the loftier the work of art. The Epithalamium of Spenser transcends the exquisite Epithalamium of Catullus largely by Spenser's beautiful austerity of ethical spirit. Mr. Worsfold's endeavour after reconciliation is not too definite or convincing, not easy to lay hold on. He takes his definition of morality from Matthew Arnold (a lax interpretation of Arnold, we think), and describes it as "the general sense of mankind." But it is more fundamentally true to say that poetical morality corresponds to the laws which underlie the unchanging government of the universe, laws of which there is constant tradition among the great poets—Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton. Ruskin's view is correct, says the author, applied to a work of art in its "external or objective aspect," regarded as "the interpretation of moral beauty by the assistance of physical beauty," but incorrect applied to a work of art in its "internal or subjective aspect"—regarded as "the expression of the artist's mind, as a 'conception converted into a creation.'" Which seems to us vague and unsatisfying. Will it be credited that, in grappling with this stubborn difficulty, Mr. Worsfold adventures lightly the casual statement that "Southey and Wordsworth" are "now regarded as our most spiritual poets"? Southey—immortal Poetry!

But Mr. Worsfold proceeds, having got his utterances from the critics, to apply them. The Aristotelian method of judging new work by reference to the various categories of composition based on the practice of previous writers is done away with, he says. We now take it for granted that a creative writer "will adopt the appropriate and necessary form of composition, and we look mainly . . . at the effect which he has produced by his composition as a whole; and if we find that his creation possesses the essential quality of appealing to the imagination, we do not trouble to consider whether . . . he has moulded his materials into the precise form of any previously existing model." This, we submit, is inadequate to explain the method of the best modern critics. They try sympathetically to identify themselves with the artist's mind, grasp his standpoint, think again his conception after him, divine and annex his individual plan, and then intelligently criticise his work according to its proportion of success in developing that personal plan. According to their capacity of assimilating his design, their criticism will be good or bad, complete or incomplete. And the measure in which a man possesses this sympathetic intuition is the test of his critical gift. "Appreciation," the wise it call, which we prefer to Mr. Worsfold's "interpretation" as a name for the modern process of criticism.

Mr. Worsfold lays down three principles for applied criticism. Firstly, truth—generalised truth. In essence, an agreement between the opinions and feelings of the writer and the general sense of mankind. Hence the necessity for morality. From what we have said it will be gathered that we would prefer to say an agreement with the integral truth of nature, "a criticism of nature," as Cousin says. Secondly, symmetry: the adaptation of the external qualities of a given work to the special purpose it is intended to achieve. It is a very embracing definition. One would rather say, a relation of ordered parts to produce an harmonious and organic whole. But Mr. Worsfold evidently and deliberately joins symmetry with selection, which surely should be kept separate. He quotes Meredith: "The art of the pen is to rouse the inward vision, . . . because our flying minds cannot contain a protracted description. The Shakespearian, the Dantesque pictures are in a line or two at most." This is done by selection. But Mr. Worsfold says: "So the test of symmetry is indirectly a means by which the presence of this dominant artistic quality can be discovered and measured in a work of literature." The selection of the fit earth to make a jar is not part of the jar's symmetry, though it is an indispensable preliminary to the making of a symmetrical jar. Indeed, that species of selection to which the Meredith quotation refers should rather come under Mr. Worsfold's third heading—Idealisation.

This principle requires not merely that the mental aspect of reality should be presented by the author, but that a selection from the mental aspect of reality should first be made, and that the selection so made should exclude such matter as affects unpleasantly the aesthetic consciousness of the reader.

Here comes one of Mr. Worsfold's unpardonable imprecisions of speech. He speaks of "that characteristic quality of a work of art which we call, from a subjective point of view, 'to give pleasure.'" How can "to give pleasure" be a quality; which is manifestly the outcome or effect of a quality? Under this head, Mr. Worsfold points out, comes the doctrine of "poetic justice," and he has many remarks on that doctrine—some good, some courting criticism. But what is the outcome of all this critical apparatus? How are we to apply it? By comparison, answers Mr. Worsfold; and it is practically the conclusion of his book.

Assume that we know not merely that we should look for truth in any given work, but also the sort of truth for which we should look—that is to say, the truth of logic, if the work be non-creative, the truth of art, if it be creative—if, then, we would ascertain the extent to which the work in question possesses this quality, we must compare it with a work of recognised merit . . . in the same department of literature. Gradually by the study of the best work . . . in the several departments of literature, our minds will become so familiarised with the several and characteristic excellences of each, that we shall almost instinctively welcome their presence, and resent their absence.

Now that last sentence is true, and understood in this general sense the principle of comparison is as right as it is obvious. But Mr. Worsfold does not leave it there. He lays down a detailed and mechanical comparison which can breed nothing but conventional judgment—where it is not impracticable. "If we wish to know how X has succeeded, we compare his work with the work of the same kind which A, B, and C have done, and admittedly done well." Thus, he says, to judge the detailed description of a love-declaration between two young people in Richard Feverel, we should compare it with the like scene in Romeo and Juliet. The critic who should do so would be lost—if he were trying to judge Richard Feverel as a new and unknown work! Even in Mr. Worsfold's comparison, with all its parti-pris, the differences are very much more conspicuous than the resemblances. The work of a great poet (let us say) is almost sure to be so novel and sui generis that such mechanical and detailed comparison with the work of any predecessor will be either impossible, or a snare for the feet of the critic so banal as to attempt it. It is precisely such rootedly mistaken efforts which are responsible for nearly half the conventional damnation meted out to poets at their literary birth. Arnold recommended readers to keep in their minds choice lines and passages of great poetry, as a standard of supreme poetic quality. But (though even this is liable to perverted application) Mr. Worsfold is not justified in citing it to countenance a method of criticism which would have pricked the roots of Arnold's hair! Such comparisons are sometimes interesting, when you have already captured and certified to yourself the excellence of a new writer, but they are pernicious as means of a priori appraisal.

And this is all that Mr. Worsfold has to tell us about the handling of the tools he has so painstakingly labelled for us. Let us confess that, as Mr. Punch says, "we don't seem to get no forrarder." The rest of the book is a brief synopsis of literary forms, with a jejeune note on style. Decidedly, the book is not satisfactory, yet it has much which is satisfying. The evolution of criticism is traced with a system not before applied to it; and our modern critical gains are appraised, so that we can see where we stand in relation to our ancestors. This is good work, and we only wish it had been done with better command of style. Superfluous words should be thinned out of almost every sentence; for Mr. Worsfold has a fatal love of rotundity for its own ponderous sake. Were this done, it would save much labour to the reader of a book none the less worth reading.

Too Much Drum.

Writ in Barracks. By Edgar Wallace. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

IMITATION is not always flattery. Even if it be clever, it may have the effect of opening the eyes of men to the defects of its model. It may give an impetus to reaction, and justification to a growing weariness. One feels like this in regard to Mr. Wallace's book of verses. Again and again the reader's hand relaxes, and his eye wanders, and he asks, How long? How long, that is to say, will British patriotism find its most vigorous expression in these khaki-coster rhythms, these music-hall sentiments, and this extremely facile vein of brag. Surely there is a better way. Surely even the Boer war, in the necessity of which we believe, but in which we take no joy, might inspire a poem of stern and sombre beauty, finding its core of inspiration in that very absence of inspiration which leaves a clearer vision of the dull, stern, burdensome tasks of empire, where the end is not glory, but simply rectification. In South Africa we are meeting no ancient hereditary foe, we are awakening no red traditions, we are not risking our lives and safeties here at home. Say what one will, the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war"—and its vivid danger—are missing. Not, therefore, need our poets hold back. The purest blood of England has soaked the Veldt. There has been no reluctance to go out. The country houses and the City offices have poured forth their strong men; no rank has been too high, no occupation too absorbing, no wealth too great, to be forsaken for this tiresome, necessary business, this joyless political task, demanding the profuse sacrifices of war. The sacrifice has been made in the calm, unfaltering English way. There is the unwritten poem. By all means let there be war poetry, but let the poetry fit the war.

Considerations such as these qualify our enjoyment of Mr. Wallace's soldier songs. We do not like the easy jeering of "My Pal, the Boer":

"My pal, the Boer!
You're a prisoner of war
(E tried to break my jaw, but that's a trifle);
You can't escape me, can yer?
In the name of Rule Britannia,

I commandeer your 'orse an' Mauser rifle!"

Nor do we feel that a sword-buckling prayer like that offered in "At the Brink," with its refrain, "Give peace in our time, O Lord!" has any true relation to the present struggle. "The Squire" is the unabashed, unabated glorification of John Bull as the landlord of the earth; while in "The People to Cecil Rhodes" we hear the long, indiscriminating yell of Stock Exchange enthusiasm. It is, however, Mr. Wallace's good work that makes us reject his bad with a certain warmth. He is so very good when he is on the right lines; and again and again he not only does honour to Mr. Kipling, but comes near enough for rivalry. He has not the irresistible rhythm which, in Mr. Kipling, spirits the reader along; nor has he Mr. Kipling's sudden elevations of expression which explode a glamour over a whole poem: "An' the dawn came up like thunder out o' China 'erorst the bay." He is capable of dropping into such perilous stuff as this:

The number one is on the bridge,
The sun is low an' red!
An' shot an' shell, like fiends of 'ell,
Are shriekin' round 'is 'ead,
An' three marines are crippled,
An' their sergeant-major's dead!

A smile is on 'is bloodless lips,
'Is sword 'angs from 'is wrist,
And a lock of 'air of a maiden fair,
Is clasped in 'is bloodstained fist,
But 'e'll meet 'er at the great roll-call,
When they muster by "open list"!

Behind and among all this there is some respectable stuff. The greeting to Mr. Kipling—the piece by which Mr. Wallace was first known—is excellent:

You 'ave met us in the tropics, you 'ave met us in the snows;
But mostly in the Punjab an' the 'ills.
You 'ave seen us in Mauritius, where the naughty cyclone
blows,
You 'ave met us underneath a sun that kills,
An' we grills!

An' I ask you, do we fill the bloomin' bills?

Since the time when Tommy's uniform was musketoon an'
wig,
There 'as always been a bloke wot 'ad a way
Of writin' of the Glory an' forgettin' the fatig',
'Oo saw 'im in 'is tunic day by day,
Smart an' gay,
An' forgot about the smallness of his pay!

But you're our partic'lar author, you're our patron and our friend,
You're the poet of the cuss-word and the swear,
You're the poet of the people, where the red-mapped lands extend,
You're the poet of the jungle an' the lair,
An' compare
To the ever-speaking voice of everywhere!

In "Ginger James" we have a good barrack song, justified of itself. "Ginger Jim" was the scamp of the regiment, but there came a day when he had the respect of everyone, from colonel to drummer-boy:

The band turned out to play
Poor Ginger James away;
'Is captain and 'is company came down to see 'im off;
An' thirteen file an' rank,
With three rounds each of blank;
An' 'e rode down on a carriage, like a bloomin' City toff!

'E doesn't want no pass,
'E's journeying first-class;
'Is trav'lling rug's a Union Jack, which isn't bad at all;
The tune the drummers play
It ain't so very gay,
But a rather slow selection, from a piece that's known as "Saul."

A sense of humour which should have saved him from writing some pieces in this volume is shown by Mr. Wallace in "The King of Oojie-Moojie," a delightful rendering of our normal dealings with dusky African potentates. But we shall fill our remaining space with two stanzas from "When London Calls"—a poem which alone should persuade Londoners to buy this volume:

There's a voice that calls the waster, when the doors of home are shut.
(O the voice of club and chamber, and the arc-light burning blue!)

There's a voice that calls the trooper in his daub and wattle hut.
(O the midnight cabs that rattle from the Strand to Waterloo!)

There's a voice for ever calling from the Square and from the Slum,
From the Hornsey-rise to Brixton, from St. Saviour's to St. Paul's.

'Tis the never-changing message of the everlasting
"Come"

To the brick and to the mortar,
London calls!

'Tis the swelling roar of Epsom, with the backers seven deep.
(O the rush around the Corner, and the finish on the Straight!)

'Tis the tinkling hum of Henley as it snuggles down to sleep.
(O the light-lined laughing river, with its fairy-fancied fête!)

'Tis the growl of Ratcliffe-highway, 'tis the lisp of Rotten-row;
'Tis the beauty that entrances, 'tis the horror that appals;
'Tis the firemen's horses tearing to the midnight sky
aglow;
It's a vague and restless—something.
London calls!

Mr. Wallace writes as a soldier—he spent "six happy years" in the ranks of the Army Medical Corps—and as a journalistic versifier, walking very frankly in the steps of Mr. Kipling. His shortcomings are largely from without, his triumphs are from within; and we can do with any quantity of verse as good as "Tommy to his Laureate," "Ginger Jim," and "When London Calls."

The Degradation of the Baronetage.

A History of the Baronetage. By F. W. Pixley, F.S.A.
(Duckworth & Co.)

MR. PIXLEY has broken fresh ground in his History of the Baronetage, and, in so doing, has faced the difficulties and earned the honour of the pioneer. The opening chapter, which deals with the use of the word "baronet" previous to the creation of the Baronetage in 1611, is interesting; but, as has recently been pointed out in the ACADEMY, even it, as is probable, those antiquaries are wrong who maintain that in all such cases it is merely a scribal error for "banneret," it is certain that there can be no connexion whatever between the baronet of the Middle Ages and his namesake of the seventeenth century. The baronetage of James I. was an entirely new class of nobility, created under specific and unprecedented regulations, and for a particular purpose. At the same time it is just possible that the method employed by James I. may have been suggested by a precedent, quoted by Mr. Pixley, which occurred in the reign of Edward III.; and in Wyrley's True Use of Armour, published in 1592, there is a passage that may throw a sidelight on this point.

Unfortunately for the Baronetage, the general public has not the knowledge to discriminate between the seventeenth century baronets, the only holders of the dignity worthy of being seriously regarded as members of the degree, and the later creations in which the social qualifications, in former times rigidly insisted upon, have ceased to be required. It is hardly necessary to point out that the more recent recipients of the title have not been usually, far less invariably, as the original conditions stipulated they should be, gentlemen of blood, of at least three generations of legitimate coat-armour, and in the possession of a revenue by inheritance from landed estate of the modern equivalent of from £6,000 to £7,000 a year.

As a matter of fact, all creations beyond the first two hundred were an infringement of the undertaking on the part of the Crown not to exceed that number. Still, throughout the seventeenth century the dignity continued to be confined to the families of the old landed gentry, the true aristocracy of England, though the identity of some of these ancient houses has been obscured by the acquisition of peerages.

It is greatly to be regretted, that instead of utilising the old titles of knight and baronet in their present meaningless, and often ludicrous applications, some new designations of honour were not devised of a nature less inappropriate to the profession, trade, or social position of the grantee.

But the older baronets have not only been badly treated in this general degradation of their degree, they have also been shamelessly robbed of some of their special privileges. One particularly gross breach of faith on the part of the Crown is the refusal of late to carry out the undertaking given in all patents prior to December 19, 1827, to confer knighthood on the eldest sons of baronets on the attainment of their majority. It is, of course, open to the sovereign, as the "fount of honour," at any time to introduce modifications, desirable or otherwise, into patents of nobility; but the revoking of a permanent contract such as this entered into by the Crown is, in the peculiar circumstances, tantamount to the repudiation of a debt, and since in these matters the prerogative is above the reach of the law, the act is unchivalrous as well as dishonest. In this instance, however, there is apparently a remedy. Knighthood is conferred either by accolade or by patent. In the case, therefore, of those patents of baronetcy which include the knighthood clause all that seems needful is for knighthood to be automatically assumed by the heir on his reaching the age of twenty-one, without troubling the sovereign to assist.

It cannot be denied that the baronets themselves have during the last century taken much pains to bring ridicule and additional contempt upon their body. On various occasions they have associated themselves for the purpose of preventing irregular assumptions of the title, and of applying for the restitution of the rights of which they have been deprived. But the movement has on each occasion come to an ignominious end, owing chiefly to the absurd and groundless claims put forward for trivial objects of personal adornment such as one would have supposed could appeal only to the heart of a Chinese mandarin or a South Sea Islander. The theatrical assortment of "properties" in which the committee of baronets, in 1835, begged permission to bedeck their persons was discreetly disallowed by the advisers of the Crown, and was even demurred to by the official men-milliners of the College of Arms. The modern potted-meat or party-financing baronet is perhaps sufficiently ridiculous as he is. It is difficult to believe that he would inspire greater veneration in his customers or his constituents if he masqueraded behind the counter or on the hustings arrayed as even Solomon certainly was not; if, clad in a green coat, garnished with badge and star, collar of SS and knightly belt, and embellished with a scarf after the fashion of an Oom Paul or an Ancient Buffalo, his "honourable" brow overshadowed by a white hat surmounted by a nodding plume of snowy feathers, he should brandish, so far as the massive thumb-ring and signet of his state would permit the exertion, a sword in his right hand, a pennon in his left. And the prayer for this strange frippery was not the fooling of farceurs, but was laid before the sovereign in very sober earnest by the grave and reverend seniors of the baronetage.

All this was exceedingly childish and ill-advised, but can afford no justification for the utter disregard of the ancient respectable qualifications for the baronetage. That, and the notorious fact that baronetcies are regularly on sale in the political market, a scandal carefully guarded against in the early regulations, have been the principal causes of the disrepute into which this much-wronged and much-abused degree of nobility has fallen; and it is within the knowledge of the present writer that there exist not a few heirs to seventeenth century baronetcies who prefer to let their rights lie dormant rather than use a title which has lost all value and respect.

To return to our author, Mr. Pixley has done his work extremely well. His narrative is lucid and well ordered, and the treatment of his subject thorough and based on original authorities. It is satisfactory, by the way, to read his very proper denunciation of the vulgar abbreviation "Bart." for Baronet, and of the slovenly and ignorant habit of describing all grades of the peerage below duke by the title of "lord." We have noticed but few errors, and those of no great magnitude. A couple of fragments of unintelligible Latin occur: "duo stermini" on p. 5, and "inter aliâ" on p. 297, and the derivation given of "sir" from κύριος belongs to the dark ages of etymology. We heartily commend the book to those interested in the subject, and sincerely trust that its intrinsic merits will not suffer through the deterrent horrors of its binding, which appears to emulate the gaudy abominations of the peerage and county family publications.

West and East.

Christianity and Mythology. By John M. Robertson.
(Watts & Co.)

SOME few weeks ago we had occasion to refer to a curious opinion held by Mr. Robertson to the effect that no such thing as race genius exists. If it were true, the Occident would experience no difficulty in understanding the Orient, a proposition which the very existence of this book confutes. No doubt the plan of it was conceived in circumstances that do not tend towards sympathetic study. Mr. Robertson, as is well known, was a favourite lieutenant of the late Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, and it was at his request that the study of "Christ and Krishna," which is the nucleus of the book, was undertaken. Now we have no wish to say any ill of Mr. Bradlaugh, he died somewhat more honoured than he had lived, and his posthumous reputation is at least as great as was his living one. We do not even wish to pass judgment on his merit as a controversialist; but it is scarcely necessary to say that he did not possess the delicate sympathy that enables a man to enter into and even represent the feelings and temperament of those opposed to him. That was not his particular gift. Rather he was a born fighter, ready to ransack East or West for weapons in his endless controversy with theologians. His, as he would probably have been glad to admit, was the spirit of the iconoclast—bustling, energetic, assertive, positive, the spirit of a partisan. Upon the author of this book his mantle descended. With more intellect, but less of his master's burly force, Mr. Robertson nevertheless follows the same track.

There is a magic in the East that fascinates some—not the magic hymned by Mr. Kipling, but the spiritual, unknown to him as to Mr. Robertson, though the two are wide asunder as the poles. In the West humanity is masculine to think or do. Mr. Robertson, armed with scale and compass, represents it. He comes as an exponent of naturalism, abhorring the mystic, though mystical enough is his own "ism" if pursued to its source, and bent on applying strict rules of logic and analysis to the careless, dreaming East. It is done at a sacrifice. The result has, in the first place, no literary value whatever—it is a mere polemic. Literary value could only have sprung out of some love of the East for its own sake, some feeling that would have dragged the author into its innermost life. If the reader is in doubt of what we mean, let him read one after the other Mr. Robertson's and Mr. Frazer's account of Krishna: they are practically agreed in their conclusion, but the latter, drawn to the East from childhood, living his best days in it, learning to think in its very terms, is able to see the full value of "those beacon lights that were set ablaze to direct the quivering soul in its flight through time," even though he confesses to be one of those who "stand listening wearily to the muffled sound that comes from the chamber of science."

This sort of writing and thinking is possible only to one capable of projecting himself, quite independent of his own belief, into the lives of others. Mr. Robertson's failure to do so most probably is in part due to a habit of controversy; you almost hear an angry rasp in his voice as he flings defiance or challenges contradiction; due still more, we should fancy, though we trust no injustice is done him by the supposition, to the apparent fact that he has had to approach the original documents through the medium of translation. He might get at the main facts in that way; but, after the facts have been mastered, the wisdom of the East may still remain a sealed book. In regard to the historical and textual criticism of the Bible this may have been a still greater disadvantage, even though he has winnowed the French and German authorities with the ardour of a true student, somewhat to the neglect of those in England, we think. Bishop Lightfoot, for example, led the way in textual criticism; and much that is put forward in regard to the pre-Christian existence of the more essential passages in the Sermon on the Mount and the Lord's Prayer was primarily due to his research, although the name does not occur in the multitudinous authorities here quoted. Mr. Robertson's facts are mostly gleanings from the authorities; the original part of the book is the pushing of the conclusion to its extreme. Not only will he have it that all the miracles of Christ are mythic, and all the doctrines old, but that the historical personage round whom they were supposed to have accumulated was himself a myth.

We cannot believe that much good would come of discussing this point in the pages of the ACADEMY; nor, frankly, does Mr. Robertson appear to take a very tactful method of winning adherents to his belief. He seems to be beset with the idea that throughout the centuries a conspiracy has been abroad to impose a false religion on mankind—that is to say, if he would go so far as to admit that there is such a thing as true religion. He even falls foul of Mr. Andrew Lang for holding with perfect reasonableness that religion and myth are not necessarily connected. Mr. Lang says: "Man's consciousness of sin, his sense of being imperfect in the sight of 'larger other eyes than ours,' is a topic of the deepest interest, but it comes but by accident into the realm of mythological science." One might imagine this proposition self-evident. Another writer, not accused even of Mr. Lang's faith, dwells on "the doubts, the efforts to seek for the soul a secret hiding-place from the injustices of the world, the black pall of despairing pessimism that only can be rent by belief or faith." Surely both writers touch on something that is inherent in human nature, and exists apart from its expression, even if we should grant that the expression invariably takes mythical form. But the essence of the thing, to quote Mr. Lang again, is "the yearning after the Divine that is not far from any one of us." And, really, that touches the controversy to the quick. To apply the laws of logic and historical criticism to the myths, stories, and discourses wherein this human aspiration is embodied is no more satisfactory than would be the endeavour to find out the charm of a song by subjecting to chemical analysis the paper and ink used in printing it. When Mr. Gladstone appealed to "the solemn voice of the ages," he was sneered at by those who call themselves rationalists; yet the unalterable fact remains that, as far as knowledge goes, the human mind has craved for a certain nourishment that religion in some form or other has supplied. The moral to be drawn is, that the work Mr. Robertson essays is to be achieved not by pulling down, but by building up. Truth, in doctrine at any rate, is not to be tested by the time, place, and mouthpiece of its delivery, but by the response it evokes in the mind of man. And it is idle to talk, as Mr. Robertson does, of "a complex of real knowledge, correcting and reacting on one's whole conception of the universe." The so-called "real knowledge" rests, finally, upon the same unanswering mystery as did the knowledge of old. What lies beyond is now, as then, a matter of guess, and the man of to-day's "conception of the universe" is not more likely to be true than those of antiquity. And this consideration, if no other, might teach us to be reverent and humble in dealing with the beliefs of the past.

An Expensive Purifier.

The Influence of Mars. By Eva Anstruther. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

THE "Prelude" to this tiny book presents England as a female standing by herself at a suitable height above sea-level, "a woman strong and beautiful; the mighty mother of a race of mighty men." To her comes a male stranger, and states that he wants her peace of mind and her men and her gold, and so forth, and that in return he will give manhood, strength, sacrifice, and so forth. She inquires, using the second person singular, who he is, and he replies: "I am War the Purifier." And she ejaculates: "Lo! I am well content."

After which symbolism, if symbolism it be, the reader is at liberty to turn to the realism of the Honourable Mrs. Anstruther's twelve tales of purification. In the first of these stories, "A Medical Exam.," we have a peer of the realm and his wife—"a very ordinary couple, prosperous, uninteresting. . . . They lived in the country from July to March, and in London from March to July. . . . Bar outside happenings, they would have gone on doing the same thing, at the same time, in the same way, for ten years to come." But something happened, and Mrs. Anstruther describes the occurrence in the same phrase in nearly all the twelve tales: "The War Storm Burst." The War Storm having burst, the peer enrolls himself in the Imperial Yeomanry, and she busies herself "importantly with War Committees." But the peer has to be "vetted" before he may proceed to South Africa. The doctor tells him that he has just six months to live. (It is perfectly incredible that any examining doctor should go out of his way to sentence an examinee to death in this manner, but Mrs. Anstruther has it so.) The peer returns home; his wife is engaged in settling "who was to take in who" at that night's dinner party, but he nevertheless informs her tout court of his impending fate. "So she faced death with him." Incidentally, like many characters in fiction at a crisis, she is at this point suddenly endowed with a sense of hearing. "He dropped the curtain, and she heard the metallic clanging of the curtain rings upon the pole." Presumably, if her husband had not been condemned to die in six months, she would not have heard the metallic clanging of those curtain rings. Then they gave the dinner party, just as usual, and no one guessed. Only a "horsey man," with unconscious and miraculous allegoric force, summed up the situation in a tale about a mare: "I hunted her two seasons . . . with the Pytchley. Rather a stiff country for such a little bit of a thing, but quality always tells in the long run. It's the well-bred 'uns who will carry anything, and go on till they drop, even though they may be weedy sort of brutes to look at, and seem up to no weight at all."

Now all this, to be candid, is simple amateurishness—amateurishness which is not always even grammatical: an amateur's pathetic attempt to achieve the impossible by means of words like Eternity, Fate, Englishman. Turgenev could do as much in a couple of thousand words as most people; but even he would have shrunk from the business of gathering up the tragedy of two lives and sticking it into a column and a-half of the Westminster Gazette. The thing couldn't be done. It might have been hinted at; but Mrs. Anstruther hasn't even hinted at it. She has merely, in this as in all the other stories, indulged in an orgy of rank sentimentality. The book is like a chocolate cream for sickliness. Open it where you will, you find the same saccharine, plaintive note, expressive of the mood of a stockbroker when he hears "By the Fountain" sung "in the gloaming." Listen to the beginning of "The Fluffy Boy":

W. G. Wilson—just W. G. He had not even the individual note of a Christian name—only initials. Did his people call him Willy or Walter or Wilfred? No one knew or cared. He was merely a name on a list, a list of dancing men, which She who had given a Ball, handed over, in a patronising spirit, to She who aspired to a like Pinnacle of Fame.

In this amiably pretty book all the usual people do all the usual things. The unruly girl "smoothes back her rebellious curls." The agonised mother "walks up and down, up and down, like a caged thing." The moved father "blows his nose with quite unnecessary vigour." And everyone talks book talk, not real talk. Imagine a man referring to dead soldiers as "brave fellows." He might have said "poor chaps" or "poor devils"—but brave fellows! Imagine a small boy saying to his apologetic grandmother, apropos of a lady who is nursing him on her knee: "She's not the sort what wearies. It's quite all right"! Imagine an old woman on a 'bus, on Ladysmith Day, holding forth to a stranger like this:

I hear the loud shout of success, as you do, but listen behind it. Bend down your ear and listen to the heart of success as it beats. It's the sound of the muffled drum, beating most slowly as for a funeral; to the slow, heavy tread of the men who march mourning: it's the sound of teardrops falling, falling one by one—this is the heart of success. . . ."

War has different effects on different people. On Mrs. Anstruther it has had the effect of causing her to write this book. The Influence of Mars is doubtless the sincere expression of a state of mind, an utterance honest and, perhaps, inevitable. We have no desire to scoff at it, though to avoid doing so is extremely difficult; but we are bound to say that, in our opinion, it is without any sort of merit, or even of effectiveness.

Other New Books.

NOTES ON A CENTURY OF TYPOGRAPHY.

BY HORACE HART.

THIS is such a book as a retired printer might spread on his knees, and enjoy. Mr. Hart is the controller of the Oxford University Press, and this folio is the result of certain technical researches he has made into the past history of the ancient and important press over which he presides. The full title of the volume is Notes on a Century of Typography at the University Press, Oxford, 1693-1794; with Annotations and Appendices. The basis of the book is the collection, existing at Oxford, of Specimens of printed type such as were regularly sent out to authors to assist them in selecting suitable types for their books. Publishers are, perhaps, less ceremonious, and authors less exacting, in these days. Indeed, the custom of sending out these specimens seems to have been honoured at Oxford only in a definite period; it did not begin until 1693, and it ended abruptly in 1794. Mr. Hart has reproduced a great many of these Specimens, and in doing so has stored up and expounded much fine old typographical lore. Essentially, the book is a picture-book—that is to say, its aim is to reproduce to the eye the types, initials, printer's marks, colophons, &c., of which specimens were circulated among authors in the above period. Moreover, it is strictly a record of such specimens as have survived. If a fount of type be not represented in any Oxford Specimen, and if no punch, matrix, or lead type of it can be found, then that fount makes no appearance in this work. To have included mention of such types would, Mr. Hart tells us, have expanded his work beyond reasonable limits. Perhaps the most striking feature of this curious history, to the lay mind, is the dominance of Dutch type. All the earliest Oxford printing was done with type "made in Germany"—to be precise, at Cologne; and throughout the seventeenth century the directors of the Press imported type from Germany, France, and Holland. Type-founding was not authorised in England until 1637; and for long after that date Dutch type held sway. Mr. Hart quotes from Reed's Old English Letter Foundries to show that this was the case in the early years of the eighteenth century:

There was probably more Dutch type in England between 1700 and 1720 than there was English. The Dutch artists appeared for the time to have the secret of the true shape of the Roman letter; their punches were more carefully finished, their matrices better justified, and their types of better metal, and better dressed, than any of which our country could boast. Nor was it till Caslon developed a native genius that English typography ceased to be more than half Dutch.

It goes without saying that Mr. Hart's commentary on the types he reproduces is highly technical. But it is also manifestly a labour of love. Only 150 copies of this interesting record have been printed. (Oxford University Press.)

A WALK THROUGH THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

BY F. G. AFLALO.

From the Encyclopædia of Sport, of which he is editor, Mr. Aflalo has turned for the nonce to that living encyclopædia of animal life, the Zoo, where he gossips in a simple, informing way on the curiosities of its orderly lairs. His book will satisfy the country cousin and the Londoner who has boys. Again and again the "nature of the beast" is happily touched off, not omitting any refinement of manner acquired in the polite society of the Gardens. The giraffe, we are told, is so fastidious that it will not accept an apple from which its keeper has had first bite—a fact which should be of some educational value; as also the futility of Temminck's Snapper, "a dirty old turtle," which from force of habit angles for fish when there are no fish to catch. One regrets to learn that the Snapper, probably from protracted disappointment, now refuses to eat the steak provided for him, and has taken no food for months. The pair of South African ratsels may be particularly recommended to the attention of youth, not, perhaps, on educational grounds, for they devour their offspring, but because of their cheerful dexterity. When the ratel sees a keeper approaching with a supply of horse-flesh he turns a series of delighted somersaults, which he repeats when he has successfully robbed his partner of her share of food. This conduct makes it necessary that the female should be fed in a separate compartment. The ratel can also climb over the roof of his house, and hang on by his forepaws. "They eat," says Mr. Aflalo, "about 6 lbs. of horse meat each daily, as well as such culs as they may produce." This cannibalistic passion is also shared by the tigers. Mr. Aflalo tells of one tigress which, just before a birth, was provided with 20 lbs. of fresh meat in the hope that it would stay her appetite. In addition to this, however, she devoured her three culs.

The illustrations to the book are, on the whole, well printed, and many are of unusual interest—those, for instance, showing the unrolling of the chameleon's tongue, and the full stretch of that extraordinary member in act to secure a fly. The chameleon, by the by (another note for youthful visitors), does not flourish on young flies; he prefers old ones that have indulged in high living. Another interesting series exhibits the African egg-eating snake in the various stages of egg consumption. (Sands & Co.)

THE ECONOMICS OF MODERN COOKERY.

BY M. M. MALLOCK.

Husks do not necessarily appear in the menu of the Younger Son, but he often envies the Prodigal his fatted calf. He has appreciated M. M. Mallock's attempts to help him in the management of his larder. Hence the second, and enlarged, edition of A Younger Son's Cookery Book, the title of which has been changed "to one more generally descriptive." This is a book that goes to the first principles: "What is stock?" for instance, or "What is a ragout?" One can believe that if Angelina would only commit to memory the passage on rolling dough (p. 147), the honeymoon might continue at home after the return from the seaside. The author comments on the lack of appreciation for the nuances of flavour displayed by the lower and lower-middle classes, and would lay "a very strict embargo" on "lemon-peel, herbs, nutmeg, mace, and cloves, the too liberal use of which is an almost universal instinct."

"And things are not what they seem," sings Longfellow; and the motto might well serve for New Zealand mutton, which, "when fit to cook, has oftener than not the appearance of being in a state of advanced decomposition." We should be glad to avoid it at all times. It may be added that M. M. Mallock's rules for choosing different meats should be conned by every young housewife. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)

Fiction.

"The Weapons of the Dead."

A Gift from the Grave. By Edith Wharton.
(John Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

A NOVELISTS' novel this might fairly be called—in the sense, at any rate, that in order to apprehend the delicacy of the work, and the perfection of its economy, the reader should himself have seriously essayed fiction. Its bulk does not exceed one-third of the average six-shilling measure, and every line is vital. For style, the sentences, with their carefully prepared resolutions, are like the sentences of Mr. Henry James; like his, too, is the general method of "attack"; but the story is told very frankly, with none of the miserly eking out of light that is what, from another than Mr. James, decidedly we would not stand.

You are to suppose that, instead of being the happy object of a great and beautiful love, such a woman as Elizabeth Barrett was the victim of a passion for a man of quite mediocre qualities; that upon him she lavished the treasure of her heart; and, knowing well that he had nothing to give her in return, continued through many years to write to him from a distance all the best of her thought and of her emotion. The affection Glennard entertained for Margaret Aubyn comprised "a dual impulse that drew him to her voice, but drove him from her hand." To be loved by the most brilliant woman of her day was a thing that could not but render him vain-glorious; to be incapable of loving her "seemed to him, in looking back, derisive evidence of his limitations; and his remorseful tenderness for her memory was complicated with a sense of irritation against her for having given him, once for all, the measure of his emotional capacity." And here is a phrase that creates the woman: she "combined with personal shyness an intellectual audacity that was like a deflected impulse of coquetry; one felt that if she had been prettier she would have had emotions instead of ideas."

It was not that Mrs. Aubyn permitted herself to be a pensioner on his bounty. He knew she had no wish to keep herself alive on the small change of sentiment; she simply fed on her own funded passion, and the luxuries it allowed her made him even then dimly aware that she had the secret of an inexhaustible alchemy.

Read this passage from the farewell interview before her setting out for England:

He was tired of her already—he was always tired of her—yet he was not sure that he wanted her to go.

"I may never see you again," he said, as though confidently appealing to her compassion.

Her look enveloped him. "And I shall see you always—always!"

"Why go then?" escaped him.

"To be nearer you," she answered. . . .

It is worthy of note that the contrast between the woman whom Glennard loved and the woman he had tolerated is not a contrast between a good and a bad woman, a wise woman and a fool.

Miss Trent had the charm of still waters that are felt to be renewed by rapid currents. Her attention spread a tranquil surface to the demonstrations of others [the significance of this remarkable expression is wonderfully unfolded as the story goes forward], and it was only in days of storm and stress that one felt the pressure of the tides. This inscrutable composure was, perhaps, her chief grace in Glennard's eyes. Reserve, in some natures, implies merely the locking of empty rooms or the dissimulation of awkward encumbrances; but Miss Trent's reticence was to Glennard like the closed door to the sanctuary, and his certainty of divining the hidden treasure made him content to remain outside in the happy expectancy of the neophyte.

She was quite practical; she knew perfectly that to happy domesticity a little money is an antecedent necessity. And so the dead woman's letters were given in two volumes to the New York public. To Alexa Trent the price was represented as an inheritance. Thenceforward, having won his wife, and while all things prospered in his hand, the troubled man was doomed to hear the prattle of inquisitive readers, and on all hands unmeasured condemnation of the impossible person who had betrayed a confidence so generous. When he opened the first volume, the little broken phrases fled across the page like wounded animals in the open. . . . It was a horrible sight . . . a battle of helpless things driven savagely out of shelter. He had not known it would be like this. . . .

He had viewed the transaction solely as an unfortunate blemish on an otherwise presentable career; "heedless of the divinities who, below the surface of our deeds and passions, silently forge the fatal weapons of the dead." Now he began to be tormented by the necessity of defending himself against the perpetual criticism of his wife's belief in him. His punishment, it seemed to him at other times, thenceforth would be "the unescapable presence of the woman he had so persistently evaded. She would always be there now. It was as though he had married her instead of the other. It was what she had always wanted—to be with him—and she had gained her point at last." Worst of all he felt that he would never again be able to see Flamel, the bookman who had been his intermediary, speaking to his wife without "a sense of sick mistrust that loosened his joints." With quite extraordinary sureness we learn the process by which fear begets remorse, remorse repentance, repentance purification. Harassed by dread of betrayal, swaying between defiance and self-disgust, with miscalculated words he builds up between Alexa and himself a hateful bridge of comprehension. From that moment the interest centres in the woman. To hate him would have been easy; to despise him easy. She does neither. With faultless tact the wife, passionately just, is shown to stand of her own will beside him at the bar of conscience; and she divines the moment of his absolution. That was the dead woman's final gift: at last she had made him to be the man she had loved; and for her, in death as in life, the joy of giving.

Such is the end to which we are beautifully brought. We can only add, rather helplessly, that we are conscious how far this sketch and these extracts must fall short of reflecting the impression that has been made upon us by a story that is, to our judgment, a work altogether apart.

Neighbours. By Julia M. Crottie.
(Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THESE "annals of a dull town" are never dull. We realise the people of Innisdoyle with unusual vividness—the white Main Street, the little muddled shops, the "pickie" players quarrelling on the pavement, the whisky-sodden, good-natured doctor, the lounging gossips quick to weep or fight or pray together. It is all a part of life as it is in a hundred Innisdoyles, its squalor tempered with kindness, its dreariness with invincible humour, its poverty with the grace of charity. The Irish character, touched sympathetically and with understanding, is lavish of response. Mrs. Crottie has both understanding and sympathy; she has, also, that rare instinct for dialogue which alone can make such stories absolutely faithful. There is much of death and burying in the book—too much, indeed—but no sentimentality. She does not go to wreck on the shoals of pathos.

They are terrible fighters, these Innisdoyle folk. There was a great fight between the pugilistic parson and Robin Boyle, "the delicate tinker." They met, both driving, in a narrow road; neither would give way.

"Oh, your reverence," shrieked a woman, running up with her hair flying, and eyes swollen and discoloured,

"in the name o' the three O'Reillys, pass him by! I've him alone! He's as harmless as a child if he's let alone, but tons o' pepper—the p'ison of sacks o' oats is in him if he's meddled with. He's not delicate —"

"Stand out!" yelled the tinker, "an' fight for your life, for here forneust you stands the boy that'll make you see stars—your natural master!"

Could flesh and blood stand that?

In a trice greatecoat and hay-rope were on the ground, and tinker and clergyman were in all the delirium of battle. The woman retreated to the shelter of a clump of bushes near by . . . but by and by a stone flung at her brought her out.

"Come," said her husband, as delicate and white as ever, "an' let us be moving."

Mrs. Crottie writes in a simple, straightforward style, workmanlike and efficient. What she needs to cultivate are action and construction. The dialect, it may be added, is faithfully rendered.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SENATOR NORTH.

BY GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

Mrs. Atherton has here brought her wit and observation to the study of American political life, and of politics in relation to society. Says Mrs. Madison to her daughter, who is determined to "go in" for politics: "It always has been my boast, Betty, that I never have had a politician in my house." Betty's unshaken resolve throws Mrs. Madison into tears of despair as she forcees her drawing-room filled with "a lot of lank, raw-boned Yankees with political beards." The story deals with the cares and temptations of senatorial life, and is laid in Washington, and often in the Senate. "Betty went to the Senate Gallery on the following day . . . and heard an exposition of the Populist religion by the benevolent-looking bore from Nebraska." (Lane. 6s.)

WINEFRED.

BY S. BARING-GOULD.

Mr. Baring-Gould's new novel is a "story of the chalk cliffs," in which the smallest doings of a West Country village are recorded. The very names seem familiar—Mrs. Marley, Mr. Holwood, and the rest. There are the smuggling episodes that never tire, and love and landships complete the interest of a readable story of a familiar type. (Methuen. 6s.)

MONICA GREY.

BY LADY HELY-HUTCHINSON.

This short novel appears to have had a special inspiration, deeply felt. We read: "If, by the unfolding of her lived-out experience I can bring home to some sore heart the truth for which my dear lady died—that sacrifice is always better than indulgence, whether the love be what the world smiles on as legitimate, or of that sad kind which the customs and traditions of a pseudo-moral society refuse to authorise—I shall be very ready to go to." The story belongs to the series so well inaugurated by Miss Wharton's A Gift from the Grave. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE SEEN AND THE UNSEEN.

BY RICHARD MARSH.

Twelve short stories, insufficiently distinguished from a novel of twelve chapters. The first opens with the sentence: "The conversation had been of murders and of suicides. It had almost seemed as if each speaker had felt constrained to cap the preceding speaker's tale of horror." (Methuen. 6s.)

A FRIEND OF CESAR.

BY WILLIAM STEARNES DAVIS.

Mr. Davis's period is '50-'47 B.C., the time of the fall of the Roman Republic. The author's aim is to present the Pagan point of view in contrast to the Christian point of view as presented in Quo Vadis; and he has endeavoured to keep to "strict historical probabilities." The story has already been issued in America. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Nietzsche.*

NIETZSCHE! Had Balzac conceived the man—but even Balzac could not have done that—his joy in finding this name would have eclipsed for the moment his joy in the creation. What night, and wrath, and strength, and strength cut short, look through the bars of this inspired dissyllable—Nietzsche. The man who bore it died last Saturday at Weimar, and with him passes from our ken one of the strangest figures of modern times. Two men have now gone into the silence who bear the marks of their age as no others do—Amiel, the weary man, and Nietzsche, the rebellious man. Here we speak of Nietzsche. But how to precipitate him? How forge the phrase that should precede the summary? In that mood which has come once to every man when he has felt the universe, the height of the stars, the behind and the before, and his personality like a mountain whirling—and his brain has stopped . . . and lo, the danger was over, and the street was with him again—in that mood Nietzsche stayed a little longer than other men, and emerged with a religion that was a transvaluation of all the ideas on which the management of human life now rests. In some such way one visualises the birth of a creed which has been called hideous, ferocious, abominable, insane, but which is nevertheless a direct, we may almost say a legitimate, product of the age. Nietzsche is the incarnation of ideas which men have hardly yet weighed, or dared to combine. We may dispute his explanation of himself, but the man has lived and died.

The simplest way of stating Nietzsche's teaching is to say that the struggle for existence, by tooth and claw, which has evolved man, is accepted by him as the sole principle of human progress. The victory of the strong is the supreme necessity; for the weak there shall be no mercy. Physiology is all. As Nietzsche's chief British exponent, Dr. Tille, interprets:

Physiology, as the criterion of value of whatever is human, whether called art, culture, or religion! Physiology as the sole arbiter on what is great and what is small, what is good and what is bad! Physiology as the sole standard by which the facts of history and the phenomena of our time can be tried, and by which they have to be tried and to receive the verdict on the great issue: decline, or ascent?

It follows that Christianity, the religion of the protection of the weak, was in Nietzsche's eyes the supreme evil—"the collective insurrection against race of all the down-trodden, the wretched, the ill-constituted, the misfortunate." With an extraordinary and melaucholy force he bewails the undoing by its agency of "the whole labour of the Roman world," which was working out the destinies of the race on the principle of breeding strong men and eliminating the feeble. Moreover, in the Roman world, everything essential had been discovered to make people go to work: the methods, it must be repeated ten times, are the essential thing, also the most difficult thing, and, besides, the things that have habit and indolence longest against them. What we have now won back for ourselves with unspeakable self-vanquishing (for we have still somehow all bad instincts, all Christian instincts in our nature)—the open book in presence of reality, the cautious hand, patience in earnestness and details, all the righteousness in knowledge—it was already there! already, more than two thousand years ago!

Nietzsche, then, regarded Christianity as the most disastrous putting-back of the clock ever achieved—"the one immortal blemish of mankind." So tremendous, and so oft-quoted, are his denunciations of the creed of Christendom that one must do him the justice—if it will pass for such—of pointing out that his references to Christianity were not always ungentle. In the chapter on Free Death in Thus Spake Zarathustra he exclaims:

Too early died that Hebrew whom the preachers of slow death revere, and his dying-too-early hath been fatal for many since.

When Jesus the Hebrew knew only the tears and melancholy of the Hebrew, together with the hatred of the good and just—then longing for death surprised him.

Would that he had remained in the desert and far away from the good and just! Perhaps he would have learnt how to live and to love the earth—and how to laugh besides!

Believe me, my brethren! He died too early; he himself would have revoked his doctrine, had he reached mine age! Noble enough to revoke he was!

Absurd as it is to proceed so rapidly, we must leave further indication of Nietzsche's larger opinions, our aim being to exhibit also his handling of everyday life and of literature. Remembering that he placed the salvation of the world in the fulness of life, no surprise can be felt when we encounter Nietzsche's contempt of the small moralities which keep the weak and the stupid safe from the strong and each other. All that was simply repressed disease. The enveloping scorn of some of his characterisations can hardly be matched in literature. Take this on "The Virtue that Maketh Smaller":

I pass through these folk and keep my eyes open. The folk do not forgive me for not being envious of their virtues.

They bite at me because I say unto them: "For small folk small virtues are requisite"; and because it is hard for me to understand that small folk are requisite!

Alas! the curiosity of mine eye strayed even unto their hypocrisie, and well I divined all their fly-happiness and their humming round window-panes in the sunshine.

So much kindness, so much weakness see I. So much justice and sympathy, so much weakness.

Round, honest and kind are they towards each other, as grains of sand are round, honest, and kind unto grains of sand.

Modestly to embrace a small happiness—they call "submission"! And therewith they modestly look sideways after a new small happiness.

At bottom they desire plainly one thing most of all: to be hurt by nobody. Thus they oblige all and do well unto them.

But this is cowardice; although it be called virtue.

And if once they speak harshly, these small folk—I hear therein merely their hoarseness. For every draught of air maketh them hoarse.

Prudent are they; their virtues have prudent fingers. But they are lacking in clenched fists; their fingers know not how to hide themselves behind fists.

For them virtue is what maketh modest and tame. Thereby they have made the wolf a dog, and man himself man's best domestic animal.

"We put our chair in the milst"—thus saith their simpering unto me—"exactly as far from dying gladiators as from happy swine."

This is mediocrity; although it be called moderation.

* The Works of Friedrich Nietzsche. 3 vols. (Unwin.)

Again, this on Marriage:

Worthy and ripe for the significance of earth appeared this man unto me; but, when I saw his wife, earth seemed with me a madhouse.

Yea, I wish the earth would tremble in convulsions whenever a saint and a goose couple.

This one went out for truths like a hero, and at last he secured a little dressed-up lie. He calleth it his marriage.

It will be easily surmised that Nietzsche's literary judgments are startling re-valuations. His own ambition was toward the apothegm, the march of brief gnomic utterances to a chant as of the old Greek hymns. In this he was in no way original. His originality lay in his conception of his attainments. "Aphorism and the sentence, in which I, as the foremost among the Germans, am master, are the forms of eternity; my ambition is to say in ten sentences—what everyone else does not say in a book." In his essay, "My Indebtedness to the Ancients," Nietzsche has a passage which may rank high among expressions of the felicity imparted to the reader by a perfect style:

Up to the present, I have not received from any poet the same artistic rapture as was given to me from the first by an Horatian ode. In certain languages that which is attained there cannot even be willed. That lingual mosaic, where every word, as sound, as position, and as motion, diffuses its force right, left, and over the whole; that minimum in the compass and number of signs, that maximum thus realised in their energy—all that is Roman, and, if you will believe me, it is noble par excellence. All other poetry becomes too popular in comparison with it—mere sentimental loquacity.

Nietzsche's literary hatreds are perfectly explicable to students of his wider opinions. He characteristically tabulates them under the heading, "My Impracticables." These are:

Seneca, or the foreador of virtue.

Rousseau, or return to nature in impuris naturalibus.

Schiller, or the moral Trumpeter of Sackingen.

Dante, or the hyena poetising in tombs.

Kant, or cant as an intelligible character.

Victor Hugo, or Pharos in a sea of absurdity.

Michelet, or enthusiasm which strips off the coat.

Carlyle, or pessimism as an undigested dinner.

John Stuart Mill, or offensive transparency.

The Goncourts, or the two Ajaxes struggling with Homer; music by Offenbach.

Zola, or the delight to stink.

His longer condemnations fall on George Sand, Sainte Beuve, Carlyle, and others. George Sand is "this productive writing cow, who, like her master Rousseau himself, had in her something German in the bad sense." Sainte Beuve is nothing of a man; full of petty resentments against all masculine intellects. . . . Nobody understands better how to mix poison with praise. . . . Ill at ease in everything possessing strength (public opinion, the Academy, the Court, and even Port Royal). Embittered against all greatness in men and things, against all that believes in itself. . . . He behaves otherwise, however, with regard to all matters where a delicate, worn-out taste is the highest tribunal; there he really has the courage of himself, pleasure in himself—there he is a master. In some respects a prototype of Beaudelaire.

And Carlyle—our strong man, our despiser of shams, and adorer of strength? Surely he will fare better! But, observe:

I have read the Life of Thomas Carlyle, that unconscious and unintended farce, that heroic-moral interpretation of dyspeptic conditions. . . . A rhetorician from necessity, who was continually curtailed by the longing for a strong belief and the feeling of incapacity for it (in that respect a typical Romanticist!). The longing for a strong belief is not evidence of a strong belief, rather the contrary. . . . Carlyle deafens something in his nature by the fortissimo of his reverence for men of strong belief, and by his rage against the less stupid; he requires noise. A constant, passionate insincerity towards himself—that is his profession; he is interesting, and will remain interesting thereby. In England, to be sure, he is admired precisely on account of his sincerity. . . . Well, that is English; and in consideration that the English are the people of consummate cant, it is not merely conceivable, but appropriate. After all, Carlyle is an English atheist, who aspires to honour for not being one.

We have taken only a bird's flight over that dark continent of dogmatic thought in which Nietzsche dwelt alone. It were useless, in any case, to come to him with rules and queries. "Why?" said Zarathustra. "Thou askest why? I am not one of those who may be asked for their whys. Would I not require to be a barrel of memory, if I were to have my reasons with me?" Nor need we discuss the obvious and already uttered condemnations of this amazing German. It is well known that his reason left him, but it is an error to suppose that it left him a maniac. He retained his natural dignity, elegance, and sweetness—fading slowly out of a world in which he had proclaimed: "Blessed are the strong, for they shall inherit the earth," and this in scorn of every consequence, prejudice, and establishment. "But Zarathustra sadly said unto his heart: 'They deem me cold and a mocker with terrible jokes.'"

Things Seen.

Neighbours.

It happened not once but many times, and each time it was new. I waited for it to happen again, for here was something rare. Whenever a steamer swept round a bend of the river and raced past us, handkerchiefs, hats, hands were waved in greeting from them to us, from us to them. Every time a steamer passed it happened; every time we and they broke off occupations to wave a greeting to shadowy strangers, to faces we could not see. Men, women, children, all waved as if to say, "It is holiday time: this is our land: we are of one family."

But these signals of comradeship did not end with those on the steamers. As we swept on through the unrecorded hours of that summer day, the fluttering greetings came from the windows of houses, from people walking on the banks, from little groups on barges, and always across the waters the greeting was flashed back. There were no strangers in our world that day. Even a solitary little man, standing on the extremity of a stone breakwater, waved a red handkerchief, and he was answered by a hundred hands. And so it went on, so it will always go on in Rhineland. There there are no strangers. He who is on or near that water-way is your neighbour.

The Pilot.

He came out of the night from nowhere, for evening mists hid the river banks; he went back into the night—to nowhere; but while he remained every eye watched him, every heart beat a little faster for his coming. For the river was swollen, the channel was narrow, and rocks slouched above the foam. He came out from the night in this way. Ahead I spied a small boat beating her way in the steamer's course. In the stern sat a figure, his keen face peeping from between his waterproof cap and cloak. When the steamer drew near, a rope was thrown and caught; for a moment the boat swung alongside, and in that moment he jumped on board. The passengers drew aside; he passed through the lane they made, a solemn, detached figure; he ascended the steps to the bridge, shook hands with the captain, and took the wheel. He spoke to none. We were of no account. His eyes never wandered from the path the steamer must go, and while he steered the captain paced up and down the bridge—captain for this hour but in name. We gave this Unknown, who had come out of the night to guide us safely, our silent homage. In the strangeness of that dark journey through the winding river, with the cliffs towering on either side, and the roar of the rapids beating in our ears, the profession that this Unknown followed became touched with mystery and glory. To do a thing perfectly for the good of many, without the trivialities of speech, and the disappointments of intercourse, and to remain unknown through it all—how fine! He guided us safely past all dangers, and when we reached the wide, open reaches of the river, there ahead was another little boat waiting for him. He renounced the wheel, shook hands with the captain, and descended the steps. As he passed through the line of passengers one cried, "Grüßs' Gott!" "Grüßs' Gott!" he answered, haring his head.

And so the Unknown passed into the night whence he had come.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

Elisabeth de Bavière, by Constantin Christomanos, is as revolting and sickening a book as hysterical and decadent literature has produced. This indelicate Greek cad, admitted as reader, travelling companion, and teacher of Greek to an intimacy as strange as it was inappropriate with the late Empress of Austria, shows his appreciation of that injudicious Royal lady's favour by the publication of a perfervid and maudlin volume, supposed to be the tale of their odd relations. When we read, towards the end of this hideous book, that the Empress said to him: "I can be influenced neither in good nor in evil, for I abandon everything to my interior voices and to my destiny. Have you not remarked that I know more about you than you yourself do? At a first glance I know what men are worth"—we sincerely wish the poor distraught woman, victim of so many unprecedented domestic disasters, had possessed in reality the gift she boasted of, in which case she would have shuddered away from such companionship as she deliberately chose in this maudering rascal.

The book is worthily translated and prefaced by two howling Nationalist humbugs. It is a singular fact that the Nationalists cannot possibly touch anything they do not lamentably soil, mar, or render ridiculous. I can only explain it by the supposition that Nationalism is a form of madness, and not a pleasing or interesting one at that. A certain part of France went off its head recently, and has not yet recovered its mental or moral balance. And so a professor of France, M. Gabriel Syveton, disgraced publicly for his political frolics in the untermated Affair, awaiting the joys of a general rising on a level with that of the Boxers of China, which he and his extraordinary party fondly aspire to, employs his leisure in translating into literary French the unhealthy ravings about an unfortunate sovereign lady of an hysterical Hellene. And M. Maurice Barrès, that apostle of literary blackguardism, gravely prefaces the treason in the high, unmelodious French of which he rejoices in the secret.

The woman is dead under tragic circumstances, and for this reason, if for none other, has a claim upon silence and respectful sympathy. Her life was not a happy one; her nature was not a happy one, and she was mistress of neither. Members of her family still live for whom she is a sacred and private memory. A whole nation has mourned her as empress; a smaller race has loved her as a queen. Are these things of no account to heartless outsiders? Must the woman and the sovereign be held, for the world at large, as mere matter for the self-advertisement of a blatant fool like Constantin Christomanos, as food for the vulgar and the indiscreet? We will admit—poor crowned eccentric, who could not wear her coronet of thorns without public revolt—that she gave herself as a meal to the indiscreet, but is that a reason why the decent among us should not feel an ardent desire to kick and maul the poetical M. Christomanos? Even M. Barrès, with his famous cult of his "moi," and his well-known indelicacy of pen, is obliged to head a quotation from the learned doctor's pages with this significant statement: "You will realise what faults and qualities are those of our guide only in reading this first page, charming in its love of beauty, and in which we recognise a distant brother, all impregnated with Orientalism, of our Julian Sorel." Now Julian Sorel, Stendhal's hero of Rouge et Noir, is the sorriest, the most squalid and unspeakable cad of all French literature. In seeking a fit and base comparison, it would be difficult to sink into a lower depth of humanity. Here are extracts from what M. Barrès calls the self-revealing page. The Empress desires to learn Greek, and M. Christomanos, a young student at Vienna, having been recommended to her, a court carriage calls at his door to take him to the palace. He awaits the Empress by order in the Park:

I was filled with unutterable emotion. Around a bush trembling under the innumerable gold flowers of the mimosa, hives of bees hummed. All these little balls in flower shed with their intoxicating perfume a golden smile. In truth, they knew not that they were there as much for me as for the bees, that their glance, their embalmed breath should render for me the hour unforgettable as well as give honey to the bees. . . . I still feel the ineffable poetry of that hour of waiting, which carried me far away from myself towards the distant infinite, which precipitated me in the abyss. So that, when I came back to myself, I was the prey of a strange sensation as if from greenish and crepuscular depths of the sea a powerful wave had cast me upon a land foreign and unknown to the land of life. And while I waited there my heart was more and more filled with the certitude that I was on the point of seeing appear what my life would hold most precious. Suddenly SHE was before me. I felt HER approach, and the sensation of her coming seemed to have sprung within me as long as if I had lived through it hours and years. SHE was before me, bent a little forward. Her head was detached upon a background of white parasol radiant with sunshine, whence started a kind of vaporous nimbus round her forehead. In her left hand she held a black fan slightly inclined to her cheek. Her eyes of clear gold looked fixedly at me, scanning the features of my visage, animated with the desire of discovering something there. Did they find what they sought? Was it later that they smiled upon me, or from the first did they greet me with those smiling beams?

Poor Elisabeth of Bavaria! Whatever she may have sought in the visage of the modern Hellene, she assuredly could have found no trace of the gentleman. Now a poet, a romancer, may write this sort of stuff by the yard when it is a question of a lover and an anonymous mistress; but an unhappy dead lady, but yesterday having won with her blood a niche in history, to be made the subject of this tasteless lyricism, is a revolting thought. Did she really pose as he makes her, printing "she" and "her" in capital letters, as travelling over an unappreciative universe in dual solitude with Dr. Christomanos? Wherever you meet them—at Lainz, Schönbrunn, in Ionian waters, in the paradise of Corfu—it is never the Empress of Austria and her surroundings; it is eternally Elisabeth of Bavaria talking of her soul and her philosophy of life in the hushed twilight of dawn, in the glimmer of russet woods, upon a sunlit sea, along moonlit lawns and shadowy glens with the eloquent Dr. Christomanos. Like Browning's Star, he would have us believe that she opened her heart to him, and we feel sorrier for Elisabeth of Bavaria than a little while ago.

H. L.

Correspondence.

The Jargon of Criticism.

SIR,—May I venture, as a public librarian, to say a word on this subject, with special reference to criticism of novels? When the number of public libraries and their requirements are taken into account, it will be allowed that librarians have a very practical interest in the matter.

It is not too much to say that the current criticism of novels is, in the majority of cases, practically worthless as affording any real guidance to librarians in the selection of fiction. The reason is not unknown to literary men, and, as having reviewed many hundreds of novels, I can endorse what one of your correspondents says in the current issue of the ACADEMY on that point. It is largely due to lack of conscientious work on the part of reviewers, induced by the conditions of the work itself.

Let me explain. In most places, from the metropolis to the smallest country town with its weekly or bi-weekly, there is always a superabundance of persons ready to undertake the reviewing of novels—not to speak of other classes of literature—for the books, and for the delight of the thing, and editors are, naturally, quite willing to take advantage of their services. And no doubt such persons, while the work interests them, do their best to form and express a fair judgment on the books placed in their hands; but, as all who have tried it know, the reviewing of fiction becomes in time a depressing duty. Unless one has special encouragement to continue to do his best, or has exceptional pride in his work, he usually ceases largely or wholly to read with any degree of carefulness the novels that lie till the last moment unopened on his study table. Hence in a large measure the “confirmed habit of agreeableness” in criticism, for to express an adverse opinion on a book demands that the critic must at least have read it.

Very well. Public librarians, in selecting fiction, have to deal with a prevalent criticism that is conflicting and unreliable. They read a criticism of a new author's book couched in all the familiar terms of agreeable commendation, and, anxious to provide readers with the latest and best fiction, they include this work in their next order—to find, in many cases, that circulation of the book among general readers would, to say the least, not tend to the elevation of the public taste. For myself, I am gradually amassing a little pile of such books that, having read, I should not think of placing in circulation, and, having cut, am precluded from returning to the bookseller.

In view of this condition of things, I should like to tender a practical suggestion to publishers. Librarians are, for the most part, always glad to have reliable information about new books, and I am sure they would welcome from publishers a circular setting forth an outline of new novels, and showing under what conditions the characters live and move and have their being. Such a circular must not attempt to characterise the books in any way, for then it will immediately become valueless; and it must not come to hand, as some publishers' circulars do, at stated periods. To be of real use it must be available on the publication of the works to which it refers. Information thus supplied would not fill the place of candid and reliable reviews; but, in the absence of these, it would at least enable librarians to judge, as far as is possible without having read the books, of what manner of work they are.—I am, &c., A PUBLIC LIBRARIAN.

August 25, 1900.

SIR,—I am interested in “Miles Enderby's” letter in this week's ACADEMY, partly because I am also a casual unpaid reviewer and also because I agree with him in what he says about editors not wanting good work. Unlike him, however, I am not at all sorry for myself, for I like seeing such quantities of new books, apart from the pleasure of criticising them! In my humble opinion most of the editors of provincial daily papers do not know what good literary work is: they may be excellent political journalists, but more often than not they have not the slightest literary instinct. Therefore if they can get a dozen book reviews of varying length for their weekly “Literary Page” they are quite satisfied, and do not wish to remunerate the reviewer either for good work or bad. When the good time comes in which everything that appears in a paper will be paid for—including the personal paragraphs under the heading “Society,” by those who send the paragraphs—we may expect the literary part of a provincial daily to be as good as its political and commercial columns. Until then, we who are foolish (?) enough to review for the shilling-a-volume wage must try and do our duty both to the unsuspecting public and to the author. Possibly the unpaid reviewer deals more faithfully with the latter than does he who is adjudged worthy of his hire. Our position, if unpaid, is assuredly one of some influence—a consoling thought which I offer to “Miles Enderby”—and I for one most certainly enjoy it.—I am, &c., “LOQUACIOUS VESSEL.”

August 25, 1900.

Ruskin on Epitaphs.

SIR,—Read in connexion with the results of your Prize Competition of this week, the following extracts from Fors Clavigera may interest some of your readers:

... take care that some memorial is kept of men who deserve memory in a distinct statement on the stone or brass of their tombs, either that they were true men or rascals—wise men or fools.

How beautiful the variety of sepulchral architecture might be, in any extensive place of burial, if the public would meet the small expense of thus expressing its opinions in a verily instructive manner, and if some of the tombstones accordingly terminated in fools'-caps, and others, instead of crosses and cherubs, bore engravings of cats-of-nine-tails, as typical of the probable methods of entertainment in the next world, of the persons not, it is to be hoped, reposing below. . . .

The wisest men are wise to the full in death, and, if you would give them, instead of stately tombs, only so much honour as to do their will, when they themselves can no more contend for it, you would find it good memorial of them, such as the best of them would desire, and full of blessing to all men for all time.

—I am, &c.,

Edinburgh: August 26, 1900.

L. C. JACK.

“The Dictionary of National Biography.”

SIR,—I think that it is much to be regretted that one of the most interesting and instructive works of the age is practically a sealed book to the public—I allude to The Dictionary of National Biography. It is a vast work of some sixty volumes, but each volume is complete in itself. It can, of course, be seen at the British Museum and some other libraries, but something more than this is needed to make it accessible to the reading public. I applied to Mudie's about it, and received reply that it was unsuitable for their purposes. I cannot understand why this should be, and feel assured that if they and other libraries had a copy of it, and made it known to their subscribers, there are many persons who would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of reading it. It is a work the reading of which ought, I submit, be facilitated as much as possible, and I should be glad to see some expression of your opinion on the subject.—I am, &c.,
S. A. RAM.

32, Oakley-square, N.W.: August 25, 1900.

[We are not surprised by Messrs. Mudie's reply. Nor can we quite see how a work of reference consisting of sixty odd volumes is to be made generally available.]

The Coisoned Pup.

SIR,—It is interesting to note in "W.'s" able article on page 155 of your last number that the Pall Mall Gazette had its "coisoned pup"! It would be instructive if you would give a name to this particular pup, explaining his canine propensities. Much has been written in your recent columns upon English words that have fallen into disuse, and though to "coison" is doubtless a verb which is fraught with terse meaning (especially when qualifying the Pall Mall Gazette's pup), yet my dictionary hath it not. Kindly elucidate, and explain. Or is the whole but the vagary of a humorous compositor who has been admitted upon the grave staff of the ACADEMY by mistake?—I am, &c., FOGGED.

[Under the editorship of Mr. Henry John Cockayne Cust, the Pall Mall Gazette was noted for its "occ. verse" (still kept up), and for the original titles given to its leading articles. On one occasion, when an article had been called The Poisoned Cup, Mr. Cust was dissatisfied with so commonplace a title. Time pressed, and no alternative suggesting itself, Mr. Cust transposed the capitals and caught his train.]

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 49 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best inscription suitable for the proposed medallion of John Ruskin in Westminster Abbey. The suggestions are well meaning, but rarely are they simple, forcible, and original. There is too much of the old accumulative eulogy. The description of Ruskin as a man, "Who held with Farrar that God's Best Gifts are the Commonest," strikes us as being, in some respects, the most extraordinary line ever suggested for the monument of a great man. We award the prize to Mr J. R. Anderson, Lairbeck, Keswick.

HE TAUGHT US TO HOLD
IN LOVING REVERENCE
POOR MEN AND THEIR WORK
GREAT MEN AND THEIR WORK
GOD AND HIS WORK.

Other contributions are as follows:

Noble, disinterested, pure in thought and deed; he sought the unattainable, and found some neglected sheaves of truth. His life was a protest against a gain-greedy and self-seeking age. He added new graces to criticism, and gave a fresh meaning to the moral significance of art; for he saw the beauty of Truth, and the truth of Beauty; while he laboured always to expose what was false or insincere in Art and Life. His monument is not here: it must be sought for in his country's Literature, to which he has added an immortal lustre. [A. E. W., Inverness.]

To the memory of John Ruskin: one who sought in everything the good, the beautiful, and the true: who held with Farrar that God's best gifts are the commonest: who laboured strenuously in the service of his fellow-man without desire of earthly reward: who played upon our hearts as on a harp: and make our eyes bright as we speak of him: whose heart had a look southwards: and was open to the whole noon of nature: and who cultivated that nobleness born of a chastened and reverent fancy, which turns the common dust of servile opportunity to gold.
[A. G., Cheltenham.]

To him "God appeared in perfect beauty." His life was spent in the endeavour to reveal this "perfect beauty" to others. Even as he saw it himself—in nature, in art, and in literature. His spirit will live enshrined in his books while there are men who desire beauty, not for its own sake alone, but as a revelation of God. Ruskin needs no other monument.
[E. W. H., Manchester.]

Erected to the memory of one who was the apostle of Truth and the priest of Beauty; a man who spent his life in the endeavour to benefit his fellow-men by the eloquent exposition of a creed which held that Truth, administered by Justice, renders Life more righteous, and that Truth, revealed by Art, makes Life more beautiful.
[L. N. H., Barnet.]

To John Ruskin, who telling men of the beauty that is in Nature and in Art, and of the beauty that might be in their own lives, also exemplified that beauty in his life and in his writings.
[E. R. P., Liverpool.]

The morning breaks, the shadows flee away,
Earth's blinding mist falls from the tired eyes
Of him, the Seer, whose long vigil dies
Before the dawning of the perfect day.
For lagging Death no longer doth delay,
And swift the unimprisoned spirit flies
Within the veil, where now at rest it lies,
Hushed from the turmoil of life's weary way
For on this Seer life pressed heavily!
He saw the distant heights, crowned with pure white
Of Truth's fair fame, where dwells in mystery
The Spirit: and to reveal that glorious sight
To all mankind, he laboured ceaselessly.

[A. M. P., Hampstead.]

To the glory of God and in lasting memory of John Ruskin. As art critic he laboured strenuously to create a truer love of the beautiful and to lay down those eternal principles which underlie the art of all ages; while, as moral reformer, he exercised through his books a most beneficent and widespread influence. His high ideals, his great mental vigour, and his almost unparalleled moral energy, imparted fresh impulses towards righteousness to the age in which he lived.
[T. H., Stoke-on-Trent.]

Other replies from: M. F., Strathpeffer; F. A., Weymouth; I. S., Clapham; W. S. B., London; Mrs. L. M. S., London; Mrs. von S., London; E. D., Chelsea; Z. McC., Whitby; P. H. M., Manchester; H. W., Neath; E. H. H., Streatham; C. C., London.

Competition No. 50 (New Series).

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best rendering into English verse of the following beautiful lines by Victor Hugo:

Écoutez!—Comme un nid qui murmure invisible,
Un bruit confus s'approche, et des rires, des voix,
Des pas, sortent du fond vertigineux des bois.
Et voici qu'à travers la grande forêt brune
Qu'emplit la rêverie immense de la lune,
On entend frissonner et vibrer mollement,
Communiquant au bois son doux frémissement,
La guitare des monts d'Alspruck, reconnaissable
Au grelot de son manche où sonne un grain de sable;
Il s'y mêle la voix d'un homme, et ce frisson
Prend un sens et devient une vague chanson.

La mélodie encor quelques instants se traîne
Sous les arbres bleuis par la lue sereine,
Puis tremble, puis expire, et la voix qui chantait
S'éteint comme un oiseau se pose; tout se tait.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Hastings (James), A Dictionary of the Bible. Vol. III. (Clark) 2s/
Drummond (Rev. R. J.), The Relation of the Apostolic Teaching to the Teaching of Christ (Clark) 10/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Moore (T. Sturge), Altdorfer (Unicorn Press) net 2/6
Rothenstein (W.), Goya (Unicorn Press) net 2/6
Hcole (Charles H.), Attempts in Verse (Rivingtons) 4/6
Burleigh (Oakes), Leafing Willows (Reading: Thorp)
Deighton (K.), The Old Dramatists (Thacker) 5/0
Williamson (George C.), Perugino (Bell) net 5/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Griffiths (Major A.), Famous British Regiments (Unwin) 2/6
Pengelly (R. E.), John Ruskin (Andrew Melrose) net 1/0
Hillegas (Howard C.), With the Boer Forces (Methuen) 6/0
Jones (David Brynmor), The Welsh People (Unwin) 16/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Poddy (Alex. A.), Days in Galilee and Scenes in Judæa (Gay & Bird)
Stocum (Captain J.), Sailing Alone Round the World Sampson Low 8/6

JUVENILE.

Leasr (Edward), The Pelican Chorus. With Drawings by L. Leslie Brooke (Warne) 3/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Padovan (A.), Figli della Gloria (Hoeppli, Milan)
Whitmore (C. A.), Municipal London, 1900 (Black) 1/0
An Amateur Mechanic. How to Make and How to Mend Schenkschein 2/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Bos (Dr. J. Ritzema), Agricultural Zoology. Trans. by J. R. Ainsworth
Davis (Methuen) 3/6
Carroll (John), Freehand Drawing of Ornament (Burns & Oates) 1/6
Ellis (S. F.), The Romance of the Rose: Temple Classics (Dent) net 1/6
Macaulay (Lord), Critical and Historical Essays: Temple Classics
(Dent) net 1/6
Swayne (Major H. G. C.), Seventeen Trips through Somaliland. 2nd Edition (Rowland Ward) net 7/6
Whibley (Charles), Rabelais. Vol. III. The Tudor Translations ... (Nutt)

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere

GOVERNESSES for PRIVATE FAMILIES—MISS LOUISA BROTHAN can RECOMMEND several highly-qualified English and Foreign Governesses for Resident and Daily Engagements.—CENTRAL REGISTRY for TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

"Miss Rossi writes with grace, humour, and vivacity."
The Speaker.

LESSONS by CORRESPONDENCE.—The art of Literary Composition, like other arts, cannot be acquired, because it is the expression of the artist's personality.

But, like every other art, it rests on a basis of knowledge, and of principles which may easily be acquired. The system of instruction is adapted to meet the requirements of each correspondent. A subject is set for a composition of a given length, which is returned with marginal comments and corrections, and, in addition, a couple of sheets giving reasons for each correction, and practical advice.

MSs. already written may be substituted for the subject set, and will be carefully criticised.

Fee, payable in advance: Twelve lessons, Three Guineas; or a trial course of three, One Guinea.

Miss Rossi, 32, Monmouth Road, Bayswater, London, W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—THE SEPTEMBER CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW REMAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SONS, Library Department, 156, Strand, London, W.C.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

An American Transport in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2½%

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2½%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.—DRAUGHTSMAN in the HYDROGRAPHICAL DEPARTMENT of the ADMIRALTY (1725), 6th SEPTEMBER.
The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS.—ASSISTANT in the NAUTICAL ALMANAC OFFICE of the ADMIRALTY (1825), 10th SEPTEMBER.—FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.
The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the SECRETARY, Civil Service Commission, London, S.W.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SOUTH WALES and MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The Council invites APPLICATIONS for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER in HISTORY and ENGLISH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE.

Applications, with testimonials, must be received by the undersigned not later than September 9th, 1900.

Particulars may be obtained on application to

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Secretary and Registrar.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 2nd, 1900—viz., Two Senior Open Scholarships, value £75 each, will be awarded to the best candidates (if of sufficient merit) in not more than three nor fewer than two of the following:—Chemistry, Physics, Zoology, Botany, Physiology, Anatomy.

Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty-one years of age (if of sufficient merit) in not fewer than three of the following:—Botany, Zoology, Physiology, Physics, and Chemistry.

The Jeaffreson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Class Subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of June, 1900.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc. Examinations of the University of London will commence on October 1st, and continue till July, 1901. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum.

Fee for the whole Course, £21, or £18 18s to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken.

There is a Special Class for the January Examination.

For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

LONDON LIBRARY, St. James's Square, S.W.

Patron—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G. President—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.
Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.; the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.
Trustees—Right Hon. LORD AYLESBURY, F.R.S.; Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.
Committee—Rev. Canon AINGER; Dr. J. H. BRIGGS; Prof. LEWIS CAMPBELL; J. W. COUTHOPPE, Esq., C.B.; EARL of CREVE; AUSTIN DOBSON, Esq.; SYDNEY GROGE, Esq., M.P.; Sir A. GEIKIE, F.R.S.; Sir R. GIFFEN, K.C.B., F.R.S.; EDMUND GOSSE, Esq., LL.D.; Mrs. J. R. GREEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; Sir C. P. LEBERT, K.C.S.I.; Sir C. M. KENNEDY, C.B., K.C.M.G.; SIDNEY LEE, Esq.; W. S. LILLY, Esq.; SIDNEY J. LOW, Esq.; FRANK T. MARZIALS, Esq.; Sir F. POLLOCK, Bart.; Rev. Dr. RIGG; S. ARTHUR STRONG, Esq.; H. R. TEDDER, Esq.; Sir SPENCER WALPOLE, K.C.B.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. CATALOGUE, FIFTH EDITION, 1888, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

No. 283.—SEPTEMBER, 1900.

"BUSINESS PRINCIPLES" in the PUBLIC SERVICE. By EDMUND ROBERTSON, Q.C., M.P. (late Civil Lord of the Admiralty).

THE STAFF WORK in the WAR. By Colonel LONSDALE HALE.

THE RELIGIONS of CHINA.—I. Confucianism. By the Right Hon. Professor MAX MÜLLER.

THE SITUATION in ITALY. By Signor GIOVANNI DALLA VECCHIA.

AMERICAN IMPERIALISM. By BRADLEY MARTIN, Jun.

OUR ALLIES at WATERLOO. By Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.

THE TRADITIONAL "BRITISH SAILOR." By W. J. FLEICHER.

THE MAIOLICA of SIENA. By LANGTON DOUGLAS.

THE OLDEST PICTURE-BOOK of ALL. By E. WALTER MAUNDER (Assistant, Greenwich Observatory).

STATISTICS of SUICIDE. By REGINALD A. SKELTON.

THE BURDEN of COAL. By BENJAMIN TAYLOR.

THE NEWSPAPERS. By Sir WEMYSS REID.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR HOSPITALS. By MURRAY GUTHRIE, M.P.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD

MUDIE'S LIBRARY (LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria

Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

"This new novel by 'John Oliver Hobbes' is a triumph of intellectual creativeness, and it has held me captive from cover to cover."

C. K. S., in THE SPHERE.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSTALLS.

6s. (In Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

EXTRACTS FROM REVIEWS:—

Spectator.—"This brilliant novel is written with a distinction unfamiliar in contemporary fiction."

Daily Telegraph.—"A book that everyone will talk of."

Daily News.—"Mrs. Craigie's characters—even the most introspective—are, however, so well drawn that it is difficult to have too much of them."

Athenæum.—"A piece of writing that shows a very adroit mastery of many elements."

Globe.—"The bold experiment again succeeds, and its success is a thing on which Mrs. Craigie may be especially congratulated."

Standard.—"Robert Orange" is a remarkable book."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Its comedy is alive with the brilliant, half-cynical observation of character."

Westminster Gazette.—"Almost a remarkable, as it is certainly a most conscientious, study in emotion."

The World.—"There is no possibility of considering this remarkable book in any other light than as the complement of the equally remarkable book which preceded it. It is, probably, one of the most subtle essays on man ever written by a woman."

Anglian Daily Times.—"The average novel reader may jib at certain pages of 'Robert Orange,' but the whole book is an interesting and powerful piece of work by a lady novelist possessing a rare individuality."

Daily Express.—"Robert Orange" is in the air, and it is impossible to get away from it. Moreover, not to have read it is to confess to being 'out of the movement.'"

Sunday Special.—"A notable achievement in literary art... It is a most interesting story, and it is interesting, not so much for anything the characters of it do, or even say, but for the characters themselves, and for what they feel, for the emotional, the inner life of them... The one demand we have a right to make of a novelist is that he shall interest us. That John Oliver Hobbes has done, and done thoroughly."

Speaker.—"A most entertaining book... There is no novelist living, except George Meredith, who can equal Mrs. Craigie in the power of making striking and interesting personalities live in their work."

Echo.—"Rarely can it be said of the sequel of a novel that it equals, much less surpasses, its predecessor, but such a compliment is certainly due to 'Robert Orange,' the new romance in which 'John Oliver Hobbes' continues the history of the hero already familiar to readers of 'The School for Saints.'"

Tablet.—"Light the book is, with never a thought of levity; 'smart,' if that is to be the word, with no hint of either vanity or vulgarity, with no strain after paradox, no paltering with truth. To say of people that they are very good is often tantamount to saying of them that they are very dull. That, no doubt, is because we live in an imperfect world. This book, at any rate, gives no quarter to such a reproach. It is the work of one whose wit is as alert as her orthodoxy is openly declared."

Star.—"The School for Saints" was good, but 'Robert Orange' (Fisher Unwin), unlike most sequels, is better."

Country Life.—"Robert Orange" is a sequel to 'The School for Saints,' and a worthy sequel; but it may be read very well, by a slight exercise of the imagination in the concluding chapters, as a single production, and, so read, it will produce an abiding impression on any thoughtful mind.... Robert Orange is an eminently religious book, but it is conspicuously bright also; it is political, but it is also witty; it is philosophical, but it is also shrewd; it is an artistic collection of character studies, but they are all human, and nearly all of individual and original type. But it has action also; in it many love stories run their troubled course simultaneously."

Sunday Times.—"Perhaps 'Robert Orange' may best be classed as being worthy to be placed among those works that we keep, not those that we send back to the lending library; and for such there is always room."

C. S. SKEET, in The Londoner.—"The great quality of this book, however, as that of most of Mrs. Craigie's other books, is that, whether in romance or comedy or analysis of character, it is always the opposite of the commonplace—not with the cheap effects of paradox, but because the author has an eye for colour and for contrast, and a spontaneous brilliancy of expression. One is so weary of laborious contrivances of adventure, of conventional pictures of 'Society'—the members of which are supposed to spend all their time in restaurants making rapid repartees—of superficial and happy-go-lucky psychology. Or one would be weary if one read them. Mrs. Craigie's books are stimulating, provocative, always distinguished, and always interesting. And thus one is, I think, the best of them."

Christian World.—"It will be appreciated by those who recognise the beauty and literary charm of Mrs. Craigie's work.... It is a book to read, and cannot fail to add greatly to Mrs. Craigie's reputation as a writer of exceptional ability."

Scotsman.—"Its literary accomplishment is remarkable; and the book, showing its author at her best, cannot fail to be widely and eagerly read."

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

Frederick Warne & Co.'s Publications

NEW NOVEL BY MAX O'RELL.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Woman and Artist.

By MAX O'RELL,

Author of "John Bull and his Island," "John Bull and Co."

PRESS OPINIONS.

Lloyds' News.—"Anything from the pen of the clever Frenchman, whose acute yet amiable criticisms of things English have amused us all, is sure to be interesting. The present story is more than that, for it is an admirable and fascinating piece of fiction, the underlying aim of which would seem to be the glorification of English womanhood. The book sparkles with bright phrases and sayings."

Saturday Review.—"Told in a bright and genial style, Max O'Rell's story is at once interesting. He has caught the atmosphere of student life in London. His character sketches are excellent."

Daily Telegraph.—"Good things are life in this delightful book, which ought to win a shining success."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"It is not only for the story, we need hardly say, that 'Woman and Artist' is to be enjoyed, though that is always interesting. Max O'Rell's lively wit and satire of things English dash out throughout, sometimes very brilliantly."

Sheffield Daily Telegraph.—"A clever and thoroughly entertaining story, interesting in plot, and full of smart epigrammatic writing."

NEW VOLUME BY SILAS K. HOCKING.

When Life is Young.

With Illustrations by Lancelot Speed.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 2s. 6d.

"Good construction, charm of plot, and avoidance of overcrowding the characters mark Mr. Silas Hocking's work. In the present instance he has given us plenty of exciting incident without degeneration into sensationalism, and a vigorous coherent tale from beginning to end."—Lloyds' News.

"As in all Mr. Hocking's novels, there is plenty of incident in the story, with many dramatic scenes, showing an intimate knowledge of many phases of life, and keen observation of the lights and shadows of human character."

Birmingham Gazette.

The Dogs of War.

A Romance of the Civil War.

By EDGAR PICKERING. With Illustrations by Lancelot Speed.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6s.

In large crown 8to, cloth gilt, gilt edges, price 7s. 6d.

Heroes of the United Service.

Records of Noble Deeds in the British Army and Navy.

By the late Mrs. L. VALENTINE.

With Upwards of 150 Illustrations in the Text and 32 Full-page

Plates, by Clarkson Stanfield, R. Caton Woodville,

Lancelot Speed, &c.

"This, the final work of Mrs. Valentine, whose writings have won considerable popularity, is one that should be a great favourite with both boys and girls, and, at the same time, may be read with profit by men and women. Our rough island story is so full of brave deeds by our soldiers and sailors that it is difficult to make a selection. Mrs. Valentine has, however, in this handsome, profusely illustrated volume, performed that task with remarkable success."

Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

POCKET VOLUME. BOUND IN KHAKI.

Small 24mo, cloth, red lettered, gilt top, 1s.

SOLDIER SONGS: a New Military Song Book

Containing the latest Popular Songs, including—

THE SOLDIERS OF THE QUEEN.

PRIVATE TOMMY ATKINS.

WHO CARRIES THE GUN.

THE DEATHLESS ARMY.

THE UNION JACK.

THE OLD BRIGADE.

TO THE FRONT, &c.

To which are added the Collection Edited by J. E. CARPENTER.

Also issued in limp red lambskin, 2s. net.

POCKET VOLUME. BOUND IN NAVY BLUE.

Small 24mo, cloth, white-lettered, gilt top, price 1s.

In navy blue lambskin, 2s. net.

SAILOR SONGS: a New Naval Song Book,

Containing the latest Popular Songs, including

THEY ALL LOVE JACK.

THE DEATH OF NELSON. THE MIDSHIPMITE, &c.

To which are added the Collection Edited by J. E. CARPENTER.

London: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., and New York

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

NOW READY.

THE MASTER CHRISTIAN.

By MARIE CORELLI.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The demand for Miss MARIE CORELLI'S New Romance, THE MASTER CHRISTIAN, continues to exceed all precedent. The first number printed—75,000 Copies—is the largest on record, and Messrs. METHUEN have increased this by 25,000, making in all 100,000 COPIES printed before publication.

THE GATELESS BARRIER. By LUCAS MALET, Author of "The Wages of Sin." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The workmanship of the book is eminently admirable. Mr. Rivers is a brilliant character study. The book is written with distinction, reticence, humour, and power."—Lancet.

"It is but seldom that one is delighted by so masterly and graceful handling of the supernatural in fiction as is found in this work."—Glasgow Herald.

"This beautiful and thoughtful book."—Public Opinion.

"Genuine imagination and charm have been at work here. The writing is always elegant and polished."—Daily Chronicle.

"In 'The Gateless Barrier' it is at once evident that, whilst Lucas Malet has preserved her birthright of originality, the artistry, the actual writing, is above even the high level of the books that were born before."—Westminster Gazette.

"ENGLISH NELL."

SIMON DALE By ANTHONY HOPE. Fourth Edition. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fifth Edition in the Press.]

GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE WALKERS OF SOUTHGATE: being the Chronicles of a Cricketing Family. By W. A. BETTESWORTH. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s.

"One of the most interesting cricket books of recent times."—World.

"A worthy memorial of the famous family."—Glasgow Herald.

"It teems with reminiscences of the famous brotherhood."—Referee.

"A volume which every lover of the game of games should add to his library."—Cutlook.

DARTMOOR: a Descriptive and Historical Sketch. By S. BARING-GOULD. With Plans and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A most delightful guide, companion, and instructor."—Scotsman.

"A most delightful book."—Daily News.

"The book has colour, spirit, and individuality."—Daily Chronicle.

"Informed with close personal knowledge."—Saturday Review.

WITH THE BOER FORCES. By HOWARD C. HILLEGAS. With 24 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SIEGE OF MAFEKING. By J. ANGUS HAMILTON. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RELIEF OF MAFEKING By FILSON YOUNG. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE PEOPLE OF CHINA. By J. W. ROBERTSON-SCOTT. With a Map. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

POETRY.

WRIT IN BARRACKS. By EDGAR WALLACE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

BELLES LETTRES.

THE LITTLE GUIDES.—Pott 8vo, cloth, 3s.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. By G. E. TROUTBECK. Illustrated by F. D. Bedford.

SUSSEX. By F. G. BRABANT, M.A. Illustrated by E. H. New.

THE NOVELS OF CHARLES DICKENS.

With Introductions by GEORGE GISSING. Notes by F. G. KITTON, and Illustrations.—Crown 8vo. Each Volume, cloth, 3s. net; leather, 4s. 6d. net.

THE PICKWICK PAPERS. With Illustrations by E. H. NEW. 2 vols.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. With Illustrations by R. J. WILLIAMS. 2 vols.

THE LITTLE LIBRARY.

With Introductions, Notes, and Photogravure Frontispieces. Pott 8vo. Each Volume, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net—NEW VOLUMES.

THE EARLY POEMS OF ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by J. C. COLLINS, M.A.

MAUD. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.

CRANFORD. By Mrs. GASKELL. Edited by E. V. LUCAS.

SCIENTIFIC AND EDUCATIONAL.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF LARGE INDUCTION COILS. By A. T. HARE, M.A. With numerous Diagrams. Demy 8vo, 6s.

LACE-MAKING IN THE MIDLANDS, PAST AND PRESENT. By C. C. CHANNER and M. E. ROBERTS. With sixteen full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

AGRICULTURAL ZOOLOGY. By Dr. J. RITZEMA BOS. Translated by J. R. AINSWORTH DAVIS, M.A. With an Introduction by ELEANOR A. ORMEROD, F.E.S. With 155 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A GERMAN COMMERCIAL READER By S. BALLY, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. [METHUEN'S COMMERCIAL SERIES.]

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. METHUEN will publish, on September 12, A MASTER of CRAFT, by W. W. JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes"; and on September 17, CUNNING MURRELL, by ARTHUR MORRISON, Author of "Tales of Mean Streets." A Novel of Modern Society and Politics, entitled QUISANTE, by ANTHONY HOPE, will be published on October 10.

SEVEN POPULAR NOVELS.—Six Shillings Each.

THE GATELESS BARRIER.

LUCAS MALET.

WINEFRED.

S. BARING-GOULD.

THE SOFT SIDE.

HENRY JAMES.

PATH and GOAL.

ADA CAMBRIDGE.

SONS of the MORNING.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

THE SEEN and the UNSEEN.

RICHARD MARSH.

THE CONQUEST of LONDON.

DOROTHEA GERARD.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1479. Established 1869.

8 September, 1900.

Price Threepence
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

NEXT week we shall publish an Education Supplement containing, besides reviews, several articles of general interest, one of which will deal with the best methods of imparting a taste for literature in schools.

MR. W. J. STILLMAN writes us as follows from Frimley Green, Surrey: "I am just now informed by a person, who himself seems directly informed, that the 'Light of the World' of Mr. Holman Hunt has been destroyed as heretical by a Roman Catholic lady who was its possessor. My information is that the destruction was decided on under the persuasion of the lady's confessor. Cannot some reader, if not yourself, confirm or, better, contradict the report?" We cannot believe it; but neither can we contradict it.

MR. WILLIAM WATSON'S illness has passed the acute stage, but his complete recovery will necessarily be slow.

THE controversy as to the authorship of Elizabeth and her German Garden is still mildly agitating the literary backwaters. What if the Miss Beauchamp who married a German baron and the Countess Arnim were one and the same person? "C. K. S.," in the Sphere, has a last quaint comment on the Pless legend: "It is probably sufficient for Princess Henry of Pless to carry out Mr. Ruskin's ideal of what is woman's noblest attribute—the art of looking charming." An agreeable epitaph on an imaginary literary reputation.

MR. THOMAS WRIGHT is to publish, with Mr. Fisher Unwin, a volume of Cowper's verses, containing twenty-eight poems and fragments. This does not surprise, after the poet's recent centenary celebration; but we are always inclined to regret these disinterments of work which the author preferred to bury.

MR. MURRAY sends us a specimen of the blue cover in which the Monthly Review will be issued. It is a little stern and official in appearance, but decidedly handsome, and unlike the cover of any other magazine. A small head of Minerva is stamped in relief in the centre of the front cover.

THE Free Lance is to justify its adjective. Mrs. Clement Scott, who has just "won a prize for being one of the best-dressed women in London," is to contribute a weekly fashion article to the Free Lance, and is now in Paris organising her department. This promise of millinery is accompanied by another of war exposures "even more serious than Mr. Burdett-Coutts's recent charges."

IN reference to a correspondent's letter of last week stating that the Dictionary of National Biography could not be procured at Mudie's, we have received a communication from Mr. William P. Dickson, of Glasgow, who was president of the Library Association in 1888. He reminds us that at the Glasgow meeting of that association he suggested that such works as Dr. Murray's Dictionary of the English Language and the Dictionary of National Biography, being indispensable to even the smallest public library, might be presented to such libraries, as a local benefit and public service, by men of means. The suggestion appears to us an admirable one, and not impossible of realisation.

THE Daily Mail, a few days ago, published an article of the permissibly personal type on Mr. James Lane Allen. The writer points out that the author of The Increasing Purpose has revived in England that belief in the literary future of America which was born with Hawthorne and Poe, but which had faded in the interval because of the lack of genuine impulse and imagination in American work. This is a daring statement of English feeling, and also somewhat unjust to literary America. We admit that Mr. Allen has most worthily achieved his popularity, but it seems rather early to claim it as an indication on which to base a statement so general. Mr. Allen has put aside The Mettle of the Pasture, on which he has been at work, to take up another theme which has made a more urgent claim on his imagination. The writer in the Daily Mail is not at liberty to state the nature or title of this story, but suggests that it is to concern itself with recent psychological developments in the study of birds and animals: this, of course, in addition to strong human interest.

THE further confessions of Marie Bashkirtseff, continued in the Gentlewoman, carry us on another two months, from November, '83, to January, '84. Her moods are unchangeably changeful:

Now, I have here a study on Chopin, Liszt, Paganini—artists with hands kissed by duchesses, grand seigneurs, artist gods! Wagner was one of them. Then, my little one, you are sensible only of these mundane, noisy, and outward glories! No! But I demand that genius should be accompanied by them. Genius ought to enjoy all music, all incense, all flowers. Life, enriched with so much adoration, takes in my eyes its true aspect.

Ah! my God! Let me be independent, let me work, make of me a veritable star!

How characteristic is this:

I have made Julian come for my statue, which is finished as a sketch. He is entranced, and says, "Very good, exquisite, charming, captivating," which means that I no longer esteem Julian.

And this, which sums herself up so concisely:

I am tempted to give thanks to God that I have painted the cap in the picture, and it looks very well. I have a nature so diverse and so droll that I might be one of the happiest creatures in the universe if . . . I really meant to be.

IN the current number of the Author Sir Walter Besant has a word to say concerning the coming publishing season. He suggests that it would be wise to keep back experimental books, such as novels by new and little known writers, until the spring, when the Presidential Election, and probably our own General Election, will be over. Only the popular novelist can be sure of his readers in times of public excitement.

MR. W. D. HOWELLS'S "Personal Retrospect of James Russell Lowell" in the September Harper is very good reading. Mr. Howells has already recounted his earliest meetings with Lowell; here he describes the intimacy which began in 1866 when, on his return from Venice, he became Lowell's neighbour at Cambridge. "He liked to have someone help him idle the time away, and keep him as long as possible from his work." Mr. Howells performed these duties, but that does not keep him from defending Lowell against the charge, so often brought against him, of being a rather idle man. Mr. Howells's evidence, it must be confessed, is stronger than his assertions. In obedience, perhaps, to the demands of his friends, Lowell once tried his hand at a novel—a fact not very generally known. He achieved one chapter, which Mr. Howells praised; but the thing was soon put away. Mr. Howells's calls were casual and delightfully intellectual.

If I dropped in upon him in the afternoon I was apt to find him reading the old French poets, or the plays of Calderon, or the Divina Commedia, which he magnanimously supposed me much better acquainted with than I was, because I knew some passages of it by heart. One day I came in quoting:

Io son, cantava, io son dolce Sirena,
Che i marinai in mezzo al mar dismago.

He stared at me in a rapture with the matchless music, and then uttered his admiration and despair in one word. "Damn!" he said, and no more. I believe he instantly proposed a walk that day, as if his study-walls, with all their vistas into the great literatures, cramped his soul liberated to a sense of ineffable beauty by the verse of the sommo poeta.

We hear something also of Lowell's fastidiousness in matters of vocabulary and style:

He would go carefully over a poem with me, word by word, and criticise every turn of phrase, and after all be magnanimously tolerant of my sticking to phrasings that he disliked. In a certain line,

The silvern chords of the piano trembled, he objected to silvern. Why not silver? I alleged leathern, golden, and like adjectives in defence of my word; but still he found an affectation in it, and suffered it to stand with extreme reluctance. Yet . . . he professed not to have prejudices in such matters, but to use any word that served his turn, without wincing; and he certainly did use and defend words, as undispriced and disnatured, that made others wince.

He was otherwise such a stickler for the best diction that he would not have had me use slovenly vernacular even in the dialogue in my stories: my characters must not say they wanted to do so and so, but wished, and the like. In a copy of one of my books which I found him reading, I saw he had corrected my erring Western woulds and shoulds; as he grew old he was less and less able to restrain himself from setting people right to their faces. Once, in the vast area of my ignorance, he specified my small acquaintance with a certain period of English poetry, saying, "You're rather shady there, old fellow." But he would not have had me too learned, holding that he had himself been hurt for literature by his scholarship.

No complete life of Richardson, the novelist, has appeared since that by Mrs. Barbauld, in 1804. A new biography is shortly to be published by Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son. It is the work of Miss Clara Linklater Thomson, and contains much fresh matter, derived from Richardson's unpublished letters in the Forster collection at South Kensington, and from other contemporary sources.

MR. FORTESCUE has given the Bookman some interesting information about the British Museum General Catalogue of books and the proposed new Subject Index. The General Catalogue is now completed to the end of 1899, and the usual Accession Catalogues are regularly prepared and absorbed in the General Catalogue, which now runs to four hundred volumes and seventy additional supplements. The cost of this catalogue has been roughly estimated at £40,000, or £2,000 a year spread over a period of twenty years, and copies have been supplied to most of the leading libraries in Europe at a cost of £84. Now that the staff employed on the General Catalogue is free to take up other work, it has been decided to start a Subject Index, which Mr. Fortescue hopes will be completed within ten years.

MR. CLAUDE PHILLIPS, the Keeper of the Wallace Gallery, is about to write a series of articles on the various artistic "Collections in Hertford House" for the Art Journal, beginning with the January number of next year.

THE special feature of the Bookman this month is Mr. J. E. Hodder Williams's illustrated article on Mark Twain. This is a very useful and interesting record of Mr. Clemens's career as a writer and a man. Mr. Clemens's present residence at Sir Hugh Gilzean Reid's house on Dollis Hill is noted, and we are told that he proposes to spend the winter in New York and return to his Hartford home next spring. Concerning Mark Twain's pet scheme of a portrait gallery of his contemporaries which is not to be published until one hundred years after his death, Mr. Williams says that Mark Twain takes it very seriously and works on it steadily.

In many respects the work will be unparalleled in the history of literature. It will consist of descriptions of the men and women with whom he has been brought into personal contact, written with the single object of telling the whole truth, without malice and, at the same time, without respect of persons or social conventions. In Mr. Clemens's opinion a work of this kind is only possible under the conditions he has laid down for himself. A book that is not to be published for a century gives, he explains, the writer a freedom he could secure in no other way. It is only under these conditions that you can draw a man's portrait without prejudice, and yet have no fear of hurting his feelings or those of his sons or grandsons. A book published a hundred years hence containing honest and truthful portraits of monarchs, politicians, bootblacks, and shoemakers, of all the infinitely varied views of humanity with which Mark Twain has come in contact in the course of his long and active career, must be of greatest value to posterity. During the rest of his life Mr. Clemens means to produce a new portrait of old or new acquaintances whenever one comes vividly before his mind. The one passport to a place in his gallery is that the man or woman should have excited his interest. Elaborate arrangements have been made for the preservation of the MS. and for its publication when the time comes.

APPROPOS of our quotations on some of the numerous incidents of free library work, a Yorkshire librarian writes:—"Many of the 'malapropisms' and errors of library book-borrowers (such as those you quote in your issue of September 1) are so stale and 'chestnutty' that I know you editors look upon them dubiously and with the regard of old acquaintance. However, the following came under my immediate notice only two days before I picked up the ACADEMY of Saturday last. A lady reader here inquired (for the second time) of one of my assistants if we had any of the novels of Derrick Vaughan. She had read the famous work of Miss Edna Lyall (so she stated), and was anxious to make further acquaintance with the literary work of the individual described as 'Derrick Vaughan, Novelist.'"

THE Elf is as elfin as ever. It tumbles about in one's hand, a litter of beautiful printing, book-plates, songs, and fine writing. This is the manner of it:

A SUMMER SHOWER.

Upon a Summer day it chanced that a little pink cloud floated merrily upon the dawn-stream. Its golden sails were filled with sweet zephyrs from the South and West, and it had travelled far with a cargo of pearls to traffick with the under-world. This strange vessel was manned by cherub sailors, each well versed in current and shoal, storm and derelict meteor.

Thus they had travelled, favoured by the two soft winds, till they came close upon a great mountain top. Then the wind grew stronger.

The great wood, which clothed the mountain in unbroken foliage and was the habitation of many singing birds, seemed to roll and toss in waves and breakers of dark green.

The little cloud floated nearer.

One sailor was at the prow, another at the helm with anxious face. The sail was slackened and a golden anchor dropped. Bravely for a moment did the little craft ride the gale, then smote hard and rent her fair side. And, as she sank in the swirling pine-tree, showered the wood with gleaming pearls.

Thus they write at the Peartree Press, White Cottage, Shorne, near Gravesend, Kent. The Elf is flawlessly produced. The scarlet cord that ineffectually holds it together seems to have been tied by restful hands under a pear-tree.

ONE of the most welcome books of the autumn season will be the Letters of T. E. Brown. Mr. Sidney T. Irwin, who edits them, has written an introduction, in which he claims for the author of Fo'c'sle Yarns a very high place in the ranks of letter-writers. Of Brown's style Mr. Irwin says:

Gray, Cowper, Byron, Lamb, FitzGerald, not one of these has a manner of which Brown's could be called a reproduction, or to which his manner could really be compared. If there is in it something of the allusiveness of Lamb, it is still not Lamb's allusiveness but his own. Cowper and FitzGerald—separated as they are by something like a century—have that in common which is emphatically not a characteristic of these letters. Cowper wrote, he said, "nothing above the pitch of everyday scribble": and no admirer of Brown could contend that his slightest fragment could be so described; while the "carelessness" which so charms us in FitzGerald is no less absent. Brown knew he was not careless. "I like," he said, "to please my friends." But in Pope's phrase, "There's a happiness as well as care," and the best things in these letters, like the best things in the writer's conversation, came with a rush of spontaneity, and were lavished indifferently on the simple and the cultivated.

Messrs. Constable will issue the Letters in two volumes.

WE wonder how many of our readers could give good replies, offhand, to the examination questions on Robinson Crusoe which are set by St. Nicholas to its September readers. Here they are:

1. From whom did the hero take his first name? What was his last name, in its true form? What does the name mean in its original language?
2. How came Robinson to visit America?
3. On what day was he cast on his island home?
4. Supposing the story true, what persons occupied the throne in England during his stay on the island? What was happening in North America about that time?
5. How old was Robinson Crusoe when wrecked?
6. How did he know that the footprint on the sand was not made by his own foot?

7. What did "Benamuckee" mean to Friday?
8. How long was Crusoe on the island until rescued?
9. How came Crusoe into the ownership of a fortune during his absence from civilisation?

Another question, "What well-known men and women were young enough to enjoy Robinson Crusoe when it was 'just out'?" is answered to some extent by the editor, who points out that Jonathan Edwards, John Wesley, Buffon, Fielding, Linnaeus, Haller, and Chatham were, in 1719, the date of the first edition, boys of the right age to enjoy the story. Probably nearly all these read Robinson Crusoe. But why omit Dr. Johnson, who was ten years old, and the son of a bookseller, when Defoe's romance appeared? Another probable pioneer reader was David Hume, who was eight years old when the story was new.

THE death of Dr. Henry Sidgwick, who recently retired from the Professorship of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, and had been President of the Society of Psychical Research, removes an honoured and dignified figure from our midst. The Methods of Ethics was, perhaps, the most powerful of his works. It is interesting to recall the fact that Charlotte Brontë was at one time governess to the future philosopher. Prof. Sidgwick was one of the early contributors to the Academy, and for recreation devoted himself to novel reading.

IN the midst of the endless clamour and paragraphs concerning what Miss Marie Corelli has been doing, it is interesting to read the following mild reminder in the British Weekly: "Miss Marie Corelli's promised biography of Mr. Eric Mackay, which was to be prefixed to a volume of his poems, has not yet appeared."

MR. V. TCHERTKOFF, of The Free Age Press, Maldon, Essex, has received from Count Tolstoy the MS. of The Slavery of our Times, the inquiry into the results of modern industrialism on which Tolstoy has been engaged for some months. It will be translated by Mr. Aylmer Mande, and published at one shilling by The Free Age Press, probably during October, simultaneously with new threepenny editions of Tolstoy's story of the early Christians, Work while Ye Have the Light, and his autobiography, How I Came to Believe, or My Confession, as it has been called in England. In the preface to The Slavery of our Times Tolstoy writes:

Nearly ten years ago the census in Moscow evoked in me a series of thoughts and feelings which I expressed as well as I was able in my book, What Must We Do Then? At the close of last year (1899) I was led to re-examine these problems, and the conclusions I reached were the same as in that book. But as it seems to me that during these ten years I have succeeded in thinking over the subjects more coolly and circumstantially, and in connection with the theories circulating to-day, I now offer my readers the new considerations leading to these conclusions, thinking that they may be useful to those who sincerely strive after the elucidation of their position among mankind, and the clear definition of the moral obligations which issue from this position; and therefore I print them.

The fundamental idea both of the former book and the present is the negation of coercion. This negation I learnt and understood from the Gospel, where it is expressed most clearly in the words "Ye have heard it said, An eye for an eye" . . . i.e., You were taught to use coercion against coercion, but my teaching is, Offer your other cheek to the smiter; i.e., suffer violence but do not commit it." I know that these great words, owing to the carelessly-perverted and uniform interpretations of both Liberals and Church, will be for the majority of so-called educated people a reason for not reading this work, or for a biased attitude toward it. And yet, nevertheless, I place these words at the beginning of my book.

SOME remarks on his own holiday reading by Claudius Clear, in the current British Weekly, bear out what we said in a recent article about the critic's relations with books. "On holiday," says Claudius Clear, "I read what I choose, and I re-read a great deal." His comments on some of the older books are interesting and acute. One of our competitors, a fortnight ago, said of Thackeray, he "must have had a heart, but it was not always in the right place." That was crude, but we have always felt, and have more than once indicated our belief, that the old cry about Thackeray's cynicism was not altogether groundless. The effect of a re-perusal of Vanity Fair on Claudius Clear was to put him in sympathy with Miss Muloch's characterisation of Vanity Fair as "the most brilliant, the most heartless, and the most hateful of modern fictions." Part of Claudius Clear's own verdict is: "He is to be admired with discrimination. No one looked up to him more than Charlotte Brontë did, and yet she knew his weakness as well as his strength. The oftener one reads Vanity Fair the more one is able to read between the lines and to discern how terrible is the meaning in some of its greatest passages." It is only right to add that C. C. warmly recognises Thackeray's fine qualities.

THE National Home-Reading Union, fresh and serious as ever, issues the syllabus of its twelfth reading season. Three courses are proposed. The first is the Young People's Course. The second is the General Course, which is intended for those who have but little leisure. The third is the Special General, and is chosen for advanced students who wish for "systematic historical help." This course includes the following subjects:

English History, from 1789.
Modern English Literature.
The Tragedies of Shakespeare.
Browning.
Mediæval and Early Renaissance Literature.
India.
French History, 1275-1789.
German Lyrical Poetry.
Education.
Astronomy.

That is enterprising indeed.

Bibliographical.

I HOPE Mr. Andrew Lang is not going to spoil his style by affectations. In Longman's this month he says: "As we turn over the Early Poems [of Tennyson] we cannot too much admire [the italics are mine] the blindness or the prejudice which failed to recognise their extraordinary and original merits." Here Mr. Lang is using "admire" in the strict philological sense; but, as that is not the sense in which "admire" is now generally used, to utilise it in that way is to be guilty of rather paltry pedantry. Mr. Lang, moreover, is a little too airy in his comments. He says of Tennyson: "The plays, of course, are, in his case, not 'the thing.'" Mr. Lang has in his mind, I assume, the acting qualities of the plays, but the value of his ipsi dixit depends upon whether he ever witnessed performances of "Queen Mary," "The Falcon," "The Cup," "The Foresters," and, above all, "Becket." "The Promise of May" was before its time; it would have now, in all probability, a reception very different from that which was originally accorded to it. "Harold" has not been played. All the rest have been welcomed more or less kindly, while in "The Foresters" and "Becket," respectively, Miss Rehan and Sir Henry Irving made one of the biggest successes of their lives.

Mr. W. E. Garrett Fisher, writing in the Cornhill on "Feasts in Fiction," seems to think that he is a pioneer in that field of literary research. So far is he from being that, that I remember reading an article, practically on the same subject ("Some Dinners in Fiction"), in one of the numbers of All the Year Round some ten or a dozen years ago. The writer of that article displayed wider reading than Mr. Fisher exhibits. He drew, as Mr. Fisher does, upon Peacock, Thackeray, and Dickens, but drew also upon Scott, Bulwer, and Beaconsfield (not to mention Hook, Anthony Trollope, James Payn, Mr. George Meredith, and Mr. Thomas Hardy), whom Mr. Fisher ignores. "Among modern authors," says the Cornhill writer, "there can be no question that the pre-eminence in this, as in most other branches of fiction, must be assigned to Thackeray." But are not Lord Beaconsfield's "dinners in fiction" more notable and memorable than any in Thackeray? How about that historic repast at which Lord St. Aldegonde, rejecting "all the indelicacies of the season," requested to be supplied (if I remember rightly) with cold beef?

It is stated that "Mr. J. A. Hammerton has completed his work on Mr. J. M. Barrie and his books. This will include a full bibliography." Mr. Hammerton appears to be rather in a hurry. According to Who's Who, Mr. Barrie is only in his forty-first year, and in the ordinary course of nature has many years of work before him. His publications number only nine, all told—one of the nine (An Edinburgh Eleven) being a mere pamphlet, and another (Better Dead) of slight dimensions. Mr. Hammerton, I understand, has been a journalist in the provinces. Does he intend, I wonder, to identify for us all the articles Mr. Barrie wrote for the Nottingham Journal during his connexion with that paper? Any way, it seems early in the day to present the world with "a full bibliography" of Mr. Barrie. Mr. Hammerton, by the way, may be remembered by some as the compiler of a book on The Actor's Art, published in 1897.

In The New Order Mr. Oswald Crawford resumes the practice of an art which he has practically neglected since 1888. Four years ago, it is true, his name was attached to a volume of short stories called The White Feather, but his latest substantial novel was that of Sylvia Arden, brought out twelve years ago. He began "fictionising" in 1884, with The World We Live In; then came, in 1885, A Woman's Refutation, and, in 1887, Beyond the Seas. More lately he has produced two or three anthologies. He has certainly shown versatility. Besides writing and compiling some books, he has helped to publish many others; he has dabbled in journalism, and has been Consul at Oporto. The list of his literary noms-de-guerre is, perhaps, the longest in history.

So good old Samuel Richardson is not wholly forgotten after all. A lady has written "a biographical and critical study" of him, which is to be published shortly. That the work should have been undertaken by a woman is eminently appropriate, for Richardson was a great favourite with the sex in his own day, and it is by women, probably, that he is most read now. Miss Thomson's "study" is the first that has been devoted to Richardson for some time. The latest notable essay on the novelist is that which Mr. H. D. Traill included in his volume on The New Fiction, &c. (1897).

"The Rev. A. W. Hutton is to write the article on Manning in the supplement to the Times' edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica." Why, certainly; what more natural or proper? Did not Mr. Hutton produce in 1892 a full-blown biography of Cardinal Manning? Did he not contribute an account of him to the "English Leaders of Religion" series? If any man knows the subject, he does.

I mentioned the other day, with reference to Dr. Airy's coming volume on Charles II., that he had edited for the Clarendon Press a portion of Barnet's History of My Own Times, and published it in 1897. I am asked to add that a second volume of the History, bringing the narrative down to the end of Charles's reign, was brought out, under Dr. Airy's editorship, in March last.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Ouida's Apology.

Critical Studies. By Ouida. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

WHATEVER the reader may think of this volume, however he may be offended by its contempt for modernity, with its mechanism, militarism, and science, he will be compelled to admit that the subjects herein discussed concern him vitally. Art and Literature are not mere luxuries of life, they are absolute necessities, which the soul can no more live without than the body can without bread.

In these thirteen essays—all of which, except the one on W. Scawen Blunt, have appeared before—Ouida reveals her skill and delicacy in interpreting the art work of her contemporaries. Although she has been writing novels for more than a generation—Under Two Flags was published in 1868—yet the chief labour of her life, far from blunting her critical acumen, has added to its incisiveness, and increased the sweep and certainty of her generalisations; nor has her passion for art, as is too frequently the case, withdrawn her interest from communal matters. To many who have never cared to understand her these studies will come as a surprise; to a few their interest will lie not so much in the new vistas opened up by her sympathetic treatment of D'Annunzio, Georges Darien, J. H. Rosny, Cherbuliez, and others, as in the high seriousness with which she regards the novelist's craft. Witness the following:

It does not appear even to occur to Sir John Lubbock that a fine novel contains intellectual qualities of the highest kind, and combines in itself the widest effects and the most delicate minutiae of creative art. A fine novel should be no more "run through" than the sculptures of the Vatican or the pictures of the Uffizi should be run through in ignorance and haste; common readers, like common tourists, may do so; but to do so is as gross and unpardonable an insult as it is to the sculptures and the paintings.

In such terms in a hundred places does the writer magnify her office. Indeed, if we may accept Bacon's cynical remark that we praise in others the virtues which we are known to possess ourselves, a fitting sub-title to this volume would be "Apologia pro mea arte." In a kindly study of the brothers Rosny, whom (quoting a French critic) she speaks of as "the authors of to-morrow," or les jeunes, she does not permit the joints in their armour to go unnoted:

True art is natural, and this new school [the school to which the brothers Rosny belong] is seldom natural; there is more eccentricity of manner in it than originality of thought; there is too great an effort, too perpetual a strain in its productions; frequently, as in the case of Maurice Barrès, subtlety of language is employed to conceal absolute poverty of idea; or, as in the case of Georges Ohnet, to clothe mere wooden puppets with a semblance of life by skill in depicting incident.

Again, in a footnote to a translation of a few pages of L'Impérieuse Bonté, she writes:

What I have translated as "oxidised silver" is in the original "blackened nickel"—one of those unfortunate, grotesque, inharmonious expressions of which there are many in this book. To compare water, the liquid, the mobile, the translucent, to any metal is a strange and unfitting comparison.

This is fearless criticism, all the more so that it will send her enemies rummaging through her books for the pleasure of a tu quoque; but there is more to come:

There is in the Rosnys the distressing habit, common to all the more recent French writers, with few exceptions, of endeavouring to be pedantic, to be involved, to express an idea barbarously and bewilderingly instead of harmoniously and clearly; to say épiderme instead of peau, crédique instead of croûte, prunelles instead of yeux; to use the jargon of science, the abomination of foreign or technical idioms; to turn away from the natural, the direct, the usual, the obvious, and seek an appearance of profundity in what is merely a confusion of sounds.

What critic would discover the absence of all these defects in Ouida's own novels if she did not first show them the way? And yet—at least, in the present volume—she comes out from the test almost scatheless. The criticism of Marion Crawford's Italian novels is acute and penetrating. One could make up out of it the whole art of novel writing according to Ouida:

Mr. Crawford can create the most delicate aquarelles and the most glaring of posters. Mr. Crawford never loses himself in his creations, and his style never varies, whether he treats of horrible psychological mysteries in Prague or of pleasant carnival scenes in Rome.

His masterpiece is Marzio's Crucifix, in which he attained a naturalness of treatment which makes his "detestable melodrama," as in the Witch of Prague, all the more inexcusable. He is at his best when writing of the gentleman in the society he knows so well. His defects are many; his characters do not grow; they are not always consistent, and he lacks versatility; he is constantly raising "the expectations of the reader by indications which result in nothing, signposts in a road which do but lead to a blank wall"; and, greatest indictment of all:

To Mr. Crawford as to Peter Bell, a primrose by the river's side is a primrose, and it is nothing more, and the thrush or linnet which sings in the hawthorn above the primrose roots for him has no existence. He has the American's indifference to all created things which are not human. There are no animals in his books except two poor terriers (who have their necks broken by the obvious lover in To Leeward) . . . and he calls a cicada a locust.

This last criticism reminds one of her comment on D'Annunzio's line—"there leaned some purple flowers":

Campanulas, spotted orchis, or foxgloves, I suppose. It is characteristic of him that he sighs for an "unseizable secret," and does not take the trouble to learn the names of the flowers he sees.

The essay which perhaps bristles most with controversial matter deals with "Unwritten Literary Laws":

If a conversation be considered confidential, how much more should a correspondence be so? A letter in any degree intimate is a hostage given into the hands of its recipient. We are justified in expecting that any sentiments, views, or opinions it may contain shall not go beyond the reader, for whom they have been penned.

And in a postscript to this essay the author adds: "Since this was written, the letters of Ruskin and Rossetti have been published; a greater offence to dead men could not be committed."

This is much too sweeping. Ruskin said that all the world might, if it wished, read any letter he had ever written. During his life he approved of the publication of a selection from his letters, and we should be all the poorer without Hortus Inclusus. Ouida makes no reference to Browning although, on the publication of his and his wife's letters many critics held it a violation of a sacred trust on the son's part, for all that his father had given him permission to do as he thought best. Of course, there is not a shadow of excuse for putting letters under the world's coarse thumb against the expressed wish of the writer of them; where no such wish has been made known, it must be left to the sensitiveness, good taste, and generosity of the holders of the letters to determine whether what is told in secret shall be proclaimed from the house-tops. There can be on such a question no absolute law, written or unwritten. Another question raised in the same essay is the anonymity of the Press. Here, again, no law could be more arbitrary and unnecessary than that all articles should be signed. It is usual in France to sign articles in the daily papers; and we doubt whether things are better there because of the practice. Perhaps the solution of this very difficult problem will be found in a compromise: let the leaders which definitely commit the paper to a policy be signed. Reviews of books, special articles and columns are now very frequently initialled; and when we get "a finer, juster, higher kind of public feeling," each contribution will be judged on its merits, and not approved or disapproved prejudicially because of the signature. Another objection may be urged. An editor may hold that his leader is not to be regarded as his own personal statement, but the statement of a society or section whose servant he is. Another grievance—one which the writer shares with many other writers—is the shameless way in which literary piracy evades the law. For these thefts there is very little chance of redress in the present state of libel law: if an author is scoundrel enough to steal from another, he will contrive to do so for all the laws, be they ever so carefully drafted. Another unwritten law—or, rather, one that Ouida would like to see in force—is that when once a romance, or a story, or a poem has been published, it should remain intact for all time. Her argument is that a work as soon as it is published passes irrevocably to the world. Were such the law, the first editions of all poems, &c., would in future be the received text, and varie lectiones would be unknown. As a simple matter of fact, poets and authors have introduced slight alterations into the texts of their books, and it is difficult to see why they should be debarred from so simple and harmless a satisfaction. There is little point in urging that the painter is not allowed to repaint his picture after sale, or a sculptor to saw off an arm of his statue and substitute another for it; because in such cases the painting or statue is the only one in existence, whereas in the case of a book, whatever emendations are introduced into the text of it, the author will not seize your first edition and substitute for it another. Another offence to our author is the six-shilling novel, with its ugly cloth back, bad type, and poor paper, which is compared unfavourably, both in price and format, with French and Italian books.

I have now before me a book of Pompeo Molmenti's, issued by Bemporad, of Florence; its cost is two francs twenty-five centimes; less than one-and-sixpence in your money. It is bound in thick cream-coloured paper; it is called Il Moretto di Brescia, being a brief study of the life and works of the great artist of whose pure and noble work the city of Brescia is full. . . . The type is large, the paper fine, the illustrations (phototyped) are of extreme delicacy and beauty, rendering worthily the works of Moretto. . . . Will you tell me where I should find anything equal to it at its price in London?

We leave the question with the readers of the ACADEMY.

The final paper deals with the destruction of Venice; it is a terrible indictment of modern insensibility to beauty. Everywhere in Italy the speculator is at work destroying memorials of the past. Here and there a voice is raised against the laws which permit it, but apparently without avail:

In Italy such destruction is more sad and shameful than anywhere else in Europe, by reason of the magnificence and glory of her past, which was a Pharos of light and leading to the earth, is now every year and every day receding farther and farther into darkness; that dreadful darkness of the modern world which comes of polluted waters and polluted air, of the breath of poisoned lungs, and the pressure of starving crowds. The basest form of venality, the lowest form of greed, have fastened on her with the tentacles of the devil-fish, and are every hour devouring her.

Well might the President of the Academy ask despairingly, "Non può Lei far nulla per salvare la nostra povera Venezia?"

Archaic Manners and Morals.

Oldest Books in the World. By Isaac Myer. (Kegan Paul.)

In this oddly-named volume—we take the omission of the article to be due to the American objection to waste time—are collected such antique stuff as the Book of Kaquemna, the maxims of Ptah-Hotep and of Ani, an anonymous set of gnomic sayings from Leyden, extracts from the Book of the Dead, and a Demotic papyrus of the Louvre. A full translation of each document, with a dissertation thereon by Mr. Myer, fac-similes of some of the papyri, and woodcuts from others, go to make up a handsome book. Anybody interested in the greater and lesser ethics of the ancient Egyptians and unacquainted with the documents themselves—perhaps a rare combination—will find here plenty of materials for a judgment upon them.

The claim of these MSS. to be the oldest in the world is, we think, but very imperfectly made out. None of them were written before the Twelfth Dynasty—some poor 3,000 years B.C.—and most of them had their birth in the palmy times of the Eighteenth, seventeen centuries later. It is quite true that the two first mentioned claim to have been first written in the Fourth and Fifth Dynasties respectively; but it is doubtful whether this is more than a literary device on the part of the author, comparable to that whereby all the later European conjuring books were regularly attributed either to King Solomon or (mirabile dictu!) Pope Honorius III. The Pyramid Texts, too, as we are accustomed to call the lengthy ritual engraved on the inside of the Pyramids of Unas, Papi, and others, can be actually dated to about 3,500 B.C. Mr. Myer, indeed, would draw a distinction between inscriptions like these and writings on papyrus, but it is quite certain that the workmen who carved the ritual on stone must have had some more portable MS. to work from. Moreover, we are much mistaken if some of the clay tablets—going back, it is said, to 6,000 B.C.—brought back by the American Expedition to Babylonia, do not turn out, when deciphered, to be books in every sense of the word. On the whole, therefore, we can only take these Egyptian papyri to have only a provisional claim to the place their collector would assign to them.

It will surprise no one acquainted with such matters to find that the first of these books refers to so trivial a subject as etiquette. * Just as the modern schoolboy will pardon a crime, but be implacable towards a breach of his own peculiar code of manners, or as a Zulu chief, while smashing the Decalogue to pieces, will die of shame if he be caught speaking to his mother-in-law, so the ancient Egyptian thought a gentlemanlike deportment far above rubies. Like the Babes Book, which, oddly enough, was one of the first books printed by our own Caxton, the Book of Kaquemna mostly concerned itself with the behaviour of its readers at table. "If thou sit at meat with a number of persons," says the sage, "despise the dishes which thou lovest; it is a short time to restrain thyself; voracity is a degrading thing because bestiality is in it." Yet the rule is not without its exceptions. "Shrink not from meat in the presence of a glutton, take what he gives thee, refuse it not. . . . Lo! the refusal would be disappointing." And the guest's complacency is supposed to extend to drinkables. "If thou art drinking with a wine-bibber, take thou what he offers; it will please his heart." A too close adherence to Kaquemna's maxims might have got the Egyptian with a weak digestion into trouble.

The maxims of Ptah-Hotep, two dynasties later, rise above this nursery-governess wisdom, and tell the reader how to conduct himself in debate. "If thou hast to do with a disputer whilst he is in his heat, and he is thy superior in ability, lower the hands, bend the back, do not get into a passion with him," says Ptah-Hotep. "It is a great error to interrupt him, and proclaims that thou art not capable of being tranquil when contradicted."

Excellent advice this, but who on earth ever thought that a speaker with a different opinion was one's "superior in ability"? Another of Ptah-Hotep's rules is more open to question:

If thou art one of those who carry messages from one great man to another, conform thyself exactly to what he has entrusted thee with. . . . He who perverts the truthfulness of his message so as to repeat only what may be pleasing of the words of any man, great or small, is a detestable person.

Those who remember Gérôme's picture in which the angry Pharaoh sits among the corpses of the messengers who have brought him ill-tidings might think, to use the Irish phrase, that it would be better for the Egyptian to be a detestable person for a few minutes than to be a dead man for the rest of his life. But the fact that the world was made for the rich and great is the axiom that Ptah-Hotep never tires of repeating. "As to the great man who has plenty of the means of existence," he says, "his line of conduct is as he wishes. He does what pleases himself." And ordering oneself lowly before one's betters is not only wisdom, but a religious duty: "If thou humblest thyself in obeying a superior, thy conduct is wholly good before God." While the duty of the master is to see that his servant knows what is to be done, and then does it. "Give orders without reserve to those who do wrong, and to him who is of a turbulent disposition; and he will not deviate from the straight path." But to avoid losing one's temper is the supreme duty: "Keep thyself from attacks of bad temper," says Ptah-Hotep, "it is a fatal malady which leads to discord, and there is no longer any existence for him who entangles himself therein." Even a judge is implored to be patient. "Do not ill-treat the petitioner," is the advice to him—"that would discourage him. Do not say to him, 'Thou hast already said that. The means of obtaining a clear explanation is to listen with kindness.'"

But the ancient Egyptian was capable of rising to higher rules of conduct than these, and the Negative Confession in the Book of the Dead gives as good a list of life as we meet with in ancient literature. "I have given bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, a boat to the shipwrecked," says the soul when appearing before its judges. "I have not ill-treated slaves. I have not defrauded the oppressed of their property. I have not caused pain. I have done no murder. I have not given order for murder to be done for me. I have not committed fornication. I have not borne false witness. I have not encroached upon the fields of others. I have not done harm unto animals. I have not been a tale-bearer." Such are some of the sentences that can be picked out of the various recensions, and, although they are mixed up with the repudiation of many merely technical offences against religion, they make up a body of morality which it would be hard to beat in similar documents of Jews or Christians. In one respect, indeed, they are distinctly superior to anything of the kind. Nothing, as has been said by one who is a savant as well as an Anglican priest, in the Old or New Testament condemns lying pure and simple, a fact which he attributes to the fact that among the Jews lying, except under special circumstances, is not regarded as a fault. Yet the Egyptian code of morals is much more in accordance with Aryan ideas of honour. "I am not one who telleth lies in the place of truth," says the justified soul, and "I have not told a lie to any man" is the version of it given in Ptolemaic times. "God punishes the liar" is also one of the maxims of Ani, who goes at some length into the wickedness of even the injured attempting to escape by saying the thing which is not.

Thus we see the ideal that the ancient Egyptian set before himself. Space prevents us from giving it in full, yet what we have given is perhaps a fair sample of the rest. He seems to have been a kindly person, affectionate and even thoughtful for his family and slaves, courteous in manners and anxious to fulfil his duties to the State and his rulers, while he avoided in theory all the grossest vices. How far he adhered to the pattern he set himself we cannot, of course, say, but the fact that the ideal was a high one speaks well for him, and must have more or less influenced his conduct.

Of the present volume it only remains to say that Mr. Myer, whom we only know as the author of a very rambling book on the Cabala, and another on Scarabs, which did not, if we remember right, arouse the approbation of Egyptologists, is evidently not a painful and accurate scholar. Otherwise he would not translate Neb-er-teher, which means Lord of Totality or dominus universi, as "Lord of the Company of Gods," or spell cynocephalus as "kynokephallos." There are many other mistakes in the book, but as the translations he here gives are nearly all taken (with due acknowledgment and reference) from the works of Egyptologists of authority, this need not interfere with the general reader's appreciation of his material.

Full-Dress Topography.

Fulham, Old and New. By Charles James Fèret. (The Leadenhall Press. 3 vols. £3 3s.)

MR. FÈRET calls his work an "exhaustive" history of Fulham. It is exhaustive as distinct from literary. Everything is set down; the suburb is raised before us brick by brick. These three large quarto volumes contain, together, a thousand pages; together they weigh 15½ lbs. avoirdupois. We can make no pretence to follow Mr. Fèret in his itinerary of the vast London suburb which a hundred years ago was a riverside village with a fishery and an unrivalled peal of bells. Generalisation is outside his method, which is that of a collector rather than an historian. We cannot too highly praise the industry and the boundless patience with detail which Mr. Fèret has brought to his task. All that pedigrees, church registers, vestry minutes, old newspapers and magazines, deeds, manorial rolls, and parish reports could yield him Mr. Fèret has appropriated. Our admiration for his industry begets the one criticism which we have to make against his achievement. A work like this—full of detail and broken matter—should have had more care bestowed on its minor arrangements. Mr. Fèret has made it difficult for the reader to find where the account of a house or street begins and ends. Thus, in vol. ii., p. 134, we have the following marginal headings near the top of the page: "Brightwell's.—Parson's Green House.—Villa Carey.—Peterborough House." But the twenty-two pages governed by these side-headings are one long array of paragraphs, quotations, &c., in which the beginnings and ends of their subjects elude the eyes. In the chapter headed "Crabtree" (vol. iii., p. 60), the reader may well be confused between Crabtree House, Lord Peterborough's house called "La Trappe," and Brandenburg House. Throughout the work the top margins have been entirely neglected as a means of guiding the reader, who must soon be irritated by the lifeless repetition of "Fulham Old and New" on every page. On the other hand, our praise of the book is not yet exhausted. Its five hundred illustrations, carefully selected and admirably printed, are a wonderful topographical series. From many of these photographs artists might learn that the despised suburbs are full of chance beauty.

It is on the records of the literary associations of Fulham that we at last settle. These, however, are not very numerous nor very striking. Fulham is a literary Mecca only to those—they are a very little band—who have an enthusiasm for Samuel Richardson. The vainest, and nearly the greatest, of novelists lived for fifteen years in a house which still stands in the North End-road. The house is really the north half of a mansion which has long been divided into two equal portions. To-day the two halves have been so differentiated to the eye by alterations that their former unity would hardly be suspected. Richardson's portion, which is capitably photographed in Mr. Fèret's second volume, is a fine old red brick Georgian house, very square and genteel and mellow, but not in any way remarkable. Here the well-to-do printer and novelist held his court. Here was the grotto in which he wrote, and of which the exact position in the garden has been debated by antiquaries with becoming ardour. Mrs. Barbauld saw it before alterations set in. "It was on this seat, Mr. Le Fevre told me, that Pamela, Clarissa, and Grandison received their birth; I kissed the inkhorn on the side of it." Another early gleaner of Richardsonian traditions was Sir Richard Phillips, and Mr. Fèret incorporates a good story which shows how even early inquirers may be balked in the search after hero-relics and hero-gossip. Wishing to make sure that this was the novelist's house, Sir Richard put some questions to an aged widow who kept a public-house near the corner of North End-lane, where she had lived about fifty years.

She remembered his person, and described him as a round, short gentleman, who, most days, passed her door, and she said she used to serve his family with beer. "He used to live and carry on his business," said I, "in Salisbury-square." "As to that," said she, "I know nothing, for I never was in London." "Never in London!" said I; "and in health, and the free use of your limbs?" "No," replied the woman; "I had no business there, and bad enough to do at home." "Well, then," I observed, "you know your own neighbourhood the better. Which was the house of Mr. Richardson in the lane?" "I don't know," she replied, "I am, as I told you, no traveller. I never was up the lane. I only know he did live somewhere up the lane." "Well," said I, "do you go to church?" "No," said she, "I never have time. On Sundays our house is always full. I never was at Fulham Church but once, and that was when I was married, and many people say that was once too often, though my husband was as good a man as ever broke bread—God rest his soul!"

"The Grange" harbours memories of other great men than Richardson, for he had many visitors. A glimpse of these, and of Richardson's vanity as host and writer, occurs in Boswell:

One day at his [Richardson's] country house at North End, when a large company was assembled at dinner, a gentleman, who was just returned from Paris, willing to please Mr. Richardson, mentioned to him a very flattering circumstance—that he had seen his Clarissa lying on the King's brother's table. Richardson, observing that part of the company were engaged in talking to each other, affected then not to attend to it. But by and by, when there was a general silence, and he thought that the flattery might be fully heard, he addressed himself to the gentleman; "I think, Sir, you were saying something about—", pausing in a high flutter of expectation. The gentleman, provoked at his inordinate vanity, resolved not to indulge it, and with an exquisitely sly air of indifference answered: "A mere trifle, Sir, not worth repeating." The mortification of Richardson was visible, and he did not speak ten words more the whole day. Dr. Johnson was present, and appeared to enjoy it much.

With characteristic, and perhaps Quixotic, thoroughness Mr. Fèret gives, as far as he is able, the names of all earlier and late occupiers of The Grange. Among the latter was the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones, who, like Richardson, had a garden studio. There is still a pleasant lawn, a fine mulberry tree, a dying apple tree of great age, and a fine old thorn on which, Mr. Fèret thinks, Samuel Richardson must often have looked.

In 1755 Richardson removed to Parson's Green, Fulham; but "Richardson's Villa," as it came to be called, has entirely disappeared. The neighbourhood of this villa had already some interesting literary associations, few of which, it may be assumed, were lost on Richardson. Close by was Peterborough House, where Charles, the eccentric Earl of Peterborough, had entertained such litterati as Addison, Swift, Prior, Pope, Locke, and Bolingbroke. It is on ground such as this that Mr. Fèret's method shows to least advantage. The reader looks for some savour of those old gatherings at Fulham, but finds only disjecta membra. Peterborough's restlessness—he was said to have seen more kings, princes, and postillions than any man of his day—is mentioned and illustrated, but the Fulham parties are not realised as we think they might be. Voltaire's visit to Peterborough House in 1727, when Addison was his fellow guest, might surely have been presented in more detail. Swift's "Journal to Stella," too, would have yielded some facts. "I have been supping with Lord Peterborough," Swift writes in November, 1710, "at his house, with Prior, Lewis, and Dr. Freind. 'Tis the ramblingest, lying rogue on earth." And he has a valuable note on the garden of Peterborough House: "The Secretary and I, and Brigadier Sutton, dined to-day at Parson's Green, at my Lord Peterborough's house, who has left it and his gardens to the secretary during his absence. It is the finest garden I have ever seen about this town, and abundance of hot walls for grapes, where they are in great plenty, and ripening fast. I durst not eat any fruit but one fig." For a year (1840-41) Peterborough House was the home of William Beckford, the author of Vathek. Later it became a private lunatic asylum, and we are now told that the old house will soon be cleared away. Its grounds, which cover twelve acres, are still finely timbered. Immemorial elms may be seen there, one of them being 150 feet high.

Many other small literary associations of Fulham have been collected by Mr. Fèret. In "Hore's Tenement," Parson's Green, Lord Bacon found refuge in the first weeks after his disgrace. Bacon having been at Fulham, it goes without saying that Shakespeare's occasional presence in the riverside village has been affirmed. It is certain that John Florio, with whom Shakespeare is supposed to have been intimate, lived in a house in Bear-street, Fulham. Shakespeare's fellow player, Henry Condell, had a tenement in Back-lane, Fulham; and of one Robert Burbage there is also trace. But these things prove nothing; and it is hardly worth while to examine the argument by which Thomas Crofton Croker sought to assemble these people and Shakespeare in the Golden Lion. Mr. Fèret is wisely sceptical. Other literary residents of Fulham were John Norden, John Fletcher, Sir Thomas Bodley, and Addison. Addison's frequent visits to Sands End are matter of history, but it is not so certain that he lived, as tradition says, at Sandford Manor House. Writing from "Sandy End" in 1708, to the young Earl of Warwick and Holland, he recounts his efforts to find birds' eggs:

This morning I have news brought me of a nest that has abundance of little eggs, streaked with red and blue veins, that, by the description they give me, must make a very beautiful figure on a string. My neighbours are very much divided in their opinions upon them; some say they are a sky-lark's; others will have them to be a canary bird's; but I am much mistaken in the colour and turn of the eggs, if they are not full of tom-tits. If your lordship does not make haste, I am afraid they will be birds before you see them; for, if the account they gave me of them be true, they cannot have above two days more to reckon.

The same rural suggestions occur in another letter, "the business of which is to invite you to a concert of music, which I have found out in a neighbouring wood. It begins precisely at six in the evening, and consists of a blackbird, a thrush, a robin red-breast, and a bull-finch." Mr. Fèret does not forget to quote Thackeray's admirable description of Addison at Fulham, where Esmond meets Mr. Addison walking on the road, "the moon shining on his handsome, stern face."

We are conscious that we have very inadequately displayed the extent and thoroughness of this suburban survey. But the reader may be assured that there is not a street of any age in Fulham into which Mr. Fèret does not lead him, nor an old house that he does not turn inside out. The information given about the obscure tenants of old houses is nothing less than prodigious. Where those tenants have been celebrities of any dimensions the information is proportionately fuller. Munster House, the home of John Wilson Croker, and afterwards a lunatic asylum; Arundel House, where Henry Hallam lived in 1819; Crabtree House, the home of George Bubb Doddington, and, afterwards, under the name of Brandeburgh House, the retreat of Queen Caroline and the scene of her death; Normand House, with its annals of escaping lunatics; Lonsdale House, on the lawn of which Mr. Gladstone proposed to Miss Glynne—these are a few of the many old Fulham houses described. To Hurlingham, of course, the fullest justice is done; and Fulham Palace, the oldest existing building in the parish, has half a volume to itself. The oldest parts of the Palace date only from the early years of the sixteenth century; but on this spot the Bishops of London have dwelt for fully eight centuries—and one at least, Bonner, is said to haunt his old corridors. Several excellent maps complete the equipment of a work which is a definitely valuable addition to our knowledge of London. More literary books about Fulham have been written, and will be written again; but here is the mine of information from which every future writer on this suburb must take his ore. We may add, too, that to a Fulham reader this work will seem faultless. Him it will rejoice by its fullness, its correspondence with actuality as of a map.

Among the Boers.

With the Boer Forces. By H. C. Hillegas. (Methuen.)

Origin of the Anglo-Boer War Revealed. By C. H. Thomas. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

THE war in South Africa has brought out a huge crop of volumes from correspondents and others who followed the armies, but hitherto most, if not all, have been written from an Imperial, and not from a local, standpoint. This book by Mr. Hillegas, who appears to have been a correspondent for an American paper, is warmly Pro-Boer. It is a little difficult to criticise the book, as it is neither literature nor history, but a piece of elaborate special pleading for the Boers, masked now and again. A writer on the Boer side might be expected to underestimate the number of the burghers in the several engagements, but such assertions as that "thirty thousand farmers of no military training were enabled to withstand the opposition of several hundred thousand well-trained soldiers for the greater part of a year" defeat their own purpose.

It is a relief to turn to a description of the personal appearance of some of the Boers, which is evidently from life:

It was quite in keeping with their other ideas of personal comfort for many Boer burghers to carry a coloured parasol or umbrella to protect them from the rays of the sun, and it was not considered beneath their dignity to wear a woman's shawl around their shoulders or head when the morning air was chilly. At first sight of these unique spectacles the stranger in the Boer country felt amused; but if he cared to smile at every un military scene he would have had little time for other things.

Here we have a little touch which brings the unsophisticated back-country Boer to the mind's eye. Another interesting passage is that which describes the discipline of the Boer forces:

The burgher was bound by no laws except such as he made for himself. There was a State law which compelled him to join a commando, and to accompany it to the front, or in default of that law to pay a small fine. As soon as he was "on commando," as he called it, he became his own master. . . . No general, no Act of Volksraad, could compel him to do any duty if he felt uninclined to perform it, and there was no power on earth which could compel him to move out of his tent if he did not desire to go. In the majority of countries a man may volunteer to join the army, but when once he is a soldier he is compelled to fight; but in the Boer country the man was compelled to join the army, but he was not obliged to fight unless he volunteered to do so.

That this is slightly overdrawn is shown by the fact that later on the writer represents Louis Botha as having knocked a burgher down for refusing to carry ammunition to the top of a kopje under fire when ordered to do so. Another remark, that sheds some light on the manner in which the burghers escape from our troops, is that which points out that their generals were allowed to operate in parts of the country with which they were thoroughly acquainted. For example:

General Cronje operated along the western frontiers of the republics, where he knew the geographical features of the country as well as he did those of his own farm. General Meyer spent the greater part of his life in the neighbourhood of the Biggarsburg and northern Natal, and there was hardly a rod of that territory with which he was unfamiliar. . . . General Christian de Wet was a native of Dewetsdorp, and there was not a sluit or donga in all the territory where he fought so valiantly that he had not traversed scores of times before the war began.

And so on, and so on. This knowledge of the ground is worth thousands of men to the Boers, and has enabled them to choose and defend strong positions and to escape by mountain paths unknown to our officers. Times without number their intimate knowledge of the ground has enabled them to escape with but little loss, whereas our men, with no knowledge of the country and with inferior maps, had to blunder along, as it were, in the dark.

The question of the foreign mercenary filibuster is one on which Mr. Hillegas should be worth hearing, but there is no doubt that he underestimates their numbers when he puts them down at between eight and nine thousand. Evidently, he has not much opinion of these men, for he says that:

For a month after the investment of Bloemfontein these legions alone enlivened the situation by their frolicsome reports of attacks on the enemy's outposts. During three weeks the entire British army must have been put to flight scores of times at the very least, if the reports of the foreign legions may be believed, and the British casualty list must have amounted to thrice the number of English soldiers in the country.

We are still without a picture of the Boer as he really is, though occasionally Mr. Hillegas gets pretty near the mark.

"The conspiracy of the nineteenth century unmasked," shouts Mr. Thomas on his title-page; but though he was once an Orange Free State burgher, and the conspirators are alleged to answer to the name of Afrikaner Bond, he has not learned the art of unmasking with effect. It is absurd, for instance, to speak of "the mire of academic squabble re suzerainty." At that rate, it were "academic" to discuss the question whether one's property were leasehold or freehold, supposing one were confronted by a sudden demand for rent.

However, the Bond is most unacademically pronounced guilty in this rather scrappy volume. It employed occult propaganda to seduce a simple people to false convictions, to induce the creation of gigantic armaments, a secret service employing at a vast cost journalism, emissaries, and agencies to gain partisans and allies outside South Africa . . . a system of immigration from Holland towards supplanting the English factor, and to introduce auxiliaries.

The recent existence of an active agency for rallying the dangerously preponderant Dutch element in South Africa against the English is, of course, not to be denied. No doubt the typical Boer attitude is that expressed almost syllogistically as follows: "The English hired the Zulus to massacre our people [!]. They robbed us of Natal, and drove us from the Colonies. There can be no peace with them until we have our own."

Enter Mrs. Kruger, who dreams of her husband as an Afrikaner Moses, but not, we may hazard, until he had had strong premonitions of his own concerning the magnificence of his "destiny." "This grand old Boer," Mr. Thomas calls him, and the late-rising literary man cannot refrain from admiring a septuagenarian who was ready to give audience to "rich and poor alike" every morning, Sundays and holidays excepted, from 5.30 A.M. and 6 A.M. in summer and winter respectively. What a characteristic picture that is which we have of him standing up at the dedication of a synagogue to invoke "God's mercy to remove the veil which obscured" from Jewish eyes "their own and also the Gentiles' glorious Immanuel." Money, that blighter of reputations, has by its obscene connexion somewhat impaired our reverence for Mr. Kruger's piety; but we are still very far from sympathising with such travellers as Canon Knox Little and Mr. Stuart Cumberland, who have mistaken vulgar personality of reference for the acumen of the critic.

We may add that Mr. Thomas tells an extraordinary story of a field cornet who in the house of a Uitlander whose hospitality he was accepting observed, by way of censuring his hostess, who was conversing with another guest in our tongue, "that he could not tolerate English being spoken within his hearing." There seems, however, to be a fate beyond the field cornet's control which ordains the steady declension of Dutch as a medium of expression in South Africa.

Other New Books.

THE JEFFERSONIAN CYCLOPEDIA. EDITED BY J. P. FOLEY.

This is an amazing volume. It professes to be a "manual" of Jeffersonian doctrine, and it weighs nearly six pounds. It is a précis, and it fills 1031 pages: it is intended for all classes, and it costs thirty shillings. Yet we must be just: it sums up more than a man; Jefferson was an institution. As third President of the United States he had seen the birth of American independence, and he was the promulgator of its principles and aims. He claimed, indeed, to have been the author of the Declaration of Independence. Under his rule slavery was abolished. He lived the fullest and longest political life that has ever fallen to the lot of an American statesman; and, when he retired from public life to his native Virginia, he remained the imposing figure-head of American life. This is the book of the whole Jefferson. It is an index rerum compiled from the speeches, public writings, and private letters of the "Father of Democracy," whose counsels and ideas it codifies on a scale which we have never seen applied to a single modern mind. Here the Democrat and the Republican will find convenient texts on Government, Politics, Law, Education, Commerce, Coinage, Agriculture, Finance, Freedom, and Religion; and here, scattered up and down the pages in their alphabetical places, will be found Jefferson's obiter dicta on marriage, art, literature, and the musical glasses. We confess we doubt the wisdom of this inclusion of his views on things in general. They are so dreadfully correct. Under "Fiction, Value of Sound," we have an extract from a letter to one Robert Skipwith, beginning:

A little attention to the nature of the human mind evinces that the entertainments of fiction are useful as well as pleasant. That they are pleasant when well written every person feels who reads. But wherein is its utility, asks the reverend sage, big with the notion that nothing can be useful but the learned lumber of Greek and Roman reading with which his head is stored? I answer everything is useful which contributes to fix in the principles and practices of virtue.

And so on. The pronouncements are all numbered. Number 5107 is on Marriage, and is a personal statement:

I have one daughter married to a man of science, sense, virtue, and competence; in whom, indeed, I have nothing more to wish. . . . If the other shall be as fortunate. . . . I shall imagine myself blessed as the most blessed of the patriarchs.

But no prince or peer would have been welcomed by Jefferson to his home at Monticello. Jeffersonianism Number 5111 reads:

Our young Republic . . . should prevent its citizens from becoming so established in wealth and power as to be thought worthy of alliance by marriage with the nieces, sisters, &c., of kings.

The "nieces, sisters, &c., of kings" is good. America has got over some repugnances since those words were written. We may hope that only the yellowest of newspapers, in its tantrums, would write of England as Jefferson was accustomed to write between 1810 and 1815. "I consider the Government of England is totally without morality, insolent beyond bearing, inflated with vanity and ambition . . . the eternal disturber of the peace of the world." But, with it all, Jefferson saw that England's might was necessary to America; and—well, many things have happened in the interval.

It is curious to see what apt texts abound in this volume for verbal warfare arising out of almost any conceivable political situation. The volume is arranged and printed with admirable clearness, and it appears to fulfil its stated aims with mathematical accuracy and completeness. It contains 9,228 extracts and ten portraits and illustrations. (Funk & Wagnalls Co. 30s.)

GOYA.

BY W. ROTHENSTEIN.

The life of Goya, in a peculiar degree, marks the artist. With the smallest general education, the son of mere working folk, he rose, by sheer force of genius, to be a favourite and satirist of courts. Driven from Madrid to Rome by fear of the Inquisition, he worked his way to the latter place as a bull-fighter. Returning to Madrid in 1775 he married a daughter of Bayeu, and became the leader of Spanish art. From that point on he marched through triumph and intrigue, restless always, till we see him a deaf old man at Bordeaux, exiled from his beloved Spain, now sitting for days in solitary silence, now flinging himself furiously into his old work. From such a temperament sprang the brutality, the delicacy, the awful satire, the frankness, of his amazing accomplishment.

Mr. Rothenstein's appreciation of Goya is just and eloquent; he sees his subject, hardly yet understood, as a force in art vitally alive, a master in composition and design. He spared neither himself nor others; from a Court beauty he turned to the nightmare and horror of los Caprichos and los Desastres de la Guerra. From these series a few characteristic examples are reproduced, together with other plates and three photogravures. (Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE HISTORY OF THE PARISH OF PRESTON.

BY HENRY FISHWICK.

Colonel Fishwick is the author of several books on Lancashire, and has already written the history of Rochdale. His treatment of the story of the ancient town on the Ribble which was once the Priest's "ton" or enclosure, and is now Preston, is exhaustive. The general history, municipal history, and ecclesiastical history of the town are treated in detail; and the longest chapter in the book is devoted to "Old Houses and Old Families"—an allotment of space very much in harmony with the sobriquet, "Proud Preston." It is mentioned that at the Herald's visitation of 1664-65, by Sir William Dugdale, no fewer than twenty-two Preston families entered their pedigrees. Among the many families specially noticed are Arkwright of Preston, Blundell of Preston, Chorley of Preston, Farington of Ribbleson, Lemon of Preston, Mort of Preston, Travers of Trillicketh, Winckley of Preston, &c., &c. The parish church of Preston, a modern, "handsome" building, occupies the site of a church dedicated to St. Wilfrid in 709. The most interesting monument now in the church is the Bushnell Brass, perpetuating the memory of "Seath Bushell, wollen draper, bayliffe, and a brother of Preston, dying the xv. of Sept., aged 53." Thorough and painstaking as are Col. Fishwick's chapters on the general history of Preston (the Jacobite rebellion of 1715 is, of course, the pièce de résistance), it is to the "Miscellany" at the end of the book that the reader must turn for aught of spice or surprise. Here are given curious particulars concerning local pastimes, the cuckoo stool and pillory, wayside crosses, trade tokens, &c. Col. Fishwick disclaims for Preston the honour of having been the birthplace of Lady Hamilton, who, as he points out, was born at Nesse in Great Neston, in the county of Chester. In modern social history Preston shines as the town in which the word teetotalism was first used, as the first town in which a journal exclusively devoted to the propagation of that principle was published, and as the first town in which a temperance hotel was opened. Preston is the Mecca of the water-drinker. (Stock. £1 16s. 6d.)

PEDIGREE WORK.

BY W. P. W. PHILLIMORE.

A concise little handbook by the author of How to Write the History of a Family. Mr. Phillimore gives much indispensable information to the budding genealogist, who so often flounders helplessly in the sloughs which beset the borders of his subject. The sections dealing with various prime sources of inquiry are clear and full, and most useful lists are given of the Herald's Visitations and Regnal Years. Above all things, Mr. Phillimore says in effect, be punctiliously accurate. That is the first and last word for the pedigree-hunter to have in mind. (Phillimore & Co. 1s. net.)

Fiction.

The Crimson Weed. By Christopher St. John.
(Duckworth & Co. 6s.)

MR. ST. JOHN, whose name is new to us, has written a grave and dignified novel. A little more freshness, a little more vigour of presentment, and it would have been arresting. As it stands, The Crimson Weed, while it just fails to be memorable, does in fact reach an equable distinction, and perhaps heralds something of imperative force from the same hand in the future. What this drama of a futile revenge lacks more than anything else is the inventive quality. When success depends on invention, the author fails. He begins with that commonplace of English fiction—the Anglo-Italian love-story: old chateau, tangled garden, strange servants, decay—all the "properties" which the young-lady-novelist who has enlarged her mind by a tour in Italy uses up in her first novel. We do not say that Mr. St. John ought not to have built his edifice upon the loves of Gilbert Otway, artist, and Maria Carducci, daughter of princes, in the antique chateau of Fontegioia; but that he did so is a sign of his tendency towards the trite. When the son of that irregular and fatal union discovers his father in a President of the Royal Academy, and his mother in an opera singer who is making a sensational début as Isolde at Covent Garden, we think that Mr. St. John has worked out his tendency to the full.

The author confounds the theatric with the impressive or rather, his imagination, when it is most active, is partially stultified by the outworn materials on which it chooses to work. All the big scenes between Luke Grey and his mother, and between Luke Grey and his father, have this imperfection of a stagey basis, which robs them of a fairly-earned conviction:

"Forgive me," he said again, dragging himself nearer her on his knees. "I could not wait to warn you. I am . . . I am Luca." He laid his head upon her breast as he whispered his name, and now he felt her fingers rest half timidly on his hair. She did not speak, and soon he realised that she was crying. In the silence he heard the tears drop thick and fast upon his head. He moved his position slightly and kissed her neck. Again he kissed it, and then her breast, which seemed to cover all the sorrow of the world. And still she wept. At the moment she had cried, "Ah, who is it?" she had identified him with the fruit of her love and anguish; when her voice said, "Who has come in here?" her eyes held no question. . . . And still she wept. He thought of the bright and burning Isolde he had seen just now in the garden, the Isolde in whose enchanted senses the sounds of the chase had been magically transformed into the voices of love, the huntsman's horn into the sob of the wind, the baying of the hounds into the rustle of leaves, the Isolde whose passion seemed to strain against the enclosing sides of the frail case of humanity until it was near cracking, and opening for the confined spirit the vasty road to death. This was not that Isolde! These horrible silent tears! His excited brain imagined that with each one a drop of her life fell upon his hair.

This is undeniably strong, but it is a mere well-doing of that which has been well done once or twice before, and passably done a thousand times before. In the scenes with Gilbert Otway, Mr. St. John permits himself to introduce revolvers and strangulation in a manner irritatingly trite; Luke Grey even thinks that he has killed his father. Nevertheless, we do not wish to push our point too far. If the story is not original, still originality may come to the author. Beauty is frequently achieved in it—a beauty akin to the strange orchidaceous effects of Gabriele D'Annunzio, for whom Mr. St. John evidently has a deep admiration.

The Whistling Maid. By Ernest Rhys.
(Hutchinson. 6s.)

FROM the author of The Fiddler of Carne we expect humour, atmosphere, and more than a hint of the fantastic. These things are here; The Whistling Maid is a good book, in some respects even a beautiful book. The Whistling Maid herself, Luned, daughter of Rhosser of Rhos (the period of the story is that of the second Edward), is a simple, fragrant, wholly girlish creature, whose adventures we follow with no lapse of interest from the May morning when she sets out, disguised as a page by the old witch Malen, to bring aid to the beleaguered castle of Rhos, on to that happy night of the Plygain when Rhos is finally saved. It is a story of rapid action, bustling, eager, full of the flash of steel in a land seething with Welsh and Norman faction. Luned sees blood, feels a dagger prick, and comes into the sinister shadow of the black Howel Farf, her father's kinsman, who desires her to mate with his foster-son, Jestyn. It is Howel who lays siege to Rhos, and it is he into whose hands she falls for banishment to the island house of Dinas Moryn. She arrives there with Dr. Iago and the witch Malen to find the host, Morgan, dead, and the house empty. They drink the last of a fateful keg of wine, setting a full cup in the dead man's place. Says Malen:

. . . "I think Morgan Ola's gone down to his own—his own folk—his other house."

"What other house?" asked Luned, anxious to humour her as far as possible, and afraid to be left alone, even by such a companion.

"There's a city—wide streets, shops fine as Chepe's, and many a plas and many a tavern—under the sea. That's why they call it Dinas Moryn. And this place—wait till I take ye down the cellar stairs. Morgan told the outl fishermen of Abereli he had a house down there. He said he would go there; and now the wine is out . . . you understand. . . . 'When that's done I'm done too.' Morgan's gone down to his own. . . . But I'll take the wine to his grave." . . .

Mr. Rhys has an unmistakable power of weird suggestion, an eye for setting and landscape seldom at fault, a true sense of the beauty of words: his book, too, is excellently constructed, and has not a slovenly sentence in it. But its characterisation just falls short of the real by reason of its insistence on poetical accidents rather than on common-place essentials. But we like the Maid of Rhôs and her horse Gringolet and the magic silver whistle of St. Brieux that sounds so sweetly in these pages.

The Banker and the Bear. By Henry Kitchell Webster.
(The Macmillan Company. 6s.)

This "story of a corner in lard" is of American origin, and would seem to have been suggested by Harold Frederic's The Market Place. It is, quite simply and unaffectedly, the history of a "corner," with the description of a run on a bank for chief episode, and a limited amount of very mild love-making by way of sauce. Mr. Webster's method is not of the kind to arouse criticism. Neither good nor bad, it is of the "hypnotising" variety. You may read and you may read, and if now and then it occurs to you that you are not grasping the facts, no matter! You become hypnotised by the even and passionless narration; you are insensibly drawn from one sentence to the next, and from the left-hand page to the right; you turn over in a dream, and begin a new chapter with the comfortable certitude that no fell shock awaits you:

"If something should scare the depository into making a run on the bank—you see only about half its business is commercial business; the rest is savings. The big depositors wouldn't scare. They're stockholders mostly, and they know the old bank's as solid as a fort. But if the little fellows who've got their savings in there once get the idea that it's shaky, they'll come, every man, woman, and child of 'em, and get their money out inside of twenty-four hours. He'd have to shut up for a while if they did that. They won't scare, though," he said, rising; "and I don't know that I'd want them to. I hope the directors'll do the trick; but if they can't, we'll find some other way."

He walked over to the telephone and called up Jervis Curtin.

"You saw this morning's Herald, I suppose?" he said.
"Yes—I'm coming over to see you this afternoon. I had a small dispute with Mr. Bagsbury the other day, and I've sold out my stock. I think we'd better come to an understanding, for his benefit, as to what our relations have been—. All right—I'll be over in about an hour."

It is nearly all like that. After about half an hour you have fallen into a habit of reading The Banker and the Bear, and only the arrival of the last page will cure you of that habit. Here and there the tale verges on the perfunctory—as in the passages about old Bagsbury's will; and here and there a sort of excitement is reached—as at the climax of the run on the bank; the use made of a "time lock" in the culminating scene constitutes something new in sensational literature; but, on the whole, the story keeps an unswerving course, like a Flemish canal; you could see the end from the beginning, did not mere distance intervene.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE SOFT SIDE.

BY HENRY JAMES.

A volume of short stories from Mr. Henry James. Such titles as "The Great Good Place," "The Given Case," "The Third Person," "The Real Right Thing," catch the eye in the table of Contents; and from the page, as you open the volume at hazard, shoots telegraphically such a message as: "Do hope you sweetly won't mind, to-day, 1.30, my bringing poor, dear Lady Mullet, who is so awfully bent." And again, here, in a word, is an unknown who looks "like somebody's flattering idea of somebody's own person as expressed in the great room provided at the Uffizi Museum for Portraits of Artists by Themselves." (Methuen. 6s.)

SONS OF THE MORNING.

BY EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

This is such a full-blooded story of the West Country as was to be expected from the author of The Children of the Mist. A single illustration—a capital photographic view of Scor Hill Circle and Watern Tor—quietly gives the reader his first sense of the background and atmosphere of the story. From this we turn by chance to page 157: "Far below them, in fulvous light of a wild sunset, the circle of Scor Hill appeared. Concerning the memories its granite girdled, Christopher knew little; but, at sight of Watern's crest, now dark against the flaming sky, he remembered that there lay the scene of Stapledon's end, and regretted that he had come within sight of it that night. To him the distant mountain was a theatre of tragedy; to Honor, an altar of sacrifice." The hero and heroine are each the last of a line; the final fruit of an ancient stock. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE CONQUEST OF LONDON.

BY DOROTHEA GERARD.

"If, instead of living on the interest of our four thousand pounds, we were boldly to attack the capital, we would not need to remain at Gilham. . . . Even in London I don't see how we could possibly spend more than a thousand a year, which means that we would have four years of constant enjoyment before us. . . . And if only one of us marries decently, then it is all right, for, of course, she will look after the others." Thus the four heroine-sisters, daughters of a struggling artist and nieces of a millionaire. The plot has obvious attractions, and the author of A Forgotten Sin has made the most of them in this light-hearted story. (Methuen. 6s.)

A PRINCESS OF VASCOVY.

BY JOHN OXENHAM.

A well-written, warming romance, crammed with adventure and the open-air life. The heroine passes from school, where she has learned to row, swim, paddle, fence, and walk twenty-five miles, to a camp on the Amazon, where, under her father's tuition, she learns to shoot and finds hardship "heavenly." Fights with natives in the loneliest waters of the Amazon and flight through the dim forest are, as it were, only the tuning up of a long orchestra of incident. Later we have the continental pseudo-monarchy. (Bousfield. 6s.)

PATH AND GOAL.

BY ADA CAMBRIDGE.

This is the type of the novel which cannot be easily "tasted." The title might be given to almost any story. There is no table of contents, and the chapters have no titles. Every page is headed "Path and Goal," but the path and the goal are not for merely prying eyes. Rather than misrepresent the story we will quote its motto from Clough: "Was it ordered that twice two should make four simply for the intent that boys and girls should be cut to the heart that they do not make five? Be content; when the Veil is raised perhaps they will make five; who knows?" (Methuen. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Dread of Being Dull.

THE constant effort to amuse, varied by the endeavour to astonish, is working considerable havoc even in that department of literature supposed to be sacred to amusement, and is assuredly defeating its own end. The vast majority of present-day novels do not amuse. If they are novels of adventure, they provide a species of excitement which is soon worked out. Broadly speaking, as there is a limit to the number of possible mathematical riders, there is a limit, generally a very narrow one, to the possible developments of a plot. Material can only be manipulated in certain ways, and one can scarcely hope to surprise the reader long accustomed to guess, at earlier and earlier stages of successive stories, who is going to fall in love and out of it, who is at the bottom of the villainous machination, and who is going to play the virtuous detective. We spot these things as the examinee, by a vicious habit, spots possible questions on the most innocent page of history. Great masters of narrative, indeed, have felt adventure insufficient to maintain interest. Defoe called in the aid of a background totally foreign to the reader's experience. Scott used that of character.

But the modern reader doubts the virtue of "character." Some books have it writ large on every page, as some books used to have "problem." They differ in the working out. Sometimes the dramatis personæ achieve eccentricity, if not personality, and the book is composed of their remarks. If, by the by, the importance of construction were better understood, no author would attempt to make a novel out of remarks, any more than he would crowd all his verve into his first three chapters. His characters would do and say what arose out of the situation, and not what appeared to him to illustrate their peculiarities. He would regard them as real people with an independent existence—not diagrams in illustration of a lecture; and he would impart to the reader a vital interest in them, not a languid curiosity as to what they were meant for. He would have a plot, too, perhaps a simple one, but still intelligible. He would make the situations arise naturally from the plot, and the emotions from the situations. He would not leave the simple reader inquiring within himself what it is all about. And—this has nothing to do with construction—only with respect for good work—he would read his proofs.

Why do authors commit these familiar sins? Probably because their temptations are great—if they live by writing they are perhaps insuperable. If they wish for an immediate hearing they must write what the great mass of readers can read, not only with pleasure, but—a far more deadening restriction—without effort. It may, indeed, be said that those who wish to provide anything higher than amusement have always been forced to cater for the few, while the gentleman who caters for the many simply discharges what was the bear leader's function in former days, and has no place in literature at all. Of course, a public exists for good work, and is perhaps larger than ever it was. But a public also exists now for second-rate literary work, and for it is produced an immense mass of fiction, which threatens often to smother the good, simply because of the stupendous nature of the task of sifting.

The modern writer also writes in a hurry, because he must catch the attention of the public at the right moment—not to speak of other reasons. This may be the cause of his inattention to proofs. But the blighting influence which above all others destroys his deeper purposes, his freedom, his love of his work—that lingering affection without which one doubts whether great imaginative work can be built up at all—is his deadly fear of being "dull."

No one can write worthily on a great subject—and human nature is a great subject—without making some demand on the patience of the reader. To elucidate any subtle point, the author must explain himself—and explanations are useless unless followed with care. To present his conception of the characters he must now and then digress, and so interrupt the action of the story. Above all, to exhaust his subject, he must write much that will not be appreciated at the first reading. If he permits himself, in justice to his theme, to insert what is not of vivid and immediate interest, the reader is wearied instantly; and every stall is crowded with books whose very covers seem to shout, "Amusement without effort." The taskmaster Demos is inexorable. An introductory page about the hero will be the death of the story. Nobody wants to know who brought him up, where he came from, or how he got there—not even though the knowledge should be absolutely necessary to make his future actions convincing. On the first page he must be either funny or desperate, lest he and the book should die. Now, character, if depicted with any justice, is not appreciated at the first reading, because it must be worked up with many delicate touches. Broad outlines, seized at once by the eye, only indicate a type; and even then, if the type is not at once recognised, it needs explanation before it can attract. Besides, are our most valued acquaintances those who startled us into wishing to know them? Are they those whose friendship we have taken no trouble to acquire, whose antecedents we do not want to hear, and whom we throw aside the moment we find them in a mood which is neither tragic nor amusing? Are Colonel Newcome, Dr. Primrose, Lucy Snowe, Maggie Tulliver, of this kind?

A book published not very long ago laid a strong hold upon its readers. It was marked by extraordinary power and depth. It almost left the impression of a great book. But its construction had been dominated and crushed by this haunting dread of being dull. It opened—presumably in order to arrest attention—with a scene startling and dramatic enough to have satisfied the reader of old days at that point—about one-third through a novel—where his interest was so far worked up that it was time for the plot to thicken. Explanations must come in somewhere, especially in a philosophic novel; and accordingly we were dropped from intense excitement into retrospect, which in this order palled upon us. But it is not now permitted to begin gently and work up the slope. You must begin at the top and go rapidly, even if you end in stagnant water at the bottom. Again, the author, endeavouring to live up to the demand for feverish excitement, was unable to make straws show the way of the wind. Somebody has observed that Becky Sharp needed to commit no crime in order to reveal herself. We know what she is without that. But the characters now under consideration are elucidated by a number of strong—it might rather be said violent—scenes, written with extraordinary power, no doubt, and each in itself deserving of high praise—but failing to impress in proportion to their strength, because they dwarf each other, and suffer from want of background. The same with the characters themselves. Hardly any of them fail to interest, and to interest intensely in their way, but—hinc illæ lacrymæ. There should be a large proportion of characters in a book which interest mildly, pleasantly, soothingly; and among them the few on which the mind is fixed should stand out, grouped in due subordination to a central idea. Here, for fear any should be reckoned dull, there are something like half-a-dozen personages, all of whom grip the reader as strongly as a hero or heroine need do. They are not overdone. One is left wishing to be told more, not less, about nearly all of them. But they distract interest from one another; they have no connexion or suitability for each other, except the fact that they are found between the same covers; and the result is that want of unity in design which must ensue when the author is not content to allow any of his characters to stand behind.

"I like to have room in a book," said a friend of the present writer; but Demos, the unreasonable, wants crises packed in a book like herrings in a barrel. Fielding allowed himself "room" for disquisitions on life whose style places them among the jewels of the English language. They do not assist the excitement, and probably contemporary Demos did not like them, but posterity does. Why do all for Demos? why not something for posterity? Fielding and his contemporaries give us time to live with their heroes and heroines under normal conditions—we get to know them—they are not incessantly urging our jaded emotions to tears and laughter. So with Thackeray, Dickens, Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot—but which of them would obtain the coveted meed of praise—the statement that "you cannot put down the book till you have finished it," from a review in which Demos puts his trust? The books you cannot put down are so often the books you cannot take up again—but Demos goes his way in blissful ignorance of that.

Still, in every age, real greatness will turn to sound and natural methods. Mr. Meredith and Mr. Hardy do not allow Demos to regulate their style, their plots, their times and seasons, their choice of a motive. And if we are not compelled to devour each of their books whole at a sitting, at any rate we are not satisfied without a second perusal. Mr. Gissing, too—whether or not he can be called strong enough to bend the bow—is above constructing a bad imitation of the weapon which anybody can bend, and which has no effect beyond a feeble twanging of the string. The public is in the debt of an author who gives it subtle philosophy of conception.

An author's defects are easily traced to his aims. Unless he has a good deal of the superhuman about him, he must endeavour to arrest attention, to whip up jaded interest by strong stimulants, to startle the mind at every turn—in short, never to allow the reader to put the book down lest, his attention once distracted, he should never take it up again. Is it of any use to say that it is the true artist's business to have a good deal of the superhuman about him—to lead his public, not to follow it—to brave the damning accusation of dullness at first, and to wait till the world values his treasure, rather than to throw away his treasure to run after the world, offering it a réchauffé of what he believes to be admired and understood? Perhaps not; but if not, art is in a bad way.

A Guide to Grub Street.

WHEN Defoe wrote his Complete English Tradesman he expounded business with hard literary ability. A more probable fruit of to-day would be a "Complete English Writer," expounding literature with hard business ability. Such a work is foreshadowed, if not realised, in a book of 150 pages just issued by Mr. Grant Richards under the title, How to Write for the Magazines. To the writer, who veils his identity under the chaste pseudonym, "£600 a Year from It," literature has one meaning—to please the public; and one end—to enrich the writer. And his "Magazines" are the big bright miscellanies of these insatiate days—the sons of Tit-Bits and Anak. The language used and the sentiments expressed are the language and sentiments of the market. How to make literature "a thoroughly paying, remunerative affair" has been the personal aim of "£600 a Year from It"; and he now offers his experience and counsel to "that large section of the literary public who would like to 'write something' for the magazines and weeklies." The brutal common sense of the book would be a tonic if it were less strong. As it is, it makes for vertigo and emigration.

"£600 a Year from It" is never more delightful than in his distant references to "style." He always quotes the word, doubtless to suggest the remoteness and unreality of this subject. "Having got the material together, take great pains with your 'style,' and don't drop too much into slang expressions and methods." But this gagging of the old Adam is not quite all. We are also told: "You should have had a good education to be able to write . . . stylishly at all . . . and this same education should have made you familiar with all the best 'styles,' so called, in our own literature or among foreign authors." It appears that the ability to write stylishly may itself need repression. For there follows this great and governing dictum:

The style most in vogue to-day, especially in the papers and magazines with the largest circulation, both in this kingdom and in America, is what is known as the "popular" style.

And the popular style, even "£600 a Year from It" admits, is not exactly a daisy. It excludes "the Art point of view," and the educated author feels he is being "dragged down." "But when he looks at the ledger side of the account on the 31st of December each year [of course he does look at his accounts on the 31st of December each year] and sees the hundreds—sometimes thousands!—of pounds standing to his credit from it, he becomes reconciled to it, and even looks pleased." Still, even allowing for the great compromise which "£600 a Year from It" recommends and practises, we should have thought that some rags of style might still be fluttered on the breeze of popular taste. The expressions "faculty for seeing," "the capability for authorship," "a difficult habit for you to acquire," "clearly grasped," "potent reasons," "the author has got good ideas," "one single line," "in a subsequent chapter," &c., &c., are surely needless concessions to the "popular" style. The section on "The Chief Weeklies" begins with the luminous and elegant sentence:

There is no denying, by any impartial and dispassionate observer and reader, that Pearson's Weekly, though nothing extra in this line, is the most thoughtful and probably the most literary of the chief weeklies of this class.

A too generous sacrifice of "style" seems to be made in this remark:

To the author of articles, absolute accuracy, so far as can ever be managed, is almost perfectly essential.

And are not "the best 'styles' so called" too violently superseded in the sentence:

There has been during the past few years a regular "craze" among the papers and magazines (especially the illustrated ones) and weeklies for "interviews" with persons more or less—generally the latter—celebrated.

To do him justice, "£600 a Year from It" leaves his readers in no doubt as to what the "popular" style is. It is "freshness." "Do be fresh; do be novel in some way or other; do make your work striking." So shall you make a name that of itself will bring the "non-regular reader" of a magazine into the fold. "That is what is wanted by editors to-day. Your articles must be chatty, smart, crisp, anecdotal. It is not a sine qua non that they be instructive—indeed, few are so; but it is a sine qua non that they contain anecdotes, interesting examples, illustrations of some sort; striking matter strikingly put; facts glaringly set out; all served in a brisk, readable style, that draws the reader along to peruse the article almost in spite of himself." We will say this for "£600 a Year from It," he knows his business. We are abashed by the strength of his positions and the ease of his unconcerns. And to hear him expound first principles as dodges, and enunciate the verities of literature as crackers of shrewdness is splendid. His words are charged with terror for serious writers. "Old, worn-out topics that were debated in the days of our grandmothers, subjects that are academical or very ancient, dreary uninteresting studies to the mass of mankind; such subjects as these will stand little chance of bringing you money in, whatever fame they may bring you, and that is very doubtful also." And as for the great magazines—the Cornhill, Longman's, Macmillan's, and the rest—ah, well—to write for them "may be the acme of some sort of success, that I don't know; but I do know from experience that it is not the acme of financial success as an author." We comfort ourselves with the thought that "£600 a Year from It" does not know what sort of success may be obtained by writers of "high class" work. Indeed, his upward vision seems rather limited. In one place we find him instituting a scale of achievement in these words: "You may begin at Marie Corelli and Hall Caine, and go downwards to lesser lights, stage by stage. . . ."

Between the abyss of "stuff" and the empyrean of "style" our guide wings his assured flight. Below him, literature is anything, above it is culture; but here it is "a thoroughly paying remunerative affair." This book is the certificate of that truth.

Things Seen.

Das Bier.

As I came down from the mountains, a peasant, with a chamois swinging at his back, overtook me. He sang as he walked. His brown bare knees glistened beneath his beribboned leather knickerbockers. Together we entered the inn. There, in the low panelled room, with stags' antlers curling jauntily from the walls, and stuffed birds with bright red crests hanging from the ceiling, a score or so of jolly Bavarians were taking their evening meal. Before each was a great metal-covered mug of beer. As I seated myself, a family party, having finished their supper, suddenly broke out into a part-song. It may have been a grace, I know not, but nobody showed surprise. They just went on drinking, eating, laughing, and talking. Presently my neighbour—his braces were flowered and a great silver chain, with hanging medals, dangled from his waist—beamed at me, and unloosed a flood of words. To which I replied: "Ich spreche Deutsch nicht geläufig." Whereupon he laughed aloud, and chuckled "Nicht geläufig" to himself several times. Merrily went the evening with talk and song, and innumerable mugs of beer. The landlord, a giant with a face bronzed by half a century of wind and weather, having gone round the tables, and muttered a genial "Haben Sie gute speizen," seated himself and played a duet on the zither with the waitress, while the un replenished mugs of beer waited by her side. When the music was finished she bustled to her feet, and was again filling mugs, and yet more mugs. Then a couple danced, the girl's red dress whirling balloon-like around her, and the man smacking his leather knickerbockers and dancing in his nailed boots as lightly as a columbine. Followed more songs and more beer till the bells chimed eleven. I went to the doorway. The Pole star hung high over the mountains, and the tinkle of the zither pricked on the keen air. The man with the chamois was starting forth when a burst of laughter hushed the music. "They are a merry folk, these Bavarians," said I. "Ja!" he answered, giving the chamois a jog, "das Bier macht optimistisch."

The Stockings.

THE whole hamlet was the most casual looking place in the world; it seemed to have developed on that spot spontaneously. All about it stretched a heath, on two sides merging into fir-woods. I lay on the edge of the green at the point where the heather began: the purple acres stretched away and away under a sun that made them royally lavish of colour. Here and there were clumps of gorse—still, yellow patches which did not stir in the faint breeze that set the heather a-tremble. Not a soul was in sight; even the village inn, the "Forest King," might have been a closed church for the quietness of it. One might have supposed the place to be deserted and the houses empty save for one thing: on the green two long lines of clothes were hanging out to dry.

That conspicuous washing fascinated me. I found myself conjecturing whether it would be possible to carry away the entire lingerie of the village without detection. I felt almost inclined to adventure the experiment. I was playing lazily with the thought when I saw a dog, a brindled lurcher, slip quietly across the green towards the lines. He examined the washing with ardent curiosity, and then, to my utter amazement, seized a pair of black stockings, jerked them from the pegs, and started off across the heath, trailing his spoil. The thing was so unutterably comic that I grovelled in helpless laughter. Still no one came. I realised, all at once, that my position was somewhat invidious. If the owner of the stockings should appear I could not seriously explain that I had seen them appropriated by a dog. Accordingly I rose and walked away with stealthy unconcern. If I had been observed at that moment the manner of my departure would have stamped me a thief and a robber.

Correspondence.

Nietzsche.

SIR,—In the appreciation of Nietzsche's work contained in your issue of September 1, the critic, I notice, adopts the usual view as to the meaning of Nietzsche's writings. It is because I am puzzled with the apparent universal agreement in this view, and am utterly unable to reconcile it with my own reading, that I write.

Now I am not a student of Nietzsche, but I remember well how I took up Thus Spake Zarathustra, when thoroughly imbued with the current idea of his teaching, and expecting to meet with a definitely advanced theory of the beauty of being the stronger, the necessity for the extirpation of the weak, &c. In place of this I found a mysticism, high, pure, and wild, and in substance, if not in form, essentially poetic; along with this, strings of curiously grotesque and childish curses and denunciations, mostly, it must be said, of things mean, petty, and unworthy. But there was nothing hard or cruel in all this. The famous Beyond Man appeared as a yearning, an imaginative figuring of the possibility of strife with the greater evil of the greater universe. Nothing could give a false impression of it all than the laying out of a skeleton of dogmas, such as, I believe in the "Beyond Man," in the "Transmutation of Values Without End," and the rest. Such a catalogue bears much the same relation to Nietzsche's really powerful and attractive doctrine, as the Athanasian Creed to the spirit of the Gospels. An individualist teaching, if you like, as the teaching of the Stoics and of Buddha was individualist. But no person capable either of writing or appreciating, say, the chapter "Before Sunrise" in the above work, however self-absorbed and lacking in the sense of tears in things he might be, would be capable of that cruel appreciation of, and deliberate acquiescence in, the need of others' sufferings for one's own comfort, which is the secret doctrine of the day. And it is this doctrine that is commonly attributed to Nietzsche.

It is to be wished that critics would do more to make known the many lofty and noble meditations of this poetic genius, rather than confine themselves to adapting his denunciations and misunderstood figures of speech into a pseudo-scientific framework of dogma.

May I conclude with the Clock Prayer from Zarathustra of which the author's twelve has now struck. "The house of Brahman is always open, O Nachiketas!"

(I have used the words of the English published translation.)

One! O man! Lose not sight
Two! What saith the deep midnight?
Three! I lay in sleep, in sleep;
Four! From deep dream I woke to light.
Five! The world is deep,
Six! And deeper than ever day thought it might.
Seven! Deep is its woe—
Eight! And deeper still than woe—delight.
Nine! Saith woe: Pass, go!
Ten! Eternity's sought by all delight—
Eleven! Eternity deep—by all delight!
Twelve!

—I am, &c.

FRANK W. HACQUOIL.

[There is no doubt, we think, that the "usual view" is correct. It is nevertheless true that the physiological tyranny of Nietzsche's teaching does not exactly leap from his pages. It is there, however, in blood tracks. Has Mr. F. W. H. read The Antichrist? Let him read sections 3 and 4 of Nietzsche's essay, "The 'Improvers' of Mankind."]

The Jargon of Criticism.

SIR,—In your last few numbers you have been drawing attention to the worthlessness of literary reviews, and your correspondent of last week certainly touches the spot when he attributes their largesse of praise to the writers' having made so imperfect an examination of the books. An amusing illustration of this occurred not so long ago. The editor of a certain very respectable paper was in the habit of selecting each week from the books sent in some three or four nicely-bound novels which might do to give away to various lady friends, or if there were anything especial in the way of an art production or book of travel at 30s. net, with costly illustrations, he generally netted it for himself. These he proceeded to review during a certain three hours of leisure which occurred to him in his office once a week. From the editor's point of view all went merrily. He cemented many bonds of friendship and built up an excellent library. Authors were flattered, publishers pleased. One morning, however, as I turned over a spring catalogue I was struck by seeing the paper quoted in praise of an utterly worthless book that had come out two seasons before in an attractive cover. I distinctly remembered reviewing the book myself, and that I had not said one word of what was quoted. I got on to a 'bus and went down to the office in a fume. The editor said the firm of publishers in question was noted for that sort of thing, but that the present case was disgraceful. "Disgraceful!" I stormed. "Why, it's nothing more or less than a piece of the grossest Yankee swindling. Here have I gone and prescribed the nonsense for children's hospitals, and they have the audacity to paraphrase that into 'Mrs. Beesely Screed is in her choicest vein, and the book will be read with avidity.' I call it monstrous."

The editor was persuaded. He sat down at once and fired off a strongly-worded letter to the publishers of Mrs. Beesely Screed, dwelling upon their past sins, and pointing out that his paper would suffer seriously in the eyes of its intelligent public by having its name affixed to such an absurd and erroneous specimen of literary criticism. Then we went out for a moment together, and I returned home calmer.

The editor was a man of much worldly wisdom, so on our next meeting he anticipated my inquiries. "Wouldn't it be just as well for you," he said, "to read the paper as regularly as you can?" I can't remember everything, and you've gone and got me into a nice little mess. It appears that Mrs. Screed's book was reviewed twice. Through some mistake or other it was sent to you after it had been done in the office."

I knew well enough what "done in the office" meant, but thought it politic to keep silence. The man had forgotten his own review.—I am, &c.,

ARTHUR MAQUARIE.

SIR,—Allusion has been made in several letters on this subject to unknown, unqualified, and unpaid critics, who pass hasty judgments on books, couched in the jargon so clearly explained in your interesting article. These reiterated commonplaces of praise or blame, ad nauseam, are of no possible service either to the author or to the reader. They are nugatory and useless—merely a vox et præterea nihil. If a book is not worth reviewing and criticising with knowledge, care, and diligence, it is better to ignore it and merely to depend on the tender suffrages of the fickle public. Hasty criticism is ill-considered; swift opinions are rash; the mature judgment alone sifts, weighs, compares, condemns, or appreciates.

A review ought to be literature and not the drivel of the paid hack or idle amateur. True critics are not those who have failed in literature and art; on the contrary, they are men whose minds have compassed the significance and meaning of books which have outlived fashion, change, and time. Their intellects, saturated with what has compelled admiration and allegiance for all time, are tempered with the skill and judgment necessary to form just and correct opinions of the books of the present day. Let us, then, elevate the real critic to his high vantage ground, and say with Pope:

They both from Heaven must derive their light,
Those born to judge as well as those who write.

—I am, &c.,

ISIDORE G. ASCHER.

A New Part of Speech.

SIR,—Although adverbs are described as words qualifying verbs, adjectives, and other adverbs, yet one of the most frequent mistakes in grammar consists in adding the wrong adverb to the verb. Thus we say, and incorrectly say: "He was very pleased"; whereas we ought to say: "He was greatly pleased." "Greatly" and "very" do not differ in meaning, although they differ inconveniently as to the manner in which they are to be used in correct speech. The difference being purely grammatical, the adverbs which must not have to do with verbs might, till a more elegant grammatical expression be invented, be termed "adadjectives" or "addajects."—I am, &c.,

CHARLES G. STUART-MENTEATH.

London, W.C.

A Parallel.

SIR,—The concluding paragraph of "The Bookworm's" in the current issue of the ACADEMY regarding the lady who preserved a flounce that was torn by a royal duke reminds me of an exhibit at the Burns Exhibition held in Glasgow a few years ago. It was labelled "Nightdress said to have been worn by the wife of Souther Johnnie." Notice the beautiful connecting links. Robert Burns—his poems—Souther Johnnie—wife of ditto—nightdress of wife of ditto; and then "said to"! The exhibitor must have been a humorist, more so than those who got up the exhibition. There is nothing snobbish or toadying, of course, in the Burns enthusiast but the Lerwick lady—"lady," hum! ha!—I am, &c.,

H. E. WILSON.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 50 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best rendering into English verse of the following lines by Victor Hugo :

Écoutez !—Comme un nid qui murmure invisible,
Un bruit confus s'approche, et des rires, des voix,
Des pas, sortent du fond vertigineux des bois.
Et voici qu'à travers la grande forêt brune
Qu'emplit la rêverie immense de la lune,
On entend frissonner et vibrer mollement,
Communiquant au bois son doux frémissement,
La guitare des monts d'Inspruck, reconnaissable
Au grelot de son manche où sonne un grain de sable ;
Il s'y mêle la voix d'un homme, et ce frisson
Prend un sens et devient une vague chanson.

La mélodie encor quelques instants se traîne
Sous les arbres bleuis par la lune sereine,
Puis tremble, puis expire, et la voix qui chantait
S'éteint comme un oiseau se pose ; tout se tait.

Many of the renderings received miss the atmosphere and cadence of the lines, while not a few competitors have gone completely wrong over the eighth and ninth lines. We award the prize to Mr. Walter Gill, Claremont, Prenton, Birkenhead, for the following :

Hark ! Like the murmur of leaf-hidden broods,
A mingled noise of voices, footsteps, mirth,
Out of the woodland's dizzy depths takes birth.
And, lo ! across the dark immensity
Of forest filled with the moon's reverie
Is heard a muffled throb, a vibrant sound,
Thrilling with sweetness all the woodland round—
The guitar of the hills of Inspruck, known
By its small bell, tongued with a tiny stone.
A man's voice joins the hum, which, waxing strong,
Takes meaning and becomes a dreamy song.

A little longer yet lingers the tune
Beneath the trees blue-washed by the calm moon,
Then trembles—then expires ; the song which rushed
Stops, like a bird alighting ; all is hushed.

Other translations are as follows :

Hark ! Like the twitter in an unseen nest,
Now comes a sound confused ; and laughter here,
There voices, footsteps, by degrees draw near
From the wood's dizzy depths. O'er forest shades
That dreamy moonlight far and wide pervades,
Just then you hear the tremor, soft vibration—
The woodlands echo with sweet undulation—
Of Inspruck's own guitar, which one can tell,
For on its neck tinkles the tiny bell ;
A man's voice with it blends, and so ere long
This tremor, more defined, becomes vague song.

Some moments yet the distant music streams
Beneath the trees blue where the calm moon beams,
Then trembles, dies away, the voice's thrill
Sinks like a pitching bird ; and all is still.

[C. O. O., London.]

Hearken ! as murmurs from a nest unseen
There comes a sound confused from out the woods,
From depths bewildering of their solitudes ;
Laughter and voice and step ; the forest hrown
That fills a dream land by the moon cast down,
Feels a faint shiver through its spaces flow
To which the woods vibrate with trembling low.
Guitar from Inspruck's hills, by tinkling bell
Striking its grain of sand, thy strains we tell ;
A man's voice mingles, and the quivering sigh
Takes form, a floating, far-off melody.

Softly it lingers beneath trees that shine
With pearl-grey lustre from you moon divine,
Then, trembling, dies—the singing voice is still
As bird alighting ; silent and all chill.

[L. S., London.]

Hark ! Like an unseen nest with murmurous hum
A sound confused draws near ; and laughter, cries,
And footsteps 'scape the wooded boundaries.
Note how across the forest's brown expanse,
Filled with the moonlight's dreamy radiance,
One hears the Inspruck minstrel's sweet guitar
Trembling with soft vibration from afar,

And with its murmur wakening all the wood :
One notes the sable spot, grey sleeve and hood ;
A man's voice rises, and the murmuring throng
Of notes takes meaning, and becomes a song.

Some instants yet, beneath the moonlit trees
The tones melodious dwell upon the breeze :
Quiver, then die away. The voice's thrill
Drops, like a homing bird ; and all is still.

R. H. S., London.]

Hark ! Like the murmurs of a hidden nest
Come, in a tumult, laughter, voices gay,
And footsteps from wild, wooded depths away.
And the great dusky forest that lies thrilled
With boundless dreamery of moonlight filled
Is 'ware of some soft, dulcet quivering,
That touches every leaf with shivering—
'Tis the guitar of Inspruck, by the bell
That tinkles in the handle, known so well ;
Then a man's voice that, mingling, strikes along,
Gives meaning to the tremor, grown a song.

Some moments more the melody is breathed
Under the trees in glamorous moonbeams wreathed.
Then trembles, dies, and the voice, like a bird
Settling, is quiet, gone : nothing is heard.

E. C. M., Cork.

Other replies from : E. H. H., Streatham ; R. W., Sutton ; A. R. P., Hampstead ; A. F., Exmouth ; F. V. S., London ; G. H. S., Manchester ; "Tone," Chelsea ; A. O.-D., London ; M. T., North Berwick ; P. L. B., Stoke Newington ; L. M. L., Stafford ; J. M. M., Aberdeen ; H. H., Teddington ; E. B., Liverpool ; R. F. McC., Whithy ; G. H., Malvern Wells ; R. R., Hull ; L. F. F., Streatham ; T. C. B., Skipton ; G. H., London ; —, Ealing ; S. M., Addiscombe ; and H. B. D., Torquay.

Competition No. 51 (New Series).

This is the season of Publishers' Announcements. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the most appetising set of four imaginary announcements of new books by living writers. To avoid possible embarrassments, all such publications should be accredited to the firm of Messrs. Tonson, Dodsley, & Tonson. The four paragraphs not to exceed 200 words.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, September 11. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

"Expectants," From the Battlefield to a Glorious Resurrection (Gale & Polden) 1 0
Little (Charles Joseph), Christianity and the Nineteenth Century (C. H. Kelly) 2 0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Douglas (Langton), Fra Angelico (Bell) net 3 6
Rickards (Marcus S.), Gleams through the Gloom (Clifton & Baker & Son) 1 0
Dawson (W. J.), Savonarola a Drama (Grant Richards) net 1 4

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Robertson (Henry S.), Voices of the Past from Assyria and Babylonia. (Bell) 7 6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Cotes (Kenneth D.), Social and Imperial Life of Britain, Vol. I. (Grant Richards) net 7 6

EDUCATIONAL.

Nall (G. H.), The Outline of Sallust (Macmillan) 1 6
Gregory (R. A.) and Simmons (A. T.), Elementary Physics and Chemistry (Macmillan) 1 6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Battery (John A.), Why Kruger Made War (Heinemann) 3 6
Bellamy (Rev. R. L.), Hints from Baden-Powell (Gale & Polden) net 1 0
Neilly (J. Emerson), Besieged with B.P. (Pears) net 1 4

NEW EDITIONS.

Rhys (Ernest), Frederick Lord Ligonier, 3rd Edition (Bell) net 7 6
Boulker (Demetrius C.), A Short History of China (Gibbins) 1 0
Sykes (Jessica), Sidelights on the War in South Africa, 2nd Edition (Enwin) 3 6
Sampson (George), Burke's French Revolution (Walter Scott) 1 6
Norris (F. W.), Orations of Cicero (Walter Scott) 1 6
Kenworthy (J. C.), The Anatomy of Misery (Simpkin) 1 6
Buckland (Francis T.), Cosmologies of Natural History, 4 vols. (Macmillan) each 7 6

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

TUESDAY, WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY, and FRIDAY,
OCTOBER 2, 3, 4, and 5, 1900.

PRINCIPAL VOCALISTS.

Mesdames ALBANI, ESTHER PALLISER, EVANGELINE
FLORENCE, MARIE BREMA, ADA CROSSLEY, and CLARA HUTT.

Messieurs EDWARD LLOYD (his first Festival appearance),
GEN DAVIES, WILLIAM GREEN, ANDREW BLACK,
DAVID BISPHAM, and PLUNKET GREENE.

TUESDAY MORNING.—"ELIJAH."

TUESDAY EVENING.

Sir HUBERT PARRY'S "DE PROFUNDIS," MOZART'S SYMPHONY IN C, "JUPITER," WAGNER'S "TANNHAUSER" OVERTURE, And MISCELLANEOUS.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

Mr. EDWARD ELGAR'S New Work, "DREAM OF GERONTIUS" (Composed expressly for this Festival).
SCHUBERT'S UNFINISHED SYMPHONY.
SELECTION from HANDEL'S "ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

Mr. S. COLERIDGE TAYLOR'S SCENES from LONG-FELLOW'S "SONG OF HIAWATHA."

THURSDAY MORNING.

BACH'S "ST. MATTHEW'S PASSION."

THURSDAY EVENING.

DVOŘAK'S "SPECTRE'S BRIDE,"
GLAZUNOV'S SIXTH SYMPHONY, and Miscellaneous.

FRIDAY MORNING.

BRAMHMS'S "REQUIEM," BEETHOVEN'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY, and Miscellaneous.

FRIDAY EVENING.—"MESSIAH."

CONDUCTOR Dr. HANS RICHTER.

Detailed Programmes may be obtained post free on application to

WALTER CHARLTON, Secretary.

5, Waterloo Street, Birmingham.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

Four Scholarships and One Exhibition, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 26th, 1900—viz., Two Senior Open Scholarships, value £75 each, will be awarded to the best candidates (if of sufficient merit) in not more than three nor fewer than two of the following:—Chemistry, Physics, Zoology, Botany, Physiology, Anatomy.

Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London Medical School.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £50, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty-one years of age (if of sufficient merit) in not fewer than three of the following:—Botany, Zoology, Physiology, Physics, and Chemistry.

The Leafless Exhibition (value £20) will be completed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of June, 1900.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

WHY most MSS. are DECLINED How acceptance may be generally ensured. Hope for every MS. (however frequently it has been rejected). If no success, no fee.—For full particulars (gratis) send stamped envelope to E. H. Delamere Road, Raynes Park, S.W.

SHORT STORIES, LITERARY and ARTISTIC CONTRIBUTIONS, &c. REQUIRED for NEW ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE.—Address Editor, "The Gold Spinner," Dacre House, Arundel Street, Strand, London, W.C.

CATALOGUES.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT OF LITERATURE.
MONTHLY LIST OF NEWLY-PURCHASED SECOND-HAND BOOKS IN LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 600, just published for SEPTEMBER, will be found to include many Works relating to IRELAND and to the SOCIETY of FRIENDS.

Post free from

Messrs. HENRY SOTHERAN & CO., Booksellers,
110, Strand, W.C.; or 37, Piccadilly, W.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St.
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.

New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAC & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SOWERS."

At all Libraries and Booksellers'.

On SEPTEMBER 18th.—With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ISLE OF UNREST.

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN,

AUTHOR of "THE SOWERS," "IN KEDAR'S TENTS," "RODEN'S CORNER," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

ON SEPTEMBER THE NINETEENTH.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Infidel.

New Novel

By M. E. BRADDON

London: SIMPKIN & CO., LIMITED.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2⁰/₁₀ on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2⁰/₁₀

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2¹⁰/₂ on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2¹⁰/₂

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth).

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED under SUBJECTS.

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, THEOLOGY, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION. Price 1s. 6d.

Also a FOREIGN CATALOGUE, containing BOOKS in FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, and SPANISH.

Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;
24, Brompton Road; and
48, Queen Victoria Street, London.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated.

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST. THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS. THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEACONS. THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW. THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
(LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR.)
(LLANFAIRFACHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.)
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CROCIETH, and PWLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

Systematic Courses of Lectures and Laboratory Work in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc. Examinations of the University of London will commence on October 1st, and continue till July, 1901. Attendance on this Class counts as part of the five years' curriculum. Fee for the whole Course, £24, or £18 18s. to Students of the Hospital; or single subjects may be taken. There is a Special Class for the January Examination. For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the COLLEGE, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C. A Handbook forwarded on application.

LIBRARIAN.—The LIBRARIAN of TOYNBEE HALL, London, E., desires ENGAGEMENT in or near London. Eight years' experience. References to Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B., and Canon Garnett, Warden of Toynbee Hall.—Apply LIBRARIAN, Toynbee Hall.

DIRECTORSHIP.—A GENTLEMAN with Literary and Artistic Tastes is INVITED to JOIN BOARD OF PUBLISHING COMPANY. Must invest £200. Liberal remuneration and handsome return upon capital. Particulars only given at personal interview.—For appointment address in first instance "FICION," Box 2,672, Sells, Fleet Street, E.C.

ORIENTAL MANUSCRIPTS for SALE in Arabic, Persian, Turkish, &c. Very old and interesting. Some fine specimens decorative and illuminated.—Please write "N." care of THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

BOOKS, OUT-OF-PRINT, SUPPLIED.—State wants. Catalogues free. Wanted, Jerrold's "Jaunts," 1842; Serpents "Salmon Fishing," 1842; Jesse's "Richard III.," 1862. 25s. each offered.—HOLLAND & CO., Book Merchants, Birmingham.

ASSISTANT SCHOOLMISTRESS.—Miss LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND University Graduates, Trained and Certificated High School Teachers, Foreign Teachers, Kindergarten Mistresses, &c.—CENTRAL REGISTRY for Teachers, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

CATALOGUES.WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES sent free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms. CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2°/o on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. 2°/o

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2¹⁰/₂°/o on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2¹⁰/₂°/o

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVESCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SOWERS."
READY on SEPTEMBER 18th.

At all Libraries and Booksellers'.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ISLE OF UNREST.

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN,

AUTHOR of "THE SOWERS," "IN KEDAR'S TENTS," "RODEN'S CORNER," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

An American Transport

ON SEPTEMBER THE NINETEENTH.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

in the Crimean War.

By Capt. CODMAN.

In this work Capt. Codman relates his experiences of an American Chartered Transport in the Crimean War..... The Crimean War is the connecting link between old and modern methods of warfare.

Frontispiece.

198 pp.

Price 3s. 6d.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON & CO.

SELECTIONS FROMALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S
PUBLICATIONS.WORKS BY DR. MACLAREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 5s. each, post free.

THE BEATITUDES, and other Sermons.

"An excellent exposition of the Beatitudes.... full of thought and knowledge and power."

British Weekly.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Fetters expository, rugged, intense eloquence, and beautiful illustration."—Word and Work.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"The several sermons contained in this volume are replete with a keen spiritual insight, combined with an aptness of illustration and beauty of diction which cannot fail to both impress and charm the reader."

Methodist Times.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"They are plain enough to be understood by the unlearned, and yet have sufficient richness and cogency to attract the most cultivated."

New York Observer.

THE HOLY of HOLIES. A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"No British preacher has unfolded this portion of Scripture in a more scholarly style."

North British Daily Mail.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LIMITED,
21 & 22, Fumival Street, Holborn, London, E.C.

The Infidel.

New Novel

By M. E. BRADDON.

London: SIMPKIN & CO., LIMITED.

LONDON LIBRARY,
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.O.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P., the Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; the Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., F.R.S.

TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, Right Hon. LORD AVELL, P.R.S., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 200,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life-Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading Room open from 10 till half-past 5. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 1888, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s. C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of
all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of books at the houses of subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS
per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis
and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS
TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY
SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SU
PLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN,
SPANISH, and RUSSIAN BOOKS.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 4, Queen Victoria

Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

NOW READY.—Price One Shilling net.

JOHN RUSKIN.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

"Will find a ready popularity among all who desire a well-written, carefully condensed account of the great critic's life and work. There are lessons to be learned from many of Ruskin's writings outlined in this book, there are remarkable traits in the veteran's character that excite interest, and the complete story of his life will furnish food for reflection."

*Dundee Advertiser.JOHN RUSKIN.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

"Written in an interesting style.....in the spirit of one who has a high appreciation of the value of Ruskin's teaching."—Nottingham Guardian.

JOHN RUSKIN.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

"Leaves upon the mind of the reader the impression of a faithful portrait."—Scotsman.

"It is decidedly interesting."—Glasgow Herald.

"Both the man and the writer are successfully limned, the former especially so."—Globe.

JOHN RUSKIN.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

Price One Shilling net.

NOW READY.

THIRD EDITION, FIFTEENTH THOUSAND.

Price One Shilling net.

Field-Marshal
LORD ROBERTS,

V.C., K.P., G.C.B.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By HORACE G. GROSER,

Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," &c.

"A well-written biography, likely to have a wide circulation."—Expositor Times.

"This little work, which is admirably written, contains a graphic description of the services of Lord Roberts from his earliest days up to the present time."—Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute.

SPORTS FOR BOYS.

By HOWARD SPICER,

Editor of the "Sports Library."

The Contents are as follows:—

AN INTRODUCTION. By R. P. LEWIS, Oxford University and Middlesex C.C.C.

A CHAT ON PHYSICAL CULTURE. By the Editor of "Sandow's Magazine."

ASSOCIATION AND RUGBY FOOTBALL.

HOW TO PREPARE A WICKET. By S. APTON, Groundman at the Oval.

HOCKEY, LACROSSE, SKATING, FLY-FISHING.

ON TRAINING FOR ATHLETIC SPORTS.

SWIMMING.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

SPORTS FOR GIRLS.

Edited by HOWARD SPICER,

Editor of the "Sports Library."

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

The Articles are as follows:—

INTRODUCTION. By Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, Editor of Womanhood.

1. SKATING. By CHRISTINE HANLEY, M.A.

2. HOCKEY. By E. M. ROBINSON, Hon. Sec. All England Women's Hockey Association.

3. SWIMMING. By "NPTUNE."

4. HINTS TO GIRL GOLFERS. By MARY E. L. HAZLET, Lady Champion, 1899.

5. THE PHYSICAL TRAINING OF GIRLS. By the Editor of Physical Culture.

6. FENCING. By AGNES HOOD.

7. CRICKET. By AGNES HOOD.

8. LAWN TENNIS. By H. M. PILLANS.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

ANDREW MELROSE, 16, Pilgrim Street,
London, E.C.

MR. JOHN LONG'S Autumn List.

In crown 8vo, special cover designs,
price 6/- each.

THE REALISATION OF JUSTUS MORAN.

By FREDERIC CARREL, Author of "The Adventures of John Johns," "The Progress of Pauline Kessler," &c.

THE WAY OUT. By G. B. Burgin,
Author of "The Bread of Tears," &c.

I'D CROWNS RESIGN. By J. MacLaren
COBBAN, Author of "Pursued by the Law," &c.

MEN OF MARLOWE'S By Mrs. Henry
DUDENEY, Author of "The Maternity of Harriett Wicken," "Folly Corner," &c.

YOLANDE the PARISIENNE. By Lucas
CLEEVE (Mrs. HOWARD KINGSCOTE), Author of "Lazarus," "The Woman who Wouldn't," &c.

THE STRENGTH OF STRAW. By Esmé STUART, Author of "Sent to Coventry," "In the Dark," &c.

THE IVORY BRIDE. By Thomas
PINKERTON, Author of "Dead Oppressors," &c.

THE LUCK of a LOWLAND LADDIE.
By MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Kinsah," "Bettina," &c.

A TRAITOR in LONDON. By Fergus
HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c.

JEAN KEIR of CRAIGNEIL. By Sarah
TYTLER, Author of "Miss Nause," "Logan's Loyalty," &c.

THE MALICE OF GRACE WENTWORTH.
By R. H. HEPPENSTALL.

FRIENDSHIP and FOLLY. By Marla
LOUISE POOL, the well-known American Writer,
Author of "In a Dike Shanty," "Boss," &c.

STRAIGHT SHOES. By G. G. Chatterton.
Author of "The Sport of Circumstance," "The Angel of Chance," &c.

London: JOHN LONG, 6, Chandos Street,
Strand.

"This new novel by 'John Oliver Hobbes' is a triumph of intellectual creativeness, and it has held me captive from cover to cover."

C. K. S., in THE SPHERE.

Now ready at all Libraries and Bookstalls

6s. (In Unwin's Green Cloth Library.) 6s.

ROBERT ORANGE.

By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.

Spectator.—"This brilliant novel is written with a distinction unfamiliar in contemporary fiction."

Daily Telegraph.—"A book that everyone will talk
of."

Daily News.—"Mrs. Craigie's characters—even the most introspective—are, however, so well drawn that it is difficult to have too much of them."

Athenaeum.—"A piece of writing that shows a very air it mastery of many elements."

Globe.—"The bold experiment again succeeds, and its success is a thing on which M. S. Craigie may be especially congratulated."

Standard.—"Robert Orange" is a remarkable book."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Its comedy is alive with the brilliant, half-cynical observation of character."

Westminster Gazette.—"Almost a remarkable, as it is certainly a most conscientious, study in emotion."

The World.—"There is no possibility of considering this remarkable book in any other light than as the complement of the equally remarkable book which preceded it. It is, probably, one of the most subtle essays on man ever written by a woman."

Daily Express.—"Robert Orange" is in the air, and it is impossible to get away from it. Moreover, it is to have read it is to confess to being 'out of the movement'."

Speaker.—"A most entertaining book. There is no novelist living, except George Meredith, who can equal Mrs. Craigie in the power of making striking and interesting personalities live in their work."

Scotsman.—"Its literary accomplishment is remarkable; and the book, showing its author at her best, cannot fail to be widely and eagerly read."

LONDON: T FISHER UNWIN,
Paternoster Square, E.C.

W. THACKER & CO.'S RECENT PUBLICATIONS.*THE IMPERIAL RUSSIAN NAVY,

its Past, Present, and Future. By FRED T. JANE, Author of "All the World's Fighting Ships," "The Torpedo in Peace and War," &c. &c. With 150 Illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth extra, 39s. net.

THE HISTORY OF CHINA. By

D. C. BOULDER, Author of "Chinese Gorton," "Sir Stamford Raffles," &c. &c. A New Edition, Revised and brought up to date. Containing chapters on the Recent Concessions to the European Powers. Illustrated with Portraits and Maps. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 24s.

ECHOES of OLD CALCUTTA. A most interesting Series of Sketches of Calcutta Life, chiefly towards the close of the last century. By H. E. BUSTEED,

M.D., C.I.E. Third Edition, Enlarged. Illustrated. Post
8vo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

A SUMMER in HIGH ASIA. A

Summer Ramble through Balistan and Ladakh. By Capt.
F. E. S. ALPAID, Author of "Sport in Ladakh." With a Chapter on Central Asian Trade by Capt. S. H. GODFREY.
Illustrated, and a Map of the Route. Medium 8vo, cloth extra, 12s. 6d. net.

SEONEE; or, Camp Life on the Satpura Range. A Tale of Indian Adventure. By R. A.

STERNDALE, Author of "Mammals of India," "Denizens of the Jungle." Illustrated by the Author. With a Map and Appendix. Crown 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d.

BULLET and SHOT in INDIAN

FOREST, PLAIN, and HILL. With Hints to Beginners in Indian Shooting. By C. E. M. RUSSELL, M.R.A.C., late Senior Deputy-Conservator of Forests, Mysore District.
With a Frontispiece by C. Whymper. Demy 8vo, cloth,
10s. 6d.

A NATURAL HISTORY of the

MAMMALIA of INDIA, BURMAH, and CEYLON. By R. A. STERNDALE, F.R.S., F.Z.S., &c. Author of "Seonee," "The Denizens of the Jungle," "The Afghan Knife," &c. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 12s. 6d.

THE ROD in INDIA. Being Hints

how to obtain Sport, with Remarks on the Natural History of Fish and their Culture. By R. S. THOMAS, F.L.S.
Third Edition, Revised. Full-Page and other Illustrations.
Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

LARGE GAME SHOOTING in

THIBET, the HIMALAYAS, and NORTHERN INDIA.
By General ALEXANDER A. KINLOCH. Contains:
Descriptions of the Country and of the various Animals to be found. Third Edition, with 34 Illustrations and a Map.
Demy 4to, handsomely bound, 42s.

THE ORIGIN of the MAHOMEDANS

in BENGAL. By MOULVIE FUZL RUBEE. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

THE HINDOOS AS THEY ARE. A

Description of the Manners, Customs, and Inner Life of Hindu Society, Bengal. By SHIB CHANDR BOSE.
Second Edition, revised. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

HINDU MYTHOLOGY: Vedic and

Puranic. By W. J. WILKINS, of the London Missionary Society, Calcutta. Profusely Illustrated. Second Edition.
Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

A HANDBOOK to AGRA, DELHI,

ALLAHABAD, CANNONPORE, LUCKNOW, and BE-NARÉS. By H. G. KEENE. With Maps and Plans, in 1 vol. Fcap. 8vo, 6s.

THE TOURIST'S and SPORTSMAN'S

GUIDE to KASHMIR, LADAKH, &c. By A. E. WARD
Bengal Staff Corps. Fourth Edition. 6s.

HINDU CASTES and SECTS. An Exposition of the Origin of the Hindu Caste System, and the Bearing of the Sects towards each other and towards other Religious Systems. By JOGENDRA NATH BHATTACHARYA, M.A., D.L., Author of "A Commentary on Hindu Law," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 16s.

THE FIGHTING RACES of INDIA.

A Handbook by P. D. BONARJEE, Assistant in the Military Department of the Government of India. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

An account of the Sikhs, Gurkhas, Pathans, Baluchis, Pan-jabis, Dogras, Rajputs, Maharattas, and other Tribes from which the Indian Army is recruited.

LAYS of IND. Comical, Satirical, and Descriptive Poems illustrative of Anglo-Indian Life.

By Major W. VELDHIAM ("ALIPH CHEEM"). Illustrated by the Author, Lionel Inglis, and others. Tenth Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt, 5s.

BEHIND the BUNGALOW. By H.

AITKEN, Author of "Tribes on my Frontier." Illustrated by P. C. Macrae. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo, pictorial cloth, 6s.

TWENTY-ONE DAYS in INDIA:

Being the Tour of Sir Ali Baba, K.C.B. By GEORGE
A. KIRKLAND, M.A. A new edition, with six days added. Illustrated by the Author. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE CARLSBAD TREATMENT for

TROPICAL AFFECTIONS, and how to carry it out in India.
By Surgeon-Major L. TARLETON YOUNG. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 5s.

W. THACKER & CO., 2, Creed Lane,
London, E.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1480. Established 1869.

15 September, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

THE opening of the autumn publishing season is as the letting out of water. Books trickle, then flow, then rush, and last overwhelm. The trickling has begun. Messrs. Methuen advertised two novels of importance last week—Mr. Eden Phillpotts's Sons of the Morning, and Mr. Henry James's The Soft Side. This week Messrs. Chatto & Windus give us Mark Twain's new book, The Man who Corrupted Hadleyburg; Mr. Sonnenschein issues the Philosophical Regimen and other unpublished writings of the third Earl of Shaftesbury—a book of capital importance; while from Messrs. Horace Marshall come studies of a dead author and a living—Miss Thompson's Samuel Richardson: A Critical Study, and Mr. J. A. Hammerton's J. M. Barrie and His Books; and, as we write, Messrs. Methuen are issuing a new book by the late Mr. Crane, characteristically entitled Wounds in the Rain.

MR. W. J. STILLMAN's disquieting doubts as to the safety of Mr. Holman Hunt's picture, the "Light of the World," have been easily set at rest. We ought to have remembered that this remarkable picture is in the custody of Keble College, Oxford. Several correspondents have reminded us of this fact; and one adds particulars of the scrupulous care with which the picture is preserved. It is in a locked case in a locked side chapel of the beautiful Chapel of the College. Perhaps this very seclusion is in a measure responsible for the strange rumour to which we referred.

MR. KIPLING's new story, Kim of the Rishtri, is to appear serially in Cassell's Magazine. It is a curious indication of the modern attitude that the literary gossipier who records this fact should add: "The price is a large one, but if what I hear from an American friend is true, the book is worth it." The literary student of the future will be amazed at this bracketing of merit and price.

AN "authentic" edition (why "authentic"?) of the works of Charles Dickens is announced by Messrs. Chapman & Hall. It would appear from the prospectus that in this edition Messrs. Chapman & Hall are giving an attention to format, which their many previous issues of Dickens have rather conspicuously lacked. We note that in the shorter books a heavier paper is to be used, in order to preserve a uniform thickness in the volumes. This strikes us as rather unnecessary, the uniformity of the printed page being much more important than that of bulk.

APROPOS of Mr. Henry James's forthcoming book, A Little Tour in France, to which we referred last week, it is a mistake to suppose that this work is entirely new. It was originally published in the Atlantic Monthly under the title En Provence, and it was issued in America as an octavo volume. We give the old title-page:

HENRY JAMES.

A LITTLE TOUR IN FRANCE.

Boston:

James R. Osgood & Company.
1885.

We understand that Mr. James's Portraits of Places is out of print.

It has been suggested that the new thoroughfare between Holborn and the Strand should be called "Dickens-avenue." A correspondent of Literature points out that it will run through a portion of London which plays a prominent part both in the life and works of Dickens, containing as it does the house in which the old Household Words offices were located; Somerset House, where John Dickens worked in the Navy Pay Office; Clare-court, where the young Dickens ate à-la-mode beef for dinner. Sardinia-street figures in Barnaby Rudge, Lincoln's Inn-fields in Bleak House. Kingsgate-street, Holborn, sheltered the immortal and squalid figure of Mrs. Gamp. However, we cannot consider the suggestion as suitable. The new thoroughfare will be the biggest thing in metropolitan streets that we possess; it should not be treated from any local point of view, even though it may be associated with so great a name as Dickens. If a writer must lend his name, why not go to the greatest—Shakespeare?

THE moanings of Marie Bashkirtseff are continued in the Gentlewoman. Most of her complaints are concerned with art; thus:

The true painter designs, sketches, composes without knowing anything. I, also, designed, but not too much, with this idea, "I am gifted for painting, and some day I shall do it." Meanwhile I have masses of literary sketches, like the portfolio of a painter who knows nothing, but has the calling. One cannot do so many things . . . but if . . . to paint while it is daylight, model till dinner-time, and write afterwards.

I have been to Julian's to show him the Raudouin portrait. This Marseillais has a very contented air, and tells me it gets better and better. It is not my opinion of this portrait. I detest it. But if others think like Julian . . . Ah, well! I shall do it over again all the same; I shall try to make it please me. Julian provokes me. He insists on talking to me like this: "Your soundness in painting gets better and better." He will have it that I have been very strong, then run down, then strong again. It is false, false, false! My sketches are there. Test it.

These utterances are—wearisome.

In regard to the biography of Mr. Eric Mackay which it was understood Miss Marie Corelli was to write, but which she has not yet written, Miss Corelli wishes us to correct the statement that any such book had been "promised" by her. She informs us that she made no engagement whatever, and adds: "If such a biography is ever to be written, it must be done by someone who knew Mr. Eric Mackay before I did, as I never met him till he returned from a long residence in Italy to his father's house at the age of forty-five, when I was a child of twelve. More than half his life had been lived, and I knew, and know, nothing of it."

THE Institute of Journalists has passed the following resolution:

That this Conference is of the opinion that the subject of examination for those desirous of entering the profession of journalism should be no longer deferred, and now instructs the executive committee of the Institute to prepare an examination scheme which would be of real service to all the members of the Institute of Journalists, it being understood that, in the opinion of the Conference, the examination should for a short period be voluntary.

It may be questioned whether journalism would really gain by such an examination, though, of course, this is a matter purely within the jurisdiction of the Institute. The man who does not choose to pass the examination cannot become a member, that is all: he will be none the less a journalist.

A CORRESPONDENT asks us whether we know of "a really good lyric club or of a society where verses are criticised or prizes given." We do not. Can any reader help?

THE sixth and final volume of Dr. Joseph Parker's Studies in Texts is to be issued by Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son this week. The first volume of the series has reached a third edition.

We intend to look up a few articles we have written in our time in order to know whether we have poetic abilities unsuspected by ourselves or others. To this we are encouraged by the discovery made by a correspondent of the St. James's Gazette, who has found that Mr. A. G. Hales, the war correspondent of the Daily News, has been telegraphing poetry home, "unbeknown," in his war correspondence. The following "poem" appeared in the Daily News of August 31, and was, of course, printed as prose. The correspondent who has carved it up into blank verse deserves every credit for his acumen. Mr. Hales's ode to President Steyn runs as follows:

He is our foe, no stabber in the dark . . .
But in the open, where the gaze of God
And man can rest upon him (there) he stands
Defiant, though undone.

The poet then explains how Mr. Steyn staked his country's freedom, his earthly happiness, and his high position:

. . . In the great game
Of war; staked all that mortal man holds dear;
Staked it for what? For love of gain? May he
Who spawned that lie to stir our people's hearts
To boundless wrath against this falling man
Live to repent in sackcloth and in tears
The evil deed so done. . . .

Staked it for what?
To feed his own ambition? I tell you no.
The undercurrent which brought forth the deed
Sprang from a nobler and a higher source.
His country stood pledged (firm) in time of peace
To help in time of war a sister State.
And when the bond fell due he honoured it,
Though none knew better than this noble man
That when he loosed the dogs of war he crossed
A lion's path.

THE onslaught of Mrs. W. K. Clifford, authoress of Aunt Anne, Wild Prozy, &c., on Mr. Sidney Grundy, on the score that he has plagiarised from her for the purposes of A Debt of Honour, and Mr. Grundy's reply to his accuser, calls to mind some other recent instances of similar charges. Thus, not so many years ago, when clever Mr. Anstey Guthrie published his Giant's Robe, which story treats curiously enough of a case of sharp practice in connexion with a book, he was accused of having picked the brains of an Indian judge, one W. Follet Synge, who had written a novel called Tom Singleton on a similar theme. The theme in question was the use by one man to serve his own ends of a MS. written by his friend. Mr. Anstey amply defends himself in a preface to The Giant's Robe. Similarly Charles Reade, with a wealth of quotation and illustration, defends himself in an appendix to The Wandering Heir against the charges brought against him by Mortimer Collins and his wife when The Wandering Heir first appeared as a Christmas number of having pilfered from Swift for his descriptions of Dublin life in the last century. Reade was often accused of "lifting" from the work of others, and to a certain extent admitted the impeachment; but, as he says, an author may legitimately appropriate within reason from heterogeneous sources providing he does not do so from a homogeneous.

ONE of the most noteworthy examples of an accusation of plagiarism was that brought against Mrs. Hodgson-Burnett, who, it will be remembered, proceeded against an unauthorised dramatist of her work in relation to Little Lord Fauntleroy. Some years before the publication of that novel, a story entitled Wilfrid, by Mrs. A. T. Winthrop, was published in New York. The eponymous hero, Wilfrid, is a very engaging little boy, the son of a certain Capt. Ferrars, an officer in the army, who has made his father furious by marrying a Frenchwoman and a Roman Catholic. Capt. Ferrars is disinherited by his father, and he and his wife die, the child Wilfrid being brought up by a benevolent woman, the sister of a nurse at the hospital to which his mother had been taken. Through the agency of a philanthropic member of Parliament Wilfrid is restored to his grandfather, the Earl of Lindisfarne, and goes to live with him—the old man doting upon him. In the end the little lad dies, to the great grief of everyone. Such is a brief abstract of the main story, there being a slight sub-plot, which is of no importance in this connexion. It will be noted that the hero in one case is called by the Saxon name of Wilfrid, and in the other by the equally Saxon name Cedric, and that the former addresses his foster-mother as "Mamie," and the latter his mother as "Dearest." In fact, the resemblances are endless.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD has frequently been accused of plagiarism, and several people—Mr. E. F. Knight, for instance, author of the Cruise of the Falcon—have been accused of plagiarising from him. One of the strangest examples is where he is accused of having copied the description of Unslopagaas in Allan Quatermain terrifying a cowardly Frenchman by whirling an axe round him, from Hardy's description in Far from the Madding Crowd of how Troy's sword encircles Bethsheba. "In an instant the atmosphere was transformed to Bethsheba's eyes. Beams of light, caught from the low sun's rays, above, around, in front of her, well-nigh shut out earth and heaven—all emitted in the marvellous evolutions of Troy's reflecting blade, which seemed everywhere at once, and yet nowhere specially. These circling gleams were accompanied by a keen rush that was almost a whistling—also springing from all sides at once. In short, she was enclosed in a firmament of light, and of sharp hisses, resembling a sky full of meteors close at hand." Speaking of Far from the Madding Crowd, Mr. Pinero, it will be remembered, was charged with indolence to that, while Mr. Gilbert's correspondence in the press with an Irish musician, who accused him of plagiarism over "The Mountebanks," in regard to the penny-in-the-slot song, will not be forgotten.

THE facsimile of The Germ, which Mr. Elliot Stock is preparing to issue during the autumn, will reproduce the four separate numbers of the magazine exactly as they were issued in the buff covers by the P. R. B. These, with an extended preface on the literary history of The Germ, by William Michael Rossetti, in a separate section, will be issued in a case of suitable design, so that the reader will be able to see the exact aspect of the work as it first saw the light.

THE Paris correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette is an admirable literary gossip, and always writes with knowledge. He has just been describing the rather dismal state of the Paris chansonniers, whose long reign of success, it seems, is on the decline. The chansonniers are, in fact, so depressed that they are about to hold a congress, which, says the correspondent, ought to be a picturesque affair. The chansonniers are not arrayed like the lilies, nor like Solomon, nor like the average man. "Aristide Bruant in sage-green corduroys, jack-boots, voluminous scarlet muffler, and vast slouch hat; Hyspa of the peg-top trousers and the immaculate white Lavallière; Théodore Botrel in his Breton waistcoat; Marcel Legay, the wearer of unexampled frock-coats—these and a score of other spurners of the tyranny of the fashion-plates will make a brave show. The Tout Bohème still keeps up appearances, sartorially speaking, though it does so, which the 'ancesters' did not, on an excellent income."

CONTINUING, the Pall Mall writer says:

As periods of vogue go in Paris, the chansonniers have had a long innings, and it will not be surprising if, for a time, they are under a cloud. It was early in the 'eighties, with the foundation of the ever memorable Chat Noir, that the new generation of chansonniers first made their voices heard—an expression literally correct, as it is characteristic of the present-day chansonniers that they sing their songs as well as write them. The Chat Noir was the beginning of Montmartre, of the Montmartre of songsters innumerable and ban box cafés-concerts, artistic cabarets and bouis-bouis at every turn and corner. The movement deserves an historian, for besides having a far-reaching effect on the amusements of Parisians, and perhaps on their manners and morals, it has left its mark on literary and even on political history. What is known as "rosserie" in literature—the term would seem to be untranslatable—was the invention of Montmartre. . . . The decadence of Montmartre has been revealed by the Exhibition. Of all the failures of the great show the most glaring, the most lamentable, has been the Rue de Paris, the cafés-concerts of which are modelled on those of Montmartre. They have had no success, and they have deserved none. The sad truth is, that talent, once so prolific on the Butte, is for the moment of rare growth, if, indeed, it be discoverable at all. Of the men who made the reputation of Montmartre, some are dead—Macual and Jules Jouy, for instance—and others such as Donnay, Rollinat and Bruant have ceased writing for the Butte. Those of the older school who remain were never, perhaps, quite in the front rank, and would seem to have long since given their best work. The newcomers are legion, but the quantity does not make up for the almost total absence of quality.

REPLYING to the suggestion of a correspondent, Claudius Clear discusses in the British Weekly the question of the keeping and publication of letters and the weeding out of books. Concerning books, he says: "I do not intend ever to possess more books than I have now—that is, as new books come in, I shall go on sifting the old." It would be interesting to know how many books Claudius Clear possesses. Mark Pattison put the minimum of a decent personal library at a thousand volumes; no doubt, Claudius Clear's books far exceed that number. It strikes us as somewhat dangerous to make the exchange of old books for new in a hard-and-fast way; one might easily find that, in a mood of temporary enthusiasm, the good had given place to the indifferent.

MESSRS. ISBISTER announce for autumn publication a memoir of William Conyngham Plunket, Baron Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin, by Mr. Frederick Douglas How; and also a study of Tennyson: His Art and Relation to Modern Life, by Mr. Stopford Brooke.

THE Grande Revue contains an analysis of two unpublished collections of letters written by Mme. de Warens, celebrated by her friendship with Rousseau. The correspondence does not betray the possession by the writer of the smallest intellectual or literary interest, and an unusual ignorance of orthography, syntax, and style is only too apparent. Her sole preoccupation is business, and there is much mention of contracts—commercial, not social—and lawsuits. With Mme. de Warens commercial enterprise was a passion, and in indulging it she was never discouraged by the constant ill-fortune that attended her ventures. A silk stocking manufactory which she established at Vevey shortly after her marriage did not enrich her. After separating from her husband she induced him to transfer his means to her. Subsequently we find her manufacturing drugs at Annecy, chocolate, soap, and stoneware at Chambéry, forming a company for the exploitation of "mines situated in Chamounix," purchasing furnaces in the Maurienne and coal-pits at Harache, and ruining both herself and her friends, always with the best intentions. Many of the earlier letters contain requests for capital to promote her various undertakings, but in her old age her needs were of a more personal and pressing nature, for on one occasion she is forced to beg her correspondent to send her "quelques petites provisions de bouche" to enable her to maintain her modest household.

MR. DOOLEY, in the current Harper's Weekly, strikes that bigger vein on which he sometimes chances in the midst of his discussion of smaller matters. His subject is the Negro Problem. He gives a sketch of the career of a coloured gentleman whose name was Andrew Jackson George Wash'nton Americus Caslateras Beresford Vanilla Hicks. To Mr. Dooley he was merely "Snowball." Snowball's ambition, after packing himself with learning, did not stop short of the Presidency of the United States. "Go on," says Mr. Dooley, "on'y don't be too free." He continues:

'Twas years before I see him again. Wan day I was walkin' up th' levee smokin' a good tin-cint seegar whin a ooon wearin' a suit iv clothes that looked like a stained-glass window in th' house iv a Dutch brewer, an' a pop-bottle in th' fr-ront iv his shirt, steps up to me an' he says: "How d'ye do, Mistah Dooley?" says he. "Don't ye know me—Mistah Hicks?" he says. "Snowball?" says I. "Step inside this dureway," says I. "lest Clancy, th' polisman on th' corner, take me f'r a octoroon," I says. "What ar-re ye doin'?" says I. "How did ye enjy th' Prisdincey?" says I. He laughed an' tol' me th' story iv his life. He wint to practisin' law an' foun' his on'y clients was coons, an' they had no assets but their vote at th' prim'ry. Besides a warrant f'r a moke was th' same as a letter iv introduction to th' warden iv th' pinitinchry. Th' on'y thing left f'r th' lawyer to do was to move f'r a new thrile, an' ather he'd got two or three he th' ight ol' things was th' best an' ye do well to lave had enough alone. He got so sick iv chicken he cudden't live on his fees, an' he quit th' law an' wint into journalism. He r-run Th' Colored Suppliment, but it was a failure, th' taste iv th' public lanin' more to quadroon publications, an' no ma-an that owned a restrant or theyatre or drhy-goods store'd put in an adver-tisemint f'r fear th' subscribers'd see it an' come ar-round. Thin he attempted to go into pollytics, an' th' best he cud get was carryin' a bucket iv wather f'r a Lincoln Club. He thried to larn a thrade, an' found th' on'y place a naygur can larn a thrade is in prison, an' he can't wurruk at that without committin' burglary. He started to take up subscriptions f'r a strugghlin' church an' found th' profission was overcrowded. "Fin'ly," says he, "'twas up to me to be a porther in a saloon or go into th' on'y business," he says, "in which me race has a chanst," he says. "What's that?" says I. "Craps," says he. "I've opened a palachal imporyium," he says, "where," he says, "'twud please me very much," he says, "me ol' abolitionist frind," he says, "if ye'd dhrop in some day," he says, "an' I'll roll th' sweet, white bones f'r ye," he says. "'Tis th' hope iv me people," he says. "We have an even chaunst at ivry other pursoot," he says, "but 'tis on'y in craps we have a shade th' best iv it," he says.

Mr. Dooley's final comment is, "When we tell thim they're free they know we're on'y sthringin' thim."

THE report of the expeditions organised by the British Astronomical Association to observe the total solar eclipse of May 28, 1900, will be contained in a volume shortly to be issued from the office of Knowledge. The work will be edited by Mr. E. Walter Maunder, F.R.A.S., and will contain many fine photographs of the various stages of the eclipse.

Bibliographical.

I QUOTED last week a paragraph which had appeared in a recognised literary organ, and in which it was asserted that Mr. J. A. Hammerton's forthcoming volume on J. M. Barrie and His Books would contain "a full bibliography" of that writer. Mr. Hammerton now writes to my Editor to say that this part of the paragraph is inaccurate. As a matter of fact, he remarks, the bibliographical section of his work is prefaced by these words: "To include a complete bibliography of all Mr. Barrie's works and miscellaneous writings would be no very difficult undertaking, so far as its compiling were concerned, but the result would occupy considerably more space than can be devoted to it, or seems necessary." Nevertheless, Mr. Hammerton goes on to state that his book will include a list of "all" Mr. Barrie's "special" contributions to the Nottingham Journal—contributions which, as the product of a young man of twenty or thereabouts, can hardly be (I should say) of very great literary value. It would, indeed, be interesting to know whether this list has been made with Mr. Barrie's expressed approval, or otherwise. Mr. Barrie has the reputation of being a modest man—though, to be sure, he did produce, in Margaret Ogilvy, a volume in which the autobiographical element is large.

To my suggestion that in producing a volume on J. M. Barrie and His Books Mr. Hammerton "appears to be rather in a hurry," that gentleman replies that "The career of this author is one of the most interesting—perhaps the most interesting—of all contemporary authors. He is not likely to do better work than he has done" [which is an unkind remark]. "The fact that his publications are so few is all the greater reason for treating him seriously. Mr. Dash-Dash" [I suppress the real name out of sheer pity for its owner], "I believe, has written considerably over a hundred books. Fancy anyone writing, or anybody buying, a book about Dash-Dash!" I have thought it right to let Mr. Hammerton have his say, but on the main point of the controversy am "of the same opinion still."

It interests me to note that Messrs. Putnam's "Knickerbocker Shakespeare" (Phœbus, what a name!) is to be illustrated by drawings from the pencil of the late Frank Howard. Frank Howard died in 1866, so that he is "late" indeed. He died, it seems, in want, and his life as a whole cannot be described as a success. Nevertheless, his outline illustrations of Shakespeare's plays, the publication of which began in 1827 and ended in 1833, seem likely to keep his memory green. They appear to have been acquired, some time in the 'seventies, by Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons, of Edinburgh and London, who, in 1879 (I think), made them (or, rather, reduced reproductions of them) a feature of their "Howard Shakespeare," to my mind the best one-volume edition of Shakespeare ever published. In this edition the outline drawings measured about 2½ ins. by 3¼ ins. Are Messrs. Putnam going to reproduce these reproductions, or are they going to present the drawings in their original, or some other, shape? Anyway, I am glad to observe that these designs, so excellent in draughtsmanship if in nothing else, are not forgotten.

Comment has before now been made in this column upon the lack of enterprise exhibited by the publishers and editors of English literary classics. I am, therefore, the more glad to congratulate the publisher and editor of the "Temple Classics" upon their decision to include in the series, and issue shortly, the Letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu and the Biographia Literaria of Coleridge. These will be real boons to many a book-lover. The Biographia Literaria has not, I believe, been published in a separate form since 1866. The Letters and Works of Lady M. W. Montagu were re-issued so recently as 1893, but at a price beyond the scope of limited incomes. A book of Passages from the Letters appeared in 1891, but it is to be assumed that the "Temple" edition will be complete, not scrappy. Another volume of "passages" would hardly meet the case.

Because a contributor to the ACADEMY said last week of Ouida that "She has been writing novels for more than a generation—Under Two Flags was published in 1868," a Yorkshire correspondent opines that the reviewer regards 1868 as the year in which Ouida began her literary career. That, I think, hardly follows. We know, of course, that Held in Bondage came out in 1863, and that Strathmore and Chandos also came before Under Two Flags. Our Yorkshire friend, however, tells us that he saw the name of "Ouida" appended to many contributions to Bentley's Miscellany in the 'fifties—an interesting statement, which anyone may verify who has a file of the Miscellany, or cares to wend his way to a well-equipped public library. The question is, Is it worth while to wend? Let us wait for a Ouida bibliography.

Dr. Todhunter, apparently, has translated Schiller's Mary Stuart, and adapted it to the English stage. We are not told whether the version is in prose, in verse, or in both. We know that Fanny Kemble adapted the piece for Mdlle. Beatrice, and that the Hon. Lewis Wingfield adapted it for Mme. Modjeska; but neither version, I think, has been published, though on that point I am open to correction. The play has not attracted any translator with a high literary reputation. When Henry Morley published, in 1889, his collection of English versions of Schiller's dramas, he had to fall back upon the translation (into blank verse) made by J. L. Mellish and first printed in 1801. This had been reprinted in 1888 along with Mellish's version of The Maid of Orleans.

Very welcome indeed will be the promised biography (with diaries) of the late Miss Helen Faucit (Lady Martin). Miss Faucit deserved to have some such monument to her memory. True it is that her delightful essays on Some of Shakespeare's Female Characters contain a good deal of personal reminiscence; true it is that there are frequent references to her in Macaulay's Diary, and in other biographies and autobiographies of our time. At present, however, no consecutive record of her career has been published in England other than that which is to be read in Mr. Pascoe's Dramatic List—a sketch which, excellent as far as it goes, is obviously not adequate or final.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Milton's Prose.

TEMPLE CLASSICS.—Arcopagitica. (Dent. 1s. 6d.)

"THIS manner of writing," said John Milton regarding his prose, "wherein knowing myself inferior to myself, led by the genial power of nature to another task, I have the use, as I may account, but of my left hand." It is a sentence strange to encounter, in the strong and copious prose-work of the great Puritan—copious in style and diction, if not in quantity. Most poets, nevertheless, must have been ready to echo it; must have felt the new-born hesitancy of their accustomed ready handmaid, Expression, when she was called to walk with them in the dusty and frequented ways of prose. Yet not a beaten way was that when Milton adventured on it—wittingly we say adventured. It had for the poet an attraction which has fallen from it to-day, in that—no less than poetry—it offered him the privileges of the conqueror and explorer; a new empire to be founded, a new region to be reduced under obedience and law. And this, to some its difficulty, to the poet must have been its allurements. In poetry the great traditions had been set; in prose they remained to be set. In this medium, the language lay plastic under his hands; the whole question of its style expected his formative touch; its whole structural laws hearkened for his creative fiat. Such an unsullied and virgin opportunity comes not twice in a language.

Milton, whose authoritative sanction lies large over English poetry, made, it must be confessed, no equivalent use of his vast chance in prose. He did fine things with it, but he estated no tradition on his successors, he laid no mandate on the language: not to him have our fathers gone for a precedent, nor can we go for a resurrecting voice in prose. It has passed as an axiom that poets' prose (when poets do write prose) is peculiarly clean, pure, forthright, and workmanly; that, in fact (contrary to probable anticipation) it has no tincture of "poetic prose," but is as distinctively prose as their verse is distinctively poetry. It would be interesting to inquire whether this be so. It is so with Byron, Cowper, and Southey, who were not imaginative poets; it is so with Wordsworth when he treats philosophically of poetic principle. But when he writes on the Cintra Convention he adopts the raised manner of Hooker and his fellows; nor does the law hold exactly good with Coleridge, still less with Rossetti or Swinburne. Dryden and Matthew Arnold can be cited for it, and the prose of Shakespeare's plays; but against it again is Sidney, and against it again is Milton. Under his large motions, the garment of prose intermittently falls aside, revealing the immortal limbs of poetry.

But this alone will not explain why he is a splendidly impossible model. Browne is full of rhetoric that hovers on the confines of poetry, yet from the grand physician of Norwich it is possible to learn, as Johnson learned, and Stevenson. Browne's sentences are admirable in structure, and (apart from diction) need little, if anything, to be quite modern—we do not say fashionably modern. Therein is the difference. Milton was Milton to the last. As he went to Virgil for the structural art of his blank verse, he went to Cicero for the structure of his prose. But the Latinisation which his genius triumphantly imposed on poetry failed against the stubborn native grain of English prose. It is true (as Professor Vaughan remarks, in this "Temple Classics" edition of the Arcopagitica) that he is looser in structure than Hooker; his long sentences are in the main "not a synthesis of clauses, but an agglomeration." Clearly he discerned that rigid Latinisation would not work, and sought for such a successful compromise as he had carried out in verse. But the two elements of the compromise are only reined in equal yoke by his powerful hand; they must needs break loose from any other. Even in his hand the combination is often less than masterly, sometimes downright cumbersome and awkward. The accretions of sentence are tagged on in almost slovenly fashion. Such are the changes brought about by the fixing of a language that a child can now smile at the difficulties of the great Milton. We (so to speak) have but to touch a spring, where he had all to do with his own hand. That we may not appear to censure without giving testimony of the infelicity, consider this passage:

What if I had written as your friend the author of the aforesaid mime, "Mundus alter et idem," to have been ravished like some young Cephalus or Hylas, by a troop of camping housewives in Viraginea, and that he was there forced to swear himself an uxorious varlet: then after a long servitude to have come into Aphrodisia that pleasant country, that gave such a sweet smell to his nostrils among the shameless courtezans of Desvergonia?

Here clause is inartificially hooked on to clause; with an unpleasant effect intensified by the changes of construction; not absolutely ungrammatical, but perplexing and inelegant.

Yet again examine another sentence, where the like faulty looseness of structure is pushed to a final obscurity of expression:

So if my name and outward demeanour be not evident enough to defend me, I must make trial if the discovery of my inmost thoughts can: wherein of two purposes, both honest and sincere, the one perhaps I shall not miss; although I fail to gain belief with others, of being such as my perpetual thoughts shall here disclose me, I may yet not fail of success in persuading some to be such really themselves, as they cannot believe me to be more than what I feign.

This, despite its intended openness of structure, is truly involved, not evolved after the manner of a long sentence justly builded. And such is the fault which may rightly be charged against Milton. Of occasional Latinisms we make less account. As thus:

But these frequent songs throughout the law and the prophets . . . may be easily made appear over all the kinds of lyric poetry to be incomparable.

Or, again: "The chief of learned men reputed in this land." The like may be found, much more frequently, in Hooker; and Milton is rather to be praised that they appear so seldom, than censured that they appear sometimes. The former, indeed, exemplifies a construction which we could wish Milton had succeeded in recommending, the inversion not being violent, while there is force and propriety in bringing down the close upon the emphatic word. Next to the genius of the language, the great power which fought against the splendid host of Latinising writers was doubtless the English Bible. The Bible had decided before Dryden that the language should not set in their mould.

But if not as an inimitable model, yet as a magnificent study and recreation, like the hearing of grave and lofty music, the prose-work of Milton deserves to pass from the exclusive hands of scholars into those of all who care for exalted English. Though critics have dwelt on his Latinised diction, the substance is fine and virile Saxon, on which the Latin is a stately broidery, harmonised with rare art. He can pass from it at will to the most energetic simplicity, as one might conjecture in the author of Comus.

They thought themselves gallant men, and I thought them fools: they made sport, and I laughed; they mispronounced, and I disliked; and, to make up the atticism, they were out, and I hissed.

Were ever unlucky actors assailed with more vernacular scorn? That it can exceed, at times, in too rough abuse, we might surmise from passages in the poems. But the cudgel, if too knotty, is sound English wood; and one has a laughing relish in hearing its hearty ring—the savagery of the blows deadened by a distance of two centuries. And when Milton's matter gives him scope, how those long sentences drop like a cloak all suspicion of stiffness or pedantry, and advance in sweet and noble measure! Listen to this, if you will to hear music.

Next . . . that I may tell ye whither my younger feet wandered, I betook me among those lofty fables and romances, which recount in solemn cantos the deeds of knighthood founded by our victorious kings, and from hence had in renown over all Christendom. There I read it in the oath of every knight, that he should defend to the expense of his best blood, or of his life, if so befell him, the honour and chastity of virgin or matron; from whence even then I learned what a noble virtue chastity sure must be, to the defence of which so many worthies, by such a dear adventure of themselves, had sworn. And if I found in the story afterward, any of them, by word or deed, breaking that oath, I judged it the same fault of the poet as that which is attributed to Homer, to have written indecent things of the gods. Only this my mind gave me, that every free and gentle spirit, without that oath, ought to be borne a knight, nor needed to expect the gilt spur, or the laying of a sword upon his shoulder, to stir him up both by his counsel and his arms to secure and protect the weakness of any attempted chastity. So that even those books, which to many others have been the fuel of wantonness and loose living, I cannot think how, unless by divine indulgence, proved to me so many incitements, as you have heard, to the love and steadfast observation of that virtue which abhors the society of bordelloes.

The language of this is as pure, and austere beautiful as the thought, which is (so to speak) the finest blend of chivalry and Puritanism.

There is in the above passage a certain strain of exalted declamation, which appears yet more notable in Milton's most splendid outbursts. Outbursts they are, so that one continually considers what an orator might have been in him. Always he seems perorating to some august assembly, like his own Satan in Pandemonium: the very rhythm seems designed to swell through resounding distances and reverberate above the multitudinous murmur of frequent congregations. This suits, also, the essential spaciousness of the man's mind, its love of large grandeurs, of massed and massive sound, of all imperial amplitudes, alike in conception, expression, and ambitions. It is in such mood and at such opportunities, therefore, that his great and entirely personal style is most completely under his control, can deploy its full resources and rejoice unafraid in its own power. At such moments his style is the prose counterpart of the supreme numbers which awe us in Paradise Lost, so far as the occasion and the lesser range of prose will admit. Sometimes it comes and passes in a single gust, as when he speaks of the "poet, soaring in the high region of his fancies, with his garland and singing robes about him." Or, yet more magnificent:

The Apocalypse of St. John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies.

To keep on such a level would be to make his prose purely lyrical; and, therefore, in the sustained passages, Milton starts from a lower stage. Take that fine passage in the Areopagitica:

Books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burthen to the earth; but a good book is the precious life - blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can restore a life, . . . and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse.

This weighty piece of reflection is almost modern in form. From it Milton rises or descends at will, until he reaches his majestic and characteristic level, shown in the following passage:

Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed upon Psyche as an incessant labour to cull out, and sort asunder, were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. . . . He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost which vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental whiteness.

Praise is impotent before such prose as this, which only Milton could transcend. Often quoted, we must yet quote again the words in which he achieves that feat:

Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full mid-day beam: purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

So puissant a passage (to use Milton's own word) is not to be found elsewhere, and could hardly be written again. We could no more build like the builders of Egypt than we could write in this colossal manner. The Miltonic prose overtops our praise, and seems framed for a larger generation. It stands with the columns of Memphis and Babylonian gardens, and all primeval survivals which have testified, or still testify, to the living little, of the spacious dead. Let us not overlay it with the parasitical growth of vain words.

A Solitary Sea-Rover.

Sailing Alone Around the World. By Captain Joshua Slocum. (Sampson Low. 8s. 6d. net.)

THIS book breathes the spirit of the old great seamen. We do not mean that the modern sailor lacks any sailorly qualities; but here we have more than these—we have a joy in adventure big as the seas covered; a grip, a constancy, a fearlessness and initiative which appeal to one's pulses like the sound of a bugle at dawn. The authentic strong man is before us, possessed with that sea love which welcomes any danger smelling of brine. Captain Slocum discovered no reefs or islands; they were all discovered, one supposes, long ago, charted, and made part of the sea's history. But he accomplished what has never before been recorded of any man—he sailed round the world alone, and, moreover, he built the ship that carried him. The statement is astounding. Yet the narrative itself is so little sensational in manner, so sober and well-balanced, that we accept it all without a touch of incredulity. It is not a bare narrative, either: it is a piece of art.

On both sides [says Captain Slocum] my family were sailors; and if any Slocum should be found not seafaring he will show at least an inclination to whittle models of boats and contemplate voyages. My father was the sort of man who, if wrecked on a desolate island, would find his way home, if he had a jack-knife and could find a tree. He was a good judge of a boat, but the old clay farm which some calamity made his was an anchor to him.

Coming from such a stock, Captain Slocum inevitably rushed seawards, and after working his way up to commands and ownerships he conceived the idea of his great adventure. He rebuilt, entirely with his own hands, the old sloop Spray, which had been propped up on land for seven years, and in her he accomplished this memorable voyage. The tonnage of this tiny craft was nine tons net and twelve and seventy-one hundredths gross—a mere toy in which to put a girdle round the world. His chronometer was a dollar tin clock with a smashed face. He set sail on April 24, 1895, from Boston, Massachusetts.

At first the loneliness was awesome; that, however, soon wore off, and we have a remarkable picture of this Nova Scotian sea-dog, solitary in mid-Atlantic, singing to a shrill accompaniment of wind and wave, "Johnny Boker," "We'll Pay Darby Doyle for his Boots," and "Babylon's a-fallin'." So sailing he passed "Flores in the Azores," a nineteenth century captain of spiritual kin to that old scourge of Spain, Sir Richard Grenville.

The voyage appears to have been something of a triumphal progress. The Spray was petted at her ports of call, crammed with provisions, presented with sails and flags: her fame was flashed before her. One is glad to learn that at Gibraltar Captain Slocum and the British Navy became fast friends. Once the captain was suffering from delirium and cramps induced by a diet of plums and Pico white cheese. He dreamed that a pilot came aboard:

"Señor, I have come to do you no harm. I have sailed free, but was never worse than a contrabandista. I am one of Columbus's crew . . . I am the pilot of the Pinta come to aid you. Lie still, señor captain, and I will guide your ship to-night. You have a calentura . . . You did wrong, captain, to mix cheese with plums. . . ." Then he sang:

"High are the waves fierce, gleaming,
High is the tempest roar!
High is the sea-bird screaming!
High the Azore!"

When the captain recovered from the calentura, the pilot of the Pinta had vanished.

We cannot follow the Spray through her whole course. She did as bravely in the Pacific as in the Atlantic, never turning nasty as ships sometimes will. She was seventy-two days between Juan Fernandez and Samoa. The Trades were kind:

For one whole month my vessel held her course true; I had not, the while, so much as a light in the binnacle. The Southern Cross I saw every night abeam. The sun every morning came up astern; every evening it went down ahead. I wished for no other compass to guide me, for these were true. If I doubted my reckoning after a long time at sea, I verified it by reading the clock aloft made by the Great Architect, and it was right . . . I awoke sometimes to find the sun already shining into my cabin. I heard water rushing by, with only a thin plank between me and the depths, and I said: "How is this?" But it was all right; it was my ship on her course, sailing as no ship had ever sailed before in the world. . . . I knew that no human hand was at the helm; I knew that all was well with "the hands" forward, and that there was no mutiny on board.

In July, 1896, Captain Slocum reached Samoa, where he was entertained by Mrs. Stevenson and Malietoa.

Tusitala, it will be remembered, had left Vailima for a greater house eighteen months before. Mrs. Stevenson presented the captain with the four volumes of the sailing Directories of the Mediterranean, inscribing the following on the fly-leaf of the first:

TO CAPTAIN SLOCUM,—These volumes have been read and re-read many times by my husband, and I am very sure that he would be pleased that they should be passed on to the sort of seafaring man that he liked above all others.

The Spray laid up at Cape Town for a three months' rest while the captain toured inland. In Pretoria he had an interview with ex-President Kruger, being introduced by Judge Beyers. The latter mentioned that Captain Slocum was making a voyage round the world. "You don't mean round the world," said Mr. Kruger, reminding the judge that the world was flat, "it is impossible! You mean in the world." This amazing saying seems to illuminate Mr. Kruger's attitude towards facts.

The Spray cast anchor in her home port on June 27, 1898, after an absence of three years and two months. It was a marvellous undertaking, marvellously successful. The story of the cruise of this little craft is full of the fine flavour of romance; it is packed with the awe and splendour of the high seas, with the essence of brave adventure. It is a book to remember and to keep. We shall sail with the Spray and her reliant master under the Southern Cross on many a night when we weary for the brisk tang of the salt.

India's Foes: Russia and Famine.

Russia against India. By A. R. Colquhoun. (Harpers. 5s.)

Open Letters to Lord Curzon on Famines and Land Assessments in India. By Romesh C. Dutt. (Kegan Paul.)

THE complications in China have brought with them an enormous crop of books on the Far East and Asiatic questions, and there are few more industrious workers in this field than Mr. A. R. Colquhoun, whose huge volume, Overland to China, we reviewed not long ago. His present book is in some parts a recapitulation of the former volume where it dealt with Russia, though it has aims and objects of its own. It is addressed to that now very popular personage, the man in the street, and is meant for his information and enlightenment. Russia against India makes no pretensions to being literature; it is merely an example of book-making, though of the best kind. It views as a whole the advance of Russia, "creeping on, bit by bit," and Mr. Colquhoun gives the outlines of a policy which he declares is bold and prudent. If it really is all the author claims for it, we trust that it will be adopted.

Mr. Colquhoun begins with an historical introduction to his subject, and goes on to describe the country and people of Central Asia. He then touches on British rule in India, in Persia and Afghanistan, and Russia in Central Asia, and concludes with what is really the kernel of the book, "The Defence of India." Mr. Colquhoun does not believe that Russia will invade India in a few months or in a few years' time; her whole history forbids such an assumption. Russia has never rushed matters; she has always crept forward gradually and imperceptibly, letting the confiding British public forget one step before she takes another.

It may be taken for granted, of course, that if Russia were now, from her present base, to attempt a direct invasion of India across the whole extent of Afghanistan it would fail. But does anyone, in his senses, suppose Russia is going to embark on such a foolhardy enterprise, when, with the experience of her continued success, she can, without sacrificing the life of a single Cossack, without any great expenditure, do now as she has done before, creep on bit by bit, so as to avoid arousing the susceptibilities of the British public? The Russians have made a close study of the British character, under the influence of a democratic Parliamentary Government. The apathy and indifference to everything except the safety of the present second embodied in the sayings: "A long way off," and "It will last our time," are powerful allies of Russia, and well she knows it.

Russia uses her position in Central Asia to put pressure on us in India, and she will increase that pressure as she gets a more favourable position and is more strongly established. A passive defence within the Indian frontier is simply suicidal. It gives Russia the choice of position for attack, and leaves her free to push down and seize a port in the Persian Gulf. The true defence of the British Empire in India is, Mr. Colquhoun holds, to preserve Afghanistan and Beluchistan as real barriers, which can only be done by developing and extending communications to Kabul, Kandahar, and Seistan. The Indian pamiirs must be defended, but actively defended in Afghanistan. It is no longer enough to block the mouths of the passes. On points of detail there may be discussion, but there can be no doubt that Mr. Colquhoun's book, as the work of an expert, will be most informing to the general reader. It is short and concise, and puts the pith of the whole matter in readable form. The maps which accompany and elucidate the text are excellent, and in an appendix is the famous Circular Note which Prince Gortschakoff issued in 1864, and which bamboozled the more ignorant and confiding of our politicians for so many years. With the document is also the apocryphal Testament of Peter the Great, which is, nevertheless, a capital guide in Russian foreign politics. On the whole, Russia against India is instructive and admirably suited to its purpose.

Mr. Dutt's book is moderate in tone, sound in economic reasoning, and shows a sincere desire to help the Government in its arduous task. But it is the most formidable indictment that has ever been brought against the practical success of British rule in India. Mr. Dutt, a distinguished ex-official himself, points out that since the transfer of the administration to the Crown (1858) there have been ten famines in India, entailing a total loss of 15,000,000 lives. He admits that undoubtedly these famines are directly caused by the failure of the annual rains, over which man has no control; but it is equally certain that their intensity, and their disastrous effects, can be to a great extent mitigated by moderating the land-tax, by the construction of irrigation works, and by the reduction of the public debt and the expenditure of India.

That is the essence of his case. The plea that famines are mainly due to the rapid increase of population he dismisses with the argument that "the increase is less than in England and Wales, and eighteen other countries out of twenty-eight for which figures are available." Regarding expenditure, he mentions that "retired viceroys and high military authorities have told the Royal Commission on Indian Expenditure that to maintain, at the cost of India, a vast force required for Great Britain's Imperial purposes abroad is unjust, illegal, and inequitable."

It is with land assessment, which varies with each Province, that he deals in detail:

In Bengal 80 per cent. of the gross produce is retained by the cultivator, 14 per cent. is paid to the landlord as rent, and 6 per cent. to the Government as land-tax. This tax has been permanently fixed since 1793; hence the landlord gains at the expense of the Government.

In Northern India the cultivator also gets 80 per cent., but the landlord 10 per cent. and the Government 10 per cent. The assessment is made for thirty years, so that it can be changed to the advantage of the Government.

In Bombay and Madras, where the Government is also the landlord, the cultivator usually gets only 70 per cent.;

in the Central Provinces barely 66 per cent. This assessment is far too severe on the cultivator, and allows him no margin for bad harvests.

Mr. Dutt points out the remarkable fact that the Central Provinces, the most sparsely populated part of British India, have suffered the most from recent famines; also that Bengal, the most thickly populated, has lost not a single life through famine since the Permanent Settlement (1793). Between these extremes lies Northern India with its ideal system.

This book is well worth a careful study by those interested in India. It will probably create a stir in high official circles.

"Old Purgatory Pickpurse."

Man and the Spiritual World as Disclosed by the Bible. By the Rev. Arthur Chambers. (Charles Taylor.)

IN casting aside the popular accretions which had overlaid the Church's teaching with regard to the condition of the departed, the Reformers uprooted also the conception of an intermediate state. But the bald alternative that remains after its elimination is too frightful for contemplation; so here back again is Latimer's "Old Purgatory Pickpurse"—no longer predatory—introduced some years ago by the very Protestant Dean of Canterbury in the guise of Eternal Hope; now further fortified, scripturalised and (if we may coin so hideous a word) Drummondised into an evolutionary universalism. Apart from the Biblical evidences which in this place we must be content to take for granted, the general view of our divine is summed up with some neatness in the course of a chance conversation with a Salvationist. As they sat facing each other in a railway carriage the fellow impudently asked:

"Are you saved?" I was a little taken aback [writes Mr. Chambers]. . . . So in answer to his question I said, "No." A curious look passed over his face, and he evidently expected me to say something more. I then continued, "Don't you think that question of yours is a rather silly one?—as silly, I think, as if I were to ask you whether to-day is to-morrow."

He appeared puzzled, and I went on: "Do you know what salvation is?" He did not reply. "It is this," I said: "God's Eternal Purpose—of making us as absolutely perfect in character and spirit as Himself. . . . Salvation means a condition of wholeness, soundness; in other words, it is the accomplishment of God's Great Purpose of perfecting us. . . . When I shall find myself in Heaven ridded of every imperfection, with every latent power of good in me developed, and my mind and spirit replete with every grace, and I in all my parts perfect, then, and not until then, shall I be able to say, 'I am saved—I am sound.'"

It is not so terse as the reply drawled through his nose by the founder of the Cowley Society—"Saved, yes; but not safe"—but 'twill serve both for the putting to flight of inquisitive evangelists and for the general presentiment of an eschatological system as far as possible removed from the orthodoxy of the Anglican monk. If the existence and immortality of the soul be assumed, the system it sketches may fairly commend itself as reasonable to anyone who has reserved to himself the right of private judgment.

Towards the settlement of the more fundamental question whether the human moi may exist apart from the body, and how, Mr. Chambers is not so happy. The Biblical evidences once more we may take for granted; but in citing the following narrative he does little to fortify our confidence either in the doctrine or in himself as its apologist:

The gentleman had had a severe illness, and himself knew at last that there was no hope of his recovery. About an hour before the change came, he states that he was suddenly conscious that there was within his body a something that seemed as if it were floating in much the same way as a boat moored to a quay floats with the rise and fall of the water. Presently he became conscious of another sensation. It was as if a number of tiny cords or fibres along both sides of his entire body were being snapped one after another. The sensation was not painful. This went on for some time, until at length it seemed as if this floating something were contracting upward from the feet. . . . Later he could feel that the contraction had extended to his chest, and lastly to his head. Then came an oblivion, and his next consciousness was that he himself was standing beside the bed.

This piece of description, "countersigned by two doctors," shows mainly, to our mind, the essentially materialistic mind of the modern spiritualist. Somewhere there is a picture representing the flight of the soul from the mouth of a dying man in the form of a newborn infant. This floating sensation, this snapping of cords from the feet upwards, seem to us to perpetrate, by the less excusable medium of words, no less gross an outrage upon sound philosophy. That the man had a sensation of snapping cords no one is troubled to deny, or that his inside seemed afloat; neither experience is unprecedented; but that Mr. Chambers should gravely allege these sensations as though they represented the dissolution—in this case temporary—of soul and body shows only that he approaches the question from a materialistic standpoint; and our misgivings are not dispelled even by his reference to Ecclesiastes xii. 6—"or ever the silver cord be loosed." Not more relevant appears the interview with the learned Hindu who took possession of a commonplace young man's organs of speech, and, in English spoken with a foreign accent, answered Mr. Chambers's questions about the future state at great length so as that clergyman could hardly himself have bettered the replies, or, we may add, more consistently have split his infinitives.

It will be gathered that we follow Mr. Chambers's thoughtful and interesting speculations with satisfaction so long as he confines himself to considerations of reason and Holy Scripture, and keeps clear of "Mr. Sludge."

Fiction.

The Gateless Barrier. By Lucas Malet.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

LUCAS MALET has deviated; she has deviated into the supernatural. We have no grievance against her upon that count, for the tendency of established writers to continue exactly the performance which has resulted in their establishment is not without grave disadvantages both to the writers and to literature. But we doubt whether Lucas Malet was well advised in this particular deviation. Of an intellectual, even scientific, temperament, prone to examine, weigh, and consider, an expert manipulator of pros and cons, she has never, we think, seriously accepted her own story—this story of a man who loved a ghost woman into physical existence. The pretty idea may have captured her fancy, led it on, and ultimately hypnotised even her imagination into a semblance of exertion; but that she, Lucas Malet, was for one moment under the illusion of such a fantasy we cannot believe. All that deliberate cleverness can do Lucas Malet has done to make the fantasy convincing, to give it an air of reality. The "uneasiness" of the ghost-woman is neatly explained; the mutual attraction between the ghost-woman and Laurence Rivers, the married hero, is neatly explained; the various steps in the process of the ghost-woman's re-incarnation are neatly linked to a series of physical facts; the question: "Must not an ex-ghost eat and drink?" is answered in a scene of surprising ingenuity; no point is omitted, no difficulty shirked. But, despite all this, there is no conviction. A work of fiction only succeeds artistically when it compels the reader to think that the related events actually happened, he knowing all the while that they did not happen. That is the essence of success: the illusion of reality. The Gateless Barrier will convince no one. It may please many—it has pleased us—but it is without authority, without that imperative appeal which is the sublime attribute of imagination well and truly exercised. One admires it as in a procession of ambassadors one would admire the Minister Plenipotentiary of some Central American republic. Oh, yes! he is there—uniform, parchments, seals, sacred inviolability, and all apparatus equal to M. de Staal's—but, surely he hasn't got the effrontery to mean it!

There is much to praise in the book. The portrait of the dying, but remorseless, materialist, old Mr. Rivers, is drawn with sympathy and genuine power; and Laurence's young American wife, Virginia, so dazzlingly perfect within her limits, and yet so gross, hard, and tawdry in comparison with the spiritual graces of the ghostly heroine, is also a brilliant sketch. The historic English mansion, with its vast ménage of servants, really exists for us. The "manifestations," with all their surrounding phenomena, have been contrived with a rather fine ingenuity—an ingenuity which would "persuade" if anything other than imagination could persuade. Laurence's first speech to his beloved apparition seems to us a model of its kind:

"Listen to me," he said. "We are strangers to one another—so strangely strangers that I half distrust the evidence of my senses, as, only too conceivably, you distrust the evidence of yours. I don't pretend to understand what distance of time or space or conditions separates us. I only know that I see you, and that you are unhappy, and that you search for something you are unable to find. Look here, look here—listen to me and try to lay hold of this idea—that I am a friend, not an enemy; that I come to help, not to hinder you. Try to enter into some sort of relation with me. Try to cross the gulf which seems to lie between us. Try to believe that you have found some one who will keep faith with you, and do his best to serve you; and believing that, put the sorrow out of your face —"

Lastly, the dissipation (if the term may be allowed) of the ghost is adequately motivated, and comes near to being pathetic.

In sum, The Gateless Barrier has almost everything except that something without which it is nothing.

The Uttermost Farthing. By B. Paul Neuman.
(Blackwood. 6s.)

Love the paymaster of Vengeance: this would seem to be the motive of the story that is told with some power in this volume.

Nora Crofts is the daughter of a man who, by the carelessness of his city friend, was brought to ruin and death. Her childish instinct for justice sets her apart to be avenger of his imagined wrongs; and with all the force of her precocious nature she sets herself to work towards this end. Her younger brother is her chosen instrument. Upon his education and advancement she bends her every thought; and his successful career at the University, and in his profession of the law, realises the first great step towards the exaction of her righteous retribution. How at every turn she is frustrated by her better nature, and how eventually, by mere force of congruity (as the schoolmen say), her noble efforts for the brother and sister, in regard to whom she is left in a parent's place, strengthen the good in her nature and crush down the evil which at the beginning she had called good, is the web of the tale. It is crowned by her marriage with the son of the man whom it had been her cherished hope to hunt to death. The narrative is relieved by lighter touches, in which a cockney gardener and two unmarried aunts have their utility.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE FLOWER OF THE FLOCK.

BY W. E. NORRIS.

High life, in Mr. Norris's neat manner. In the very beginning Charlie Strode, in his dashing 30th Lancers' uniform, comes under the eye of Mrs. Van Rees, an American widow, rich and childless and clever, who is gathering impressions in Piccadilly Mansions. These two are linked all through the story, which is full of smart—not too smart—dialogue, and is laid impartially in England and America. (Nisbet. 6s.)

THE NEW ORDER.

BY OSWALD CRAWFURD.

From the dedicatory letter to "L. W." we learn that Mr. Crawford conceived, during a fishing tour in Wales, the idea of a "processional novel" of modern life, as distinct from the plot novel. The old picaresque novel is, however, differenced. Personal adventures being few and far between to-day, we have instead "the procession through the chances of the world—and there are some very strange ones still left—of an idea, or of a group of ideas, rather than of an individual." The story is also a procession of very recondite quotations, which appear above the chapters and are signed: "Maori Proverb," "A Saying of Sakya-Muni," "From 'El Romance de Doña Elvira,' by Ramon Xavier de los Toblados," and "Counsel to the Searcher: Ancient Chinese Philosophical Treatise," &c. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

THE FOURTH GENERATION.

BY SIR WALTER BESANT.

"The question with which this story deals," says Sir Walter Besant, "can never be answered; from time to time every man must ask himself why the innocent suffer, and do suffer every day and in every generation, for the follies and the sins of their forefathers. Every man must find his own answer, or must acknowledge sorrowfully that he can find none. I venture to offer in these pages an answer that satisfies myself." (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

UNDER FATE'S WHEEL.

BY LAURENCE L. LYNCH.

"A Story of Mystery, Love, and the Bicycle." A complicated melodrama, in which Sheriff Cooke detects and loves, and a number of people are at tragic cross purposes until Inez explains all on her death-bed in a silence so great that when, in answer to her request, they gave her water, "save for this, there is no sound or movement." Then Inez explains about her bicycle ride in boy's clothes, and the air-gun with which she did the deed, and things are served up all round. (Ward Lock. 6s.)

THE WORLD'S SLOW STAIN.

BY HAROLD VALLINGS.

A rather engaging story, in which a self-made man's social ambitions are fed by a growing intimacy between his daughter and the son of his aristocratic neighbour, a Marquis. On hearing that the Marquis has called while he was out, John Bradshaw is almost thrown off his balance, but manages to preserve outward calm, and thus retain the respect of his butler. Describing his master's reception of the news to the first and second footmen, Jenkyns said: "Why, he took it like a rock, and I, for one, give him full credit for his pluck. His in'ard man, of course, shouted in a voice of thunder: 'Well, I'm d—d!' His out'ard and visible self simply remarked, as coolly and quietly as you please: 'Jenkyns, that hall-clock is thirty seconds slow. See to it at once.'"
A good story of social dynamics in country houses. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE MAN OF THE MOMENT.

BY DOROTHEA GERARD.

Captain the Hon. Douglas Musgrove is one of those splendid creatures who are indispensable in every crisis, the support of Prime Ministers in war and diplomacy. He "would have been recognised anywhere on the Red Sea littoral." In an accident his cab knocks over the most beautiful woman Musgrove has ever seen, and at once we are ascending richly carpeted stairs near Oxford-street; la belle inconnue discloses "a foot and ankle (in open-worked stocking) which would have delighted a Canova or a Watteau," and a suspicious foreigner on the pavement crushes his cigar under his heel as he notes the shadow of Captain Musgrove kissing the Countess's fingertips thrown on the blind. Meanwhile, the Prime Minister and the Chancelleries of Europe are kept waiting. (Ward Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE DOGS OF WAR.

BY EDGAR PICKERING.

A romance of the Civil War, opening at St. Ives in the year 1636, and introducing us to Mr. Oliver Cromwell in church. The story produces an interesting train of incident, and ends with the execution of Charles I. (Warne & Co. 6s.)

A SPIDER'S WEB.

BY MRS. AYLMER GOWING.

After a prologue of twenty-six pages, the story opens at a Foreign Office reception, at which Lord and Lady Rosebery are represented as receiving the diplomatic world. The talk is sumptuous, the society irreproachable, and the heroine's name is Daryl. Jewels and politics, dances and intrigues, and a streak of Nihilism through all. (Burleigh. 6s.)

A PRICK OF CONSCIENCE.

BY ALAN ST. AUBYN.

The toils of an old love which marriage should have broken are the theme of this story by the author of Under the Rowan Tree. The toils are broken with the necessary gradualness, and Captain Darrell lives to wear the Victoria Cross and to be "soothed, healed, and purified by the Love of a good woman." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

AFTER MANY DAYS.

BY C. HOWELL.

Not often in real life is a man the guardian of a young girl, the murderer of her father, her lover, and her father-in-law, by turns; but such are the positions in which Gaspard Sterling is placed, and from which remorse drives him at last through the door of suicide. The young people forgive and forget, and are happy "many days after." (Digby, Long. 6s.)

A DAUGHTER OF WITCHES.

BY JOANNA E. WOOD.

"A Romance." The scene is New England, and names like Vashti, Temperance, and Mabella are bestowed on the characters. Sidney Martin had seen the Winged Victory of Samothrace "in the cool greyness of the Louvre"; and "here in the New England hills he had found a woman who might have been its original." That was Vashti. It was Temperance who gave him some "delightful milk and her opinion of boarders." The story develops very definite types of New England character, and grows more tragic as it proceeds. There is a highly-wrought, but rather familiar, situation in the chapel of the village of Dole, where the hero "in words of surpassing and subtle eloquence, laid bare every secret of his soul." (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

Educational Supplement.

EDUCATIONAL WORKS FROM MR. MURRAY'S LIST.

SIR WILLIAM SMITH'S EDUCATIONAL SERIES. LATIN COURSE.

Young Beginners' Latin Course. 2s. each.

- I. First Latin Book. Grammar, Easy Questions, Exercises, and Vocabulary. 2s. 6d.
II. Second Latin Book. An Easy Latin Reading Book, with Analysis of Sentences. 2s. 6d.
III. Third Latin Book. Exercises on the Syntax, with Vocabulary. 2s. 6d.
IV. Fourth Latin Book. A Latin Vocabulary for Beginners, arranged according to Subjects and Etymologies. 2s. 6d.

PRINCIPIA LATINA Part I. Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, and Vocabulary. 3s. 6d.

Appendix to Part I. Additional Exercises and Examination Papers. 2s. 6d.

Part II. A First Latin Reading Book. 3s. 6d.

Part III. A First Latin Verse Book. 3s. 6d.

Part IV. Latin Prose Composition. 3s. 6d.

Part V. Short Tales and Anecdotes for Translation into Prose. 3s. 6d.

Students' Latin Grammar. 6s.

Smaller Latin Grammar. For Middle and Lower Forms. 3s. 6d.

A Child's First Latin Book. Comprising a full Practice of Nouns, Pronouns, and Adjectives, with the Verbs. By Professor T. D. Hall. 2s.

TRANSLATION AT SIGHT; or, Aids to Facility in the Translation of Latin. Passages of Graduated Difficulty, Carefully Selected from Latin Authors, with Explanations, Notes, &c. By Professor T. D. Hall. 2s.

GREEK COURSE.

INITIA GRÆCA. Part I. Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, and Vocabulary. 3s. 6d.

Appendix to Part I. Additional Exercises and Examination Paper. 2s. 6d.

Part II. A Greek Reading Book. 3s. 6d.

Part III. Prose Composition. 3s. 6d.

Students' Greek Grammar. 6s.

Smaller Greek Grammar. For Middle and Lower Forms. 3s. 6d.

Greek Accidence. 2s. 6d.

ENGLISH COURSE.

English Grammar. With Exercises. 3s. 6d.

Primary English Grammar. With Exercises and Questions. 1s.

English Composition. Examples and Exercises. 3s. 6d.

FRENCH COURSE.

FRENCH PRINCIPIA. Part I. Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, Vocabulary, and Materials for Conversation. 3s. 6d.

Appendix to Part I. Additional Exercises and Examination Papers. 2s. 6d.

Part II. A French Reading Book; with Etymological Dictionary. 4s. 6d.

Part III. Prose Composition. 4s. 6d.

Student's French Grammar. With an Introduction by M. LITTRE. 6s.

Smaller French Grammar. 3s. 6d.

FRENCH STUMBLING-BLOCKS and ENGLISH STEPPING-STONES. By FRANCIS TAEYER, M.A., Late Senior French Master at Eton College. Small Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

GERMAN COURSE.

GERMAN PRINCIPIA. Part I. Grammar, Exercises, Vocabulary, and Materials for Conversation. 3s. 6d.

Part II. Reading Book; with Dictionary. 3s. 6d.

Practical German Grammar. For Advanced Students. 3s. 6d.

ITALIAN COURSE.

ITALIAN PRINCIPIA. Part I. Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, Vocabulary. 3s. 6d.

Part II. An Italian Reading Book. 3s. 6d.

SIR WILLIAM SMITH'S SCHOOL DICTIONARIES. LATIN.

Smaller Latin-English Dictionary. With a Dictionary of Proper Names. 7s. 6d.

Complete Latin-English Dictionary. 16s.

Smaller English-Latin Dictionary. 7s. 6d.

Copious and Critical English-Latin Dictionary. Compiled from Original Sources. 16s.

BIBLE.

Concise Dictionary of the Bible. With Illustrations. 21s.

Smaller Bible Dictionary. With Illustrations. 7s. 6d.

CLASSICAL.

Classical Dictionary of Greek and Roman Mythology, Biography, and Geography. With 800 Woodcuts. 18s.

Smaller Classical Dictionary. With 200 Woodcuts. 7s. 6d.

Concise Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities. Thoroughly Revised and in the most part Rewritten (1898) by F. WARE CORNISH, M.A. Medium 8vo, 21s.

Smaller Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities. With 200 Woodcuts. 7s. 6d.

SIR WILLIAM SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORIES.

Maps, Plans, and Woodcuts. 3s. 6d. each.

England, from the Earliest Times to 1887.

Scripture History. continued down to A.D. 70.

Ancient History, down to the Conquests of Alexander the Great.

Ancient Geography.

Rome, to the Establishment of the Empire.

Greece, to the Roman Conquest.

Classical Mythology.

English Literature. With Lives of our Chief Writers.

Specimens of English Literature.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORIES.

England, from the Earliest Times, continued down to 1878. With 36 Woodcuts. 1s. 6d.

France, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Second Empire. With Maps and Woodcuts. 2s. 6d.

MRS. MARKHAM'S HISTORIES.

England, from the First Invasion by the Romans, down to the year 1878. With 100 Woodcuts. 3s. 6d.

France, from the Conquest of Gaul by Caesar, down to 1878. With 70 Woodcuts. 3s. 6d.

Germany, from the Invasion by Marins, to 1880. With 50 Woodcuts. 3s. 6d.

ETON COLLEGE SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Eton Latin Grammar. For the Higher Form. 6s.

Eton Elementary Latin Grammar. For Use in the Lower Forms. 3s. 6d.

Eton Preparatory Grammar, abridged from the above Work. Crown 8vo, 2s.

Eton First Latin Exercise Book, adapted to the Latin Grammar. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Eton Ovid Lesson, being Easy Passages selected from the Elegiac Poems of Ovid, with Explanatory Notes. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Eton Horace: The Odes, Epodes, and Carmen Saeculare, With Notes. By F. W. CORNISH, M.A. In Two Parts. With Maps. 6s.

Eton Exercises in Algebra. 3s.

Eton Exercises in Arithmetic. 3s.

English-Latin Gradus, or Verse Dictionary. By A. C. AINGER, M.A., and H. G. WINTLE, M.A. (448 pp.) Crown 8vo, 9s.

MURRAY'S HANDY CLASSICAL MAPS.

Edited by G. B. GRUNDY, M.A., Brasenose College, Oxford.

MAPS NOW READY.

GALLIA. One sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

ITALIA (Northern Italy, South, and Sicily). Two sheets in one case, 3s., cloth; 1s. 6d. net, paper.

GERMANIA, RHAETIA, ILLYRIA, MOESIA, &c. One sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

BRITANNIA. One sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

HISPANIA. One sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

PALESTINE, SYRIA, and part of MESOPOTAMIA, and a Map showing St. Paul's Voyages. Three Maps on one sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

MAPS AT PRESENT IN PREPARATION.

GRÆCIA (Northern Greece, South, and Peloponnesus). Two sheets in one case, 3s., cloth; 1s. 6d. net, paper.

ASIA MINOR and MARE AEGÆUM. Two Maps on one sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE (at different epochs). Two Maps on one sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

EGYPT and the EASTERN EMPIRES. Two Maps on one sheet, 2s., cloth; 1s. net, paper.

An Index is bound with each Map.

"This method of showing physical features is most effective, and lends the maps a value which is possessed by no other classical atlas known to us. We recommend all schoolmasters and students who care for geographical matters to look at these maps."

Athenæum.

THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES.

Large 8vo, cloth extra, 6s. per Volume.

A BOOK OF WHALES. By F. E. BEDDARD.

BACTERIA. By GEORGE NEWMAN, M.D.

RIVER DEVELOPMENT. By Professor I. C. RUSSELL. Illustrated.

VOLCANOES. By Professor BONNEY. Illustrated.

THE STUDY OF MAN. By Professor A. C. HADDOX. Illustrated.

THE GROUNDWORK OF SCIENCE. By ST. GEORGE MIVART.

EARTH SCULPTURE. By Professor GEIKIE. Illustrated.

A List of the above Series, containing Volumes in Preparation, can be obtained, post free, on application.

MURRAY'S UNIVERSITY EXTENSION MANUALS. Edited by Professor KNIGHT, of St. Andrew's University.

A full List and all details relating to this Series sent on application.

EARLY CHAPTERS IN SCIENCE. A Popular Account of the Elements of Natural History, Botany, Physics, Physiology, Chemistry, &c., &c., for Young People and Beginners. By Mrs. AWDRY. Edited and Annotated by W. F. BARRETT, Professor of Experimental Physics at the College of Science, Dublin. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A NEW FRENCH GRAMMAR.

THE TECHNICAL SCHOOL FRENCH GRAMMAR. By Dr. W. KRISCH, sometime Teacher of Latin, Greek, French, German, and Spanish at the Wolverhampton Free Library Science School. Examiner in Modern Languages to the Midland Counties Union of Educational Institutions, 1897-99, &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

TEXT-BOOKS FOR THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE SCHOOLS EXAMINATIONS,
LONDON UNIVERSITY, AND COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS EXAMINATIONS.

LATIN.

- Macmillan's Elementary Latin-English Dictionary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 3s. 6d.
- English Latin and Latin-English Dictionaries. By Prof. C. D. YONGE. Each sold separately, 3s. 6d.; or, complete, 7s. 6d.
- Macmillan's Latin Course. By A. M. COOK, M.A., and W. E. P. PANTIN, M.A. First Part, 3s. 6d. Second Part, 4s. 6d.
- Macmillan's Shorter Latin Course. Being an Abridgment of Macmillan's Latin Course. First Part, 1s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net. Second Part, 2s.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net.
- Moisner's Latin Phrase Book. Translated by H. W. ADEN, M.A. 4s. 6d.
- Cæsar—The Gallic War. By Rev. JOHN BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 4s. 6d.
- With Notes and Vocabulary. BOOK IV. By CLEMENT BRYANS, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK V. By C. COLBECK, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK VI. By C. COLBECK, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Cicero—The Catiline Orations. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 2s. 6d.
- Pro Roscio Amerino. Edited by E. H. DONKIN, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- De Senectute. With Notes and Vocabulary. By E. S. SHUCKBUEGH, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Eutropius. Books I. and II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By W. WELCH, M.A., and C. G. DUFFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Horace—Odes. Books I., III., and IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. each. Edited by the Same. 2s. each.
- The Odes and Epodes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 5s. Epodes, separately, 2s.
- Epistles and Ars Poetica. Edited by A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 5s.
- Livy. BOOK V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By M. ALFORD. 1s. 6d.
- BOOK XXI. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. W. CAPES, M.A., and J. E. MELHISH, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- BOOK XXII. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. W. CAPES, M.A., and J. E. MELHISH, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Phædrus—Fables. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Select Fables. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Sallust—Catilina. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Catilina. Edited by C. MERVILLE, D.D. 2s.
- Bellum Catilinæ. Edited by A. M. COOK, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- Tacitus—The Histories. Edited by A. D. GODLEY, M.A. BOOKS I. and II. 2s. 6d.—BOOKS III.-V. 3s. 6d.
- Terence—Adelphoe. Edited by Prof. S. G. ASHMORE, 3s. 6d.
- Auton Timorumenos. Edited by E. S. SHUCKBUEGH, M.A. 2s. 6d.—With Translation, 3s. 6d.
- Virgil—Æneid. With Notes and Vocabulary. BOOK I. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK II. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK III. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK IV. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK V. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK VI. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK VII. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK VIII. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK IX. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK X. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK XI. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK XII. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

GREEK.

- Macmillan's Greek Course. Edited by the Rev. W. G. RUTHERFORD, M.A., LL.D., Head Master of Westminster.
- First Greek Grammar. By Rev. W. GUNION RUTHERFORD, M.A., LL.D. ACCIDENCE, 2s. SYNTAX, 2s. Together, 3s. 6d.
- Easy Exercises in Greek Accidence. By H. G. UNDERHILL, M.A. 2s.
- Second Greek Exercise Book. By Rev. W. A. HEARD, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- Easy Exercises on the First Greek Syntax. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- Macmillan's Greek Reader. With Notes, Vocabulary, and Exercises. By F. H. COLSON, M.A. 3s.
- An Introduction to Greek Prose Composition. By H. PITMAN, M.A. 2s. 6d.—KEY, 5s. net.
- Passages for Greek Translation for Lower Forms. By G. H. PEACOCK, M.A., and E. W. W. BELL, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Æschylus—Persæ. Edited by A. O. PRICKARD, M.A. 2s. 6d.—Prometheus Vinctus. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Euripides. With Notes and Vocabulary.—Alcestis. By Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d.—MEDÆA. By Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d.—HECUBA. By Rev. J. BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—ANDROMACHE. Edited by A. R. F. HYSLOP, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- Homer—Iliad. Edited by W. LEAF, Litt.D., and Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. BOOKS XIII.-XXIV. 6s.
- Iliad. BOOKS I., IX., XI., XVI.-XXIV. The Story of Achilles. Edited by J. H. PRATT, M.A., and WALTER LEAF, Litt.D. 5s.
- Plato—Crito and Phædo. (Cc. lvi. to end.) Edited by Prof. C. H. KEYNE, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phædo. Translated by F. J. CHURCH, 2s. 6d. net.
- Euthyphro and Menæxenus. With Introduction and Notes by C. E. GRAYES, M.A. 1s. 6d.
- Thucydides. BOOK III. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A. (In preparation.)
- BOOKS VI. and VII. Edited by Rev. PERCIVAL FROST, M.A. With Map. 2s. 6d.—BOOK VI. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A. 3s. 6d.
- BOOK VII. Edited by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A. 3s. 6d.
- Xenophon—Anabasis. With Notes and Vocabulary. BOOK I. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK I. With Exercises by E. A. WELLS, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK II. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK III. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d.—BOOK V. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d.

OVINITY.

- St. Luke's Gospel. Greek Text, with Introduction and Notes. By Rev. J. BOND, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- The Gospel According to St. Matthew. The Greek Text, with Introduction and Notes. By Rev. A. STOMAS, 2s. 6d.
- An Introduction to the Creeds. By Rev. G. F. MACLEAR, D.D. 3s. 6d.
- The Acts of the Apostles. The Greek Text, with Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d.
- The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version, with Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

- Elementary General Science. By A. T. SIMMONS, B.Sc., and L. M. JONES, B.Sc. 3s. 6d. (Adapted to the London Matriculation Course.)

ENGLISH.

- English Grammar Past and Present. By J. C. NESFIELD, M.A. 4s. 6d.—KEY, 2s. 6d. net.
- Manual of English Grammar and Composition. 2s. 6d.—KEY, 2s. 6d. net.
- Outline of English Grammar. By J. C. NESFIELD, M.A. 1s. 6d. (Specially adapted for the Preliminary and Junior Local Exams.)
- Word-Building and Composition. By R. S. WOOD. BOOK VII. 1s.
- A First Book in Writing English. By E. H. LEWIS, Ph.D. 3s. 6d.
- A First Manual of Composition. By Prof. E. H. LEWIS. 3s. 6d.
- A Short History of English Literature. By Prof. G. SAINTSBURY. 3s. 6d.
- Burke—Reflections on the French Revolution. With Introduction and Notes by F. G. SELBY, M.A. 5s.
- Byron—Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. Edited by Prof. E. E. MORRIS. CANTOS III. and IV. 1s. 9d.
- Chaucer—The Prologue. With Introduction and Notes. By A. W. POLLARD, M.A. 1s. 9d.
- The Knight's Tale. With Introduction and Notes. By A. W. POLLARD, M.A. 1s. 9d.
- Children's Treasury of Lyrical Poetry. Selected by F. T. PALGRAVE. Part I, 1s.
- Macaulay—Lays of Ancient Rome. With Introduction and Notes. By W. T. WEBB, M.A. 1s. 9d. (Contains the Prophecy of Capys, Iwry, and the Armada.)
- Milton—Paradise Lost. BOOKS III. and IV. With Introduction and Notes. By M. MACMILLAN, B.A. 1s. 3d. each; sewed, 1s. each.
- Poems of England: a Selection of English Patriotic Poetry. With Notes. By H. B. GEORGE, M.A., and A. SIDGWICK, M.A. 2s. 6d.
- Scott—The Lay of the Last Minstrel. With Introduction and Notes. By G. H. STUART, M.A., and E. H. ELLIOT, B.A. CANTOS I. to III. 1s. 3d.; sewed, 1s.
- Marmion. With Introduction and Notes. By M. MACMILLAN, B.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d.
- Shakespeare. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DELIGHTON.—As You Like It. 1s. 9d.—HAMLET. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s.—HENRY V. 1s. 9d.—MERCHANT OF VENICE. 1s. 9d.
- Spenser—The Faerie Queene. BOOK I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. PERCIVAL, M.A. 3s.; sewed, 2s. 6d.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.

- Corneille—Le Cid. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 1s.
- Mérimée—Colomba. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 2s.
- Molière—Le Malade Imaginaire. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 1s. 6d.
- Voltaire—Charles XII. Edited by G. E. FASNACHT. 3s. 6d.
- The Study of French according to the Best and Newest SYSTEMS. By A. F. EUGENE and H. E. DUBIAUX. 3s. 6d. Exercise Books, in Eight Books, 6s. each.
- Macmillan's Progressive French Course. By G. E. FASNACHT. FIRST YEAR. 1s.—Supplementary Exercises to First Year, 1s.—SECOND YEAR. 2s.—THIRD YEAR. 2s. 6d.—KEYS, 4s. 6d. net each.
- Macmillan's Progressive French Readers. By the Same. FIRST YEAR. 2s. 6d.—SECOND YEAR. 2s. 6d.
- Macmillan's French Composition. By the Same. Part I., 2s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net.—Part II., 5s.—KEY, 5s. net.
- An Abridged French Grammar for Schools. By G. E. FASNACHT. 2s. 6d.
- A Compendious Dictionary of the French Language. By Prof. ALFRED EWALL and GUSTAVE MASSON. 3s. 6d.
- Goethe—Egmont. Edited by S. PRIMER, Ph.D. 3s. 6d.
- Hermann und Dorothea. With Introduction and Notes. By J. T. HATFIELD. 3s. 6d.
- A German Primer. By ORTO SILPMANN. 3s. 6d.—KEY, 3s. 6d. net.
- Macmillan's Progressive German Course. By G. E. FASNACHT. FIRST YEAR. 1s. 6d.—SECOND YEAR. 3s. 6d.—KEYS, 4s. 6d. net each.
- Macmillan's Progressive German Readers. By the Same. FIRST YEAR. 2s. 6d.
- Macmillan's German Composition. By the Same. Part I., 2s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. net.
- A Compendious German and English Dictionary. By Prof. WHITTIER and A. H. EDOREN. 5s.—GERMAN-ENGLISH. 3s. 6d.
- Commercial German. By F. C. SMITH. 3s. 6d.

HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY.

- Elizabeth. By E. S. BEESLY. 2s. 6d.
- A First Sketch of English History. Part I., 449-1307. Part II., 1307-1689. Part III., 1689-1895. By E. J. MATHEW, M.A. 2s. each. Complete, 3s. 6d.
- A Primer of English History. By A. B. BUCKLEY. 1s.
- A History of England. By A. B. BUCKLEY. 3s.
- History of England. By EDITH THOMPSON. 2s. 6d.
- Analysis of English History. By Prof. T. F. TOUT. 1s.
- A Short History of the English People. By J. R. GREEN, LL.D. 1s. 6d. Also in FOUR PARTS, with Analysis. 3s. each. Part I., 607-1265. Part II., 1265-1549. Part III., 1549-1689. Part IV., 1689-1873.
- A History of Rome for Beginners. By E. S. SHUCKBUEGH, M.A. 3s. 6d.
- The History of Rome. By T. MOMMSEN. Abridged for Schools by C. BRYANS and F. J. R. HENDY. 7s. 6d.
- A Primer of the History of Rome. By Bishop CREIGHTON, D.D. 1s.
- A Primer of the History of Greece. By C. A. FYFFE, M.A. 1s.
- History of Greece to the Death of Alexander the Great. By J. E. BURY, M.A. 8s. 6d.
- History of Greece. By Prof. A. HOLM. Authorised Translation Revised by F. CLARKE, M.A. 4 vols. I-III., 6s. net each. Vol. IV., 7s. 6d. net.
- Commercial Geography. By E. C. K. GOSNER, M.A. 3s.
- A Short Geography of the British Islands. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, LL.D., and A. S. GREEN. With Maps. 3s. 6d.
- Geography of the British Isles. By Sir A. GEIKIE. 1s.
- The Elementary School Atlas. By J. BARTHELOMIW. 1s.
- Class-Book of Geography. By C. B. CLARKE. 2s. 6d.; sewed, 2s.
- Class-Book of General Geography. By H. R. MILL. 3s. 6d.
- Geography of Europe. By J. SIMP, M.A. 2s.
- Elementary Geography of the British Colonies. By GEORGE M. DAWSON, LL.D., and A. SUTHERLAND, M.A. 2s.

Educational Supplement.

SATURDAY: SEPTEMBER 15, 1900.

The Teaching of English Literature.

It is impossible to teach English literature in a course of lectures; your object must, therefore, be to awake interest in it. Keep in mind the continuity and development of literature; but dwell on the greatest writers. . . . Read out good passages, and at the end (but not in the middle), explain why they are good. Encourage the students to read widely for themselves, in unannotated texts and the better anthologies, and, if they like it, to learn lyrics or short passages by heart.

IN no province of school work have the principles of the new teaching been hitherto so little effective as in the teaching of literature. Other subjects—science, mathematics, and even languages—are now taught in a few schools educationally; the method of instruction has been brought into intelligible relation with the processes of a child's mind. The science master knows well enough that his pupil is eager to slip his leash and discover things for himself. Again, in language teaching a very important principle has emerged as a result of the efforts of neo-educationists here and abroad—the principle that a foreign language should be acquired without the intervention of the mother language. By this method maison suggests the thing “house” directly, and not indirectly through the word for the thing. Le chien saute is not first reduced to an English equivalent form before the full concept is realised. To take another example, the child is not told that three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles, because the fact in itself is of small significance; but he is led on step by step until the truth dawns upon him, and he feels the thrill of discovery.

But, curiously enough, the ideas of the New School have not as yet wrought much change in literature teaching. The result is, that while there is no lack of writing on the subject, very little of that writing concerns itself with the psychological aspect of it. This may be in part explained by the fact that very little time is devoted to literature, and little that is used up in cramming the children for passing examinations. First, then, sufficient time must be left for teaching drawing and literature—a minimum of four hours a week. What is the best way of spending the two hours of this for literature? How is a child to be taught to profit by, and enjoy, great literature? Here, if we are faithful to the tenets of the new school, we shall strive to discover what there is in the ordinary boy's natural endowment upon which we can work. Well, the average town-bred boy between twelve and thirteen is neither a critic nor an aesthete; he is high-spirited, active; lives in a world peopled by engine-drivers, firemen, engineers, explorers, alpine climbers, naval and military officers; his observation is very keen; his code of honour is of the quid pro quo order; he does not care for the best poetry, although he has a fine ear for metre; he is highly emotional, patriotic, romantic, fearless; he delights in animals; in making collections of stamps, coins, birds' eggs, &c.; in manual labour, and in games. This being the material in which the teacher of literature has to work, it is evident that his selection from the literary masterpieces must be wholly determined by reference to it. As it is desirable that the master should know the character of the class of boys he has to teach, he should make a preliminary examination of it by following at first its lead—that is, set some work to be read by the pupils themselves, and then find out by examination how the reading has been done. Afterwards, the master will have little difficulty in leading them. The present writer was once surprised to find how interested boys were in a play which he considered tedious, affected, and painfully unreal—the play was “Richard II.” A little reflection will show the cause of this. There is so much in the play which appeals to a boy's nature. The quarrel between Mowbray and Bolingbroke and their banishment, the changing fortunes of the protagonists, the treachery revealed by some of the characters, and the faithfulness of others—all pluck the boy's interest and fix his attention. The colouring of the whole play is crude, and the perspective faulty; but as the boy is a born pre-Raphaelite, this does not matter. The boy who has heard his father discuss domestic and foreign politics, weigh up evidence against criminals, and pass judgments on men and affairs, is quick to seize the salient points of a play like this. Aumerle is closely shadowed by the boy after he has shown, by his reply to Richard's question, what manner of man he is:

“How far brought you High Hereford on his way?”
“I brought High Hereford, if you call him so,
But to the next highway.”

Henceforth, no lie or act of cowardice will escape the young student's notice; also he will discover and be amused by Richard's maudlin sentimentality; and he may, with a little coaxing, be induced to enjoy and commit to memory Gaunt's dying speech. On a second reading, when the class knows what is coming, the interest will shift, the first emotional sensation will give place to a speculative interest: here the exact nature of Mowbray's and Aumerle's guilt will come up for discussion; little touches passed unnoted in the first reading will receive attention, as will also the variations from Holinshed. So far, the progress has been quite simple and natural; but how are we to make a play of this elemental type a stepping-stone to “Hamlet” or “Lear”? Only, we think, by making sure that all has been got out of the simple play or poem which the pupil is capable of before leaving it for a new study. One reason why boys and older students never really reach the “Hamlet” stage is the baneful habit of searching for the purple patches, the beautiful bits. No literary habit could be more debilitating than this; such training in unduly developing the emotional and æsthetic side of our nature necessarily atrophies the intellectual, and makes all reading which requires thought distasteful. We have known men who have devoted their whole life to literature to whom each writer connoted simply a few sublime or beautiful lines. It is as though one should reject bread and butter and feed wholly on cake. The student who learns early to take the dull passages with the “nice” is more likely to get the full enjoyment of the “nice” bits than he who, butterfly-like, flits from choice passage to elegant. Let Matthew Arnold's Introduction to Ward's Poets serve as an awful warning. Although Arnold defined poetry as a criticism of life, yet too frequently in discussing poetry he sticks in questions of style and classification. Unless a student is prepared to read a masterpiece carefully, right through, it is difficult to see how he can ever hope to enjoy it intellectually. Be this as it may, the natural boy does not skip his favourite books: he reads his Dumas and Defoe through and through many times; and if later he skips all the hard and dull pages, he has probably learnt the habit at school. Another hint suggested by the study of the natural boy is that the master should on no account trouble his young pupil with his ideas on style; nor should he warp his judgment by passing unfavourable criticisms on writers whom he dislikes. Who that has saturated himself in the impassioned language of Ruskin dares to read Gibbon or Macaulay, or to admire Rembrandt and Velasquez? Ruskin's scorn for the authors he hated has made more youths prigs than his magnificent chapter on the Nature of Gothic architecture has made architects.

If a child has learnt to read a book through he will not find it difficult to pass from the merely objective literature to the speculative and erudite. Admitting that a great gulf divides Marmion from Paradise Lost or Macbeth, yet the mastery of the former is surely the best way of bridging it.

We have left ourselves little space to comment on the Hints to Teachers recently issued by the Board of Education, a few sentences from which stand at the top of this article. There are, however, one or two points which call for comment. The teachers are to keep in mind the continuity and development of literature: continuity may pass, but what is meant by development? As literature reflects the age in which it is produced, and as each age in some sense is developed from the age immediately preceding it, it follows, of course, that literature, too, will grow from age to age; but along with this development it is surely possible that there may be deterioration as well. Perhaps, however, all that is meant is that literature continually widens in its interests. To-day poems, prose works, and novels touch life at every point: in fact, literature, possibly for the first time in history, is as various as life, and reflects its infinite manifestations.

Would it not be better for the lecturer to keep in mind, not so much the development of literature as the differences between the literature of one age and another, and the causes which lead to its growth and decay; also its relation to the times with which it is co-temporary? Surely, too, the lecturer should know something of the literature of Italy and France. Another suggestion we demur to. To what purpose should the lecturer explain why certain passages, which he has selected for reading, are good? How much more useful educationally it would be for the student to make out this for himself. Nothing is said in these hints of the history of the period in which the writer lived; but clearly Chaucer, Dante, Shakespeare, Molière, Milton, Goethe, and Tennyson are all children of their age, and one source of the keenest intellectual pleasure is denied the student if he does not early learn to fit each writer into his age, and to interpret his writings by the light of it. But each teacher will read literature in his own way, and he will pass on to his pupils his own bias, infect them with his own contagion, and impose upon them his authority. By some literature is regarded as the expression of the intellect of its time, to others it is a mere garnering of the flowers of speech. Each must interpret as he will and as he can.

The many histories of literature, full of dates and facts, are to be kept out of the children's hands. Let them begin their study of literature as nearly as they would if left to browse in a library. Children at the beginning of their intellectual awakening are highly imaginative, and closely observant; at this stage pictures are narratives and narratives are pictures. Unfortunately, this power of visualising weakens rapidly as the number of studies and experiences increase. Even reading itself—much of it—tends to destroy both the visual and retentive faculties of the mind. Symbolic advertisements, illustrations, carefully arranged head-lines in the daily newspapers, all tend to throw veils of darkness over that gift which is of such precious brightness and freshness in early boyhood.

Thus through the Scottish camp they pass'd
And reached the City gate at last,
Where all around, a wakeful guard,
Arm'd burghers kept their watch and ward.

Read those four lines once to a child of nine, and then ask him to make a picture of what they suggest, and the literary teacher will learn two things—first, the natural method of teaching literature; and secondly, how terrible a destruction of mental life goes on during school-hours.

Text Books, School Books, &c.

English.

Essays and Essay Writing for Public Examinations. By A. W. Ready, B.A. (Bell.)

THIS book has the least possible to do with literature. It is not Mr. Ready's object to teach style, or a care for letters, or even how to make six hundred a year from the magazines. He merely sets forth the methods on which for ten years he has "prepared" (Anglice, crammed) "pupils for Army and other examinations, with a constant average of high marks in the most unpromising cases." We do not wonder at his success. A faithful observance of his rules as to the advisability of punctuation, the proper distribution of paragraphs, the discreet avoidance of words whose spelling seems to you doubtful, the wisdom of keeping to simple and co-ordinate sentences, and so forth, would doubtless "pass" any tolerable composition. His model essays, in their three stages of analysis, sketch, and finished essay, are excellent models for the purpose. A man trained on Mr. Ready's system, though he would not have approached distinction, or even decency, of writing, would probably always be able to make himself at least intelligible in letter or despatch. Yet we cannot but regret that such real ability as Mr. Ready's should be thrown away on narrow educational ideals. His own contempt for the "unpromising" material with which he has to deal peeps out amusingly in half-a-dozen stinging asides:

"Few of you for whom this book is intended are likely to read our older English authors who build their style on classical models." "You must cease to use slang, of which a great part of your conversation is probably made up." "Do not use words of which you do not understand the meaning." "The full stop requires no explanation. Do not, however, forget it altogether." "The combination of no ideas wherewith to start and no words wherewith to continue is, indeed, cheerful." "A large class of essays, as you will perceive later, cannot be approached without a knowledge of the facts connected with the British Empire. You should read a little pamphlet called 'Through the British Empire in Ten Minutes,' by Colonel Sir Howard Vincent, C.B."

These are the men and this is the education which make our Army what it is.

Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy. Edited by D. Nichol Smith, M.A. (Blackie.)

Macaulay's Essay on Horace Walpole. Edited by John Downie, M.A. (Blackie.)

Macaulay's Essay on Lord Clive. Edited by John Downie, M.A. (Blackie.)

THESE are the most elaborate editions in the batch before us. The editorial matter is very full and appeals to the more advanced type of student. Mr. Nichol Smith's edition of Dryden's famous treatise, for instance, must have been a work of considerable labour. Close attention has been paid to the text; the introduction and full notes show a wide acquaintance with the history of the drama and with the literature, French and English, of dramatic criticism. An appendix contains some valuable extracts from the controversy between Dryden and Sir Robert Howard which followed the publication of the essay. The volume is more than a school-book: it is worthy of a permanent place on the library shelves. Mr. Downie's two Macaulay Essays are done with the same pains and with considerable historical erudition. But we cannot quite persuade ourselves that Macaulay deserves or repays such treatment in the way that Dryden does. Who is going to use these books? They are too detailed for elementary work, and if the older student sits down to Macaulay's Essays, he should read straight ahead, and not stop to pick them to pieces.

Milton: Paradise Lost. Books I.—IV. Edited by J. Logie Robertson, M.A. (Blackwood.)

Cowper: The Task, and Minor Poems. Edited by Elizabeth Lee. (Blackwood.)

Macaulay: Essay on Johnson. Edited by D. Nichol Smith, M.A. (Blackwood.)

Goldsmith: Traveller, Deserted Village, and Other Poems. Edited by J. H. Lobban, M.A. (Blackwood.)

THE initial volumes of a new series of "English Classics" under the general editorship of Mr. J. H. Lobban. They are prepared, with a medium amount of introduction and annotation, by proved and competent scholars. But they appear to closely resemble other school editions of the same classics, and it seems to us a pity that the rivalry of publishers should lead to so much reduplication of practically the same editorial work.

Ivanhoe. With Introduction and Notes by J. Higham, M.A. (Black.)

Quentin Durward. With Introduction and Notes by H. W. Ord, B.A. (Black.)

WE are always glad to see schoolboys set to read Scott, and these volumes give two of the best novels for the purpose in a convenient form. The brief introductions just indicate the historical environment of each story, and do not essay criticism. With regard to the notes, we have two faults to find: they should be footnotes, in order that they may catch the attention of the reader at the right moment, and that the teacher may not be tempted to expect them to be known by heart; and they should be rather fuller. The principle upon which this difficulty has been selected for explanation and that disregarded is not evident. Thus when Scott says that "the Greek Dubravius visited the Scheik Ebn Hali," Mr. Ord mentions who Ebn Hali was, but Dubravius remains unannotated. Mr. Higham gives a rather unnecessary note on one page about "Flanders cloth," which really needs no explanation, and on the next leaves "jennets," "palfrey," "sumpter mule," and "fur, of that kind which the French call mortier," to look after themselves. To our mind, the notes to such a book ought to satisfy all the questions which the actual text might possibly suggest to an inquiring schoolboy mind; they ought not to introduce irrelevant and additional historical information, as, for instance, about the mediæval trade between England and Flanders. Why does Mr. Ord translate "annuncio vobis gaudium magnum" by "I announce to your great joy"?

The Lady of the Lake. Edited by R. G. McKinlay, B.A. (Black.)

Marmion. Edited by W. M. Mackenzie, M.A. (Black.)

THESE are on much the same lines as the editions of Scott's novels issued by the same publishers. But the introductions take a rather wider scope, and include some remarks upon the literary qualities and metrical peculiarities of Scott. The notes are more adequate in extent, and perhaps fairly reach the extremely low level of scholarship generally expected in such compositions. But to say with Mr. Mackenzie that a "breviary contained the daily service of the Church somewhat shortened, whence the name (Lat. brevis, short)," is only to approximate to accuracy. There should be no reference to such terms as "zeugma" or "hypallage" in elementary text-books.

The New English Poetry Book. Edited by E. E. Speight. (Marshall.)

THIS is an excellent little selection of poetry, "intended for the use of children from the ages of thirteen upwards." It draws liberally upon Herrick, the Ballads, and Keats, and has some bits from quite modern writers, such as Mr. Bridges, Mr. Henley, T. E. Brown, and others, which come freshly. The burden of the eighteenth century, so heavy, as a rule, in school anthologies, is quite shaken off. A brief glossary is the only form of comment.

Pope's The Iliad of Homer. Books I., VI., XXII., XXIV. Edited by Paul Shorey, Ph.D. (Isbister.)

THIS is an imported American school-book, edited by a Chicago professor, and published by Messrs. Heath, of Boston. The selection of books and the editing are commendable; the German illustrations, some of them based on Flaxman, are quaint; and we cannot imagine what educational use could be made of the volume. Nobody is going to teach Homer through an annotated edition of Pope. To students of the eighteenth century Prof. Shorey's analysis of Pope's "non-Homeric traits" will be valuable.

The Princess. Edited by Andrew J. George. (Isbister.)

ANOTHER example from the same American series. The editing is most irritating—a flood of gush, and an indigest of irrelevant quotation and superfluous comment.

Othello. Edited by C. H. Herford, Litt.D. (Macmillan.)

PROF. HERFORD'S "Eversley Shakespeare" was primarily intended as a library rather than a school edition of the plays. But the separate volumes of the present reissue, with their scholarly prefaces and brief necessary footnotes, are none the less admirable things to put into the hands of a senior boy who wants encouragement to read largely and liberally rather than minutely.

As You Like It. Edited by Elsie Fogerty. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

A VERY interesting experiment. Miss Fogerty has "adapted" "As You Like It" for "amateur performance in girls' schools." That is to say, she has arranged the text, with as few cuts as need be, elaborated the stage directions, and added full marginal hints for appropriate gesture and elocution. She has also given directions for stage setting and accessories, capital sketches for costumes, and diagrams for the grouping of the dramatis personæ at critical moments. It is all done with the greatest freshness, practicality, and taste; and the book should be invaluable in the preparation of that most delightful of all educational amusements—a school play. The large edition, with cuts of costume, costs half-a-crown; additional copies, suitable for "parts," sixpence each. Miss Fogerty proposes to follow up "As You Like It" with "The Princess," the "Alkestis," and the "Antigone."

The Age of Hawke. Edited by L. W. Lyde. (Black.)

THIS is a "Sea-dog Reader." It is quite unsuitable for a "Reader"; if by that is meant, as we suppose, a book in which children may learn to read. Reading should be taught in the early stages by means of simple, modern English; in the later, by means of the classics. The contents of this volume, drawn from the Gentleman's Magazine, and various collections of naval memoirs and narratives, are by no means invariably either modern or classical. There are some racy bits, but there is also much English which is not good now, and cannot have been good at any time. Nor do we think more highly of the value of the book as "a fascinating 'centre of action' round which to group the history of the 'Making of the British Empire.'" No wise teacher treats the "making of the British Empire" apart from other, and in many respects more important, aspects of British history. And in any case the making of the British Empire is properly to be regarded as something better than a blatant record of uninterrupted sea-fights.

A Short History of the British Empire. By G. E. Green. M.A. Dent.

A HISTORY of the "British Empire"—or, as we should say, of "England," for there is no "Empire" about it until near the end—for "junior forms." A few years ago it seemed as if historians had learnt that certain literary qualities were necessary for elementary histories, in order that the readers might, if possible, be attracted rather than repelled. We cannot conceive any child being attracted by Mr. Green's uninteresting little chronicle. And the terrible appended chapters on literature in the middle ages, the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, are in a fashion which is, or ought to be, quite obsolete. The strong point of the book is an excellent series of archaeological illustrations. The maps, however, are inadequate.

A School Geography of the World. By Lionel W. Lyde, M.A. Black.

THE last ten years have seen many improvements in the teaching of geography. It is, fortunately, beginning to be recognised that geography is only a branch, dependent upon many others, of the organic whole, called science, and amenable, therefore, to the ordinary methods of the investigator. To speak authoritatively upon this subject a teacher must be intimately acquainted with the principles of physics, geology, and some branches of biology—that is, if he proposes to deal with geography intelligently, and not merely as topography. The Americans are teaching us, too, that, like other sciences, geography is only properly treated when taught practically. Bearing these facts in mind, one reads the introductory pages of Mr. Lyde's book with considerable disappointment. The language is loose even to incorrectness, and contains many misleading statements. Thus, on p. 2, after referring to the way in which mountains "attract clouds," we get the following paragraph: "When such winds are carrying moisture, mountains condense it, and divide it into two parts—water, which falls, and heat, which rises; and this rising heat draws in clouds, to be similarly condensed." Every line of this statement needs revision. On p. 6 the word "heat" is used where "temperature" is meant. On p. 7 we read: "The sun's rays heat only the surface of land, but can penetrate water to a depth of probably 500 feet; consequently, surface water does not become warm with the same rapidity or to the same degree as land does, nor does deep water radiate heat as quickly or as completely as land." Here, again, an entirely erroneous impression is conveyed. Similarly, the geological information is often inexact. We hope Mr. Lyde will subject his book to a careful revision, when it will become what it might easily have been—an excellent school geography.

A Geography of the British Empire. By Lionel W. Lyde, M.A. Black.

THE great merit of this little geography, as of the rest of the excellent series to which it belongs, lies in the care with which the climatic and physical conditions of commercial productiveness are elucidated. Its weakness is in the lack of anthropology. Nor do we agree with Mr. Lyde that an independent atlas is a better thing than maps accompanying the text. It is easy enough to keep a finger in two places in a book of this size, and we feel sure that a map is more likely to be consulted so than if it has to be turned up in an atlas lying on some neighbouring, or not neighbouring, table. It would, perhaps, have been an example of "intelligent anticipation" to have added an account of the Transvaal and Orange State to that of existing British Africa.

Greek and Latin.

Greek Testament Reader. By Theophilus D. Hall, M.A. Second edition. (Murray.)

WE have nothing but praise for this Reader, which should be welcomed for Sunday use in higher schools. The extracts have been made with admirable judgment, great attention has been paid to secure a correct text, and the notes, especially in the earlier part, are very full. The short syntax and the vocabulary are excellent features, but in the latter we notice as debatable matter the explanation of Beelzebub, in its Greek form. Gesenius, at all events, does not support it.

Homer: Odyssey. Book XI. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by J. A. Nairn, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press.

THE Introduction is a very careful and attractive piece of work, and Homer's ideas of the state of the dead are minutely examined in the light of the study of early religions. The notes on grammar and textual criticism (of which the editor makes a feature) are excellent, and the appendices, especially those on versification and lost consonants, are concise and valuable. The book is worthy of all praise.

Herodotus. Book II. A Translation, with Test Papers, by J. F. Stout, B.A., Cambridge. W. B. Clive.

MR. STOUT's translation of the Father of History's Egypt reads very pleasantly, and the test papers will be found useful by candidates for examination on the book. The wonderful amount of information collected by the old Greek traveller will always make his account fascinating, even in a translation. Apart, however, from very full notes, embodying the result of recent research and discovery, half its value is lost. One of the most precious contributions to literature would be a thorough revision of Rawlinson's great work: will none of our scholars undertake the task? We have only come on one serious error of the press—the transposition of two lines on p. 67.

Xenophon: Anabasis. Book V. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary, by G. M. Edwards, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press.

MR. EDWARDS continues his excellent school edition of Xenophon's wonderful story of the Retreat of the Ten Thousand, and the new instalment is quite equal to its forerunners. The story of Cyrus' advance and his fall are well told in the Introduction, which then takes up the tale of Xenophon's leadership. The way in which he won the hearts of his men, and the wonderful skill with which he surmounted the obstacles of the march, form a record of which we can never tire: as the beautiful style has always commanded admiration. The notes are full and good, and the quotations from Grote and others light them up pleasantly: while the translations are always happy, and the difficulties of construction and syntax are fully dealt with. The book is heartily to be praised, and we may perhaps point out that in many ways the campaign of Xenophon in Asia Minor presents instructive points of likeness to that of Lord Roberts now in South Africa—or even more to the wonderful march from Kabul to Kandahar. It is also pleasant to remember that whereas Xenophon presents an almost unique union of the philosopher and the great general, Lord Roberts also has distinguished himself in the field of literature.

The Agricola of Tacitus. With Introduction and Notes, by Alfred Gudeman. Boston, U.S.A.: Allen & Bacon.

PROF. GUDEMANN, of the University of Pennsylvania, gave us, a couple of years ago, an admirable chrestomathy of Latin Prose Literature under the Empire, and his present book is not less admirable. He has steeped himself in his subject, and wields a great body of learning easily. The Introduction deals with every aspect of the work in a pleasant style, and very thoroughly, the section on the literary character of the Life and the canons applied by Greek rhetoricians to the βασιλικὸς λόγος being perhaps the most interesting. The very studied style of Tacitus is also thoroughly discussed and illustrated, and his character and purpose in the work examined and vindicated. To an Englishman the Agricola must always be of the highest interest, and we welcome the present excellent edition. The Notes are very full and learned, and pass over no difficulty; and the text has been very carefully constituted; in every case that we have looked into the reading adopted commends itself. The work of other editors, especially Furneaux, has been fully used, and is amply acknowledged. In connexion with the Agricola it is interesting to read the Institutes of Quintilian (III. 7), as both Tacitus and Pliny were probably his pupils.

Cicero: Pro Lege Manilia. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. C. Nicol, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

CICERO'S speech in support of the Manilian Law, to entrust to Pompey the supreme conduct of the war in Asia, marks an important advance in his political career, as he now definitely enrolled himself as a follower of Pompey, to whom he was ever after faithful. Mr. Nicol gives a clear and careful view of the political situation, based (as he tells us) almost entirely on Mommsen. The operations of Mithridates and Tigranes in Asia Minor, and the formidable position held by the pirates of the Mediterranean, are described, and the great qualities of Pompey as a commander; and then we have a capital short analysis of the speech. The notes are full and good, and we are glad to have a protest against "making things too easy" for boys, which is a snare into which editors readily fall. Altogether this makes an excellent book for the first study of Cicero.

Cicero: in Catilinam I.—IV. By H. W. Auden, M.A. (Blackwood.)

MR. AUDEN'S is a capital edition for school use of Cicero's splendid invective, at what was the highest point of his political career, and to which he always looked back with just pride. The notes are not too many, and deal chiefly with points of translation and with the political institutions of Rome; they give boys all the help they need without superfluous matter, which is thrown away on them. The Introduction is a very good piece of work, particularly the sections which deal with the historical value of the speeches and the political state of Rome at the time. The character of Catilina, the real significance of his conspiracy, and his relation to Caesar and the popular party, are very well discussed; but justice is not fully done to the firmness as well as the high, pure character of Cicero. If Rome could have been saved, his action would have done it. A distinguishing feature of this edition are the fine illustrations and excellent plans; and the Appendix, a careful study of Cicero's style in the Speeches, with exercises for imitation, completes a book which we heartily commend to teachers.

Virgil—Georgics. Book IV. By John Sargeaunt, M.A., University College, Oxford. (Blackwood.)

THIS volume belongs to the same series as Mr. Auden's Catiline Orations, and is distinguished by the same features. The Introduction is very pleasantly written, showing thorough sympathy with the poet; and the illustrations are apposite and in themselves delightful, most of all the vase-painting (p. 46) of "the first swallow." Virgil's Bees has always been a favourite, since Dryden depreciated his own translation as compared with Addison's! We have only two little objections to this pretty book: the marginal summaries rather interfere with the appearance of the text, and in the Introduction (p. xxvii.) one might almost imagine the lyric, "She, poor bird, . . ." was a translation from Virgil!

The Æneid of Virgil. Book V. Edited, with Notes and Vocabulary, by A. Sidgwick, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

MR. SIDGWICK'S edition of the Æneid, both in its collected form and in separate books, is now too well known to call for commendation. We need only say that this new part is marked by the same finished scholarship, fine taste, and clear exposition which distinguish all the editor's work. The subject-matter of the book is, of course, less interesting than that of the Fourth or Sixth, being a sort of pause in the main action, as is the Third Book also; but the descriptions of the games and the rowing matches have a special attraction for boys—especially in these days.

Ovid: Selections from the "Tristia." Edited, with Notes and Vocabulary, by H. F. Morland Simpson, M.A., formerly Scholar of Pembroke College, Cambridge. (Cambridge: University Press.)

MR. SIMPSON has in these selections given a very interesting text-book for young scholars. The story of Ovid's life and banishment, told in his own incomparable verse, cannot easily be matched for pleasant reading; and that story is very happily presented in these extracts. The editor rightly protests against giving boys too much help, and insists on the need to make them work out the meaning for themselves as far as possible. We should have been glad if the latest text—that of Mr. Owen in Postgate's edition—had been followed; that adopted seems decidedly less good—e.g., p. 2, l. 30, qui for quod is not easy to translate. Also, it is superfluous to bracket syllables to be elided: a boy should learn the rules once for all. The notes give all the assistance required, and those at the beginning of each extract are particularly full and good.

Cæsar: De Bello Gallico. Book V. Edited, with Notes and Vocabulary, by G. S. Shuckburgh, M.A. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THE editor continues with Book V. his edition of Caesar. The expedition into Britain, as furnishing our earliest knowledge of the country, is always of exceptional interest, and Mr. Shuckburgh's short Introduction gives an admirable summary of the campaign. The notes are full, and deal chiefly with points of grammar and construction, and the map, plans, and occasional illustrations make up a pretty and useful book.

Livy. Book V. With Introduction, Notes, and Exercises by W. Cecil Laming, M.A. (Blackie.)

THIS is a good edition to the now well-known "Illustrated" series. The discussion on the sources and value of early Roman history is thorough, though there is no reference to Macaulay's preface to the Lays. Livy's carelessness in regard to topography might also well have been contrasted with Macaulay's great care in such matters. The notes are full and scholarly, and the hints on translation prefixed to the exercises valuable. As usual, the illustrations leave little to be desired, though the geese in the frontispiece look like swans, and such an array of stars of the first magnitude was certainly never seen before or since!

The Æneid of Virgil. Books VII.—XII. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. G. Page, M.A., formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. (Macmillan.)

WE are glad to receive the second volume of Mr. Page's school edition of the Æneid, which completes the work, and makes a nice, handy, desirable book. It is in the main the same as the editions of the separate books, which we have had pleasure in commending as they appeared; but it is no mere reprint. Careful examination shows that the notes have been diligently revised, curtailed, or amplified as later judgment suggested, so that the completed commentary is even better than that of the parts.

- Cæsar*. Book I. Edited by A. C. Liddell, M.A. (Bell.)
- Cæsar*. Book IV. Edited by Rev. A. W. Upcott, M.A. (Bell.)
- Cæsar*. Book V. Edited by A. Reynolds, M.A. (Bell.)
- Cicero: Selections*. Edited by J. F. Charles, B.A. (Bell.)
- Horace: Odes*. Book III. Edited by H. Latter, M.A. (Bell.)
- Ovid: Tristia*. Book III. Edited by H. R. Woolrych, M.A. (Bell.)
- Phædrus: a Selection*. Edited by Rev. R. H. Chambers, M.A. (Bell.)
- Stories of Great Men*. Edited by Rev. F. Conway, M.A. (Bell.)
- Vergil: Æneid*. Book VI. Edited by J. T. Phillipson, M.A. (Bell.)
- Xenophon: Anabasis*. Book I. Edited by E. C. Marchant, M.A. (Bell.)
- Scalæ Primæ*. By J. G. Spencer, M.A. (Bell.)

TEN of the above volumes are from an "Illustrated Classical Series" under the general editorship of Mr. E. C. Marchant. It is in the illustrations that the characteristic feature of the series is to be found. These are numerous and are selected with great care from very various sources: coins, monuments, bas-reliefs, vase-paintings, and the like. They include also maps and plans and views of historic localities. Such illustrations are certainly a most valuable addition to school-books designed for students of almost any grade, and we welcome the appearance of the series as a sign that the principle of "education through the eye," so long recognised as important in primary education, is beginning to make its way among the more conservative methods of the public schools. For the rest, the editions are designed for junior students, and the editors have been careful to keep in mind what junior students really need. Mr. Marchant puts the case in a nutshell in his brief preface: "This is an elementary edition: the difficulties solved are such as perplexed the editor in the days of his youth. . . . There is absolutely no trace of erudition between these covers." That is as well, for there are editors of elementary school-books who refer their unhappy readers to German monographs by way of elucidating knotty points. Mr. Marchant gives his team of editors a free hand on certain matters of arrangement. Hence various interesting experiments, of which that of a special appendix tabulating the chief grammatical points illustrated in the text seems to us the most happy. This idea is particularly well carried out in Mr. Charles's Selections from Cicero. Mr. Latter puts a few notes more "advanced" than the rest into an appendix—also a good plan. The volumes are furnished with vocabularies, but as teachers differ about the value of vocabularies, they can also be had without these. And finally, they can be had with vocabularies, but without notes.

Mr. Spencer's Scalæ Primæ is a "first Latin Reader" prepared on the same lines as the "Illustrated Classics." It is well adapted to serve as an introduction to them.

French and German.

- Outlines of French Historical Grammar*. By Alfred T. Baker, M.A., Camb.; Ph.D., Heidelberg. (Dent.)

THIS little book is gratifying proof of the advance now being made among us in the scientific study of French. The main points in the history and phonetic growth of the language are clearly and fully set forth. Mr. Baker's knowledge is great, and his style pleasant. The alphabet of the Association Phonétique Internationale to indicate the pronunciation is adopted, and is very helpful. We regret to see how often it differs from (say) the system adopted in the (Oxford) New English Dictionary. The history of sounds and the development of vowels and consonants, from the earliest stages on to present-day French, are carefully traced and amply illustrated, while the second half of the Grammar deals not less thoroughly with words (verbs especially) both separately and in the sentence. A short Appendix of Extracts from the early language and full indexes complete a valuable work.

- The Technical School French Grammar*. By Dr. W. Krisch. (Murray.)

THE plan of this book is good, but the execution falls short. The regular verbs have been plainly set out, but there is no table or list of irregular forms, a few of which only appear in the notes, while many, of course, occur in the extracts. The Reader is well done, except for a large number of misprints: p. 104 bristles with them. The book needs very thorough revision, and a good deal of matter should be added. Some of the notes show that Dr. Krisch could have made a good book, but he has not done so.

- Cassell's Lessons in French*. New edition. Revised by James Boiëlle, B.A. (Univ. Gall.) (Cassell.)

"GOOD wine needs no bush," and a school book of which nearly a quarter of a million of copies has been sold needs no recommendation. The present volume is very handy, and only wants a good index. This would greatly improve its usefulness, though it would be troublesome to make.

- Grammaire Française Élémentaire*. Par W. G. Hartog, Professeur de français au Liverpool Institute. (Black.)

MR. HARTOG has made a bold departure in writing his Grammar in French, but he has done the work very well. The main facts of the language are clearly and accurately set forth, though, of course, it may be doubted whether one or other of the elementary grammars produced in France might not have served the purpose. We question whether the terms Genitive and Dative are appropriate in an analytic language (p. 3); we should have liked the letters of the alphabet to be named; the section on the plurals of compound nouns (p. 9) is hardly satisfactory; the formation of the feminine of adjectives in et has been omitted (p. 11); the chief rules for position of adjectives (p. 12) should have been given; Quatre, Quinze, &c. (p. 16) should not have capitals. There are also a few tritling misprints in the course of the book; and surely Littré's abbreviation kilo is right rather than kilog. (p. 52).

- Athalie*. Tragédie par Jean Racine. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Index, by H. W. Eve, M.A., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THIS is a capital edition of Racine's great religious play, the suggestion of which we owe to bigoted M^{me}. de Maintenon. As Mr. Eve points out, the tragedy is very comparable to a play of Sophocles, and in length it is about equal to the Edipus Rex. The Introduction gives an excellent summary of the history and development of the drama in France, making full use of the fresh matter in Petit de Julleville's new History of French Literature, and draws out the points of comparison and contrast with our own drama—which may be said to have triumphed in the French Romantic school. Then follows a short sketch of Racine's own life and work, and an analysis of Athalie. But perhaps the best part of the Introduction is the long, minute, and thorough study of French dramatic versification, the long Alexandrine measure which never fails to strike an Englishman as heavy and monotonous. The Notes show fine literary taste and wide and judicious reading; and the frequent parallels from our own and other literatures greatly add to the value of the commentary. There could be few more instructive tasks than to compare Athalie with Milton's Samson Agonistes.

Une Joyeuse Nichée. By Mme. G. de Pressensé. Edited by S. Alge. (Dent.)

THIS short, charming story by Mme. de Pressensé is the third of the series brought out by Mr. Rippmann. The distinguishing feature of the method is that the whole instruction and explanation is given in French, and we are assured that it is highly successful. For ourselves, we should have feared that the results would be less accurate than if English were employed, except in a few rare cases, but that is a matter which must be settled by experience. No pupil could fail to be delighted with the story of French child-life, which reminds one pleasantly of our own Miss Edgeworth's stories. The characters of the children are excellently brought out and contrasted. The explanatory matter consists of a clear, short, simple grammar, with plenty of examples and exercises scattered through it; on this follows a very complete Vocabulaire, explained throughout in simple French, and a Table of Irregular Verbs. We wish the new series every possible success.

Select Passages from Modern French Authors, with Short Literary and Critical Notices. By L. E. Kestner, B.A. (Blackwood.)

THE compiler has given a very pleasant and fresh collection of passages, of good style and moderate difficulty, in prose and verse, from authors of the last hundred years. The notes prefixed to the extracts are mere hints, meant to be expanded by the teacher, and as such are useful. We should have liked to see something from Jules Verne and from Ste. Beuve. We rather demur to the statement (p. 87) that Renan was "not a sceptic"; the palmery work of Erckmann-Chatelain is certainly the Histoire d'un Paysan, which is not mentioned (p. 85); and when Zola is named (p. 111) it is not fair to forget his great series—Rome, Lourdes, Paris. There are a few, but not serious, errors of the press.

A Compendious German Reader. Especially adapted for the use of Army Classes. By G. B. Beak, M.A., Oxon. (Blackwood.)

MR. BEAK'S Reader is highly to be commended, and will be found both useful and entertaining, and it has the great advantage of being excellently printed in Roman characters, much less trying to the eyes than the German. The historical extracts number one hundred, of about a page each, and deal with kings, statesmen, battles, and political movements in fresh and varied style. The sketch of German history and the short biographical notices of authors are very well done, and the whole is a valuable addition to German class-books. It is instructive to compare it with the companion volume of French Historical Unseens by Mr. Toke, issued by the same publishers.

Science.

A Text-Book of Physiology. By Sir Michael Foster. Assisted by W. H. R. Rivers. Sixth edition. Revised. Part IV. (Macmillan.)

THE fourth part of Sir Michael Foster's standard Text-Book of Physiology has been revised for the sixth time. On this occasion Dr. Rivers has taken a sufficiently large share in the work to justify the addition of his name to the title-page. It gives some idea of the relative state of development of the senses—those gateways through which a knowledge of the material universe reaches the human intelligence—to notice the number of pages which have been found necessary to adequately record what is known of each sense. While the account of the eye and seeing runs to about one hundred and eighty pages, seventy are sufficient in which to describe the ear and hearing; and the structure and functions of the organs of taste and smell require only twenty pages. The concluding chapter of forty pages is devoted to cutaneous and some other sensations. At the same time it is as well to point out that this disparity may not be entirely explained by the relative importance of the senses; it is probable that more obscure senses will grow in importance in books on physiology as our knowledge of them increases, though sight must always be our most highly developed and differentiated sense. This Text-Book of Physiology, if the plan of keeping it up to date by constant revision is maintained, will continue to be the standard work of reference on the subject.

Kirkes' Hand-Book of Physiology. By W. D. Halliburton. Sixteenth Edition. (Murray.)

IT is but little more than a year ago that we had the fifteenth edition of this widely popular text-book before us, and now the sixteenth has appeared. Every medical student knows Kirkes' Hand-Book, and it has such an established reputation for excellence that words of commendation at this stage would be out of place. Prof. Halliburton has again availed himself of the opportunity of making such alterations as recent research has made necessary, but this edition differs in no essential respect from its immediate predecessor.

The Principles of Mechanics. By Heinrich Hertz. Authorised English Translation by D. E. Jones and J. T. Walley. (Macmillan.)

THIS is not a book for the general reader, nor indeed will the ordinary student be able to make anything of it. Only those physicists familiar with modern research, and at home with the higher mathematics, will be able to intelligently follow its argument. But though it will only be studied by a select few, the generalisations contained in it and the criticisms of existing doctrines, will suggest inquiries and a re-examination of physical and dynamical theories. Hertz's name may not be familiar to readers who are not directly concerned with science, yet some of the immediate practical outcomes of his researches have been during recent months in every newspaper, for the work which has been accomplished in wireless telegraphy represents the next step after Hertz's investigations of electric waves. Indeed, Hertz's work is yet another example of the interdependence of applied and theoretical science. Those commercial men who express impatience of scientific research—disposing of it as mere theorising—would, if only they read a little more, understand that without the work of the laboratory the application of the workshop is impossible. It is for reasons of this sort that the translators of the volume deserve thanks for rendering available to physicists unfamiliar with the German language a work rich in suggestive ideas.

Logic. By St. George Stock. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

THIS little volume is a re-issue, with alterations and additions, of the author's Deductive Logic, published some twelve years ago. Mr. Stock's experience in coaching students for the examinations in logic at Oxford has enabled him to deal in a successful manner with the special difficulties experienced by most beginners. We are always impressed with the large part the terminology of the subject takes in the study of logic. Is it not possible to train students in clear, logical ways of thinking without burdening them with a cumbersome nomenclature? Surely Huxley used to say he never studied formal logic, and yet it would be difficult to imagine a clearer and more logical debater.

A Manual of Zoology. By the late T. Jeffery Parker and William A. Haswell. (Macmillan.)

WE have already called attention to the handsome volumes constituting the same authors' Text-Book of Zoology, the general plan of which is, we find, followed in the present smaller publication. In making a selection of subjects for students beginning the systematic study of animal life, the authors have found it necessary entirely to omit any treatment of certain classes of existing animals, all groups of animals now extinct, and everything but the briefest mention of embryological truths. In selecting the subjects for the volume, it has been carefully borne in mind that to be of any real value the study of zoology must be throughout based upon practical work in the laboratory, the museum, and the open-air, and that mere book-work must be rigidly kept in a subordinate position. All the types described and illustrated can be easily obtained, and it is supposed that the manual will be used as a guide to a first-hand acquaintance with the animals themselves. Owing to the death of Prof. Parker, after little more than the general plan of the book had been decided upon, the work is almost entirely that of Prof. Haswell, whose experience of teaching has enabled him to produce an admirable introduction to zoology for students presenting themselves in the junior examinations of universities. The three hundred excellent illustrations with which the book is provided will go a long way towards ensuring its wide popularity.

Text-Book of Palæontology. By Karl A. von Zittel. Translated and Edited by Charles R. Eastman. Vol. I. (Macmillan.)

THIS impressive volume is concerned with fossils, to account for which much ingenuity was exercised in former days. Fossils were long ago supposed to have grown up as crystals grow, and their resemblance to living forms was disposed of as a coincidence; they have also been regarded as reserve forms of the Creator, to be endowed with life at the proper season. Theologians have explained them as relics and proofs of Noah's deluge—a theory which called forth Voltaire's scoffingly ingenious theory that they were the discarded emblems of the Crusaders. But to-day they are known to be the remains of the life of the time when the rocks containing them were deposited. Not a complete account of such life, unfortunately, for there were endless causes at work tending to prevent the entombing of the body under conditions favourable to fossilisation. This book is an elaborate list of fossil forms of elementary organisms. Prof. Zittel, after the completion of the fifth and last volume of his celebrated Handbuch der Palæontologie, published in 1895, produced his Grundzüge der Palæontologie, and this latter forms the basis of Dr. Eastman's translation. The English version has, however, with the assistance of some dozen specialists in different branches of the subject, been brought up to date; and this was especially necessary in a subject in which such rapid strides are made from year to year. Here, then, we have an account of the chief fossils known to geologists. It contains only the invertebrate forms, but will be followed later, we hope, by an account of the vertebrate fossils. Of course, Dr. Eastman's is not a volume to be read page by page: it is a work of reference—a court of appeal—to which the student may bring fossils for identification, or in which he may trace the development of animal life as we know it on the earth to-day. It would be impossible to find a higher authority than this beautifully illustrated volume.

Elementary Physics and Chemistry. Second Stage. By R. A. Gregory, F.R.A.S., Professor of Astronomy, Queen's College, London, and A. T. Simmons, B.Sc. (Lond.). (Macmillan.)

IN this little book, divided into twenty-four short chapters, the authors have dealt with exemplary clearness with some of the most important and interesting facts and principles of their subjects. The physical part of the work deals with great fulness with the conditions of air, water, and water-vapour under the various influences of heat and cold; and the chemical part is concerned with combustion, and the production, action, and behaviour of oxygen. The illustrations, chiefly of simple apparatus required for the experiments, are first-rate. No more interesting text-book could be used on its subject, especially if the pupils be allowed (as the authors recommend) to carry out the experiments for themselves, as well as to see them performed. It cannot be too emphatically said that science is not learnt from books alone.

Geometrical Drawing, with Notes and Examples. By W. H. Blythe, M.A., late Scholar of Jesus College, Cambridge. Part I. Plane and Elementary Solid. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THIS is a very thorough book, leading up from the most elementary to advanced and beautiful geometrical figures. The chapters on Scales and on Conic Sections are particularly clear and good; every stage is illustrated most amply; but the book demands, as it deserves, a good deal of hard work and careful study from the pupil who would make the best use of it.

BLACKIE'S ILLUSTRATED LATIN SERIES.

General Editor—Professor R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D.,
Examiner to the Universities of London and Glasgow, &c.

This new Series, issued under the Editorship of Professor TYRRELL, is distinguished by several important features for the first time introduced into English School Books.

Illustrated with Full-Page Coloured Reproductions of Vase Paintings, &c.; Photographs of Bas-Reliefs, Statues, and Famous Paintings; and numerous Black-and-White Illustrations specially drawn for this Series. Crown 8vo, cloth.

The Publishers will be pleased to send Specimen Copies to Head Masters with a view to Introduction.

Eutropius.—Books I. and II. Edited by W. CECIL LAMING, M.A., Classical Master in Edinburgh Academy. 1s. 6d.

Livy.—Book V. Edited by W. CECIL LAMING. 2s. 6d.

Tacitus.—Agricola. Edited by W. C. FLAMSTEAD WALTERS, M.A., formerly of Christ's College, New Zealand. 1s. 6d.

Virgil.—Aeneid III. Edited by Professor SANDFORD, M.A., Queen's College, Galway. 1s. 6d.

Horace.—The Odes. Books I., II., III., and IV. Edited by STEPHEN GWYNN, B.A., late Scholar and Hulsean Exhibitioner of Brasenose College, Oxford. 1s. 6d. each.

Cicero.—The First Catiline Oration. Edited by Professor C. H. KEENE, M.A., Queen's College, Cork. 1s. 6d.

Cicero.—The Catiline Orations. (Complete.) Edited by Professor C. H. KEENE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Sallust.—The Catiline Conspiracy. Edited by the Rev. W. A. STONE, M.A., Assistant Master in Bristol Grammar School.

Virgil.—Georgics I. Edited by S. E. WINBOLT, M.A., Assistant Master in Christ's Hospital. 1s. 6d.

FORTHCOMING VOLUMES.

Livy.—Book I Edited by Professor JOHN BROWN, Wellington University, New Zealand.

Livy.—Book VI. Edited by W. CECIL LAMING, M.A.

Cæsar.—The Gallic War. Books I. and V. Edited by Professor JOHN BROWN.

Livy.—Books XXI. and XXII. Edited by G. G. LOANE, M.A., Assistant Master in St. Paul's School.

Virgil.—Georgics II. Edited by S. E. WINBOLT, M.A., Assistant Master in Christ's Hospital.

Virgil.—Aeneid VI. Edited by H. B. COTTERILL, M.A., formerly Assistant Master at Haileybury.

Virgil.—Aeneid I. Edited by Professor SANDFORD

Cicero.—Pro Legibus Maniliæ. Edited by W. J. WOODHOUSE, M.A., formerly Assistant Lecturer in Classics, University College of North Wales.

. Complete Educational Catalogue will be sent, post free, on application.

London: BLACKIE & SON, LIMITED, 50, Old Bailey.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

Style.

JUST two months ago we offered a prize for the best hints on the cultivation of style. The prompting incident was our receipt of a letter from a reader who, "as one having literary aspirations," begged to be supplied with rules for the cultivation of the most elusive and indefinable quality of literature. It was rather like a flower asking how it might acquire a scent. But we offered, and awarded, the prize; and a correspondence followed in which a number of readers tendered advice to our "Inquirer," and scolded each other in gentlemanly terms for a month. The discussion became amusing when the humble seeker after rules of Style suddenly entered the arena, lectured our correspondents right and left, and showed himself as pretty a penman as his most confident instructors. Since then we have been asked to say something on this perplexing subject. To desire this of us in August was scarcely humane, and if we now address ourselves to the issue it is with no ambition to construct a formula or a decalogue.

Our award was questioned by one or two correspondents, who objected to the prize-winner's dictum:

Get something great to write about, and you may be sure that your method of putting it into words will also be great; your very ability to conceive an interesting subject will assure your telling it in an interesting manner.

We do not defend this proposition in and out. But those correspondents were a little unreasonable who interpreted the word "conceive" as the equivalent of "hit upon." Surely the etymology and associations of the word forbade this objection. What was it that Robert Louis Stevenson said about rolling a subject for a long time on the tongue, until the taste of it had been acquired and loved? This was his grand preliminary. Our competitor meant that. Oddly enough, he proceeded to quote words by Mr. Robert Buchanan on the subject, in which the word "conceiving" carried this full meaning. Mr. Buchanan had written:

I know of no instance in literature where consummate mastery of verbal expression is associated with deficient intellectual power. Even Keats, the least meditative and most passionate of all the poets, and the nearest in power of verbal magic to Shakespeare, was intellectually prescient to the inmost fibres of his poetical being—pure absolute thinking and conceiving power being at the very root of his unexampled sensuous instinct, and leading him to those miracles of phrasing in which, I conceive, he has no modern rival.

Unsatisfying as this may be to inquirers and aspirers, we think it is the best-working, best-enduring short statement of the matter that we shall find in a long search. Mr. Buchanan, we believe, confesses that he has been something of an Ishmaelite of Letters; and in our meaner moments we remember that he has despitely used the ACADEMY. But he is a thorough craftsman, a scholar, a wit, a poet, and something of a hero. In a question of this magnitude we pay more regard to his opinions than those of a score of civil fellows who never gave us an hour's chagrin or a moment's inspiration. Style! the word, the idea, for ever toll us back to brains. Many definitions, many aspects, many relations, many nuances, contradictions, paradoxes, devices, exceptions, licences, and feats rise for consideration; but it all comes back to "thinking and conceiving power." Moreover, if this truth were but one of several truths equal in importance, it is the one to prefer in these days, when we are oppressed by the worship of style for style's sake, tantalised by the "beautiful secret of beautiful prose," and misled by the fallacy of the "inevitable word." It is an age when young writers seek out choice words and are betrayed by them; when nice harmonies, values, and rejections are pursued beyond reason, as if the iridescent bubbles that float on a strong river would do anything but burst in the hand. A correspondent writes to us this week: "I know at least twelve men who frankly admit that they care nothing for the matter contained in a book, but only for the style of it." These twelve good men are the jury of Style to-day. But will they not be in the dock to-morrow?

Let us be understood. We do not deny the existence and the importance of these subtleties of which so much is made. Without consideration of them no formal account of Style can even begin to be valuable. How vast, aerial, and unmapped is the domain of Style may be usefully gathered from the brilliant essay which Prof. Walter Raleigh wrote three years ago. His book is so penetrating and various that we hesitate to say a word against it. And yet it is rather as if Prof. Raleigh had come forward and, having asked, What is Style? had seized on the bewilderment of his hearers to give a kind of Greek dance on his own account, displaying the moods and possibilities of Style, but enlightening the eyes rather than the understanding. On one point—the point to which we must keep—Prof. Raleigh speaks plainly:

Style cannot be taught. Imitation of the masters, or of some one chosen master, and the constant purging of language by a severe criticism, have their uses, not to be belittled; they have also their dangers. The greater part of what is called the teaching of style must always be negative, bad habits may be broken down, old malpractices prohibited. The pillory and the stocks are hardly educational agents, but they make it easier for honest men to enjoy their own. . . . The formal attempt to impart a good style is like the melancholy task of the teacher of gesture and oratory; some palpable faults are soon corrected; and, for the rest, a few conspicuous mannerisms, a few theatrical postures, not truly expressive, and a high tragical strut, are all that can be imparted. The truth of the old Roman teachers of rhetoric is here witnessed afresh, to be a good orator it is first of all necessary to be a good man. Good style is the greatest of revealers—it lays bare the soul. . . . All style is gesture, the gesture of the mind and of the soul.

The word "style," in its meaning of a standard excellence that all may compass, is misleading. Style is your style, my style, his style. To say of a style that it is "quite Stevensonian," is to pay a poor compliment. It is true that one is sometimes constrained to describe one style by another, no imitation or servility being implied. If, for instance, we say that much of the poetry of Mr. Francis Thompson is "Miltonic," we are only exclaiming. We do not suggest the least imitation, or even, necessarily, an indebtedness to Milton, but only this—that in certain fine qualities of language, in profusion of old gold and lordly Latinities, Mr. Thompson's poetry extorts the word "Milton"—a coloured cry of admiration. In such a case the compliment may be even richer than it seems; for Milton is one of those great writers whose style ceases to be personal to himself, and is rather the majestic articulation of his age.

Still, we shall be held inexcusable if we do not attempt to show how existing styles may be used to aid the growth of styles in the making. We should say that a young writer would do well to study the styles of men who had strong apprehensive minds working in a simple, direct way. Thus we would advise the student to read and digest:

Bunyan.
Defoe.
Swift.
Addison.
Byron.
Hazlitt.
Newman.
Mr. Lang.

But we would not advise him to read for purposes of acquiring Style such writers as:

Lyly.
Sir Thomas Browne.
Lamb.
Landor.
Stevenson.
Mrs. Meynell.

This is not to distinguish these writers as sheep and goats: we cannot be so misunderstood. Nor to distinguish them as natural and artificial: again, we cannot be so misunderstood. It is to distinguish styles in which substance and form can be seen in the clearest relation to each other from styles in which that relation is not so clear. Let us proceed with a gallop to instances. We will make no curious search; we will take plain stuff. Here are four stanzas from Don Juan (need we say that verse is often prose's best model?)—stanzas in which Byron's sense of reality and his manly seizure of essentials issue in a direct style. We quote from Lambro's discovery of Haidee's and Juan's love; Lambro's pistol is in his hand:

Lambro presented, and one instant more
Had stopp'd this Canto, and Don Juan's breath,
When Haidee threw herself her boy before;
Stern as her sire: "On me," she cried, "let death
Descend—the fault is mine; this fatal shore
He found—but sought not. I have pledged my faith
I love him—I will die with him; I knew
Your nature's firmness—know your daughter's too."

"Let him disarm; or, by my father's head,
His own shall roll before you like a ball!"
He raised his whistle, as the words he said,
And blew; another answer'd to the call,
And rushing in disorderly, though led,
And arm'd from boot to turban, one and all,
Some twenty of his train came, rank on rank;
He gave the word: "Arrest or slay the Frank."

Then with a sudden movement, he withdrew
His daughter; while compress'd within his clasp,
"Twixt her and Juan interposed the crew;
In vain she struggled in her father's grasp—
His arms were like a serpent's coil: then flew
Upon their prey, as darts an angry asp,
The file of pirates; save the foremost, who
Had fallen, with his right shoulder half cut through.

The second had his cheek laid open; but
The third, a wary, cool old swordsman, took
The blows upon his cutlass, and then put
His own well in; so well, ere you could look,
His man was floor'd, and helpless at his foot,
With the blood running like a little brook
From two smart sabre gashes, deep and red—
One on the arm, the other on the head.

That is a style. You may like the scene or not, you may like its slap-dash or not; but that is a style which cannot be bettered, it can only be replaced. Again, take a half-page of Hazlitt, and take it from the superb essay on "The Spirit of Obligations":

Police-magistrates, from the scenes they have to witness and the characters they come in contact with, may be supposed to lose the fine edge of delicacy and sensibility;

yet they are not all alike, but differ, as one star differs from another in magnitude. One is as remarkable for mildness and lenity as another is notorious for harshness and severity. The late Mr. Justice Fielding was a member of this profession, which (however little accordant with his own feelings) he made pleasant to those of others. He generally sent away the disputants in that unruly region, where he presided, tolerably satisfied. I have often seen him, escaped from the noisy repulsive scene, sunning himself in the adjoining walks of St. James's Park, and with mild aspect and lofty but unwieldy mien, eying the verdant glades and lengthening vistas where perhaps his childhood loitered. He had a strong resemblance to his father, the immortal author of Tom Jones. I never passed him that I did not take off my hat to him in spirit. I could not help thinking of Parson Adams, of Booth and Amelia. I seemed to belong by intellectual adoption to the same family, and would willingly have acknowledged my obligations to the father to the son. He had something of the air of Colonel Bath. When young, he had very excellent prospects in the law, but neglected a brief sent him by the Attorney-General, in order to attend a glee-club, for which he had engaged to furnish a rondeau. This spoiled his fortune. A man whose object is to please himself, or to keep his word to his friends, is the last man to thrive at Court. Yet he looked serene and smiling to his latest breath, conscious of the goodness of his own heart, and of not having sullied a name that had thrown a light upon humanity.

Lastly, take a passage from "Comus" purely explanatory, and as valuable to the prose writer as to the poet. To the Attendant Spirit is committed the task of explaining the situation on which the story rests. It is an explanation of previous events. The whole matter is conveyed in one sustained and tactful sentence. And what a sentence! What a sure march, unhesitating, unhalting. The recital is to please but it must not usurp the mind. It is to raise curiosity, but with dignity; it is to secure attention, but with ease. Above all, it must move hopefully in every line—this statement of events. A problem in the nice conduct of a preamble! This is how Milton does it:

But to my task. Neptune, besides the sway
Of every salt flood, and each ebbing stream,
Took in by lot, 'twixt high and nether Jove,
Imperial rule of all the sea-girt isles,
That like to rich and various gems inlay
The unadorned bosom of the deep,
Which he to grace his tributary gods
By course commits to several government,
And gives them leave to wear their sapphire crowns,
And wield their little tridents; but this isle,
The greatest and the best of all the main,
He quarters to his blue-hair'd deities;
And all this tract that fronts the falling sun
A noble peer of mickle trust and power
Has in his charge, with temper'd awe to guide
An old and haughty nation proud in arms:
Where his fair offspring nursed in princely lore
Are coming to attend their father's state,
And new intrusted sceptre; but their way
Lies through the perplex'd paths of this drear wood,
The nodding horror of whose shady brows
Threats the forlorn and wand'ring passenger;
And here their tender age might suffer peril,
But that by quick command from sovereign Jove
I was despatch'd for their defence and guard;
And listen why, for I will tell you now
What never yet was heard in tale or song,
From old or modern bard, in hall or bower.

Had space allowed, we had intended to quote a passage from Defoe, and a passage from Congreve. It is in such clear and (essentially) commonplace pieces of writing that styles can be most profitably studied in the formation of Style. But even to these a man must not play the "sedulous ape" after he is twenty.

The Grammar Hour.

THE glory of NUMBER ONE—the name by which our First Class schoolroom was known—was a large mahogany case, with glass sides, containing the works of the school clock. From this case wires ascended through the ceiling, and through sundry lofts and cross-beams, into which, as forbidden ground, I penetrated whenever a ladder and an opportunity offered. At last these wires reached the "Cupola," and controlled the great gilded clock hands which gave the time to the boarding school and village of A—. Thus we of "Number One" were on terms of intimacy with Time. Other classes might hear the quarters strike, but we knew when they would strike. Their languors of study were relieved by the occasional chime, following (and foretelling) a purgatory of sums; ours could be assuaged at sight. Indeed, there was a moment, repeated every fifteen minutes, when a kind of Greenwich intoxication seized the idler members of the class. A whirring of wheels, felt rather than heard, presaged that dear interregnum. How often, as I saw the cogs take life, and the lever lift its head like a weasel, did I glory in my worthless way that now, now, and still now, I knew the time of day better than even the masters of other classes; better than K—, who softened algebra with hymns in Number Two; than handsome P—, whose tweeds and cravats gave lustre to Number Three; than well-cased B—, who joked, but stood no nonsense, in Number Four; than M—, who squandered the abilities of a Q.C. on Number Five; and better even than O—, our play-time autocrat, who gave no instruction, but built up puns that we transmitted to our parents every Sunday afternoon. The lever would fall at last, and the wires shake, and then, far above us in the sweet outside, the chime was showered abroad. It is no irreverent caprice that makes me compare that sequence of inside sight and outside sound with what I have since seen and heard in the Brompton Oratory, when hands and incense have risen together before the altar, and far above a bell in the roof has rolled a benison over Kensington Gardens.

Strangely enough—but memory is association—I see all this in turning over the pages of my old Manual of English Grammar—Sir William Smith's Grammar, from the house of Murray. I see those clock works on every page. All these rules and exercises awake no clear memories. I find I was attending to the Works when I should have been working at the Tenses. I read:

The Possessive Case denotes possession, and is, therefore, rarely used except where the Noun denotes a living thing: as Milton's poems, a negro's skin, an elephant's skull, a butterfly's wings.

I turn a few pages and read:

SAVE, EXCEPT, BUT (= except), NOTWITHSTANDING.—It is sometimes difficult to decide whether these words are to be regarded as Prepositions or as Conjunctions.

I can safely say that I felt this difficulty, for I feel it still, but my memory is a blank. Again I plunge:

After a Complex Sentence has been broken up into Simple Sentences, each of these must be assigned to its proper class, as Noun Sentence, Adjectival Sentence, or Adverbial Sentence. All that then remains is to analyse the Subordinate Sentences according to the method already explained.

Still, no memory is awakened. My impression is that a more luminous Grammar than Sir William Smith's did not exist, nor a greater syntactical blockhead than myself. It is not odd, therefore, that I shirked his book; the odd thing is that I love it now. The reason is this: Sir William Smith did not coin his "examples"; he chose them from histories, poems, novels, and essays. He sowed his pages with sentences from Milton, Pope, Goldsmith,

Gibbon, Scott, and Thackeray. It is this quartz of literature, glistening in the old Grammar-book, that I like. Some of these "examples" do not so much remind me of the A— schoolroom as transport me actually thither; giving me not merely the dew of my youth, but youth itself, of which they are fragments. Dr. Smith's aim was to make Grammar interesting, and to connect it organically with literature. The idea was excellent; but to me, who was altogether born in sin, his book remained always two books—a Grammar to be shirked, and an anthology to be loved. Some of the quotations almost start from the pages as I turn them; they come back with quite local values. They were glimpses of the world; and now, in the world, they do not read like things learned, verified, and done with; no, they retain their magic, futurity, and mystery. Many of them I know in their contexts, with which, however, they will not blend. "He bowed to the Colonel politely over his glass of brandy-and-water—of which he absorbed a little in his customer's honour." How should the twofold use of the Relative Pronouns, who, which, that, survive this picture, this enduring curiosity, thrown into the mind from "Thack. Nouv. ii."? Or how should the laws of Collective Nouns be rescued from the suggestions in:

An English mob is often conteuted with the demolition of a few windows . . . (S. Smith, i. 19.)

So, also, the use of the subjunctive after that, so that, lest, to denote a purpose or consequence was lost in the problems presented by:

Get on your night-gown, lest occasion call us,
And show us to the watchers.

(Macb. ii. 2.)

What strange situation this donning of night-gowns might portend was good guessing.

As for the movability of the Nominative, I forgot it in a dream of shipwreck:

Then rose from sea to sky the last farewell. (Byron.)

The Gerund as Subject ceased to interest me when I read:

Running to see fireworks alone is dreary work. (Newc., ch. xxxviii.)

The dreariness was not plain to me, but the fireworks were.

Some of these disjecta membra, occurring in the chapter on Analysis, were imprisoned in tabular forms; in which they paced and palpitated like leopards behind bars. There was a fine vision of Milton's that was thus confined:

Subject.	Enlargements of Subject.	Predicate.	Object.	Enlargements of Object.	Extension of Predicate
The rod	(1) potent (2) of Amram's son (3) waved round the coast	up called	a cloud	(1) pitchy (2) of locusts warping on the eastern wind	in Egypt's evil day

But I only read, and only remember, how

The potent rod
Of Amram's son in Egypt's evil day,
Waved round the coast, up called a pitchy cloud
Of locusts, warping on the eastern wind.

There was a sentence from Ivanhoe which required a whole page for its anatomical display. But I preferred the breathing whole:

The impression was increased when, the tapestry being drawn aside, a female form, dressed in a rich habit, which partook more of the Eastern taste than of that of Europe, glided through the door which it concealed, and was followed by a swarthy domestic.

I now begin to love the Analysis, to which I owe these delightful recognitions. With what a welcome I am received back to page 144, where I read :

§ 298. Sentences are either SIMPLE or COMPLEX.

§ 299. A Simple Sentence has only one Subject and one Predicate : as—

Swift [Subject] wrote [Predicate] the Tale of a Tub.

§ 300. A Complex Sentence is made up of several simple sentences, united together by means of connectives : as—

It is said that one day, in the latter part of his life, Swift, after looking over the Tale of a Tub for some time, suddenly shut the book and exclaimed, "What a genius I had when I wrote that !" (Craik, E. Lit., ii. 222.)

"Here are no less than five simple sentences," proceeds the Manual; and the fallibility of grammarians is pleasantly brought home to one who, since he shirked grammar, has learned to write "fewer than five." It is curious to notice the number of clear-cut sentences which Sir William Smith was glad to borrow from Thackeray and Goldsmith. His preference for these writers was probably involuntary, but it is fully justified. Their sentences sank into our minds, never to be erased :

We had best begin our account of our hero with his family history—which luckily is not very long.

My orchard was often robbed by schoolboys, and my wife's custards plundered by the cats.

To see the way in which he tipped children made one almost long to be a boy again.

Whenever I approached a peasant's house towards night-fall, I played one of my most merry tunes.

How she became Madame Frisby, nobody knows ; she left Clavering to go to a milliner's in London as Miss Frisby. . . .

The poetry, in the section on Prosody, was a little flower garden. The flowers were strangely labelled and wired ; but their scent stole through the intricacies of Trochees, Anapaests, Amphibrachys, and Trochaic Dimeter Catalectics. It was worth all the tedium to receive the first, last, absolute impression of Coleridge's stanza :

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free ;
We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

These things made the Grammar Hour pleasant, or at least fruitful. And perhaps I have done an injustice to its duller moments. If anyone could have made it interesting it was kindly, clever L—. Alas, he does not live to share these memories with a wayward pupil. The works of the school clock, that stood close to his desk, still gleam, I doubt not, in their case. The lever still rises every fifteen minutes, the wire still trembles upward, the chime is still heard over the stone-built village, but L— no longer calls the gazers to their books, or expounds, with a patience that grew under trial, "The Complete Paradigm of the Active Voice." W.

Things Seen.

The Plea.

THE gorge was narrow, and of terrific depth. Lying prostrate on the plank bridge which spanned it at the top, clinging to the boards, I could see, far, far below me, the smother of the mountain river rushing downward to the sea. And just above the foaming water, on an insecure pathway, a mere ledge of rock, crawled the tiny figures of those who dared the passage of the gorge. Slowly they went, holding to the wire rope, advancing with cautious steps, splashed and buffeted by the springs that rose in some virgin nook in the inaccessible mountains overhead, and spattered down the sheer sides of the gorge to join the mad little torrent beneath. For an hour I watched the tiny travellers creeping along the ledge of rock, till gradually I was aware that all stopped at a certain point and gazed up at the facing cliff. Some pointed and looked at one another ; others bared their heads ; a few knelt ; all paused as if there on the cliff a few yards above their heads was graven, or hung, something uncommon, something that was powerful to arrest the wayfarer. Curiosity caught me. I left my plank bed, and, descending by a steep and devious path, came at last to the entrance of the gorge. Through its dim ways I crawled till I reached the place where every wayfarer had paused. There, on the cliff a few feet above my head, in a fissure of the cliff which could have been reached only with much ingenuity of labour, some unknown, pious soul had placed under a small canopy a tiny carved image of the Virgin, and beneath were written in German the words : "Mary, pray for us !"

The Officer.

A MINUTE ago the broad, sunny Munich street looked as it has looked on a thousand September mornings—orderly, leisurely, bright, as a street in the fashionable quarter should look. A minute later, and how changed ! It was as if a gigantic penny had been dropped into a giant slot, producing the opening of a door in a tall official building. Out of the door emerged an officer of incommensurable rank. Plumes nodded in his helmet, his uniform was like the peacock's, his chest towered above his waist, his tilted nose patronised the morning air, and, as his shapely feet carried him down the pavement, the street sprang automatically to its duties. A fruiterer just outside the door dropped the basket he was carrying, bared his head, and bowed profoundly. Two soldiers came to the salute, and stood like rods. A woman curtsied. A group of workmen dropped their tools and lowered their heated heads. The officer went his way like a king, and obeisance met him everywhere. Civilians, soldiers, beggars—all acknowledged the honour of his propinquity. I watched him all down the sunny street, and there was but one on whom the apparition of this tremendous personality did not work—an Englishman, too amazed to do anything but stare.

Correspondence.

The Dread of Being Dull.—Grub Street Finance.

SIR,—I hope I may be allowed to congratulate you on a particularly interesting number of the ACADEMY. On two pages—195 and 196 to wit—I found more to interest and hold me than I have found in any journal for some time. I am inclined to think, too, that I personally, rather than the two articles on those pages, am to blame for the fact that the perusal and reperusal of them left me horribly depressed.

"The Dread of Being Dull," to name the first of these two articles, strikes me as being admirably true and admirably wise ; and, from the point of view of one who, in this present year of grace, seeks to serve literature, and withal to earn his bread and cheese in the serving—very distressing.

"I like to have room in a book," said a friend of the present writer, but Demos, the unreasonable, wants crises packed in a book like herrings packed in a barrel. Fielding allowed himself room for disquisitions on life. They do not assist the excitement, and probably contemporary Demos did not like them, but posterity does. Why do all for Demos ? Why not something for posterity? Fielding and his contemporaries give us time to live with their heroes and heroines under normal conditions . . ."

Quite so! This is quite admirable, because so true, so wise in its suggestion, so clearly called for, and much needed.

But, sir, have not your own pages (not so frequently, it is true, as those of other journals I could name, but yet more times than one) within the last year contained sentences in reviews of novels the gist of which was to this effect—"But the book is too long by at least a third. . . . Is good enough matter in its way, and interesting; but it is by no means essential to the story, and for that reason should never have found a place between these covers"?

Other literary journals have recently put the same sort of contention much more forcibly and less reasonably; while as their greatest meed of praise they have said of other books: "Not a line or a sentence in it but is an essential and integral portion of the story; scarcely a word but serves its vital purpose in carrying the reader," &c.

The other article I have referred to in your last issue was called "A Guide to Grub Street," and, truly, grubbing or scavenging are the trades suggested thereby. And so a man has really written this fearsome book, signing himself, shamelessly, "£600 a Year from It"; and a reputable publisher has published it! "You may begin at Miss Marie Corelli and Mr. Hall Caine, and go downward to lesser lights, stage by stage" . . . Heavens! I take it that "£600 a Year from It" is a trustful person who reads as he rides, on the tops of 'buses. From such an elevation I myself read yesterday, on a poster, of "the most daring and popular novel of the century." It was by the first of the two Immortals named by this Guide for garbage-dealers. "Of the century," no less! And so acclaimed on the very day of its publication!

Your article says of the Guide's book that it makes for vertigo and emigration; which is to put it politely and with an air which is becoming to your pages. But the thing of it is, that the horror is mostly true. Now, bearing that in mind, I ask you to consider the case of the man who is not conspicuously incapable, who is honest and single-minded in his endeavour to produce literature, who feels the other thing to be of the streets—prostitution, and who possesses no other source of income than his able-bodiedness as a literary man. To such a one the book of your snug savage with his "£600" means more than vertigo; though, if he be in good health, it may not impel him beyond the contemplation of emigration; not the emigration that your good-humoured article referred to, however; but the steerage passage kind, which writes Finis across a young life's striving, as to the merit of which posterity may or may not have something to say.

The literary signs of the times are none of them very cheerful; but this "Guide to Grub Street"—really it should be indexed under the head of indecent books, lacking humour to redeem their lewdness.—I am, &c.,

A. J. DAWSON.

Constitutional Club, W.C.: September 10, 1900.

The Bible and Lying.

SIR,—In the ACADEMY for September 8, p. 189, it is stated that "nothing in the Old or New Testament condemns lying pure and simple," and an Anglican priest is quoted as attributing this to the "fact that among the Jews lying, except under special circumstances, is not regarded as a fault." Surely this is a hasty assertion. To take the New Testament first, does not the Sermon on the Mount, in substituting a higher law for the old law which only forbade perjury, proclaim the duty of truthfulness? So St. James interprets it (v. 12): "Swear not, but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay." St. Paul says: "Putting away lying, speak every man truth to his neighbour" (Eph. iv. 25), and "Lie not one to another"

(Col. iii. 9). I see no indication of "special circumstances" here, nor, again, in the Apocalypse, where it is said that "all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." And what of the Old Testament? "Lying lips are abomination to the Lord" (Prov. xii. 22; also vi. 17). "Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour" (Zech. viii. 16). "He that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight" (Ps. ci. 7). Other passages might be added, but these are, I think, sufficient.—I am, &c.,

September 11, 1900.

[I will take "A.'s" quotations in their order. Neither the Sermon on the Mount nor the Epistle of St. James condemns lying, either expressly or by implication, but only the practice of invoking curses on the head of the asseverant as the penalty of falsehood. Hence, these texts were held by the Primitive Church to forbid the taking of oaths even in a court of justice, and modern sects, such as the Cameronians and the Quakers, have interpreted them in the same way. The passages from the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians which he quotes are in like manner directed against treachery to the community (i.e., the Christian Church), "playing false" exactly representing the Greek word used. In a secret society, such as the Christian Church then was, such a crime would of course be doubly odious. As for the Apocalypse, if the "all liars" is to be taken in its modern and literal sense, it is evident that the lake of fire and brimstone would have to receive, among others, St. Peter. But the meaning of the expression is here determined by Rev. xxii. 15, which excludes from the City of God "every one who loves and makes a lie." In the Persian literature, on which all these Apocalypses are modelled, this is the phrase always used to denote "false doctrine," and there can be little doubt that the word is here employed in the same sense. The Old Testament texts bear similar constructions, and the practice of telling lies to a co-religionist is condemned by modern Jews, while an absolution in advance is given to the orthodox for those which they may bestow upon the Gentile. I therefore hold that "lying pure and simple" is not condemned by the Old or New Testaments. But if "A." still thinks otherwise, what a view must he not take of the Bible as a rule of conduct! In it, the crimes of murder, adultery, and the like are condemned in as plain language as in any heathen code. But when lying—to which the temptations are in any community a thousand times stronger and more frequent—is reached, he has to read its condemnation into hole and corner passages hidden among gnomic sayings and the lesser prophets. It is from this method of interpretation, working by isolated texts used without reference to the context, or the habits of the people among whom they were written, that the writers of the Dictionary of the Bible are trying to deliver us.—YOUR REVIEWER.]

A New Part of Speech.

SIR,—A correspondent points out in your last issue the need for a new part of speech to distinguish words which modify verbs, and those, differing greatly in function, which modify adverbs and adverbs. I quite agree. There seems also to be a need for a radical change in the treatment of adverbs, which often admits the objectionable principle of "classification according to the meaning of the words." In the sentence, "He went away quickly yesterday," the three adverbs are exactly the same in function—e.g., that of descriptive adverbs. The division of them into three classes—place, manner, and time—seems to me not a grammatical distinction any more than the case of the nouns "country, movement, day," which might in the same way be placed in different classes according to their meaning.—I am, &c.,

GRAMMARIAN.

September 11, 1900.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 51 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the most appetising list of imaginary Publishers' Announcements. The results not being very appetising, we print only a small selection of the replies received. We award the prize to Mr. Charles D. Trantom, 11, Cheapside, Liverpool.

Messrs. Tonson, Dodsley, & Tonson have the honour to announce the forthcoming issue of THE CHARM OF AMINA MARTETT, by George Meredith. In this, his sole publication during the last four years, the author presents a record of the engagement and subsequent marriage of Amina Martett to Sir Neville Blashant. It may rightly be regarded as a feminine counterpart to THE EGOIST.

IN EMBLEMEDON FAIR, Thomas Hardy has not forsaken Wessex, but the spirit of pessimism running through all his work is now considerably modified. Indeed, this, his latest production, will be found to be a joyous book, and, as such, must appeal to an increasing audience.

MATURED OPINIONS, By Mark Twain. For many years Mark Twain has been recording his impressions of his contemporaries with a view to publication one hundred years after his own death. Messrs. Tonson have prevailed upon the author to allow them 25 "estimates" for immediate publication. Amongst the moderns reviewed in this volume are Gladstone, Grant Allen, the Emperor of Germany, Anthony Hope, Queen Victoria, and Daniel Leno, Esq.

THE FOLLY OF AN UNREPENTANT MAID, By John Oliver Hobbes. An addition, if not a sequel, to SOME EMOTIONS AND A MORAL.

Other lists are as follows:

Messrs. Tonson, Dodsley, & Tonson's Autumn List. THE DEFENCE OF MAFEKING. By Major-General R. S. S. Baden-Powell. Illustrated with photographs and sketches depicting the siege. The hero of Mafeking describes in this volume the history of the famous siege. The illustrations are unique, and the work contains the only authoritative account of this chapter in the South African War.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. A Biography. By John Morley. The Parliamentary career of the late Lord Chief Justice is specially treated in this volume by one of the leading Liberal statesmen and Cabinet Ministers of his time.

LAST POEMS. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. A pathetic interest attaches to this collection of poems, since their distinguished author declares them to be his final literary work—his legacy to the world.

THE BESIEGED LEGATION. By Dr. Morrison, the Times correspondent in Peking. With illustrations from sketches supplied by eye-witnesses. This is the first complete record of the siege of Peking to reach this country, and tells in detail the story of that heroic defence by a handful of European and American men and women. [B. R., London.]

THE STRANGE WOMAN OF SELTHORPE. A Novel. By Thomas Hardy. Mr. Hardy's new novel is the study of a woman who encounters the catastrophe common to herself and Tess; but unlike her forerunner she does not bow to her fate as inevitable, but revolts against the conventions of modern life. Her strangely independent career is traced to its end; which, we will not conceal, is a bitter one.

BROTHERS ON THE TIDE. By Mark Twain. Mr. Clemens has been induced to make public this book as a first instalment of the wonderful portrait gallery which has for so long excited an expectant interest. It will deal with the humbler types whom he has encountered. Needless to say it sparkles with humour of the most vivid and kindly order.

ECHOES OF LIFE. By William Watson. This is a collection of new poems, in mood and metre akin to the "Father of the Forest"—in point of imagery they equal it, while the verses move with a simpler and less elaborate music.

THE VEIL OF LOVE. A Poem. By George Meredith. A companion to the well-known "Modern Love," clad in the same intense and penetrative imagery. [W. C. T., Cheshire.]

A new novel by George Meredith, entitled THE LOVE STORY OF HILDA LISLE. We venture to assert that Mr. Meredith has done nothing more beautiful than this story. The character of Hilda Lisle is drawn with a tenderness and charm which make it worthy to rank with this author's greatest creations.

A new volume of essays by Anstin Dobson, POT POURRI. All the delicacy and beauty of workmanship which has made Mr. Dobson's work such a rare joy to his admirers is here displayed once more. Illustrations by Hugh Thomson.

A new story by James Lane Allen, BY RIGHT DIVINE. In this story Mr. Allen has drawn the character of a peasant boy born to be a leader of men. The scene is laid amidst the grass fields of Kentucky.

Early in October will be published the first issue of a new quarterly magazine, THE CRITERION, a journal for the youthful-minded. Edited by George Bernard Shaw. The list of contributors will include Algernon Charles Swinburne, W. E. Henley, William Archer, Richard Le Gallienne, Max Beerbohm, and Arthur Symonds. Price 2s. 6d. net. [F. W. S., London.]

A YEAR IN SOUTH AFRICA. By Field-Marshal Lord Roberts of Kandahar, V.C., &c. Those who read "Thirty-one Years in India" will hasten to order this book, while every Englishman must be interested in this story of his country's victory and his countrymen's valour told by the man best fitted to appreciate both.

AMBLES IN ARCADIA. A Book of Verses. By Herbert Spencer. The author's name will commend this volume to the followers of philosophy, and it will appeal on its merits to a wider public.

ALTRUISM: STUDIES IN APPRECIATION. "Joseph Chamberlain," John Morley; "Alfred Austin," Lewis Morris; "William Vernon Harecourt," the Earl of Rosebery; "Sydney Grundy," Mrs. W. K. Clifford; "Theodore Watts-Dunton," Algernon Swinburne; "Algernon Swinburne," Theodore Watts-Dunton; "General Booth," the Bishop of London; "Richard le Gallienne," Richard le Gallienne. These essays on the character and work of eminent Englishmen by others of like distinction form a collection unique in conception and attainment.

THE MASTER BOOMSTER. By Marie Corelli and Hall Caine. (The names appear in this order without prejudice.) First edition of 1,000,000 copies sold before publication. [W. H. S., Horncastle.]

Competition No. 52 (New Series).

The weather is growing colder, and many of our readers have had a fire lit—the first of the season. For the best poem on The First Fire, not exceeding sixteen lines, we offer a prize of One Guinea.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, September 18. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Williams (Rev. T. Lloyd), Thy Kingdom Come (Wells Gariner) 3/6
Parker (Dr. Joseph), Studies in Texts. Vol. VI, (Horace Marshall) 3/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Massey (Lucy), Songs of the Unseen Hope (Skeffington) 3/0
Greenlet (Ferris), Joseph Glanvill (Macmillan Co.) net 6/0
Brierley (Leonard), The Shah and the Ballet (Cornish, Barnstaple)
Gibb (E. J. W.), A History of Ottoman Poetry (Luzac) net 21/0
Cook (Frederick A.), Through the First Antarctic Night, 1895-99 (Heinemann)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Rand (Benjamin), Third Earl of Shaftesbury (Sonnenchein) 15/0

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Moore (Rev. Herbert), Half Hours in Japan (Unwin)
Pollok (Colonel) and Thom (W. S.), Wild Sports of Burma and Assam (Harst & Blackett) Let 16/0
Freeman-Mitford (A. B.), The Attaché at Peking (Macmillan) 6/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Scott (D. H.), Studies in Fossil Botany (Black) net 7/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Wells (G. H.), The Antigone of Sophocles (Bell)
Minchin (G. M.), The Student's Dynamics (Bell)
Bourne (G. C.), Introduction to Comparative Anatomy of Animals (Bell)
Tucker (T. G.), The Proem to the Ideal Commonwealth of Plato (Bell)
Wilson (K. P.), First Latin Sentences and Prose (Blackwood) 2/6
Kieser (W. A.), A Spanish Grammar (Blackwood) 3/6

JUVENILE.

Overton (Robert), A Chase Round the World (Warne) 3/6
Hawkins (W.) and Smith (E. T.), The Story of Alfred the Great (Horace Marshall) 2/6
Edis (E. S.), Ironheart (Cassell) 2/6
Peter Piper's Peepshow (Cassell) 1/6
Boo Peep (Cassell) 2/6
Ten Little Beer Boys, Illustrated by A. S. Forrest (Dean) 3/6
Savile (Helen), A Poor Butler (Sonnenchein, Chums, 1900) (Cassell) 8/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation (Murray) net 5/0
Lummis (E.), The Speaker's Chair (Unwin) 2/6
Chamberlain (Rev. T.), The Cobra's Den (Oliphant) 3/6
Dixon (Captain C.), The Leaguer of Ladysmith (Eyre & Spottiswoode)
Selle (Frank de L.), Hints on Hockey (Blackwood) 1/0

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

NOW READY.—AT ALL BOOKSELLERS, BOOKSTALLS, NEWSAGENTS, AND LIBRARIES.

THE MONTHLY REVIEW.

Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT.

No. 1. (THE OCTOBER NUMBER.) Price 2s. 6d. net

List of Contents.

EDITORIAL ARTICLES	THE PARADOX OF IMPERIALISM. AFTER PEKIN. PARTIES AND PRINCIPLES.
THE AMIR OF AFGHANISTAN ...	DETAILS OF MY DAILY LIFE.
A. A. BOWLBY, F.R.C.S.	SURGICAL EXPERIENCES IN SOUTH AFRICA.
LT. CARLYON BELLAIRS, R.N. ...	WAR TRAINING OF NAVAL OFFICERS.
SPENSER WILKINSON	PUZZLES OF THE WAR.
PROFESSOR H. H. TURNER	RECENT ECLIPSES
MRS HUGH BELL	ON THE INFLUENCE OF THE STAGE.
ROGER E. FRY	ART BEFORE GIOTTO (Illustrated).
A. T. QUILLER COUCH	"T. E. B."
MISS M. E. COLERIDGE	ON LOSS OF TIME.
HENRY NEWBOLT	THE NILE: AN ODE.
ANTHONY HOPE	TRISTRAM OF BLENZ. I.—IV.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

DIGBY, LONG & CO.'S NEW NOVELS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A FELLOW OF TRINITY."

A PRICK OF CONSCIENCE. By

ALAN ST. AUBYN. Pictorial cloth, 6s.
Glasgow Herald.—"The story is brightly told."
People.—"The book is exciting throughout; it is well written, the situations are clearly conceived, and the dialogue is smart."

NEW EDITION OF A POPULAR NOVEL.

A BRIDGE OF GLASS. By F. W.

ROBINSON, Author of "Anne Judge, Spinster," &c. Cl., 6s.
Daily Telegraph.—"An excellent novel. It is written in a clear, attractive style, which holds the reader enchained to the end."
Morning Post.—"A book by the author of 'Grandmother's Money' needs no recommendation. It is certain to be clever and not disappoint the reader. The plot is very artful and intricate, and well elaborated. There are plenty of thrilling scenes."

A HOSPITAL ROMANCE. By

ELEANOR HOLMES, Author of "Life's Fitful Fever,"
&c. Cloth, 6s.
Athenaeum.—"The author writes with ease.... These stories can hardly fail to be read with pleasure."

NEW NOVEL BY J. E. PATTERSON.

THE BRIDE OF LLANGASTY.

By the Author of "The Mermaid," &c. Cloth, 6s.
People.—"A highly sensational story replete with dramatic scenes.... The story never flags, the interest being well sustained to the end."

ONE OF MANY. By Vera Macha.

Cloth, 6s.
Western Mercury.—"An absolutely interesting story.... which at once arouses and sustains the interest of the reader from beginning to end. The heroine is a charmingly drawn character.... The novel is well worth reading."

OUR REMARKABLE FLEDGER.

By HARVEY BUXON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
Newcastle Chronicle.—"This work should take a leading place among the novels of the year. It is some time since we came across a story so excellently conceived and so well written."London: DIGBY, LONG & CO., 18, Bouverie Street, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SOWERS."

At all Libraries and Booksellers'.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ISLE OF UNREST.

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN,

AUTHOR of "THE SOWERS," "IN KEDAR'S TENTS," "RODEN'S CORNER," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE STRANGE STORY OF HESTER WYNNE."

ON SEPTEMBER 26th, AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MARBLE FACE.

By G. COLMORE,

AUTHOR of "A DAUGHTER OF MUSIC," "THE STRANGE STORY OF HESTER WYNNE," &c.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF SYMONDS' SHAKSPERE'S PREDECESSORS.

ON SEPTEMBER 26th.—Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

SHAKSPERE'S PREDECESSORS IN THE ENGLISH DRAMA

By JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

* This volume is uniform with the New Editions of Symonds' Travel Sketches and of "The Renaissance in Italy."

NEW VOLUME OF THE HISTORICAL SERIES FOR BIBLE STUDENTS.

Edited by Professors CHARLES FOSTER KENT and FRANK KNIGHT SANDERS.

ON SEPTEMBER 26th.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LIFE OF JESUS OF NAZARETH.

By Professor RUSH REES, of Newton Theological Seminary.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

The FIRST EDITION of SIR WALTER BESANT'S New Novel,

THE FOURTH GENERATION,

having been SOLD OUT, the volume has been REPRINTED, and copies may now be had from all Libraries and Booksellers. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"One of the rarest and most excellent achievements of the novelist, who is an adept and an artist, is the keeping of his reader's attention and interest fixed upon the manner of his revelation of a secret which they have divined as he intends them to divine it, from the first. This triumph of the fore-known is secured by Sir Walter Besant in his latest novel, 'The Fourth Generation.'... The solemn meaning of this work deserves consideration beyond our space; we can but indicate it, and briefly allude to the charming setting of the gem. Characters are sharply drawn, and treated too with a pleasant, whimsical humour—the brothe is Christopher and Frederick are as amusing as the fraternal favourites of 'The Golden Butterfly,' and the gentleman who sends in a bill for the maintenance of his grandmother to his newly-discovered cousin is very fine. The love interest is characteristically quaint, refined, and commonplace."—World.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED HADLEYBURG, &c.

By MARK TWAIN.

"There is a quantity of excellent mixed reading in Mark Twain's latest collection. Mr. Twain at sixty-five is just the same fearless, alert, and whimsical philosopher that he was when he made his début some thirty-four years ago."

"As for the tale that provides the title on the cover, it is among the cleverest of its writer's many clever studies in human character.... It is a book to be read by those who can appreciate Mark Twain, the grave and the gay. There are who cannot, but they are none the happier for their incapacity. This latest of his productions may be miscellaneous, but it abounds in good sense and happy touches, and we cannot believe that there is anyone, unless he shares the worst defect of the 'Travelling Reformer' himself, who will not enjoy repeated doses of the best of all medicines as he reads its rapidly changing pages."—Morning Post.

"Are has not knocked the edge off his wit, and in 'The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, and other Stories,' we have fun about as fine as in the days when he stormed the world with 'The Innocents Abroad'.... 'Christiana Science' and the book of Mrs. Eddy' is an amusingly sarcastic sketch, which should make even a Christian Scientist laugh. But the whole collection makes first-class reading."—Scotsman.

"Of all the good gifts that make a man companionable there is none like humour; and of all living humorists there is none now to be compared with Mark Twain.... For how well he wears still! though it is nearly thirty-five years since 'The Jumping Frog' first sprang upon New York; and thirty-five years is a long time to hold the public by the thread of humour. Nor is it only that the old wine retains its flavour; there is new vintage in new bottles, fresh and sound, recalling with interest, like a much-advertised tea, 'the delicious flavour of thirty years ago'.... The old friend is here in the old familiar spirit, excellent company, perennially youthful."—Daily Chronicle.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE CONQUEST OF PLASSANS.

By EMILE ZOLA.

Edited, with an Introduction, by E. A. VIZETELLY.

"The appearance of this book may be taken to mark an event in literature.... 'The Master' is a fascinating personality, and without that editorial instinct which, in the volume before us, Mr. Vizetelly has shown us he possesses, he might have been fascinated into doing his work less wisely and less well. He has so done it, however, that a round score of his author's novels figure in an English publisher's announcement; and this constitutes the literary event to which we referred. 'The Conquest of Plassans' may, in no measure of speech, be considered to signify M. Zola's conquest of London. Henceforth the Balzac of the Second Empire will have claims to more than one sort of 'royalty' among us."—Full Mail Gazette.

Now Ready.—Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

PHILIP WINWOOD:

A Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence; embracing events that occurred between and during the years 1763 and 1786, in New York and London; written by his Enemy in War, HERBERT RUSSELL, Lieutenant in the Loyalist Forces.

PRESENTED AND BY

ROBERT NELSON STEPHENS,

Author of "An Enemy to the King," &c.

With 6 Illustrations by E. W. D. Hamilton.

On September 27.—Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT.

By WILLIAM WESTALL,

Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c.

On October 1.—Small demy 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

THE "PRETTY POLLY":

A VOTAGE OF INCIDENT.

By V. CLARK RUSSELL,

Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor,'" &c.

With 12 Illustrations by G. E. Robertson.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St Martin's Lane, W.C.

MR. HEINEMANN'S

FIRST LIST OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Through the First Antarctic Night.

A Narrative of the Belgian Expedition, 1898-99, to the South Pole.

By FREDERICK A. COOK.

With 4 Coloured Plates and over 100 Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings.

1 vol., £1 net. [Just published.]

FIRST REVIEW.—"The volume is one of adventure, which few will enter upon without completing. Nor is it only a readable record of a remarkable voyage. It affords a large amount of information as to the scientific results achieved by the expedition."

ROMAN ART.

Some of its Principles and their application to Early Christian Painting.

By FRANCIS WICKHOFF.

Translated and Edited by

Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D.

With 14 Plates and numerous Text Illustrations. 36s. net. [Thursday.]

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS, P.R.A.

By Sir WALTER ARMSTRONG, Director of the National Gallery, Ireland. With 70 Photogravures and 3 Lithographs in Colour. Uniform with "Gainsborough," by the same Author. Limited to 1,000 copies for sale in Great Britain. 1 vol., imp. 4to, £5 5s. net. [October.]

CHARACTERS from ROMANCE.

A Portfolio of 16 Pastels reproduced in Colours. By WILLIAM NICOLSON. £2 2s. net. [Shortly.]

POMPEI: the City, its Life and

Art. An Artistic Survey of Archaeological Achievements. By PIERRE GUSMAN. Translated by FLORENCE SIMMONDS and M. JOURDAIN. With an Introduction by MAX COLLIGNON. With 12 Coloured Plates and 500 Text Illustrations. 1 vol., 36s. net. [October 20.]

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY

TALES. A New Translation from the Danish Original. By H. L. BREKSTAD. With an Introduction by EDMUND GOSSE. With 240 Wood Engravings by Hans TEGNER. Dedicated, by special permission, to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales. 2 vols., 10s. net each. [October 10.]

A LITTLE TOUR in FRANCE

By HENRY JAMES. With 12 Photogravures, 32 Full-Page Engravings, and 40 Illustrations in the Text, reproduced from Original Drawings by Joseph Pennell. 4to, 10s. net. [Shortly.]

THE PAGEANTRY of LIFE. By

CHARLES WHITELEY. Crown 8vo, buckram, with a Frontispiece, 7s. 6d. [Tuesday.]

WILLIAM COTTON OSWELL,

HUNTER and EXPLORER. The Story of his Life, with certain Correspondence and Extracts from the Private Journal of David Livingstone, hitherto unpublished. By his Son, W. EDWARD OSWELL. With an Introduction by FRANKS GALTON, D.C.L., F.R.S., F.R.G.S., &c. In 2 vols. With Portraits, Maps, and Illustrations. 10s. 5s. net. [October 3.]

FICTION.

In One Volume, price Six Shillings each.

VOICES in THE NIGHT. By

FLORA ANNIE STEEL. Thirteenth Thousand.

THE COURTESY DAME. By

R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

THE IMAGE BREAKERS. By

GERTRUDE DIX.

THIRTEEN STORIES. By R. B.

CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

PETERSBURG TALES. By Olive

GARNETT.

THE EAGLE'S HEART. By

HAMLIN GARLAND. [Shortly.]

MR. GILBERT PARKER'S NEW VOLUME.

THE LANE THAT HAD NO

TURNING. By GILBERT PARKER. [October 4.]

MR. ZANGWILL'S NEW BOOK.

THE MANTLE of ELIJAH. By

I. ZANGWILL. [October 23.]

Mr. Heinemann's Illustrated Autumn Announcement List posted free.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AN IMPORTANT NEW WORK ON SOUTH AFRICA.

8vo, 16s. net.

THE SETTLEMENT AFTER WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

By M. J. FARRELLY, LL.D.,

Barrister-at-Law, Advocate of the Supreme Court of Cape Colony.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ATTACHÉ AT PEKING.

BY

A. B. FREEMAN-MITFORD, C.B.,

Author of "Tales of Old Japan."

GLOBE.—"A book which will rank with the best of our literature concerning China, for it is at once informing and entertaining, and the work of an expert to boot."

NEW EDITION OF THE NOVELS

BY

JAMES LANE ALLEN,

Author of "The Choir Invisible" (213th Thousand).

JUST PUBLISHED.

SUMMER in ARCADY: a Tale of Nature. Globe 8vo, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

ALSO READY.

A KENTUCKY CARDINAL: a Story. Illustrated. Globe 8vo, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

AFTERMATH. Part Second of "A Kentucky Cardinal." Globe 8vo, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

FLUTE and VIOLIN, and other Kentucky Tales and Romances. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

COMPANION VOLUME TO ABOVE.

THE BLUE-GRASS REGION of KENTUCKY, and other Kentucky Articles. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

NOVELS BY

ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

Crown 8vo, blue cloth, gilt lettered, price 3s. 6d. each. Sale Over a Quarter of a Million Copies.

Nellie's Memories. 30th Thousand.	For Lilies. 14th Thousand.
Wee Wife. 22nd Thousand.	Uncle Max. 15th Thousand.
Barbara Heathcote's Trial. 20th Thousand.	Only the Governors. 15th Thousand.
Robert Ord's Attonement. 17th Thousand.	Lover or Friend? 12th Thousand.
Wood and Married. 21st Thousand.	Basil Lyndhurst. 10th Thousand.
Heriot's Choice. 15th Thousand.	Sir Godfrey's Granddaughters. 8th Thousand.
Queenie's Whim. 18th Thousand.	The Old, Old Story. 9th Thousand.
Mary St John. 16th Thousand.	The Mistress of Brae Farm. 10th Thousand.
Not Like Other Girls. 19th Thousand.	Mrs. Romney, and But Men Must Work

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1481. Established 1869.

22 September, 1900.

Price Threepence

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

A FEW weeks ago it was stated that Count Tolstoy would soon undertake a journey through Europe. We regret to learn that at this moment Count Tolstoy is in a very prostrate condition after a serious attack of illness. Great anxiety is felt by his friends, whose eyes are turned to his couch at Yasny Poliana with a certain alarm. Notwithstanding all rumours to the contrary, there is no possibility of the proposed journey to Western Europe being undertaken, nor is it probable that Count Tolstoy will be seen much again even in Moscow society.

WE are overwhelmed with new novels, many of them by writers having great, yet equal, claims to the careful attention of the critic. It is in the eternal unfitness of things that they should all come together.

The Life of Professor Huxley by his son, Mr. Leonard Huxley, will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. The book is not a summary of the father's contributions to science nor of his philosophic views, but rather a study of the man himself, of his character and temperament, and the circumstances under which his various works were begun and completed. So far as possible the story is told by original letters and by extracts from Huxley's correspondence, which was, however, by no means voluminous. The arrangement is simply chronological; seven chapters cover the first eight-and-twenty years; from that point to the end a chapter is allotted, roughly speaking, to every year.

MR. WILLIAM C. McBAIN informs us that the announcement that Mr. Herbert Spencer was, in response to a kind of round robin from his leading adherents, about to issue a book on the topics of the day is incorrect. Mr. Spencer writes that "the rumour is baseless. I am engaged on no book on the 'follies of the time.'"

MR. JOHN MORLEY's biographical study of Oliver Cromwell will be published next month. The work is incidentally a history, but it is primarily a biography—that is, an interpretation of a temperament and a career. The historical sense enables the biographer to enter with full sympathy into motives and ideals alien from his own—though the attitude maintained is always rather that of a critic and never that of an enthusiast.

"THERE is something very far wrong," writes a correspondent, "with the chronology of Miss Corelli as displayed by her in the ACADEMY note of last issue relative to the late Eric Mackay. Miss Corelli stated that she never met him until he returned as a man of forty-five to his father's house, when she was a child of twelve. Now Eric Mackay was born in 1851, and died in 1898, at the age of forty-seven, whence it follows that Miss Corelli is only fourteen years old now. This explains and excuses many things."

MR. KIPLING's reward for the serial rights of his story, Kim of the Rishti, is nearly £5,000, and, says a chronicler, "the receipts from the sales in book form will certainly not be less than £6,000," adding: "The price is satisfactory, but Lord Beaconsfield received £10,000 for Lothair; and it must be remembered that the story was not published in serial form, and that there was no American copyright." Yes, but it must also be remembered that Lord Beaconsfield was the father of Kipling-imperialism.

THIS week's Gentlewoman gives us Marie Bashkirtseff's first acquaintance with Guy de Maupassant, from whom she received literary letters before they actually met:

I remain in the house in order to reply to the unknown (Guy de Maupassant). That is to say, that I am unknown to him. He has already replied three times. He is not a Balzac whom one adores completely. I regret now not to have addressed myself to Zola, but to his lieutenant, who has talent, and much. He is, among the young, the one who pleases me. I woke up one beautiful morning with the desire of getting the pretty things I know how to say appreciated by a connoisseur. I searched and chose him.

The correspondence had its young troubles. Only five days later we read:

As I foresaw, all is broken off between my correspondent and myself. His fourth and last letter is coarse and stupid.

For the rest, as I am telling him in my last reply, these things need a boundless admiration on the part of the unknown. I think that he is not content, but what do I care for that!

Another five days pass, and:

Rosalie brings me from the poste restante a letter from Guy de Maupassant. The fifth is the best. We are not offended any longer. And then he had done in the Gaulois a delightful chronique. I feel myself appeased. It is so amusing!

This man whom I did not know occupies all my thoughts. Does he think of me? Why does he write to me?

We shall know more about this curious friendship when the Gentlewoman prints—as it promises to do—the actual correspondence.

OUR best wishes to the Monthly Magazine. It is distinctive, pleasantly solid in the hand, and nobly printed. There are three editorial articles on political questions, followed by a variety of interesting matter. The Amir of Afghanistan's chapter autobiography is dealt with by us elsewhere. Mrs. Hugh Bell writes on "The Influence of the Stage," Mr. Roger E. Fry on "Art Before Giotto," and Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch on "T. E. B." Mr. Anthony Hope's story, "Tristram of Blent," is a worthy rear-guard.

WE do not think that the interests of Mr. J. M. Barrie, or of literature, will be greatly served by the rather lengthy monograph on himself, and his books, just written by Mr. J. A. Hammerton, and published by Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son. Mr. Hammerton anticipates the very sound objections to the publication of such a book, by saying: "A sufficient answer would seem to be, that in such writers as J. M. Barrie, Thomas Hardy, 'Ian Maclaren,' Rudyard Kipling, and several others, the public that reads books is vastly more interested than it is in the mighty dead." There it is again—that "Corban" of literature: "The public want it." Beshrew the public, and the writers who are always ready to anticipate its fads and unsuitable appetites. Mr. Barrie is a humorist, and a retiring one; but we are not sure that his sense of humour will tide him over such a chapter heading as "His Knowledge of Womankind." The biographical element, we are pleased to say, is discreetly small. Of Mr. Barrie's marriage we are told: "The match was quite a little romance." So was ours.

MUCH has been written on the sources from which Robert Louis Stevenson formed his style; but his search for matter, local colour, and all the illuminating data which a novelist needs has been less carefully described. There is, therefore, much to interest in Mr. G. W. T. Omond's effort to supply this omission in an article on "The Art of Robert Louis Stevenson" which he contributes to the current North American Review. Thus, in writing Weir of Hermiston, Stevenson had various difficulties. Mr. Omond describes his researches:

The way in which Stevenson tackled some legal questions which arose is very characteristic. "I wish," he wrote to Mr. Charles Baxter, "Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, quam primum. Also, an absolutely correct copy of the Scots judiciary oath. Also, in case Pitcairn does not come down late enough, I wish as full a report as possible of a Scots murder trial between 1790 and 1820. Understand, the fullest possible." And then, in the frankest way imaginable, he asks for information on a point of Scottish criminal procedure of so elementary a nature that the youngest lawyer in Edinburgh could have answered it offhand. (Weir of Hermiston, p. 271.) But Stevenson, who had laid aside his wig and gown long before, was far too conscientious and thoroughgoing to rely on his recollections of what he must have known in his Parliament House days, and he would not run the slightest risk that, even on a technical point of legal practice, his novel might not be quite correct. One of his friends in the Speculative Society had been Mr. Graham Murray, now Lord Advocate, who told him how the land lay. "Graham Murray's note re the venue was highly satisfactory, and did me all the good in the world," he writes.

Nor infrequently Stevenson made direct use of some picturesque incident that he found in musty volumes. Mr. Omond gives an instance of this. In Kidnapped a letter is to be sent from the Heugh of Corrynakeigh, but paper, pen, and ink are wanting:

Kidnapped, p. 207.

State Trials, XIX., p. 144.

But he was a man of more resources than I knew; searched the wood until he found a quill of a cushat dove, which he shaped into a pen; made himself a kind of ink with gunpowder from his horn and water from the running stream; and tearing a corner from his French military commission (which he carried in his pocket, like a talisman. to keep him from the gallows) he sat down and wrote as follows.

Alan looked about among the trees, and finding a wood-pigeon's quill, made a pen of it, and having made ink of some powder he took out of a powder-horn that was in his pocket, he wrote a letter.

NONE the less did Stevenson act on Whitman's plan: "I loaf and invite my soul." Only the loafing came to its due end, the "maceration" period preparing the way for strenuous construction and the painful work of finding the right words and setting them in the right order. Some writers do not neatly end the one process before they begin the other. We are told that Hawthorne, while writing the Scarlet Letter, would take a garment from his wife's sewing basket and abstractedly snip it to pieces. And once with his penknife he whittled off the arms of a rocking-chair in a brown study.

In summing up, Mr. Omond approves Stevenson's sane view of his own achievement. He knew he had not Scott's knowledge or invention. He could not squander, he must needs elaborate. "He was far too shrewd not to acknowledge that it was beyond his power to reach the lofty eminence occupied by Scott, and that he could never have created the Baron of Bradwardine, or the Antiquary, or Jeanie Deans, nor woven together such a masterpiece as the plot of Guy Mannering." His tributes were the more striking because of his keen, almost angry, perception of Scott's contempt of the "toils, and vigils, and distresses" of the artist. Mr. Omond ends a good article with a rather eccentric judgment. He says:

There can be little doubt that what Stevenson wrote will stand the test of time, and that hereafter he will hold a place in the goodly fellowship of the immortals, with Balzac, and Defoe, and Cervantes, and the rest; but no man knew better than Stevenson that, far above them all, Scott moves by himself along the higher ridges of the mountaintops, unapproachable.

Now Stevenson may live with these masters, or he may not. But it is safe to say that if he lives with Cervantes and Balzac his claims to immortality are equal, if not superior, to Scott's own.

A WRITER in the Atlantic Monthly asks why we should not have a magazine devoted to the literature, art, and history of the past? This "Retrospective Review" would, he considers, revive a lagging interest in great achievements, and even introduce for the first time to many readers work which is amongst the world's best. He would reprint some of the Arabian Nights, and dig for treasure in the yet untouched mines of oriental literatures. Much of Voltaire, who is hardly read nowadays, would be practically new matter to this generation, and Cervantes, Goethe, Pascal, La Bruyère would have their turn, as well as such lesser lights as Alfred de Vigny, Stendhal, and Vauvenargues. The idea strikes us as good, though likely to be crowded out.

Moonshine's recent plébiscite of the best ten books for a five years' sojourn on a desert island has ricocheted to Chicago, where the Evening Post prints the selections of grave and reverend critics. Nearly all the lists are of an inevitable character. But among the books selected are:

Blackstone's Commentaries (a good choice).

Century Dictionary.

Mrs. Rohren's Cook-Book.

How to Tell Wild Flowers.

Montaigne on Cannibals.

Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy and Ruba'iyat of Omar Khayyám (as Dilated by Mr. FitzGerald).

Dilated! We thank thee, Chicago, for that word.

MR. HENLEY makes rough sport, in the Pall Mall Magazine, of the Quarterly Reviewer who recently attempted to explain the present dearth, and improbability, of great poetry. The Reviewer held that great poetry can be born only in a general exultation of feeling: "The general conditions that go to produce great poetry are for the moment wanting. . . . The faiths, the hopes, and the aspirations of the present generation are not in a state of sufficient, or sufficiently definite, excitement to generate the atmosphere which great poetry requires." Mr. Henley declines to be struck by this explanation, or to share the Reviewer's hope that the new Imperialism may yet warm the air to the required extent. He says:

For myself I think that the "old-fashioned" explanation is the best; and that the reason that there is no great poetry on top just now is that there are no great poets. Still, we never know. The Reviewer admits that the new gospel of Imperialism reads not unlike a reality; and 'tis plain that he does not despair of "great poetry" on the impulse of an optimistic pessimism (or a pessimistic optimism) which shall some day take our Rudyard (like a colic), and constrain him to produce—"spirited poems," which is all he is fit for now—but a real achievement in great poetry. But I've my doubts; and, I confess it, I turn with hope and confidence to the conclusions of another Reviewer in this same number of the Quarterly. It is so full of cheer for the future of English Verse! This Reviewer's word is that we must "study balance and the use of resolved feet"—that, in a word, we must put our trust in Mr. Robert Bridges, "and he will pull us through." Between the two Quarterly Reviewers—the Pessimistic Optimist (or whatever he is) and Mr. Bridges his devotee, can English Verse, the medium of Chaucer and Spenser, Shakespeare and Milton, Herrick and Dryden, Byron and Wordsworth and Tennyson, Coleridge, Keats, Blake—can English Verse, I say, go wrong?

I do not think it can. But it behoves Mr. Meredith, Mr. Blunt, Mr. Kipling, Mr. William Watson, Mr. Watts-Dunton, and the rest to make the most of the chance that is here presented to them. If they do, "great poetry" is ours at once. If they do not—! But I decline to discuss so scandalous an alternative.

A FLOTILLA of standard sea-stories—six in all—is issued by Messrs. Sampson Low at a guinea. They are: Fenimore Cooper's Two Admirals, Marryat's Midshipman Easy, Mr. Clark Russell's The Wreck of the "Grosvenor", Herman Melville's Moby Dick, Michael Scott's Tom Cringle's Log, and George Cupples's The Green Hand. The last story is probably the least known, but not the least worth knowing. Cupples, indeed, is perhaps the most finished of all these writers. You cannot open The Green Hand without tumbling on a satisfactory passage. Take one at random:

On we crept, slow as death, and almost as still, except the jerk of the oars from the heaving water at her bows, and the loud flap of the big topsails now and then, everything aloft save them and the brailled foresail being already close furled; the clouds all the while rising away along our larboard beam nor'-west and north, over the gray bank on the horizon, till once more you could scarce say which point the wind would come from, unless by the huge purple heap of vapour in the midst. The sun had got low, and he shivered his dazzling spokes of light behind one edge of it, as if 't were a mountain you saw over some coast or other; indeed, you'd have thought the ship almost shut in by land on both sides of her, which was what seemed to terrify the passengers most, as they gathered about the poop-stairs and watched it—which was the true land and which the clouds, 't was hard to say—and the sea gloomed writhing between them like a huge lake in the mountains.

THE latest addition to the series of "Temple Classics" is Lord Macaulay's Critical and Historical Essays, Vol. I. We open it at random and rub our eyes when we see the heading "On Log-Rolling" above one of the pages. Lord Macaulay knew nothing, we should suppose, of this word, which is of a later day than "puff"; and a question—a very small one, to be sure—might be raised as to the propriety of associating him with it. However, the word lends a new interest to Lord Macaulay's description of critical wickedness in high places, prevailing in 1830. After seventy years, his denunciation of puffs cannot be said to have lost all their force.

It is amusing to think over the history of most of the publications which have had a run during the last few years. The publisher is often the publisher of some periodical work. In this periodical work the first flourish of trumpets is sounded. The peal is then echoed and re-echoed by all the other periodical works over which the publisher, or the author, or the author's coterie, may have any influence. The newspapers are for a fortnight filled with puffs of all the various kinds which Sheridan enumerated, direct, oblique, and collusive. Sometimes the praise is laid on thick for simple-minded people. "Pathetic," "sublime," "splendid," "graceful," "brilliant wit," "exquisite humour," and other phrases equally flattering, fall in a shower as thick and as sweet as the sugar-plums at a Roman carnival. Sometimes greater art is used. A sinecure has been offered to the writer if he would suppress his work, or if he would even soften down a few of his incomparable portraits. . . . That people who live by personal slander should practise these arts is not surprising. Those who stoop to write calumnious books may well stoop to puff them; and that the basest of all trades should be carried on in the basest of all manners is quite proper and as it should be. But how any man who has the least self-respect, the least regard for his own personal dignity, can condescend to persecute the public with this Rag-fair importunity, we do not understand. Extreme poverty may, indeed, in some degree, be an excuse for employing these shifts, as it may be an excuse for stealing a leg of mutton. But we really think that a man of spirit and delicacy would quite as soon satisfy his wants in the one way as in the other.

ANOTHER book with Mars in its title! It is announced by Messrs. Harper, in the American papers, in these terms:

We have just published a book entitled From India to the Planet Mars, by Prof. Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva. It is an account of his observations regarding the very remarkable powers of a medium called Mlle. Hélène "Smith," in Geneva, who says she is the reincarnated spirit of the favourite wife of a Hindoo prince, who lived in Kanara in 1401. She is also the reincarnated spirit of Marie Antoinette, the Queen of France and wife of Louis XVI., beheaded in 1793. She also makes spirit journeys to the planet Mars, has discovered a Martian language, describes scenes, costumes, &c., in Mars, and tells stories and incidents in all her three lives. The book reads like a romance of the most absorbing kind, but it is fact based on the scientific authority of so distinguished a man as Prof. Flournoy. It is not only a popular but a scientific work.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Your 'Things Seen' often contain some striking and even startling contrasts, and in looking over Mary Howitt's The Desolation of Eyam, and Other Poems, recently I was reminded of that department of your paper by reading a poem in the volume entitled 'Tyre.' Here is her 'Thing Seen':

In thought, I saw the palace domes of Tyre;
The gorgeous treasures of her merchandise;
All her proud people, in their brave attire,
Thronging her streets for sports, or sacrifice.
I saw her precious stones and spiceries;
The singing girl with flower-wreathed instrument;
And slaves whose beauty asked a monarch's price,
Forth from all lands all nations to her went,
And kings to her on embassy were sent.
I saw, with gilded prow and silken sail,
Her ships, that of the sea had government.
Oh! gallant ships, 'gainst you what might prevail!
She stood upon her rock, and in her pride
Of strength and beauty, waste and woe defied.

I looked again—I saw a lonely shore;
A rock amid the waters and a waste
Of trackless sand: I heard the bleak sea's roar,
And winds that rose and fell with gusty haste.
There was one scathed tree, by storm defaced,
Round which the sea-birds wheeled, with screaming cry.
Ere long, came on a traveller slowly paced:
Now east, then west, he turned, with curious eye,
Like one perplexed with an uncertainty.
Awhile he looked upon the sea—and then
Upon a book—as if it might supply
The thing he lacked—he read, and gazed again—
Yet, as if unbelief so on him wrought,
He might not deem this shore the shore he sought.

MESSERS. CONSTABLE have issued new pocket reprints of Mr. Meredith's poems (selections), "The Story of Bhanavar the Beautiful," and "The Tale of Chloe." Brown paper covers, parchment backs, fine printing, and lightness beyond belief, are the qualities of these delightful volumes.

WANTED, a term for an inexact synonym. A correspondent writes: "I should be much obliged for being furnished with a word, from the English language preferably, or from Greek or any other, denoting an inexact synonym or incomplete verbal equivalent—e.g., 'sleep' for 'slumber.' As I cannot find the desired expression in Roget's Thesaurus, nor in the Century Dictionary, would it not be worth while to invent one in time for the New English Dictionary? It is a pity that paronym, homonym, and heteronym seem appropriated already."

ANOTHER correspondent writes: "In last week's ACADEMY I read the statement: 'Mark Pattison put the minimum of a decent personal library at a thousand volumes.' I should very much like to know if he did say this. I have always felt disheartened by his obiter dictum, as I heard it: 'No one can be said to have a library at all unless he has at least ten thousand volumes.' What a comfort it would be to know it was only one thousand!" We are unable at the moment to resolve our correspondent's doubts—and our own.

AMONG new Parliamentary candidates connected with literature and journalism are:

Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, who contests the Falkirk Burghs as a Liberal.

Sir George Newnes, who seeks to re-enter Parliament as Liberal member for Swansea.

Mr. Cecil Harnsworth, Liberal Imperialist candidate for Mid-Worcestershire.

Mr. Gilbert Parker, Unionist candidate for Gravesend.

Bibliographical.

AN interesting notion is that of the "Lover's Library" which Mr. John Lane is to give us, though I do not quite see why the collection should be confined to verse. Mr. Lane, to be sure, is the poets' publisher, but he does not disdain prose. The "Library" must needs be a little saccharine in quality, at least for those of us who have "come to forty year." Nevertheless it will have, you may be sure, its many votaries. So far, the collections of love poetry have been in single volumes and of the nature of anthologies. The first with which I became acquainted was that which Messrs. H. S. King & Co. published in 1874—Lyrics of Love from Shakespeare to Tennyson, a pretty little book which Tennyson permitted the compiler to dedicate to him. It contained, also by permission, many copyright poems by Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, Rossetti, William Morris, Matthew Arnold, and many other "stars" then shining. Then, in 1892, came Love-Songs of English Poets, 1500-1800, edited and annotated by Mr. Ralph Caine, and notable for coming down no farther than Charles Wells. The arrangement here was chronological. In Lyric Love, an anthology made (also in 1892) by Mr. William Watson, the grouping of the pieces was according to their general subject. Among the now living authors drawn upon were Mr. Meredith, Mr. Bridges, Mr. Dobson, Mr. De Vere, Mr. Hilenley, Mr. Austin, Mr. Bailey, and Mr. Blunt, while of the last generation Tennyson, Arnold, Patmore, Darley, Clough, Beddoes, Frederick Locker, Thomas Ashe, Mr. Browning, and the two Rossettis were quoted. On the whole, my only fear in regard to the "Lover's Library" is that it may stretch to the crack of doom. I don't see how it is to be comprehensive, and yet be comprised within reasonable limits.

In view of Mr. John Morley's forthcoming work on Oliver Cromwell, it may be interesting to range in chronological order the various memoirs and monographs on Cromwell which have appeared in England during the last twenty years. These were written, respectively, by Mr. F. W. Cornish (1881), the Rev. E. Paxton Hood (1882), Mr. Frederic Harrison (1888), Mr. J. A. Picton (1889), Sir R. F. Palgrave (1890), Mr. J. Waylen (1891), Mr. S. H. Church (1894), Mr. D. Murphy (1896), Mr. S. R. Gardiner (1897), Rev. R. F. Horton (1897), Mr. W. S. Douglas (1898), Mr. Gardiner again (1899), Sir R. Tangye (1899), Mr. F. W. Aveling (1899), Mr. G. H. Pike (1899), and Mr. T. Baldock (1899). Some of these writers, of course, dealt only with special phases of Cromwell's character and career. Thus, Mr. Hood dwelt on his Times and Battlefields, Mr. Gardiner (in 1897) on his Place in History, Mr. Horton on his Religion, Sir R. Palgrave on his Protectorate, Mr. Douglas on his Scotch Campaigns, and Mr. Murphy on his work in Ireland; while Mr. Baldock regarded him particularly as a Soldier, and Sir R. Tangye dealt not only with Oliver, but with Richard Cromwell. Few English historical personages have received so much attention as Cromwell has of late years from English men of letters.

It is good news that Mr. G. A. Aitken is preparing an edition of the Journal to Stella; but what is to be said of the announcement that another edition of Boswell's Johnson is on the way, and that from one of our publishing firms we are to have reprints of Vasari, of White's Selborne, of Mitford's Our Village, and of Cranford? A reprint of Cranford is promised both by Dent and by Methuen, and one wonders when the supply will stop. Messrs. Blackwood issued the other day a neat edition of Eothen; now another is advertised by another firm. Does this ringing the changes on a very few classics pay? I hope it does, but I don't see how it can.

Pascal is one of the foreign classics on whom there is always a "run." His Thoughts, translated by Mr. Kegan Paul, appeared in 1884 and again in 1888; in the latter year H. L. Sidney Lear published in English a selection from the Thoughts. The Thoughts on Religion, Englished by Mr. Basil Kennet, formed in 1893 one of Sir John Lubbock's Hundred Books, while in the following year came the Thoughts on Religion and Philosophy as Englished by Isaac Taylor. Now I note that Selected Thoughts of Blaise Pascal, translated by a lady, is to make one of the new volumes in the "Scott Library."

Canon Rawnsley was, I believe, an intimate of the Tennysons, and now we are to have a book containing his Memories of them. Moreover, there is to come, all the way from Yale, U.S.A., a professorial work on The Mind of Tennyson: His Thoughts on God, Freedom, and Immortality. I am glad to hear of the latter, because there are those who hold that Tennyson was not a thinker at all—that he simply put into concise, melodious form the thoughts of others. We shall see what the Yale professor makes of him.

The novelists still go (and will continue to go) to the poets for their titles. Thus from a lady named Theophila Worth we are to have The Marriage of True Minds (Shakespeare), and from another named Elizabeth Godfrey The Harp of Life—which, I assume, is an allusion to the line, "Love took up the harp of life," and so forth.

There is to be another edition—published, appropriately enough, at Nottingham—of The Merry Tales of the Wise Men of Gotham. They were reprinted, if I remember rightly, not so many years ago, though I cannot at the moment give the date. J. O. Halliwell's edition of 1840 will recall itself to many.

Among forthcoming novels is included A Patched-up Affair, by Florence Warden. This, I presume, is the story on which Miss Warden based the little play, with the same title, which was performed one afternoon last season at the St. James's Theatre.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

An Explosion of Humanity.

Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel. Translated by Sir Thomas Urquhart and Peter Le Motteux. With an Introduction by Charles Whibley. 3 vols. (David Nutt.)

"HARKEN (quoth Fryar Jhon) to the Oracle of the Bells of Varennes; What say they? I hear and understand them (quoth Panurge) their Sound is by my Thirst, more uprightly fatidical than that of Jove's Great Kettles of Dodona."

These words from the chapter in which Fryar Jhon "merrily and sportingly counselleth Panurge" on the subject of marriage, hint the strength of that man and of that book whom we mingle under the word "Rabelais." Down the centuries come the quick fatidical melodies of the bells of Varennes, but through them, from the night of Time, in deep undertone and awful continuance—Jove's Great Kettles of Dodona! It is because these groan through Rabelais, that Rabelais is great. It is because the book is greater than its age, and that in it we may hear Jove's Great Kettles, and Varennes' bells, and the midnight tolling of St. Paul's, and all bells that labour in the night over sleeping men, that this book can never grow old. But (to descend from belfries) it is also one of those books that gloriously restore men to themselves. Man shall not be too superstitious, too learned, or too refined; nor too long may he walk with his head in the clouds. When we build too curiously there is born a gay strong man, whose laughter knocks off the edifice its shams and hypocrisies. Again and again—since the Wife of Bath and Pantagruel—these strong, salty creations have appeared in literature: Sancho Panza, Falstaff, Robinson Crusoe, Tom Jones, Don Juan. It is forbid that the essential man who eats, drinks, and begets shall be forgotten; and how timely-welcome is the old Adam to the new! The old is at least real, the new is so often a mystic or a rope-dancer. Rabelais is the real man of the sixteenth century, and his book was an explosion of humanity.

It has been said by one student of Rabelais that, "alone among the great writers of the world, Rabelais can be appreciated by students only. To the general reader . . . he is a closed book." Exactly what this writer means by a student, and exactly what he means by a general reader, we do not know; but taking the dictum as it stands we demur to it. That the greatest onslaught on vain scholarship ever delivered by a scholar should be a closed book to the ordinary reader may seem at first sight to be a reasonable proposition. It could be maintained if Rabelais had met scholarship only with scholarship. But this was not his way. His attack was positive, not negative; he met the subtleties of the schools with a riotous display of the human animal, and gusts of essential laughter that no man might resist. It is most true, as this critic says, that his book is not for the young, nor for women. Nor is it for those who can form no cleanly conception of Rabelais's genius. He is for wholesome men, who, pursuing their way through life, wish sometimes to correct their sense of the aspiring man who fades by contemplating the natural man who persists. Rabelais provides this spectacle, and he provides it under the seal and safeguard of inextinguishable laughter.

The conditions of life which produced Rabelais as their cure are set forth with a scrupulous yet glowing scholarship by Mr. Whibley. His introduction of nearly a hundred pages contains all our essential knowledge of the wizard of Touraine. Perhaps Rabelais' late youth, his emergence from Fontenay-le-Comte on the world—a disgusted friar and an overgrown schoolboy—in his fortieth year, is a feature of his life that has been dwelt upon with more effect by one or two other writers. To have kept the dew of one's youth until that age of portliness is considered a goodly thing; with Rabelais that dew had still to fall. From a child he had lived in convents and pored over books; at forty the world was still all before him. May not this strange delay of experience explain the force and volume of that outburst which was soon to amaze Europe? At first he lived the life of a scholar and a literary hack; he went to Lyons, a centre of gracious learning, where he talked with emancipated men and cured sick. He wrote prefaces and almanacs for Sebastian Gryphius, and chap-books in which he parodied the astrologers, and began to grow the feathers of his wit. Meanwhile, the Theme was unconsciously growing, the wells of gaiety were being opened by every blow from the staff of Fate. Mr. Whibley of course scouts the superstition that Rabelais threw off his book to put a bankrupt printer on his legs. "He had no more thought of the publisher when he sat down to write than he had of his own skin. . . . He needed no spur of friendship or expediency to sing the psalm of freedom and joy that was humming in his head." Taking as his basis the legends of Gargantua and Pantagruel, familiar in Touraine as Dick Whittington in London or Tregeagle in Cornwall, Rabelais wove into these the innumerable strands of a learning gathered in monastery walls, and fed now from every centre of culture. He had made the vast discovery that what passed for learning was nine-tenths pedantry, and that what passed for asceticism was nine-tenths sham. His was the hoarse shout of the Renaissance; his the hobnails that trampled on formulæ and tradition, and on all monkery and illiberal learning. "In effect," says Mr. Whibley, "he suppressed a thousand years, and pictured man as he was before the artifice of law and church got hold of him. So he practised in a louder voice the same doctrine of Erasmus. But while Erasmus may be compared to a crystal-clear well, whose unruffled surface is broken only by the few, Rabelais is like a turbid, tumultuous torrent, clanking over half-covered rocks, and reverberating in the ears of all men." Whatever was musty in Church, Law, and Learning was blown aside by a hot blast of human breath. Useless learning was made to look cheap by a prodigious display of lore in burlesque application to trifles. Of travesty, too, Rabelais was a master. The conversation between Pantagruel and the Limousin scholar who talked the mad Latinities of Ronsard may be cited:

"My friend," asked Pantagruel, "whence comest thou?"

The Scholar answered him: "From the alme, inclyte, and celebrate Academie, which is vocititated Lutetia."

"What is the meaning of this?" said Pantagruel to one of his men.

"It is," answered he, "from Paris."

"Thou comest from Paris then," said Pantagruel; "and how do you spend your time there, you my Masters, the Students of Paris?"

The Scholar answered: "We transfretate the Sequam at the dilucal and crepuscal; we deambulate by the compites and quadrides by the Urb; we desprimate the Latial verbocination; and, like verisimilare amorabons, we captat the benevolence of the omnijugal, omniform, and omnigenal feminine sexe. . . . We cauponisate in the meritory tabernes of the Pineapple, the Castle, the Magdalene, and the Mule, goodly vervecine spatules perforaminated with petrocile. . . ."

"What devilish language is this?—by the Lord, I think thou art some kind of Heretick."

The Monks have no peace for two pages together in Rabelais' book. He tells us in the very accents of the common people why monks are hated:

"If you conceive how an Ape in a family is always mocked, and provokingly incensed, you shall easily apprehend how Monks are shunned of all men, both young and old. The Ape keeps not the house as a dog doth: He drawes not in the plow as the oxe: He yields neither milk nor wooll as the sheep: He carrieth no burden as a horse doth . . ."

"Yes, but," said Grangousier, "they pray to God for us."

"Nothing less," answered Gargantua. "True it is that with a tingle tangle jangling of bells they trouble and disquiet all their neighbours about them."

"Right," said Fryar Jhon. "a masse, a matine, a vespre well rung are half said. They mumble out great store of Legends and Psalmes, by them not at all understood: they say many patenotres, interlarded with ave-maries, without thinking upon, or apprehending the meaning of what it is they say, which truly I call mocking of God and not prayers. But so help them God, as they pray for us, and not for being afraid to lose their victuals."

In those last words we have Rabelais' true attitude. He was no heretic, and said so. "The least of their detractions," he says of his traducers, "were that my books were all stuffed with various Heresies, of which nevertheless they could not show one single instance; much indeed of comical and facetious fooleries, neither offending God nor King: but of heresy not a word, unless they interpreted wrong and against all use of reason, what I had rather suffer a thousand deaths than have thought." Just as firmly he qualified his attacks on Learning in Gargantua's noble letter to Pantagruel. "And because, as the wise man Solomon saith, Wisdome entereth not into a malicious minde; and that knowledge without conscience is but the ruine of the soul, it behooveth thee to serve, to love, to feare God, and on him to cast all thy thoughts and all thy hope, and by faith formed in charity to cleave unto him, so that thou mayest never be separated from him by thy sins."

In the same letter, and very near to the foregoing passage, Gargantua advises his son to study Nature exactly and know "the fishes, all the fowles of the aire, all the several kinde of shrubs and trees . . . all the various metals . . . together with all the diversity of precious stones that are to be seen in the Orient," &c., &c. This oxuberance of clean and beautiful knowledge is one of the glories of Rabelais. He knows all games, all country matters, all feats of arms and horsemanship, all lures and devices of the chase, all strange medicines and charms, all the lore of farms and vintages and ships and courts of justice. With what a gusto Pantagruel recalls the teaching of Gargantua on the futility of solitude and fastings:

He gave us also the Example of the Philosopher, who, when he thought most seriously to have withdrawn himself unto a solitary Privacy, far from the rustling clatterments of the tumultuous and confused World, the better to improve his Theory, to contrive, comment and ratiocinate, was, notwithstanding his uttermost endeavours to free himself from all untoward Noises, surrounded and environ'd about so with the barking of Currs, bawling of Mastiffs, bleating of Sheep, prating of Parrots, tattling of Jackdaws, grunting of Swine, girning of Boars, yelping of Foxes, mewling of Cats, cheeping of Mice, squeaking of Weasils, croaking of Frogs, crowing of Cocks, kekling of Hens, ealling of Partridges, chanting of Swans, chattering of Jays, peeping of Chickens, singing of Larks, creaking of Geese, chirping of Swallows, clucking of Moorfowls, cucking of Cuckows, bumbling of Bees, rammage of Hawks, chimring of Linets, croaking of Ravens, screeching of Owls, wicking of pigs, gushing of Hogs, scurrying of Pigeons, grumbling of Cushet-doves, howling of Panthers, curkling of Quails, chirping of Sparrows, crackling of Crows, nuzzing of Camels, wheening of Whelps, buzzing of Dromedaries, mumbling of Rabets, cricking of Ferrets, humming of Wasps, mioling of Tygers, buzzing of Bears, sussing of Kitnings, clamring of Scarfes, whimpring of Fullmarts, boing of Buffalos, warbling of Nightingales, quavering of Meavises, drintling of Turkeys, coniating of Storks, frantling of Peacocks, clattering of Magpies, murmuring of Stock-doves, erouting of Cormorants, ciling of Locusts, charming of Beagles, guarring of Puppies, snarling of Messens, rantling of Rats, guerieting of Apes, snuttering of Monkies, pioling of Pelicans, quecking of Ducks, yelling of Wolves, roaring of Lions, neighing of Horses, crying of Elephants, hissing of Serpents, and wailing of Turtles; that he was much more troubled, than if he had been in the middle of the Crowd at the Fair of Fontenoy or Niort.

And if Rabelais' catalogues of earthly things are the most wonderful in literature, shall we forget the vigour of his descriptions and their rude music? Where shall we find the noise and face-to-face fury of old-time battles described as in these words of Panurge:

When thou secest the impetuous Shock of two Armies and vehement Violence of the Push in their horrid Encounter with one another; dost thou think that so horrible a noise as is heard there proceedeth from the Voice and Shouts of Men? The dashing and jontling of Harnish? The clattering and clashing of Armies? The hacking and slashing of Battle Axes? The justling and crashing of Pikes? The hustling and breaking of Lances? The clamour and Skrieks of the Wounded? The sound and din of Drums? The Clangour and Shrillness of Trumpets? The neighing and rushing in of Horses? With the fearful Claps and thundering of all sorts of Guns, from the Double Canon to the Pocket Pistol inclusively? I cannot, goodly, deny but that in these various things which I have rehearsed, there may be somewhat occasional of the huge Yell and Tintamarre of the two engaged Bodies.

But the most fearful and tumultuous Coil and Stir, the terriblest and most boisterous Garboil and Hurry, the chiefest rustling Black Sanctus of all, the most principal Hurly Burly, springeth from the grievously plangorous howling and lowing of Devils, who Pell-Mell, in a hand-over-head Confusion, waiting for the poor Souls of the maimed and hurt Soldiery, receive unawares some Strokes with Swords, and so by those means suffering a Solution of, and Division in the continuity of their Aerial and Invisible Substances: As if some Lackey, snatching at the Lardslices, stuck in a piece of Roast meat on a Spit, should get from Mr. Greazyfist a good rap on the Knuckles with a Cudgel, they cry out and shout like Devils.

We have left ourselves no space to speak of the miracle of Urquhart's translation and the lesser miracle of the translation of the fourth and fifth books by Peter le Motteux. It does remain for us, however, to acknowledge the beauty of the presentation which their superb versions receive at the hands of Mr. Nutt. In amplitude of page and nobility of type these volumes are a worthy setting of the humour, good sense, and essential human worth of Dr. Francis Rabelais.

An Homeric History.

A History of Norway. By Hjalmar H. Boyesen. (Fisher Unwin. 5s.)

"Has Norway a history?" The question was put in half-earnest by an intelligent Englishman. Tell it not to Grieg, publish it not to Ibsen, let the ear of Björnson be deaf to it! Yet what one has asked, many, it may be feared, would echo: therefore "The Story of the Nations" series is justified of this latest among its children, which is, in effect, a new edition of the Norse-American, Boyesen's, history of his ancestral land. Prof. Boyesen being dead, Mr. C. F. Keary has added a chapter on "The Recent History of Norway," bringing the work down to date. Prof. Boyesen explains that his contract bound him to neglect (comparatively) constitutional and social for active Norwegian history; so that this is mainly a history of the old kind, a chronicle of deeds—a feature which emphasises the native "blugginess" of Norwegian annals. He has followed closely the Norse sagas, without attempting a close criticism of their reliability in detail which would be futile. The reader can judge their embellishments for himself; and the hand of the scald is obvious enough in such matters, without constant and intrusive emphasis of the fact. Prof. Boyesen has had chiefly, therefore, to tell a story; and he has told it well, with much narrative skill, compressing without the dry-as-dust air which usually attends compression in hands less skilled. The story is an engrossing one. It is more like reading Homer than reading history—a barbaric Homer, bien entendu.

Norwegian history leaps fully armed upon the scene. About three generations bring us from the chiefs of a tribe to Harold Fair-Hair, who conquered all Norway sword in hand, introduced the feudal system which did not last, and the custom of parcelling the land between all the children—legitimate and illegitimate—of a king, which unhappily did last, to the confusion of Norway and the introduction of an Eastern taste for fraternal slaughter among her rulers. Thenceforth the history of Norway presents a certain strong analogy to the history of Scotland. Denmark is her England, with whom she is at intermittent feud, who supports the continuous breed of pretenders that make the Norwegian throne a most uneasy seat, and to whom finally she is annexed, after the fashion of Scotland to England, by a dynastic union leading gradually to the predominance of her hereditary foe. Only in modern times has Norway gained a manner of independence—by her union on home-rule terms with Sweden.

The early history of Norway is a wonderful phantasmagoria of chiefs with fine double-barrelled Homeric surnames, golden helmets, cleaving axes, flashing brands, battles on stormy sea and frozen land, craft, ferocity, and untamable valour. But let this fascinating story tell itself in an episode or two. Here is one which shows that there was scant distinction between our Teuton ancestors and the Red Indians. The Jomsvikings of Jomsborg had sworn at a banquet to depose Earl Haakon, the de facto King of Norway (instigated thereto by the King of Denmark). They were taken prisoners after a terrible sea fight, in which one of them, Haavard the Hwer, emulated Widdrington at Chevy Chase; for after his feet were stricken off he fought upon his knees. They were seated upon a long log, their feet bound with ropes, and their champion, Vagn Aakesson, placed at one extremity of the log. Now Vagn at the banquet aforesaid had sworn to slay the Norwegian, Thorkell Leira. Therefore Earl Haakon's son, Erik, offered Thorkell the privilege of executing Vagn and his fellows. Thorkell joyously seized his axe, and that he might prolong Vagn's agony, kept him to the last, beginning at the other end of the log. He rushed along the row of prisoners, smiting off head after head. But Vagn sat chatting merrily with his men; they jested and laughed:

"We have often disputed," said one, "as to whether a man knows of anything when his head is off. That we can now test, for if I am conscious, after having lost my head, I will stick my knife into the earth." When his turn came, all sat watching with interest. But his knife fell from his nerveless grasp, and there was no trace of consciousness. One of the vikings on the log seemed particularly in excellent spirits. He laughed and sang as he saw the bloody heads of his comrades rolling about his feet. Earl Erik approached and asked him if he would like to live. "That depends," answered the viking, "upon who it is who offers me life." "He offers who has the power to do it," said the Earl—"Earl Erik himself." "Then I gladly accept," the viking replied. The next in order, as Thorkell walked up to him, made an equivocal pun, which, however, pleased Earl Erik so well that he set him free. Eighteen had now been beheaded, and two pardoned. The twenty-first was a very young man with long, beautiful hair, and a handsome countenance. As Thorkell paused before him he twisted his hair into a coil, and begged him not to soil it with his blood. Thorkell told one of the bystanders to take hold of the coil while he struck off his head. The man consented; but just as the axe was descending the viking pulled his hand violently back, and the obliging assistant had both his hands cut off. "Some of the Jomsvikings are alive yet," he cried, as he raised his head laughing. Earl Erik asked him his name. "I am said to be a son of Bue," he answered. "Very likely is that," said the Earl; "do you wish to live?" "What other choice have I?" asked the young viking. When Thorkell saw that Earl Erik was in a forgiving mood, he grew very wroth. Fearing to be thwarted in his vengeance, he sprang past the rest, and rushed with his axe upon his enemy, Vagn. One of the men on the log, seeing his chief's danger, flung himself forward so that Thorkell stumbled over his body, and dropped his axe. Instantly Vagn was on his feet, seized the axe, and dealt Thorkell such a blow that the axe went through his neck, and the blade was buried in the earth. Thus Vagn was the only one of the Jomsvikings who accomplished what he had vowed. Earl Erik, full of admiration, had his bonds removed, and gave him his liberty. The other prisoners were also freed at the earl's command.

This shows the savage element in Norwegian history. As an example of the heroic element, take the last battle of Olaf Trygvesson, which Longfellow has celebrated in his "Saga of King Olaf." A most romantic figure, Olaf had fought in Russia; had married the sister of the King of the Wends and been widowed of her by the time he was twenty-one; had been in Constantinople, and married the sister of the Irish King by the time he was twenty-five; and, finally, become King of Norway. After a brilliant reign, in which he reduced the greater part of Norway to Christianity by fair force of arms, his queen, Thyra, incited him to rescue certain estates due to her from the Wends and from Denmark. With a large fleet he sailed to Wendland, and amicably recovered Thyra's estates there. Meanwhile, a formidable combination was formed against him. In Denmark was Earl Erik (mentioned in our former story), who claimed the Norwegian throne, with a band of Norwegian exiles. By the persuasion of Queen Sigrid of Sweden, whom Olaf had insulted, the King of Denmark, the King of Sweden, and the Norwegian exiles leagued against him. The united fleets lay in wait for him in a narrow strait behind the little island of Svolder, and a traitor was found to lure King Olaf into the trap. His fleet was suffered to pass by; and when Olaf himself with but eleven ships came up, the three fleets sallied out upon him, covering the sea with their ships. Olaf's men urged him to decline battle, but he refused. He bound his eleven ships together, met the Danish fleet, and beat it back. On the deck of his ship, the Long Serpent, he stood with gilded shield and helmet, over his armour a scarlet tunic of silk, and discharged spears and arrows at the enemy. The Swedish fleet advanced, and enabled the Danish fleet to re-form for renewed battle. A fresh and furious fight began; but again the brave eleven sent Swede and Dane backward in disorder. Then Earl Erik, with rebel Norway, bore down on the right wing, giving Sweden and Denmark space to rally. Surrounded by three fleets, the gallant Olaf was at last overwhelmed. One by one his ships were taken, and Earl Erik rammed the Long Serpent amidships. The brave ship stood fast. Einar Thambarskelver, the best archer in Norway, a lad of eighteen, bent the bow "that none but he could wield," and whizzed an arrow over Earl Erik's head. The next sped between the earl's arm and body. Erik bade his own archer return the shot. Just as young Einar was aiming a third time, the shaft caught him, took his bow in the middle, and it burst with a loud crash:

"What was it that broke?" asked Olaf. "Norway from thy hands, my king," cried Einar. "So great was not the breach, I hope," the king made answer; "take my bow and shoot with that." He flung his own bow to the archer, who seized it, bent it double, and flung it back. "Too weak is the king's bow," he said. King Olaf flung forth his spears, two at a time, from his station on the poop, and many men were transfixed. He watched the combat on the forward deck, and it seemed to him that his men made no headway. "Do you wield your swords with so little strength," he said, "since they bite so poorly?" "No," answered a warrior, "but our swords are dull and broken." The king hastened to the forward deck, where there was a large chest of arms. He opened it and took out handfuls of bright, sharp swords, which he flung to his men. As he stooped down, the blood trickled down over his hands from under his armour. The arrows hailed thick and fast about him, and it was obvious he could not hold out much longer. One of his trusted men, Kolbjörn Stallare, sprang upon the poop by his side. His resemblance to the king had often been remarked; he was of the same height, and similarly dressed. The storm of missiles was now directed against both, and as they raised their shields they were thickly fringed with arrows. The king let his shield drop, and looked over the ship. There were but eight men alive, besides himself and Kolbjörn. He raised the shield above head and leaped overboard. Kolbjörn followed his example, but was picked up by the earl's men, who mistook him for the king.

So, with the blood of his last battle on him, Olaf sank under the cleansing waves. Another grimly dramatic scene is the death of his predecessor, Earl Haakon (who figured in our first extract). Flying with a thrall from his revolted subjects, who had rallied to King Olaf Tryggvesson (the hero of the sea-fight just described), the two took refuge in a ditch, underneath the pigstye of Haakon's mistress, Thora of Rimul. King's mistresses who kept pigstyes! Olaf, mounting a stone by the pigstye, proclaimed a large reward for whosoever should slay Haakon. Haakon saw that the thrall, Kark, was eagerly listening:

"Why art thou now so pale," asked the earl, "and now again as black as earth? Is it not because thou wilt betray me?" "No," replied Kark. "We were both born in the same night," said the earl, after a pause, "and our deaths will not be far apart." They sat for a long time in shuddering silence, each distrusting the other. At last Kark slept; but he tossed and mumbled excitedly in his sleep. The earl awaked him, and asked what he had been dreaming. "I dreamed," answered Kark, "that we were both on board the same ship, and that I stood at the helm." "That must mean that thou rulest over thine own life as well as mine. Be therefore faithful to me, Kark, and I will reward thee." Once more the thrall slept, and laboured as in nightmare. Haakon wakened him again, and asked him to relate his dream. "I thought I was at Hlade," said Kark, "and Olaf Tryggvesson put a golden ring round my neck." "The meaning of that," cried Haakon, "is that Olaf Tryggvesson will put a red ring round thy neck, if thou goest to seek him. Therefore beware of him, Kark, and be faithful to me." The night dragged slowly along, and each sat staring at the other with rigid, sleepy eyes, which yet they dared not close. Towards morning, however, the earl fell backward, and sleep overpowered him. But the terrors of his vigil pursued him sleeping. His soul seemed to be tossed on a sea of anguish. He screamed in wild distress, rolled about, rose upon his knees and elbows, and his face was terrible to behold. Then Kark sprang up, seized his knife, and thrust it into his master's throat. Olaf verified the murdered man's prophecy. He put not a ring of gold, but a ring of blood about the traitor's neck.

Imagination has obviously been used on this. But it, and our other quotations, show what a splendid feast of incident is to be found in this most romantic of histories.

Plato as Educationist.

The Education of the Young in the Republic of Plato. Translated by Bernard Bosanquet. (Cambridge Press.)

A CAREFUL estimate of Plato's contribution to the theory of education leaves little room for complacency at the progress made in twenty-three centuries; and this albeit Plato's ideal was in many points reactionary, static, and exclusive: indeed, if we take out the dramatic setting, the humour, the irony from the dialogue, and think only of its matter, much that is mechanical in modern teaching can look back to the Republic as its prototype and warrant. It belongs to the curiosities of literature that ideal commonwealths catch very little of the colour, mobility, and dynamic of life and passion; they are monotints, impressions of life focussed to a single idea. In "Utopia," "New Atlantis," and "News from Nowhere" life is caught half-tranced. Everything moves in these ideal worlds as a phantom; everything there "Softer falls than petals from blown roses"; in these dreamlands of recessional quietness content is begotten; innovating forces are unknown; fatigue, bereavement, war, factions never disturb the halcyon calm of their dream-children. "So they will feast they and their children, drinking of their wine, garlanded and singing praises of the gods, living pleasantly together, not begetting children beyond their means, dreading poverty or war." In such lands how soon should we find intolerable "the pure severity of its perfect light"; how soon should we lose all power of volition and initiation!

What makes Plato by far the greatest writer of this kind of literature is that his Republic mirrors much of the "real" Greece of his own time. He does not shirk the difficulty of inter-communal life by eliminating all the communes but one, and giving to it, for a perpetual possession, a fertile land abounding in delicious fruits. He sees very plainly that territorial expansion, fluctuations in population, and incessant internal strifes would speedily wreck his Republic, unless it is fortified against its enemies by a vigorous military class, and against the brutalising tendency of militarism—so well seen in Sparta—by the study and practice of plastic art, literature, and music. "The mere athlete," says Plato, "becomes a hater of thinking . . . and gives up making use of persuasion by means of reasoning, but carries through everything by violence and savageness like a brute, and lives in a state of unintelligence and plundering, full of inharmoniousness and ungraciousness." Accordingly, when Plato has to plan an "ideal" scheme of education for the young, he can find none better "than that which the ages have discovered . . . gymnastic for the body and music for the mind." In explaining how these subjects are to be taught he occasionally slips the noose of reality, and sets out on the high à priori road. One such escapade is his insisting that all who have the care of the young should be compelled to eliminate from the nursery tales from Homer and the tragic poets references to gods and heroes as being at all like to erring and tempted mortals. This was in the interest of religion: the gods and heroes being perfect, the poets were simply corrupting the minds of youth by such suggestions. It is strange that Plato, the idealist par excellence, should have had so little faith in a child's natural healthiness to reject what was unwholesome in his reading. The prudery which would excise "And unquenchable laughter arose among the blessed gods when they saw Hephaestus bustling through the banquet hall," or "O heavy with wine, dog-faced, with the heart of a deer," and other innocuous lines, can only be paralleled by our modern irreligion which suffers the schoolboy to find myth in the Greek scriptures, but none in the Judaic or Christian. Anyway, such a rule could not but tend to debase the religious sense, which Plato meant it to foster; for there is little doubt that the myth-making faculty which the separateness of the city-states had kept active had saved the Greeks from the rigor mortis in spiritual things which often accompanies the ritual of a single cult. What is still more surprising, however, is that neither Plato nor, later, Aristotle could even conceive the possibility of a State existing except on slavery. Slaves, aliens, and poorer free citizens (whose absorption into the permanently depressed class was continually going on) had no honourable function assigned to them, either in the "Republic" or the "Politics." Contempt for the slave passes into contempt for manual labour; and the politician, Plato believed, would be the better servant of the State the completer his alienation from the disenfranchised class. "Well, then," I asked, "are they to imitate men working at the forge or at other artisan's work, or rowing galleys, or giving time to the rowers or anything else of the kind?" "Why, how can they," he replied, "when they will not be allowed even to let their attention dwell on any of these things?" Plato's repeated assertion that men are born diversely endowed goes ill with his assumption that no artisan's son would ever be able to assimilate all that Greek life and learning had to offer, and so become by right of his own gifts a member of the controlling classes. With Plato, as with us until quite recently, education was the appanage of the well-born.

But where Plato shoots ahead of modern systems is in his recognition of the importance of surrounding the child with beautiful things, so that he will come to "approve all that is beautiful, and, enjoying it and absorbing it into his soul, will grow up in the strength of it, and become a good and noble man." For the following passage, taken in connection with another not here quoted, the editor claims that it is "the high-water mark of Plato's theory of fine art," and quotes Nettleship's saying that it contains the pith of what is to be said on the subject. We think this praise much too high, although had Plato reached the same height on the "intellectual" side of education his ideal would have been stupendous indeed:

Are we, then, to regulate the poets only, compelling them to create in their poems the image of the noble character, on pain of not making poetry among us, or shall we also regulate the other craftsmen and put a stop to their embodying the character which is ill-disposed and intemperate and illiberal and improper, either in their pictures or in their buildings or in any other productions of craftsmanship, on pain of being debarred from working among us if they cannot obey; that our guardians may not from being nurtured among images of badness, as though in a poisonous pasture, gathering in the course of every day, little by little, many things to feed upon from many surroundings, collect before they know it a single huge evil within their soul? Shall we not rather seek out those craftsmen who are able, by a happy gift, to follow in its footsteps the nature of the graceful and beautiful; that as if living in a healthy region the young men may be the better for it all, from whichever of the beautiful works a something may strike upon their seeing or their hearing, like a breeze bearing health from wholesome places; bringing them unconsciously from early childhood both to likeness and to friendship or harmony with the law of beauty?

Mr. Bosanquet's notes are exegetical rather than critical; read with the summaries and the introduction, the student will find it difficult to miss Plato's meaning. As far as possible the text is explained by the text, and always is the editor careful to point out how the connotation of important words like "music" increases as the argument progresses. If there is a fault in the way in which the commentary has been written, it is the studied carefulness with which the editor avoids using the original word even when the gain in so doing is obvious. It does not follow because a student is ignorant of Greek that his ignorance is total, extending even to Greek roots and the forms of the letters.

Dr. Hastings's Biblical Dictionary.

A Dictionary of the Bible. Edited by James Hastings, D.D. Vol. III.: Kir-Pleiades. (T. & T. Clark.)

THE present volume of this Dictionary, though, perhaps, not so interesting as its predecessors, well maintains the note of excellence struck in the first; and we are glad to see that the editor has again managed to avail himself almost exclusively of English and American talent, the long list of contributors containing only four foreign names. A good plate of coins and the customary map of St. Paul's travels—which seem to have a most unaccountable attraction for Biblical students—make up the sum of the full-page illustrations. The woodcuts in the text, though still very sparsely scattered, are probably sufficient. In this, as in all such publications, it is very difficult to discover the principle that governs their insertion. A woodcut of a phylactery might be well bestowed, as enabling the reader to know one when he saw it; but who is likely to be any the better for the common Roman forms given as illustrations to the article on Lamps?

To take first the perennially interesting subject of magic, Mr. Owen Whitehouse (Cheshunt College) comes pretty near the truth when he defines magic as "the special and abnormal agency, whether through words or acts, whereby certain superhuman personal powers are constrained either to create evil (or good) or to avert baleful effects." As has been often enough said in these columns, magic is the attempt to compel the obedience to man of spiritual powers, and we still prefer this definition to the somewhat obscure and pedantic sentence given above. This apart, Mr. Whitehouse's article may be pronounced adequate, and his account of magic in Egypt and Babylonia is just what is required to make a student of the Bible understand the manner in which the subject is there referred to. In the Egyptian part of it, the magic Papyrus of Chubas and the Westcar Papyrus might have been quoted, as well as the Papyrus Ebers; but as we are referred to Prof. Wiedemann's Religion der alten Ägypter for further information, it may well be that Mr. Whitehouse has not studied the difficult subject of Egyptian magic at first hand. On Babylonian magic he is much more detailed; but we should like his authority for the statement that the name of the god Ea was "awful, ineffable, and disguised in ciphers." The ineffability of the name of Ea did not go very far, for that name appears on most tablets of spells quite as freely as that of Merodach, who is there generally represented as his interlocutor; nor was Ea more frequently referred to by his "number" than other Babylonian gods. In that, as in other matters, it is difficult for one who has not made of the subject a special study to get away from the influence on his ideas of the mediæval Cabala. We wish, too, that in the answer to his final question—Will magic ever die?—Mr. Whitehouse had laid more stress on the fact that as the laws of nature become more and more known, the area in which the belief in magic can operate becomes correspondingly restricted. But, on the whole, the article is meritorious.

The article "Maranatha," again, is a model of what such a one should be. As the word can be construed in Syriac "The Lord is at hand," it is difficult at first sight to see how it can have been tacked on by St. Paul to the other word "Anathema," so as to form a sort of curse. Such is the kind of problem in which a Biblical dictionary is useful, and Mr. Thayer (Harvard) here solves it satisfactorily. After going through all the different readings proposed, and showing what is to be said for or against them, he leans to that which would interpret it as an ejaculation—"Our Lord come!" and suggests that it is perhaps "a fragment of some confession, creed, or hymn." Both as likely in itself, and as avoiding the alternative conclusion that the writers of the New Testament in the passage referred to were using words the meaning whereof they were ignorant, this is a happy rendering.

The doctrinal matters which are apt to become pitfalls for unwary writers are still treated with much impartiality. The very difficult article on "The Lord's Supper" is entrusted to Mr. Plummer (Durham). He assumes that the account of its institution given by St. Paul was "written earlier" than those of St. Matthew and St. Mark, and treats the description in 1 Cor. xi. 23—which gives, by the way, the consecrating words as "This cup is the New Testament in my blood—as the “primary” one. The result of this is, as he says, that “the divine injunction to the Church to continue the Eucharistic celebration in memory of its Founder rests solely on the testimony of St. Paul”—a conclusion which might not meet with approval in certain quarters. For the rest, he points out that the words of St. Paul should really be read “The bread which we break is fellowship with [κοινωνία] the body of Christ,” but that those who insist on the “is” meaning actual identity must find great difficulty when they apply the same interpretation to the cup. We do not pretend to say whether he is right or not, but it certainly seems to us a moderate and healing exposition of doctrine. The same praise may be bestowed on Mr. Adams Brown’s (New York) careful article on the “Parousia,” or Second Advent, in which he suggests that the references to it in the New Testament refer to it as “a dispensation rather than as a single event, beginning with the spiritual advent of the risen Jesus, and continuing on through all the intermediate experiences of the Church until that ‘Last Day’ when the work of salvation shall be fully accomplished.”

The trail of the Higher Criticism is, of course, still over the Dictionary, though not so much so as with some of its rivals. Mr. Chase (Cambridge) begins his article on “Mark (John)” by assuming “the identity of the John Mark of the Acts with the Mark of the Pauline Epistles and the Evangelist”—a theory which, when first started by Renan, aroused the scorn of the orthodox; but he does not think there is any reason for supposing that St. Peter, whose interpreter Mark was said to be, could not speak Greek, and he evidently thinks the silence of Clement and Origen disposes of the legend that Mark introduced Christianity into Egypt. We are also glad to see that Mr. Cowan (Aberdeen), in his article on “Nero,” leans to the theory that the “Number of the Beast” really indicates that Emperor; while Dr. Stanton (Cambridge), in an excellent article on the “New Testament Canon,” accepts the theory that the John whom Papias knew was the Elder, and not the beloved disciple. A long article by Dr. Bernard (Dublin) on “Miracle” may be commended as a gallant attempt to defend a position which seems to grow weaker every day.

Other New Books.

A TUTORIAL HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

By A. J. WYATT.

This little book is exactly what it professes to be—and more could not be said for it—a tutorial history of English literature. It is just what is wanted for a school handbook. Its scheme is clear, proportional, and scientific; it avoids jejune fulness by touching chiefly on the prominent writers, while at the same time it gives a good view of the growth no less than the sequence of English literature. Mr. Wyatt follows in his criticism accredited authorities, and judiciously quotes them where it would be difficult to supply language more able and perspicuous. His book supplies the most modern information and, for the most part, modern views.

Yet the author does not escape all the defects incident to academic compilations—such as the perilous safety of subservience to traditional judgment. Less than justice is done to Donne and the “metaphysical school,” for this is traditional; more than justice to Cowper, for example, for this, also, is traditional. On at least one point (not noticed by Mr. Wyatt) it has become seasonable the Cowper tradition should be impugned. It is assumed that his best verse errs by an inflexible simplicity, which ignores the impossibility of certain themes for poetry. In truth, it slips by the very opposite. His native instinct introduces, unafraid, an “unpoetical” topic; but, instead of dauntlessly trusting his intellect, he baulks at the last moment, and refuses the fence: he tries to “elevate the theme” (as it was called) by some rag of Papistical finery (“Papistical,” from Pepe; see dictionary). The trick, in place of raising the passage, prosaifies it; emphasising, by the glaring contrast of the stilted phrase, the homeliness of the theme. Thus, in the tender poem, “To Mary”:

Thy needles, once a shining store,
For my sake restless heretofore,
Now rust disused, and shine no more,
My Mary!

The passage is made prosaic, not by the mention of knitting-needles, but by the “funk” which swerved aside to baptize them with that conventional piece of “elevated diction”—“a shining store.” Again:

Thy silver locks, once anburn bright,
Are still more lovely in my sight
Than golden beams of orient light,
My Mary!

That final spangle from the Papistical store makes the whole stanza mean by the contrast of its tinsel glitter.

But ah! by constant heed I know,
How oft the sadness that I show
Transforms thy smile to looks of woe,
My, My Mary!

And should my future lot be cast
With much resemblance of the past,
Thy worn-out heart will break at last,
My Mary!

In this tender and true finish there is just one phrase which rings false; and it is the conventional sample of “poetic diction”—“looks of woe.” Of course, we are not attacking poetic diction, but the artificial substitute for it. It is this which sometimes mars Cowper’s best—not a too resolute simplicity. For that fault we must go to Wordsworth, and “poor Harry Gill,” and poor Harry Gill’s poor teeth, which (like his poet)—

Chatter, chatter, chatter still.

(W. B. Clive.)

NORFOLK.

By WILLIAM A. DUTT.

A writer may be forgiven any enthusiasm for his native county; nay, he should rather be encouraged in that pleasant loyalty, and be allowed to magnify his home earth to the utmost limits of his conscience. All we ask of him is that he should not play the showman too conspicuously, and Mr. Dutt seldom commits the showman’s offence. His book is, indeed, as near a model guide as may be; the itineraries are ample and well arranged, the maps good, and he discourses pleasantly by the way of matters interesting to more than the mere tourist. With this volume in his pocket a man might go through Norfolk dumb and never lose his way.

When Norfolk made up its mind to exploit itself the thing was done, and now, as Mr. Dutt says, “there is no county in England where the comforts and convenience of tourists . . . are more considered and better attended to.” Poppyland has now no secrets, its broads and rivers are somnolent waterways for the amateur wherryman, and Cromer almost spells fashion. If the spirits of Sir Thomas Browne and George Borrow, of “old Crome” and John Sell Cotman, could foregather at the “Maid’s Head” in Norwich, or up on Mousehold Heath, they would have startling views to exchange on this development. We recall that fine passage in Lavengro addressed by Borrow to the elder brother who afterwards died abroad:

Better stay at home, brother, at least for a season, and toil and strive ‘midst groanings and despondency till thou hast attained excellence even as he has done—the little dark man with the brown coat and the top-boots, whose name will one day be considered the chief ornament of the old town, and whose works will at no distant period rank among the proudest pictures of England—and England against the world!—thy master, my brother, thy, at present, all too little considered master—Crome.

Crome's day came long ago; Cotman's too.

It is impossible to find excuse for the piece of vandalism which removed Sir Thomas Browne's skull from his place of sepulture in St. Peter Mancroft to a shelf in the Museum of the Norfolk Hospital. Such noble ashes might have been left undisturbed. Yet, perhaps, he himself would have seen in it a pointed comment on his observations of the bone-filled urns dug up "in a field of old Walsingham," which gave us the Hydriotaphia and its imperishable prose.

The chapters devoted to the natural history and sport of the county are each by different and competent hands. The only English specimen of the blue thrush was seen in Norfolk; and the great crested grebe, thanks to recent careful preservation, is gradually increasing in numbers. It would be wise, in a county so adapted for varieties of bird-life, to make the preservation regulations even more strict than they are. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

SUTTON-IN-HOLDERNESS.

BY THOMAS BLASHILL.

This book makes a valuable addition to the histories of place. It is a most comprehensive monograph, full of that carefully accumulated and accurate detail which only loving labour and the true instinct for topography can gather together. Mr. Blashill was fortunate in having access to many private sources of information; he has packed his work with the minutiae of his subject, yet his detail never obscures. The history of Sutton is traced from the Conqueror's Survey, completed in 1086, when the lordship of Holderness was in the hands of Drogo de Brevere, to the opening of the Hull and Hornsea Railway in 1864. The chapters devoted to the parish during the period, extending to ten generations, when the De Suttons were Lords of the Manor, give a delightfully human picture of the Middle Ages. One sees the Cistercian Monks of Meaux, with whom the De Suttons were at frequent feud, driving their lean sheep to pasture under the jealous eyes of the Lords of the Manor, always on the watch to find means to oust the holy brethren from their rights of pasturage.

The presentation of the village community in these pages, the relations between lords and overlords, vassals and freemen, are particularly clear and succinct. Mr. Blashill's method, although accurate and scientific, is also human; he sees the colour of character. The notes on the Fishery Feasts—held annually, up to 1766, on Midsummer Eve—should be of exceptional interest to those who look for favour in reconstructing the past. The oldest record of such a feast possessed by the Corporation of Hull is dated June 22, 1695. Among the entries is one for "3 Cool Tankerds," at a cost of eight shillings. One would like to know the capacity of the tankards, and what they contained. (Elliot Stock. 6s.)

FAMOUS BRITISH REGIMENTS. BY MAJOR A. GRIFFITHS.

This is one of those perfunctory pieces of book-making which the South African War has produced in such bewildering numbers. All we can say for it is that it contains a certain number of facts and eight illustrations; but as there is no index its value for reference purposes is much reduced. (Fisher Unwin.)

FREDERICK, LORD LEIGHTON.

BY ERNEST RHYS.

A new and cheaper edition, in crown octavo, of the work first published in 1895. The volume contains eighty reproductions, two being in photogravure, from Lord Leighton's pictures, and a chapter has been added on No. 2, Holland Park-road, by Mr. Pepys Cockerell. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

Fiction.

Senator North. By Gertrude Atherton.
(John Lane. 6s.)

This book deserves a warm welcome. In the present age, an age in which the novel has practically ousted every other literary form, a responsibility rests on those novelists who have ignored the great social questions in order to produce endless and futile fantasias upon a theme which they call love, but which is nearer sentimentality. "The way of a man with a maid" is interesting—up to a point; but the complex and enormous psychology of a social organism is surely more interesting. If the novel exists so luxuriantly as to make existence impossible for other "forms," then it is the duty of the novel to fulfil the functions of those "forms" which it has crushed out of life. How many novelists recognise this? How many novelists of indubitable talent trouble themselves about those questions which continually disturb the minds of thinking persons? The attitude of our novelists in general may be compared roughly to the attitude of a newspaper which, on the day after a party-splitting event, emerges shamefully from a difficulty by printing a leader about the weather or the latest divorce case. We would not forbid love to our amiable romancers; but love, like art, is only a part of life—and a small part. "What, would you encourage novels with a purpose?" Certainly. But by novels with a purpose we do not mean novels with a fad. The finest of Balzac's work, the finest of Turgenev's—witness Le Médecin de Campagne and On the Eve—bears but little on love. These men dealt with nations. Yet such is the condition of modern taste that if an author issued a book like Le Médecin de Campagne to-day he would probably be accused of having omitted from his book the human interest and the plot!

Mrs. Atherton has essayed to produce a picture of political life in the United States, so far as it touches the Senate; and she has succeeded admirably. All her books have had sincerity and force; but, until this one, none of them has had a consistent dignity. Senator North is a grave and dignified work. It discloses knowledge, thought, and imagination. It has shape and homogeneity. Mrs. Atherton is a publicist. She is afraid of nothing, least of all of the big things. At the period of which she treats there were four questions prominent in America: the Cuban question, free silver, political corruption, and the negro problem. She deals with them imperturbably. She has woven them into the very stuff of her novel. We say that this is fine.

The book is not without its share of the indispensable "tender passion." And a terrible "human interest" centres in the figure of Harriet Walker, offspring of a Southern white and an octoroon, that tragic creature who looked like a white literally "to her finger-nails," and who yet was destined to the most frightful form of ostracism:

"My dear," he said, "that poor creature was doomed the moment she entered the world. No amount of sympathy, no amount of help that you or I could give her would alter her fate one jot. For all the women of that accursed cross of black and white there is absolutely no hope—so long as they live in this country, at all events. They almost invariably have intelligence. If they marry negroes they are humiliated. If they pin their faith to the white man, they become outcasts among the respectable Blacks by their own act, as the act of others has made them outcasts among the Whites. Their one compensation is the inordinate conceit which most of them possess. Do not think I am heartless. I have thought long and deeply on the subject. But no legislation can reach them, and the American character will have to be born again before there is any change in the social law. It is one of those terrible facts of life that rise isolated above the so-called problems. . . ."

Senator North fails only at the conclusion; and this is a pity, since it might have failed anywhere else with less consequence. The end is ineffective; it lacks the imaginative force of the rest of the book. Moreover, the introduction of Hamilton's ghost is one of those hopelessly absurd faux pas which Mrs. Atherton seems destined to make in every book. Nevertheless, Senator North is a distinguished and large work.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

CUNNING MURRELL.

BY ARTHUR MORRISON.

Not London this time, but Essex—Essex before “the speculative builder had dreamed of Leigh, and when Hadleigh was still the Hadleigh of another century.” The lighting up of Essex in the last half century would be a strange chapter in modern life; and Mr. Morrison's book is a surprising picture of the county in 1854. Ten years after that date, Mr. Morrison tells us, a man was swum for a witch in Essex, and died of it. Not the least surprise of the book is Cuning Murrell himself, an Essex fakir. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE ISLE OF UNREST.

BY HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.

A new novel by the author of The Sowers will be an event to many. The “isle of unrest” is Corsica, and a dead man lying on his face in the “Place” of Olmeta-di-Tuda is the first Corsican sight that salutes us—Corsican “dirty work.” “Someone, it was understood, had gone to tell the gendarmes down at St. Florent. There was no need to send and tell his wife—half a dozen women were racing through the olive groves to get the first taste of that.” The book is full of clearest cut incident, and the Franco-German War has an important bearing on the story. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

JEZEBEL.

BY RICHARD PRYCE.

Mr. Pryce's forte is minute description, and we think that no reader will be indifferent to the opening scene—a baptism—of this story. All the rustics were assembled to see Lord and Lady Dormorol's child christened. At the font: “It became manifest to all who were near enough to see and to hear what was passing that Lady Dormorol, with the pale face and the trembling feather, had been told by her autocratic husband that at the proper time he would intimate to her the name or the names he had chosen, and it was thus by pre-arrangement that he now held out to her the slip of paper . . . ‘No, Edward, no,’ she whispered . . . Something like horror and more than dismay seized the clergyman . . . ‘Jezebel, I baptize thee in the name . . .’ ‘Amen,’ said Lord Dormorol.” This is the story of Jezebel. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

MOTHER-SISTER.

BY EDWIN PUGH.

The mean streets forsaken, temporarily perhaps, by Mr. Morrison are the scene of Mr. Pugh's new story. “The Hole” is a shum in the north-west of London, and we are at once in the midst of squalors, amours, whisky, and street-fights. Mother-Sister is “Maddie”—or Madeline Annabel—the second child of the fearsome Dan Marmory, of The Hole. “She sat with her younger sister, Githa, in a little front room . . . whilst her father dodged the constables in the alleys round about, and other constables, attended by an idle, curious crowd, carried McCanty away on a stretcher to the hospital.” (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE WORLD'S BLACKMAIL.

BY LUCAS CLEEVE.

This story, by the author of The Monks of the Holy Tear, is a rollicking satire on the methods and sufferings of social parvenus. “There is a settled routine which the nouveau riche must follow, if he falls into the hands of the dwellers of the West-end of London. It begins with taking concert tickets . . .” After going through this routine, which advances by easy stages to Parliament, a racing stud, and a country house with traditions, he may at last be able to go about in an omnibus. With a good deal of wit and exaggeration, the author traces the career of Lucas White, millionaire, for whom she engages the reader's sympathy in his ambitions, his services to impecunious peers, and the thunder-clap which threaten his ruin. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

THE IMAGE BREAKERS.

BY GERTRUDE DIX.

In this story by the author of The Girl from the Farm we revel in modernities. Anarchism, socialism, the new woman, the revision of marriage—these are the woof of the story. At the British Museum: “In the temple of this great Bible, in the shrine of the winged bulls, dreaming in the gloom of the northern city of the great Assyrian light, the girl who had come in for shelter stood crushed with the sense of unavailing weakness before their arrogant and stable might.” (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE LOVE THAT LASTS.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

“When a man gets to seven-and-twenty wi'oot loving a woman, Alison, he gives the woman, when he does meet her, a love that lasts.” . . . She sat down on his wretched little horsehair sofa, and let her hand rest on the shoulder of the man who . . . was going to make up to her for all the misery . . . in her luckless mock-marriage.” On this theme Miss Warden's experienced pen embroiders an interesting story. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

A SELF-MADE COUNTESS.

BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

This is a story of matchmaking and social pushfulness. Its character is indicated in the author's chapter headings or maxims, such as: “The fate of young girls is often more a matter of skill than luck”; “The clever ones always play a waiting game”; “One of the greatest blessings in the world, the social world, is the feeling of being used to it,” and so on. (F. V. White. 6s.)

BROTHERS OF THE CHAIN.

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

The Hotel Cecil is taking its place in fiction. Cabs are beginning to “swing out of the Strand into the courtyard of the Cecil” as one of the inevitabilities of financial melodrama. Thus the characters in this story of a criminal brotherhood meet at the Cecil in Chapter VIII. for lunch, and there the villains are unmasked at dinner in Chapter XXX. Seas and sea-fights resound between these meals, and cigars are lighted, and messages in the Pinkerton code flash round the world. (F. V. White & Co. 6s.)

THE PRINCESS OF COPPER.

BY ARCHIBALD CLAVERING GUNTER.

A vigorous Mormon-elder-Grand-Canon-wood-pile-and-camp-fire-gin-rickie, and mining-engineer yarn, with excursions into New York vice and fashion, with such chapter headings as: “Oh, You Villain!” “The Philosophy of Kisses,” “The Wonderful Eyes of Mr. Markie Simons,” “High Jinks at the Utopia.” (J. V. White & Co. 6s.)

THE SILVER DOVE.

BY A. C. INCHBOLD.

The title is taken from these lines in The Diary of an Old Soul:

. . . Making love,
That perfects strength, divine in weakness' fire,
And from the broken pots calls out the silver dove.

The broken pots are the work of a club-haunting husband; the story of his misdeeds and salvation is closely written, and compactly laid in Hampstead and Kensington. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

One of Us.

A DELIGHTFUL piece of autobiography is the chapter of "Details in My Daily Life," contributed to the new Monthly Magazine by Abdur Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan. Indeed, the naïveté of this self-revelation is almost too much for us. If the blue cover of the Monthly Magazine, with its head of Pallas Athene, were not so austere, if the traditions of Albemarle-street were not so grave and circumspect, and if anything in the way of personal memoirs could easily surprise us, we should be tempted to suppose that Mr. W. S. Gilbert had been collecting material for a new Bab Ballad, and that his notes had gone gloriously astray. As it is, we must accept these lively self-revelations as the ipsissima verba of His Majesty the Amir of Afghanistan, and congratulate Mr. Henry Newbolt on his enterprise.

The Amir assures us that his life is quite a contrast to the lives of other Asiatic monarchs—a statement, which we are bound to say, he makes good. For the Amir has an Occidental hunger for work. So confirmed is his industry that even sickness, which turns the best of us into loafers, does not stay his activity:

When I cannot move from my bed I still keep on working at reading and writing documents and various Government papers . . . Those who have seen me at such times know how hard I work, and they have often heard me say that, if my hands and feet cannot move from my bed, I can still go on moving my tongue to give orders to those about me, and tell them what I wish to be done.

With the Amir work often means hard thinking about the welfare of his country. Often his meals wait on the table for hours until His Majesty has done thinking. Not only does his dinner get cold, but such is the depth of these Socratic reveries that when he emerges from one of them His Majesty will often ask: "Did I eat my dinner to-day, or not?"—which, if he did, is a wonderful witness to the excellence of His Majesty's digestion.

So deeply do my thoughts take possession of me when I am planning various improvements and considering State affairs that I do not see any of the people who are in my presence. Many nights I begin reading, and writing answers to letters, and do not raise my head until I see that the night is past and the morning has come. My doctors and hakims tell me that this never-ceasing activity is the cause of all my illnesses, that I work too hard, and do not take my meals regularly at fixed times. My answer is: "Love and Logic have never agreed together."

In his devotion to his work and to his people the Amir compares himself to a lover whose pains are his luxuries, and his difficulties a spur to fresh exertions. To Oriental repose—nay, to common sleep—the Amir seems to be nearly a stranger. It is true that His Majesty offers us a distinct choice of statements under this head. He goes to bed at five in the morning, and—

The whole time I am in bed my sleep is disturbed in such a way that I awake nearly every hour, and keep on thinking about the improvements and anxieties of my country; then I go to sleep again, and so on. I get up between two and three in the afternoon, and the first thing I do is to see the doctors and hakims, who examine me to see if I require any medicine.

That is a distressing state of things, and it is pleasant to know that it co-exists—the East is the home of paradox—with another of a more cheerful kind:

I do not go to sleep directly I lie down in bed, but the person who is specially appointed as my reader sits down beside my bed and reads to me from some book, as, for instance, histories of different countries and peoples; books on geography, biographies of great kings and reformers, and political works. I listen to this reading until I go to sleep, when a story-teller takes his place, repeating his narratives until I awake in the morning. This is very soothing, as the constant murmur of the story-teller's voice lulls my tired nerves and brain.

On rising, and after breakfast, the Amir begins work. Each of his officers is impatient to put his business before him. He is beset with secretaries, ushers, pages, and detectives. Members of the public also may enter his presence. The humblest water-carrier or fruit-seller is allowed, nay, entreated, to present himself. The etiquette of petitions is simple:

Any person can put his claims before me in the following way: He comes to the door and reports that he wishes to see me, and is invited to come in and tell me himself, or to put his grievance in writing and put it to the Nazir, his assistant, or to one of my Court Secretaries, or even into the Post-office. He must write on the cover: "Not to be opened by any one except the Amir." I open such letters myself, and, if necessary, I also write the answer with my own hand, and forward it to the petitioner by the same means by which it came to me. If he do not succeed in getting his letter put before me from any of these sources, there are my spies and detectives, both public and private, who are severely punished if the case is not reported to me. In fact, it is the belief in Afghanistan that every individual possesses a signature of mine, and in every house there is a detective. This is an exaggeration, I think!

It is not to be supposed that the Amir never takes recreation. On the contrary, he so far unbends as to pay two or three visits a year to his wives and family. In more youthful, less strenuous, years he saw them as often as twice a week, but he now realises that Allah did not create him "to spend my time in personal enjoyments and self-indulgence." Still, his wives venture into his presence on their own initiative ten or twelve times a year for a few hours. His youngest sons and grandsons, too, will peep in on his labours, about twice a week for a few minutes, and, finding him busy, will wrestle with each other while he wrestles with an affair of State.

It must be confessed, too, that the Amir reports well of his houses, his furniture, and his domestic arrangements generally. Persian and Herat carpets, nightingales and other singing birds, pianos, pictures, and flowers enliven the rooms of residences which suggest solid suburban comfort. Each palace is so built that it is equally adapted to summer and winter.

The rooms are so arranged that the spring blossoms may be watched as they break from the trees, and the gorgeous yellow hues of the autumn, and the dazzling falls of the winter snow and the moonlight nights are enjoyed by all the inmates of my palaces who take the trouble to sit at these windows. As a rule, I spend my summer, spring, and autumn outside the town, living for weeks in tents pitched in these positions where all the beautiful blossoms can be seen, glowing sunsets, and the yellow autumn tints.

The list of servants, too—the paish khitnats, the maiwahdur, the chanbadur, the sakab, the numerous ghulam bachalia, the Farashas, and the alma hashi, &c.—helps us to conceive of the Amir as having a most comfortable home. Moreover, there are professional chess-players and musicians to be seen and heard. "The best pianos, guitars, violins, bagpipes, and other musical instruments are always to be found in my palaces." They may be found also in Brixton. The Amir can play the violin and the rubab. The rubab, we are startled to learn, is "something like a banjo." This instrument is doubtless his Majesty's inspiration when he is worried about "the everlasting forward policy of my neighbours," one of whom, it is well known, moves forward to a banjo accompaniment. How to "run the race with the swiftest" is the Amir's daylong thought, and at night "my dreams are just the same." Sometimes he is tempted, so to speak, to leave his people to their own intrigues, treasons, and stupidities. But that is a passing mood. There are moments when the Amir enjoys his throne. When he goes out, if it be only from one building to another, he is accompanied by every one of his attendants, his Gentleman Usher, Lord of the Seal, Head of the Kitchen (whose duty is to bring petitions before his master), pages, hakims, paish khitmat, &c., &c. "When the whole cavalcade starts it forms a very pretty picture." We are sure it does. But more interesting than this is the Amir's amazing preparedness for battle:

I am always ready as a soldier on the march to a battle, in such a manner that I could start without any delay in case of emergency. The pockets of my coats and trousers are always filled with loaded revolvers, and one or two loaves of bread for one day's food; this bread is changed every day. Several guns and swords are always lying by the side of my bed or the chair on which I am seated, within reach of my hand, and saddled horses are always kept ready in front of my office, not only for myself, but for all my courtiers and personal attendants, at the door of my durbar-room. I have also ordered that a considerable number of gold coins should be sewn into the saddles of my horses when required for a journey, and on both sides of the saddles are two revolvers. I think it is necessary in such a warlike country that the Sovereign, and especially a Sovereign who is a soldier himself, should always be as prepared for emergencies as a soldier on the field of battle. Though my country is perhaps more peaceful and safe now than many other countries, still one can never be too cautious and too well prepared.

And yet we have kept the crowning reflection for the last. The Amir is one of us: he is a writer. To be explicit, he has written several books, which "have been printed at the Kabul Press," and another which Mr. Murray will issue in a few weeks. Of the last work this chapter is a pleasing foretaste. Long may the Amir ply his pen, delimit his frontiers, and play the festive rubab! But he really must not forget to eat his dinner.

Things Seen.

Armed Austria.

THE way was so solitary, the country so wild, the einspanner in which I drove so slow, that I had quite forgotten the customs-house on the Austrian frontier. Then we drew out from the gorge, and there standing in the road was a soldier, with fierce eyes, an air of Mars, and the ends of his moustache curling skywards. A rifle was slung over his shoulder, and from his mouth issued tempestuous words. Meekly I told him that I had nothing to declare. Indeed, my belongings, an anthology of poetry over which I had fallen asleep, some trivial articles of clothing, with a pair of broken boots, were so insignificant that I blushed for the discredit they would cast, if seen, on my well-groomed and well-appointed countrymen. But while the officer made belligerent remarks, and while he rolled his eyes, and while I thought humbly of the trivial tale of my belongings, a thought came into my mind to which, unfortunately, I gave utterance. I remembered that in the last Bavarian village I had bought twenty cigars at a halfpenny apiece—excellent cigars. The temptation assailed me to show that I, too, had my extravagances. I succumbed, and murmured, indicating my portmanteau:

"In there are a few cigars, just a few, for my own consumption. The officer bristled with excitement. "How many?" asked he. "Oh, nineteen, I answered, remembering that I had smoked one. Instantly he volleyed a guttural paragraph, which I understood to mean that I must pay duty on the nine. "But they are for my own consumption," I protested. "Surely ——" "The law permits you only ten," he cried. I flung myself back in my seat. The officer drew nearer to the carriage door. Two other men in the Imperial uniform suddenly appeared from nowhere, and upon their shoulders guns were also slung. They glared at me. I still can see their brick-dust faces and arrogant moustaches. The odds were too formidable. "Oh! take the cigars," said I, "take the nine cigars." Instantly the door was flung open, my bag was culled from the back of the einspanner, and I, surrounded by the might of Austria, entered the customs-house. There we fought the battle over again; there my name, occupation, residence, and date of birth were entered upon a long, closely printed yellow document; there my nine cigars were laid out upon a table, and armed Austria gazed from me to them, from them to me. Then followed a pause, broken by the ticking of the clock. I gazed at the nine cigars for which I had paid a halfpenny apiece, and thought of the long journey before me. I replaced them in my bag. Instantly the Enemy moved towards a bureau, a drawer was opened, a document was extracted, a quill pen was freely used—and I was handed a receipt for two shillings duty on nine cigars which had cost me a halfpenny apiece. I paid the money.

Austria unbent, stood at ease, and whisked me out into the Solitude.

Violins.

THIS Bavarian village had, I knew, its place in history, but I could not recall the distinction it had wrested from the ages. The little winding main street, with a miniature river galloping through it, in which women with brown, wrinkled faces were washing clothes, gave me no clue. But when, to escape the sun, I sauntered through a cool, tiled archway which led into an orchard—then I found the clue. From tree to tree, just below the ripening fruit, in and out, round and through, stretched a tracery of ropes, and from the ropes hung, half a hundred of them—violins, drying their varnish, and storing the sun. And through cottage windows, upon the skirts of the orchard, I saw men with bent shoulders and pale faces, each with a violin grasped between his knees, adjusting the strings, and polishing, always polishing. The violins they grasped were mute, but those in the orchard seemed, and it was not hard to believe, alive. They were never still; they moved to the whim of every breeze, this way, that way, backwards, forwards, and each had its own movement, its own birth-murmur of life. Some of the little ones danced madly, but the 'cellos swung to and fro with ponderous harmonies. Each had its own free impulse, and now and again one would swing near to a companion, and hang there a fraction of a second, as if to whisper some secret.

A murmur, rising and falling, filled the orchard. The music makers trembled in the wind, and thrilled in the rich sunshine. I welcomed them. These were not inanimate things. They were alive, and telling one another of the music they had been born into the world to give to man.

Ober Ammergau.

An Impression.

PUSHING itself skywards, high above the other peaks, is a crag of rock shaped like the broad end of a fir cone. It is visible to all the country side, the landmark of a hundred villages: and upon it, in icy isolation, stands a slim cross. Ober Ammergau lies beneath.

Slowly up the mountain roads, winding zig-zag through the pine forests, hanging over ravines, crawl the carriages. And over the hills come the peasants of this land—where religion goes proudly with everyday life—dusty, footsore, their faces all set towards the same goal. In multitudinous life the village is like an ant-heap. The sun blazes down on the white ways. The dust eddies up. Figures lean from the windows of the little houses, on the fronts of which Biblical scenes are painted. Men and women, drawn from many climes, speaking many tongues, linger in the streets watching and wondering at the strange sight. It is the Tower of Babel again, but that one purpose animates them all—to hear these peasants tell once again the most familiar story in the world. As the sun goes down, and the dust-strewn carriages, in interminable line, still creep and crawl into the little village, and one sees the divers types of men and women leaning from them gazing, always gazing, the wonder grows.

Gradually one begins to distinguish between the people that crowd the little curling streets. Gradually one becomes aware of certain long-haired men—grave, detached, pale—in the crowd and yet not of it; men pursuing their ordinary work of driving omnibuses, tending cattle, carrying wood, selling goods from booths, and their hair falls long upon their shoulders. These are the actors, and they are far less self-conscious than the visitors. They express no surprise at this incursion of the world into their peaceful village. They answer questions with grave courtesy; they speak of the parts they fill in the play as if it were something impersonal, just a recurring duty of their simple lives. Their chief desire seems to be that these strangers should be made comfortable, that they should benefit from this performance of the Passion Play. Vanity has never touched them. The day draws in, the streets become almost impassable, and still those grave, long-haired men move silently among the people, never excited, never worried—peasants with whom religion and life are interchangeable terms. The sun goes down on that strange sight, the slim cross sky high on the crag goes out, in a glow of fire, while here below the work of feeding and finding lodging for 6,000 people goes evenly on. There is no confusion, no fuss. If a momentary trouble arises one of the long-haired peasants is at hand to set it right. Truly the genius of these potters and carvers is many-sided. There is little rest in the village this night. An hour from midnight the carriages are still trundling in, and the shops are still open. I buy some fruit and say to the man who weighs it, "Which part do you play?" "Nicodemus," he answers, pausing a moment to give me his full attention. And yesterday morning St. Peter was cutting the grass at the house where I lodged. All night the rumble of carriages continued, and with the early morning came the tinkle of innumerable bells as the cows sought the hill pastures. It was six o'clock. I looked from my window. The way to the church was dark with early worshippers. Soon the whole village was astir, and as the bells chimed half-past seven it was as if the streets that led down to a certain meadow at the foot of the village—moved. Slowly onwards passed the procession in one thick, sinuous line on, on to the huge building that sprawls over the meadow at the foot of the village.

And high overhead, against the sun-filled morning sky, towers that slim cross.

The six thousand have entered. It is eight o'clock. The doors are closed. No one moves; no one speaks. We sit close together, staring at the stage, leaning forward in our seats, breathless, a strange assembly gathered together from all climes. The grey morning sky arches over the stage, and beyond rises a green hill, where I can see the cattle grazing. A bird flies across the proscenium. A little breeze springs up. Then a gun fires, and on either side of the Eastern buildings and streets that form the stage there is a movement, and the sudden sight of grave figures, in bright garments, advancing slowly and sedately. A shiver of expectancy! We lean forward. The Passion Play has begun.

Correspondence.

The Teaching of English Literature in Schools.

SIR,—All those interested in the literary education of the rising generation must welcome the article which appeared in the ACADEMY for September 15. Many, like myself, deplore the secondary place English literature takes in modern schools. My own school-days came ten years too early to allow me to benefit by the modern revival in women's education. But I had almost written escape for benefit! For I do not hesitate to say that I would not give in exchange for all the knowledge of Latin, Greek, and science, and the skill in carpentry and book-binding, that a girl may now gain in school, what I value most in my own education, that is a true love, and a real knowledge, of English literature and of the English language. I am told now that there is no time for such study, and that it can be well left to later years; but I am tempted to think that it is more important to teach a child to love the inside of a book before adorning its outside. In the old day-schools of Edinburgh, and at the finishing classes of more mature years, we did not learn handicraft or how to play hockey and cricket; but we gave up a great deal of time to study and to books. We were not taught scientifically, and I do not remember much about text-books, but I do remember the enthusiasm of our masters and mistresses, and the delight we found in preparing our lessons for their appreciation.

In those degenerate days children were left to prepare their lessons in their own way, and in their own time, and, I am tempted to think, both brains and character were benefited thereby. Nowadays it seems as if the teachers had to do all the thinking, and feed the children with the spoon-meat they have carefully prepared of easy mental digestion. A difficult passage had then to be worried out—we were put on our honour not to receive help at home—the library had to be hunted through and books borrowed from friends, in order to discover what is now learnt at a glance from the note at the foot of the page. Time is no doubt saved, but how much is lost!—above all, the valuable training in solving difficulties and reasoning out obscure points. And what treasures we found while hunting in dictionaries and old books: what a joy it was to go to school with a rare volume to show the master. What a triumph to be the only one in the class to have found out a hidden meaning! No doubt we often sat up too late and grew sleepy over a favourite study, neglecting the more unpopular lessons such as sums and French verbs; yet I cannot believe that we suffered in mind or body. The long rest from Friday night to Monday morning was sufficient to refresh any child's brain, and school life was more leisurely than now.

As I write I more and more realise another, and an all-powerful, element in our literary education. In Edinburgh literature is now, as it has been in the past, a living thing that enters into the life of all its inhabitants. Walking to and from school we passed through streets haunted with literary memories, and with, perhaps of even greater value, romantic and historic associations. We met and recognised men whom we revered because they wrote books, although, no doubt, we could not have told what the books were about. We looked with awe upon the window where once the shadow of a hand travelled to and fro, weaving the romances we had already learnt to love. Some of us had even talked with certain grey-haired old gentlemen, "the sportive boys" that Sir Walter writes of:

Close to my side, with what delight
They press'd to hear of Wallace wight,
When, pointing to his airy mound,
I call'd his ramparts holy ground!
Kindled their brows to hear me speak:
And I have smiled, to feel my cheek,
Despite the difference of our years,
Return again the glow of theirs.
Ah, happy boys! such feelings pure,
They will not, cannot, long endure;
Condemn'd to stem the world's rude tide,
You may not linger by the side;
For fate shall thrust you from the shore,
And passion ply the sail and oar.

We thought it worth a walk out to Roslyn to look at the lawn where two poets met so very long ago; and we delighted in the jingling rhyme that commemorates the occasion:

"Welcome! welcome! Royal Ben!"
"Thank ye! thank ye! Hawthornden."

It may be impossible to waken up in every child an enthusiasm for literature, but it is possible, surely, to teach them to be intelligently interested in books; and the book handled in the schoolroom derives a certain amount of fascination if the child has some association with its author. To have seen the house he lived in, the hillside he loved, or the church he prayed in, is enough to rouse an interest in what is else but a dull lesson. My letter grows too long, however, as all I would wish to suggest is that more might be done to interest children by teaching them, in their early and impressionable years, that literature is a great deal more than a study of prosy books.—
I am, &c.,
A MODERN ATHENIAN.

September 17, 1900.

"Fulham, Old and New."

SIR,—In justice to myself, you will, perhaps, allow me space for a few brief words anent the review of my book, printed in your issue of 9th inst.

Accuracy should, I think, be a virtue exercised by every man who proclaims himself the critic of other men's work. I do not say that Fulham, Old and New is all that it should be, but I emphatically dissent from the opinion of your reviewer that there is any want of clearness in the marginal headings employed. Your reviewer writes:

In the chapter headed "Crabtree" (vol. iii., p. 60), the reader may well be confused between Crabtree House, Lord Peterborough's house called "La Trappe," and Brandenburg House.

If I had ever written anything so nonsensical as to call Lord Peterborough's house "La Trappe," I would willingly plead guilty to the soft impeachment of your reviewer, but, happily, the mistake is his, not mine!

Again, he calls Richardson's house at North End "a fine old red brick Georgian house." Again he falls into error, for the red brick half of the Grange is the one which the novelist did not occupy. All this is perfectly clear in my work.

I could point to other mistakes in your article, but let these suffice. It is strange, indeed, that errors like these can appear in a journal such as the ACADEMY. As, however, the reader may imagine that the misstatements are based on matter to be found in my work, it is only fair to me that these corrections should be pointed out.—

I am, &c.,
CHAS. J. FÈRET.

11, Churchfield Mansions,
Hurlingham, S.W.: September 12, 1900.

[Mr. Fèret avoids our criticism. We said that his otherwise excellent work on Fulham is lacking in clear typographical guidance, and we supported our view more carefully than is indicated in Mr. Fèret's letter. In reply Mr. Fèret convicts us of a slip purely incidental to that criticism, and of another slip that has nothing to do with it.]

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 52 (New Series).

LAST week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best poem not exceeding sixteen lines on "The First Fire." Many of the poems sent in are of very equal merit. We award the prize to Miss Edith Empsall, 123, Rathcoole-gardens, Hornsey, N., for the following:

THE FIRST FIRE.

Summer is dead, and this her funeral pyre,
See how the purple blaze leaps higher and higher!
Vanish all sun-born dream and soft desire.

Throw on all memories of pageant flowers,
Of bulbul's song and magic moonlit bowers.
All dear delights of dead, delusive hours!

List to the crackling sound, relentless hiss,
The croak of scorn for all that fond brief bliss;
Grey ashes fall—is life and love like this?

Nay, for my face is flushed by that fell glow,
And—strange!—my pallid hands fresh impulse know,
And in my heart I watch a clear flame grow.

Lo, I am ready for adventure true,
In sterner mood, on rugged highways new;
Farewell, dead dreams! since deeds remain to do.

Other poems are as follows:

The light upon the ashen ground lies chill,
And, in the distance, autumn bonfires gleam;
The sun is sinking like a sun in dream,
And night's slow stain spreads o'er the barren hill.

Pull down the blinds, and let my chair remain
Beside the hearth; and light the house-fire there!
Forget the darkening world and chilly air,
And greet old friends—old books and old thoughts, again

Old thoughts! Ah, God! What ghosts of joy I see—
The robber cave, the goblin in the glare!
The firelight plays upon my mother's hair;
I sit upon my stool beside her knee!

The ruddy coal falls like a crumbling tower—
I see another face of dear delight!
"O sweet! 'Tis not for us to dream to-night.
Go bid the children come. It is their hour!"

[F. B., Milton-next-Gravesend.]

I ruh my hands?—yet uot with cold
So much as honest satisfact'ion
At finding you, my friend of old,
Returned in all your rare attraction.

Dear friend (ay, very dear to-night
To one whose credit's not extensive!),
Once more I'll join you in delight
And follow you in growing pensive.

But now you crack your sparkling joke!
Puff! . . . Well, you beat the cloud I'm blowing!
King Coal, I pray your cousin Coke
May never glower where you are glowing.

Thrice welcome! tho' some flow'rs yet bloom,
Tho' young love sings of "Sweet September."
My lime tree's dropping hints of doom—
But you shall soo me past December!

[J. J. B., Glasgow.]

When acorns from their cups are dropping,
And sportsmen's guns around are popping,
When wood-pigeons in woods are calling,
While September leaves are falling;
When o'er many a mist-grown hollow
Skims the lingering summer swallow;
When robin redbreast sings each morn,
And toadstools dance along the lawn,
Green chestnut burrs show slits of red,
Brown owls at night do wake the dead,
And sheep are driven to the fold
Ere dips the sun his disc of gold:
Now days begin to close in fast,
Autumn's chill breath is felt at last—
The first fire crackles up the chimney wide.
We are content, and wish for nought beside.

[H. F., Exmouth.]

The firelight flickers round the room,
The shadows dance on wall and ceiling,
And through the softly-lighted gloom
A Mozart melody comes stealing.
Before the fender, flanked by screens,
The black cat sits, erect and sober,
And wonders what the weather means,
Seeing the month is but October.

For hark! the bitter winds are shrill
Through double pane and oaken shutter,
And past these, too, the draughts distil
And make your curtains gently flutter;
B-think you of the coming days—
Do not the First Fire's beauties strike you?
Then, stooping towards the merry blaze,
Say "Welcome! may the rest be like you!"

[W. G., Birkenhead.]

The tired earth is waking now
After her noonday sleep.
The sun goes down more cheerily
Into the golden deep.

The children's voices ring more clear
Into the keener air;
Their footsteps sound more merrily,
The homestead seems more fair.

That generous glow upon the hearth
Means a new life for me.
Old friends have come again to stay,
A goodly company.

The world outside may be unkind,
The world outside is small.
Kings bear me company to-night
And hold High Festival.

[F. M. E., Minehead.]

This ruddy blaze, this genial glow,
Which from my hearth yon log doth throw,
Marks the proud reign of summer done;
The pitiless pomp of noontide sun
Hath passed. Soft-footing, in his room,
Comes sober Autumn, fraught with gloom
Of umber-tinted woods, and frore
Touch in his air, unfelt before.
So let me sit and bask at will
In the good warmth that drives the chill
From studious blood, and watch the play
Of dancing firelight as the day
Dies in the dusk. E'en so may I
Behold with glad tranquillity
Life's Summer into Autumn glide:
'Tis well: I have my warm fireside.

[H. H., Teddington.]

How cold and cheerless seems the grate!
It greets me with a stony stare,
And chills me as, in polished state,
It wears a gloom funereal there.

But lo! a magic wand is mine—
A lucifer is soon applied.
Ah! what a glorious glow and shine—
A welcome meet for Autumn-tide.

The faces in the fire again
Return to set us dreaming—so
We set at nought the driving rain,
And linger in the long ago!

The crocus flames in jocund spring,
We love the celandine's bright stars;
But the first fire rare joy will bring,
When leap the flames between the bars.

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

Poems also received from—R. H. S., Fulham; A. E. W., Inverness; H. C., Reigate; B. P. N., Cricklewood; W. K. H., Greenwich; G. R. G., Stoke-on-Trent; A. K. P., Worthing; P. L. B., Tonbridge; A. D., Oxford; A. E. J., Aberystwyth; E. R. C., Devon; H. P. W., Otterburn; D. G. W., Richmond; I. A., Kensington; Mrs. von S., London; J. B., Tunbridge Wells; W. H., Leicester; L. B., Chelsea; "Ione," Chelsea; Mrs. L. M. S., London; K. L. E., Colwyn Bay; A. H., Witton Park; K. E. B., Birmingham; T. C. B., Skipton; J. D. H., London; L. V. S., London; A. F., London; M. G., Kingstons; F. M., London; G. H. H., Streatham; R. W. B., Bury St. Edmunds; E. R. S., Croydon; Miss G., Reigate; E. de M., London; E. B., Liverpool; L. M. L., Stafford; G. B., Edgbaston; J. W. H., Burslem; C. F., Hastings; E. L., Didsbury; E. F., Kensington; F. W. W., London; B. S., Nottingham; G. S. W., Catford.

Competition No. 53 (New Series).

WE offer a Prize of One Guinea for the best list of PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS IN LITERATURE. The character and source of each example should be, very briefly, indicated.

RULES.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, September 25. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

New Books Received.

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Dandridge (Dante), Joy, and Other Poems (Putnam's Sons) 5/0
Kenrick (C. W. H.), Ergo Amiculae, and Other Poems (Skeffington) 2/0
Sneath (E. Hershey), The Mind of Fenelon (Constable) net 5/0
Culder (Robert H.), Poems of Life and Work (Gardner)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Lillie (Arthur), Buddha and Buddhism (T. & T. Clark) 3/0
Hamilton (J. Angus), The Siege of Mafeking (Methuen) 6/0
Andrews (S. J.), William Watson Andrews: a Religious Biography (Putnam's Sons)
Perkins (James Breck), Richelieu (Putnam's Sons)
Davidson (Thomas), A History of Education (Constable) net 5/0
Grenfell (B. P.) and Hunt (A. S.), The Amburst Papyrus (Frowde)
Helen Keller Souvenir (Volta Bureau, Washington, U.S.A.)
Irwin (Sidney T.), Letters of Thomas Edward Brown, Author of Fo'e's te Yarus (Constable)
De La Warr (The Earl), Some Reminiscences of the War in South Africa (Hurst & Blackett) 1/0
Furrely (M. J.), The Settlement After the War in South Africa (Macmillan) net 10/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Edited by Lankester (E. Ray), A Treatise on Zoology. Part II. (A. & C. Black) net 1/6
Haeckel (Ernst), The Riddle of the Universe (Watts) net 6/0

EDUCATIONAL.

Torrey (Joseph), Elementary Studies in Chemistry (Constable) net 6/0
Rutley (Frank), Mineralogy (Murby) 1/6
Monckman (James), Skertchley's Geology (Murby) 1/6

JUVENILE.

Cooke (M. C.), One Thousand Objects for the Microscope (Warne) 2/6
Hamer (S. H.), The Jungle School (Cassell) 1/6
Mayer (Henry), A Trip to Toyland (Richards) 6/0
Paine (A. Bigelow), In the Deep Woods (Heinemann)
Austin (Stella), Ben Cramer: Working Jeweller (Wells Gardner) 2/0
Leigh (M. H. C.), At the Foot of the Rainbow (Wells Gardner) 2/0
Cobb (Thomas), The Bountiful Lady (Richards) 1/6
Carlsaw (Rev. W. H.), Life and Times of Donald Carrill (Gardner)
Austin (Stella), Somebody (Wells Gardner, Darton)
Green (E. M.), Left to Themselves (Wells Gardner, Darton) 2/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Stapleton (Alfred), All About the Merry Tales of Gotham. (R. N. Pearson, Nottingham) net 5/0
Bullen (F. T.), The Palace of Poor Jack (Nisbet) 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Cupples (George), The Green Hand (Sampson Low)
Scott (Michael), Tom Cringle's Log (Sampson Low)
Melville (Herman), Moby Dick (Sampson Low)
Marryat (Captain), Midshipman Easy (Sampson Low)
Russell (W. Clark), The Wreck of the Grosvenor (Sampson Low)
Cooper (James Fenimore), The Two Admirals (Sampson Low) The Set, 6 vols. 21/0
Allen (James Lane), Summer in Arcady (Macmillan) 3/6
Dickens (Charles), David Copperfield (Nelson & Sons) 1/0
Thackeray (W. M.), The Paris Sketch Book (Nelson & Sons) 1/0

* * * New Novels are acknowledged elsewhere.

UNIVERSITY of MELBOURNE.

ORMOND CHAIR OF MUSIC.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the PROFESSORSHIP of MUSIC and the DIRECTORSHIP of the UNIVERSITY CONSERVATORIUM OF MUSIC.

Fixed salary, about £400 per annum.

Duties begin February 25th, 1901.

Applications must be sent to the AGENT-GENERAL for VICTORIA, 15, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, by 25th October, 1900.

Particulars as to salary, duties, and terms may be obtained from the AGENT-GENERAL for VICTORIA.

BOARD of EDUCATION

ROYAL COLLEGE of ART.

South Kensington, London, S.W.

COUNCIL: Sir W. B. RICHMOND, R.A. (Chairman) (Painting); E. ONSLOW FORD, R.A. (Sculpture); T. G. JACKSON, R.A. (Architecture); WALTER CRANE, R.A.W.S. (Design).
HEADMASTER—AUGUSTUS STENGER.
PROFESSOR OF SCULPTURE AND MODELLING—E. LANTERI.
(Other appointments will be announced in due course).
REGISTRAR—J. A. GRANT.

The OPENING of the ROYAL COLLEGE of ART is POSTPONED until OCTOBER 18th.

Full particulars of the revised Courses of Instruction, and of the conditions under which Students can be admitted, are given in the Prospectus, copies of which may be obtained from the SECRETARY, Board of Education, South Kensington.

CLEVER WRITERS of PURE DOMESTIC STORIES (about twenty-five to thirty thousand words), are INVITED to COMMUNICATE with EDITOR, "FAMILY STORIES," 7-12, Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

WANTED, an intelligent, educated GIRL, about 18, to train as INDEXER.—Applications in candidates' own handwriting, to be addressed to Miss HETTERINGTON, Review of Reviews Office, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, Strand.

SUPERIOR SCHOOLS for GIRLS.—Miss LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND High-class BOARDING and DAY SCHOOLS in England and on the Continent.—CENTRAL REGISTRY for TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—Gardiner's History, 2 vols., 1862—Romany Rye, 2 vols., 1877—Miss's Richard III., 1862—Lorna Doone, 3 vols.—Presentation Copies of Browning, Dickens, Thackeray, and any notable Authors. Rare Books supplied. State wants.—BAKER'S Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 29, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, Soho Square, London, W.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO
"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS

2% on the minimum monthly balances. 2% when not drawn below £100

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

2 1/2% on Deposits, repayable on demand. 2 1/2%

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and sold for Customers. The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON"

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES MAGAZINE

Is a new first-class Magazine and Review without a competitor in its particular field. It has a well-defined programme, and its contributors include the most eminent men and women of the day.

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES MAGAZINE.

THE FIRST NUMBER (OCTOBER)

CONTAINS

A NEW POEM by MR. SWINBURNE.

THE HISTORY of ELSWICK ARSENAL.
ASPECTS of MODERN ART, by SIR WILLIAM EDEN, Bart.

LONDON LITERARY LETTER by E. V. LUCAS.

OTHER ARTICLES and STORIES by

MISS M. E. COLERIDGE, HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE,

W. G. COLLINGWOOD, &c.

FRONTISPIECE by J. S. SARGENT, R.A.

Prospectus sent for a halfpenny stamp.

Now Ready. Price 6d. On Sale Everywhere, or from

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, E.C.

ANDREW REID & CO., Ltd., Newcastle-on-Tyne.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

(LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 Months, 6 Months,
and 12 Months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS
of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of Terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE
(Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; 49, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK!

6s., claret roan, gilt, illustrated

LONDON IN THE TIME OF THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. Llangollen: Darlington & Co.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, &c.

LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETWYLL COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & CO.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.

NELSON'S NEW CENTURY
LIBRARY.

Smallest Size (6½ by 4½ by 1 inch) | Largest Type (Long Primer)
Thinnest Paper (Royal India) | Lightest Weight (under 3 ozs.)

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY

THACKERAY—The Paris Sketch Book: The Irish Sketch Book; From Cornhill to Cairo. In One Volume.

The Book of Snobs: Christmas Books; Sketches of Travels in London. In One Volume.

DICKENS—David Copperfield.

ALREADY ISSUED.

THACKERAY—1. Vanity Fair; 2. Pen-dennis; 3. The Newcomes; 4. Esmond; 5. Paris Sketch Book &c.; 6. The Book of Snobs, &c.

ALREADY ISSUED.

DICKENS—1. Pickwick; 2. Nicholas Nickleby; 3. Oliver Twist and Sketches by Boz; 4. Old Curiosity Shop; 5. Martin Chuzzlewit; 6. Barnaby Rudge; 7. Dombey and Son; 8. David Copperfield.

OTHER VOLUMES in BOTH SERIES to FOLLOW QUICKLY.
Each Work complete in One Volume and Unabridged.
* Prices—Cloth, 2s. net; Leather, 2s. 6d. and 3s. net.

THOMAS NELSON & SONS,

25 & 26, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.; Parkside, Edinburgh; and New York. And all Booksellers.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

OCTOBER, 1900.—Price Sixpence.

CONTENTS.

ONE of OURSELVES. By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "Mr. Smith," &c. (Continued)

THE CAPTURE of CAFETOWN. By GEORGE PASTON.

HALL-WS' EEN. By NORA HOPPER.

CARPE DIEM. By ARTHUR F. BELL.

A STUDY in SCHOOL JOKES. By Miss E. M. GRIFFITHS.

IN THE NAME of a WOMAN. By ARTHUR W. MARCHMONT, Author of "By Right of Sword," "A Dash for a Throne," &c. (Continued).

AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

Just published.—Crown 8vo. price 5s.

A HISTORY of EPIC POETRY (Post Virgilian). By JOHN CLARK, M.A., Second Classical Master in the High School of Dundee; Author of "Manual of Linguistics."

"Unusually well written."—The Academy.

Edinburgh: OLIVER & BORN.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Ltd.

Now ready.—Price Seven Shillings and Sixpence net.

THE

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY CALENDAR
FOR THE YEAR 1900-1901.

With Corrections and Additions to the end of the Academic Year 1899-1900.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON BELL & Co.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS

BOARD of EDUCATION,
ROYAL COLLEGE of ART.
 South Kensington, London, S.W.
COUNCIL { Sir W. R. RICHMOND, B.A., K.C.B. (Painting)
 E. ONSLOW FORD, R.A. (Sculpture).
 T. G. JACKSON, R.A. (Architecture).
 WALTER CRANE, A.R.W.S. (Design).
HEADMASTER—AUGUSTUS SPENCER.
PROFESSOR of SCULPTURE and MODELLING—E. LANTIERI.
 (Other appointments will be announced in due course.)
REGISTRAR—J. A. GRANT.

The OPENING of the ROYAL COLLEGE of ART is POSTPONED until OCTOBER 16th.
 Full particulars of the revised Courses of Instruction, and of the conditions under which students can be admitted, are given in the Prospectus, copies of which may be obtained from the SECRETARY, Board of Education, South Kensington.

UNIVERSITY of MELBOURNE.

ORMOND CHAIR of MUSIC.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the PROFESSORSHIP of MUSIC and the DIRECTORSHIP of the UNIVERSITY CONSERVATORIUM of MUSIC.

Fixed salary, about £500 per annum.
 Duties begin February 25th, 1901.
 Applications must be sent to the AGENT-GENERAL for VICTORIA, 15, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, by 20th October, 1900.

Particulars as to salary, duties, and tenure may be obtained from the AGENT-GENERAL FOR VICTORIA.

TABOOED SCIENTIFIC WORKS.—The

Manager of the University Press, Limited, begs to inform the Medical Profession, Clergymen, and Teachers that the Scientific Works indicated at a recent trial and burnt by order of the Court—viz., Dr. Havelock Ellis's "STUDIES in the PSYCHOLOGY of SEX," Professor Krafft-Ebing's "PSYCHOPATHIA SEXUALIS," Dr. Ch. Féré's "THE SEXUAL INSTINCT," and G. Mortimer's "CHAPTERS on HUMAN LOVE," in the future, cannot be stocked by Booksellers in Great Britain, and will only be supplied direct from Leipzig and Paris—The University Press, Limited, 2, Broad Street Buildings, London, E.C.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 1029.—OCTOBER, 1900.—2s. 6d.

DOOM CASTLE: A ROMANCE. By NEIL MUNRO.
 CHAIRS, I-IV.—ALMOND'S NEK. By "LINESMAN."—HOW AN ENGLISH GIRL TAUGHT A PENNSYLVANIA COUNTRY SCHOOL.—IN THE HEART OF KALAMANTAN. By HUGH CLIFFORD, C.M.G.—PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD.—LORD JIM: A SKETCH. By JOSEPH CONRAD.—A MONTH IN IRELAND. By STEPHEN GWYN.—THE ECCLESIASTICAL SITUATION IN SCOTLAND.—MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD: THE MISFORTUNES OF THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—LITERARY SONAMBULISM.—A PLEA FOR LEGITIMATE PLAGIARISM.—THE EXAMPLE OF VIRGIL, SHAKESPEARE, AND MOLIERE.—THE MASTERSHIP OF THE CENTURY.—MISS CORNELI AND "THE MASTER-CHRISTIAN."—THE MILITARY POLICY OF THE COUNTRY SHOULD BE AN OFFENSIVE POLICY.—THE DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

CATALOGUES.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
 IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St. Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS

promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AUTOGRAPH LETTERS of PAINTERS, ENGRAVERS, and LITERARY CELEBRITIES.
 24 pp. Catalogue post free on application.—Myers & Rogers, 44, Booksellers' Row, Strand, London.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

BOOKS WANTED.—Gardiner's History, 2 vols., 1863.—Romany Rye, 2 vols., 1857.—Jesse's Richard III., 1862.—Lorna Doone, 3 vols.—Presentation Copies of Browning, Dickens, Thackeray, and any notable Authors. Rare Books supplied. State wants.—BAKER'S Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO
"THE ACADEMY,"

Consisting of Thirty-seven Portraits of Old and New Celebrities in Literature, may still be obtained, singly, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

NOW READY.—Price One Shilling net.

JOHN RUSKIN.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

"Will find a ready popularity among all who desire a well-written, carefully condensed account of the great critic's life and work."—Dundee Advertiser.

"This workmanlike sketch... A bit of honest work... neatly done."—Christian Leader.

"Written in an interesting style."—Nottingham Guardian.

"A book which ought to be read with great interest."—Christian Million.

JOHN RUSKIN.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By R. ED. PENGELLY.

"Leaves upon the mind of the reader the impression of a faithful portrait."—Scotsman.

NOW READY.

THIRD EDITION, FIFTEENTH THOUSAND.

Price One Shilling net.

Field-Marshal LORD ROBERTS,

V.C., K.P., G.C.B.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

By HORACE G. GROSER,

Author of "The Kingdom of Manhood," &c.

"The story is complete and glorious in itself... Worth re-reading... A rousing little book."—St. James's Gazette.

"Admirably welded together into a stirring and dramatic story."—Literary World.

"The entrancing narrative. Well printed and neatly bound."—Christian Leader.

"A close and vivid account."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"Tastefully got-up."—Scotsman.
 "Does full justice to the drum-and-trumpet career of the veteran soldier. Could easily sell at three or four times the humble shilling."—Dundee Advertiser.

SPORTS FOR BOYS.

By HOWARD SPICER,

Editor of the "Sports Library."

The Contents are as follows:—

AN INTRODUCTION. By R. P. LEWIS, Oxford University and Middlesex C.C.C.

A CHAT ON PHYSICAL CULTURE. By the Editor of "Sandow's Magazine."

ASSOCIATION AND RUGBY FOOTBALL.
HOW TO PREPARE A WICKET. By S. APTE, Groundman at the Oval.

HOCKEY, LACROSSE, SKATING, FLY-FISHING.

ON TRAINING FOR ATHLETIC SPORTS.
SWIMMING.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

SPORTS FOR GIRLS.

Edited by HOWARD SPICER,

Editor of the "Sports Library."

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

The Articles are as follows:—

INTRODUCTION. By Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, Editor of Womanhood.

1. SKATING. By CHRISTINE HANDLEY, M.A.

2. HOCKEY. By E. M. ROBSON, Hon. Sec. All England Women's Hockey Association.

3. SWIMMING. By "NETTUNE."

4. HINTS TO GIRL GOLFSERS. By MARY E. L. HEZLET, Lady Champion, 1899.

5. THE PHYSICAL TRAINING OF GIRLS. By the Editor of Physical Culture.

6. FENCING. By AGNES HOOD.

7. CRICKET. By AGNES HOOD.

8. LAWN TENNIS. By H. M. PILLSBURY.
 PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

ANDREW MELROSE, 16, Pilgrim Street, London, E.C.

THE

RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY'S NEW BOOKS.

CHRISTIAN WORK ON THE BATTLEFIELD. FROM ALDERSHOT TO PRETORIA.

A Story of Christian Work among the Troops in South Africa.

By Rev. W. E. SELLERS.

With 15 Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

This book contains many records of heroism, of suffering and sickness patiently borne, and of faithfulness to Jesus Christ under great stress and trial. The story of what has been attempted in various forms of religious activity and relief of the wounded and sick, in connection with our arms in South Africa, arouses the admiration of all Christian people.

WITH OUR SOLDIERS AT THE FRONT.

Or, Conflict and Victory in South Africa.

By HENRY JOHNSON.

With 15 Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

This is a straightforward, connected story of the great struggle between the British and the Boers in South Africa.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY GREENWICH:

A Glance at its History and Work.

BY

E. WALTER MAUNDER, F.R.A.S.,

Assistant at the Observatory.

With many Illustrations from Original Photographs.

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

Mr. Maunder tells, from first-hand information, the strange life-story of the eight Astronomers Royal, and then in detail describes the highly important work done in connection with navigation, the fixing of time, and the various highly developed scientific departments connected with the constant study of the heavens there carried on ceaselessly day and night.

THE WAY INTO THE KINGDOM;

Or, Thoughts on the Beatitudes.

By Rev. J. D. JONES, M.A., B.D.,

Of Bournemouth.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

FOR SUNDAY ADDRESSES TO YOUNG PEOPLE

KNOTS.

Quiet Chats with Boys and Girls.

By A. N. MACKRAY, M.A.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

LONDON: 56, PATERNOSTER ROW.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

New Novel by the Author of "The Sowers."

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS'.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ISLE OF UNREST.

BY

HENRY SETON MERRIMAN,

Author of "THE SOWERS," "IN KEDAR'S TENTS," "RODEN'S CORNER," &c.

"A tale of Corsican life in the reign of Napoleon III., which, from the lurid opening picture to the closing words, carries the reader along in a whirlwind of that passion and apathy, that wild turbulence under a surface of lazy indifference, which are so typical of the Corsica of to-day."—Black and White

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE STRANGE STORY OF HESTER WYNNE."

PUBLISHED TO-DAY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MARBLE FACE.

By G. COLMORE,

AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF MUSIC," "THE STRANGE STORY OF HESTER WYNNE," &c.

SHAKSPERE'S PREDECESSORS IN THE ENGLISH DRAMA.

By JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

SOME MILITARY LESSONS OF THE WAR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE.

See the OCTOBER NUMBER OF

THE

CORNHILL MAGAZINE.

NOW READY. PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Which also contains:

TWO'S COMPANY. By Mrs. H. MYLER HENSLY.
THE IMPERIAL MANCHU FAMILY. By E. H.
PARKER.

MORE HUMOURS OF IRISH LIFE.

DIAPHENIA. By BOWYER NICHOLS.

FIGHTING a PRIVATEER. By HENRY SENIOR.
Edited by Mrs. M. C. M. SIMPSON.

AN EARLY ROMANTICIST. By Miss CLARA THOMSON.

A CASE at the MUSEUM. By ROBERT ROSS.

THE GIRLHOOD of QUEEN LOUISA. By Dr.
A. W. WARD.

DOGS THAT EARN THEIR LIVING. By C. J.
CORNISH.

A TRIBUTE of BLOOD. By WILLIAM WESTALL.
CONFERENCES on BOOKS and MEN.—XVII.

The Poetry of Chaucer. By URBANUS SYLVAN.

THE ISLE of UNREST. Chapters XXVIII.—XXX.
(Conclusion.) By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO.,
15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

VOLUME VI. READY IMMEDIATELY.

THE ANGLO-SAXON REVIEW.

A Quarterly Miscellany.

EDITED BY

Lady Randolph Spencer Churchill

(Mrs. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST).

Bound in leather, with a Design in Gold from an Historic Binding.

Price 21s. net per Quarter.

CONTENTS.

ON the BINDING. CYRIL DAVENPORT.

LONDON—AFTER FORTY YEARS. Sir
WEMYSS REID.

A STUDY in DESPAIR. HUGH CLIFFORD.
COMET-LORE. E. V. HEWARD.

CONCERNING some PORTRAITS of EMMA,
LADY HAMILTON, Lord RONALD SUTHERLAND GOWER.

MARLBOROUGH and WELLINGTON.
Judge O'CONNOR MORRIS.

THREE SEERESSES (1886-1900, 1424-1431).
ANDREW LANG.

"THE BLUIDY ADVOCATE MACKENZIE."
FRANCIS WATT.

SISTER BEATRICE: a Miracle Play. In Three Acts. MAURICE MAETERLINCK.
Done into English by A. BERNARD
MIALL.

SHELLEY'S VIEWS on ART. RICHARD
GARNETT, C.B.

A FRENCH GOVERNESS. EDITH SICHEL.
TOLSTOY and TURGENIEFF. EDWARD
GARNETT.

THE QUEEN'S CHRONICLER. STEPHEN
GWYNN.

AUNT MAISIE'S INDISCRETION.
W. EARL HODGSON.

THE SALON in ENGLAND. GEORGE WHALE.

POSTPONED. R. B. CUNNINGHAME
GRAHAM.

"THE GARDEN of LOVE." A Painting by Rubens in the Prado. MAN BEERBOHM.

SIR HARRY PARKES in CHINA. S. LANE-POOLE.

IMPRESSIONS and OPINIONS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

FRANÇOISE D'AUBIGNÉ, Marquise de
Maintenon. FERDINAND ELLE.

LADY HAMILTON. TISHBEIN.

LADY HAMILTON: Cameo and Miniature.

THE LORD ADVOCATE MACKENZIE.
KNELLER.

LEON TOLSTOY. J. E. REPINE.

IVAN TURGENIEFF. J. E. REPINE.

JOHN LANE, Publisher, Vigo Street,
London, W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

AN IMPORTANT NEW WORK ON SOUTH AFRICA.

THE SETTLEMENT AFTER THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

By M. J. FARRELLY, LL.D.,

Barrister-at-Law, Advocate of the Supreme Court of Cape Colony.
8vo, 11s. net.

Outlook.—"Well written, and merits the attention of every politician."

LATEST NOVELS

BY

FAVOURITE WRITERS.

Crown 8vo, gilt tops, 6s. each.

The First Large Editions of FLORENCE MONTGOMERY'S PREJUDGED

AND

ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY'S RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE, having been exhausted before publication, Second Impressions will be ready immediately.

EGERTON CASTLE,
Author of "The Pride of Jennico,"

MARSHFIELD the OBSERVER, and the Dance of Death. [Immediately.]

CHARLOTTE M. YONGE,
Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe," &c.

MODERN BROODS. [Oct. 5.]

CHEAPER RE-ISSUE.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. The CARMINE EDITION. Small demy 8vo, with a carmine border line around each page. With 20 illustrations on steel by CRUKSHANK and LEECH. With gilt edges and bevelled boards, 6s.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s.—Contents for OCTOBER.

1.—THOMAS EDWARD BROWN. By J. C. TAYLER.
2.—SOME ASPECTS of the CHINAMAN. By F. THOROLD-DICKSON.

3.—MARKE.

4.—A GANG of COURT POISONERS.

5.—IMPRESSIONS of KLONDIKE. By C. C. OSBORNE, II.

6.—A SOLUTION of the DOMESTIC PROBLEM. By A.
GRANDMOTHER.

7.—SOCIAL LIFE in ITALY.

8.—THE RAVEN and the FORTUNE-TELLER.

9.—A CENTURY of FIGHTING. By Lieut.-Colonel VERNER.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

Price 1s.—Contents for OCTOBER.

OPENING CHAPTERS of a NEW STORY by MAARTEN MAARTENS.

ESTABLISHED
JAN HUNKUM'S MONEY.

1.—FOES in LAW. By RHODA BROUGHTON. Chaps. IV.—X.

2.—THE POEMS of BEN JONSON.

3.—NAWAZ KHAN, the GIFT of ALLAH.

4.—WALTHAM ABBEY and its ASSOCIATIONS.

5.—MY LITTLE MAID. 7.—LONG SERVICE.

6.—POPE as a PAINTER. 8.—VOLTERRA.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated.—Price 1s. 4d.—Annual Subscription, post
free, 16s.

The OCTOBER NUMBER contains—

CHINA'S "HOLY LAND." A Visit to the Tomb of Confucius.

By ERNST von HESSE-WARTEGO.

OLIVER CROMWELL.—XII. (Conclusion.) By the Right

Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P.

EAST LONDON TYPES. By Sir WALTER BESANT. Picture-

by JOSEPH PENNELL and L. RAVEN-HILL.

THE HELMET of NAVARRE.—III. By BERTHA RENELE.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Illustrated.—Price 1s.—Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The OCTOBER NUMBER contains—

TOMMY'S FOURTH of JULY in IRELAND. Story. By

ANNIE E. JONES. Illustrated.

TWO DOGS I HAVE KNOWN. Story. By Mrs. C. V. JAMISON.

Illustrated.

PRETTY POLLY PERKINS. Serial (concluded). By

GABRIELE E. JACKSON. Illustrated.

THE STORK THAT WAS LATE. Story. By CHAS. DAVIS

STEWART. Illustrated.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1482. Established 1869.

29 September, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

IN our issue of October 13 we shall publish, following the plan of other years, classified lists of the new books that will be issued during the autumn season. As these voluminous lists will fill many pages of the ACADEMY, the issue in which they appear will be increased to about thrice the size of the ordinary number, and will contain, in addition, some special articles. The lists promise a deal of good reading. In the course of a leisurely glance through them—and such leisurely glances are not among the smallest delights of the bookman's life—we have jotted down the names of some of the volumes one looks forward to reading. They are:

Life and Letters of Huxley. Leonard Huxley.
Life of Oliver Cromwell. John Merley.
The Life of Gilbert White. R. Holt-White.
Coventry Patmore: Memoirs and Correspondence. Basil Champneys.
James Martineau: a Biography and Study. A. W. Jackson.
The Day Book of John Stuart Blackie. A. S. Walker.
Ephemera Critica. John Churton Collins.
A History of Criticism. George Saintsbury.
In the South Seas. R. L. Stevenson.
The Old Familiar Faces. Theodore Watts-Dunton.
A Little Tour in France. Henry James.
The Man William Shakespeare. Frank Harris.
Three Plays for Puritans. G. Bernard Shaw.
With Christ at Sea. F. T. Bullen.
The Amusements of Old London. W. B. Boulton.
T. E. Brown's Collected Poems.
The Unpublished and Uncollected Poems of Cowper.
Mr. Quiller Couch's Anthology of English Poetry.
Tommy and Grizel. J. M. Barrie.
Richard Yea-and-Nay. Maurice Hewlett.
The Hearts Highway. Mary Wilkins.
Lord Jim. Joseph Conrad.

ONE of the autumn announcements has an interest greater than its title suggests. This is Biographia Presbyteriana, by Patrick Walker, edited, with notes, by Dr. Hay Fleming, with an introduction by S. R. Crockett. Biographia Presbyteriana contains the Lives of Alexander Peden, Richard Cameron, Donald Cargill, and others, and the two volumes will be uniform with the Edinburgh edition of Stevenson. In one of his letters Stevenson says that he owes his style to Patrick Walker, indeed, he calls him his "real father in style," although Walker's name does not appear in that familiar passage where Stevenson describes how he "played the sedulous ape to Hazlitt, to Lamb, to Wordsworth, to Sir Thomas Browne, to Defoe, to Hawthorne, to Montaigne, to Baudelaire, and to Obermann."

THE list of literary Parliamentary candidates which we gave last week did not profess to be complete. We now add:

Dr. A. Conan Doyle, Unionist candidate for the Central Division of Edinburgh.

Mr. Hubert Harry Longman, Liberal candidate for the Chertsey Division of Surrey.

Mr. H. C. Cust, Conservative candidate for Bermondsey.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE's candidature for the Falkirk Burghs is already a thing of the past. Mr. Hope's health has broken down, and his condition is stated to be "somewhat serious." Although Mr. J. M. Barrie is not a candidate, there is an evident determination on the part of his friends to induce him to stand sooner or later.

ARE angels men? asks Mr. E. B. Triscott in the Temple Magazine, and points out that "all the angels one ever reads of are men." We give it up. The question belongs to the same doubt as Elia's: "Whether the higher orders of seraphs ever sneer." Meanwhile it may be noted that in Literature angels are usually men, in Art they are women. The reasons for the difference seem to be literary and artistic.

WE recently referred to a rumour, happily found to be quite baseless, which said that Mr. Holman Hunt's picture, "The Light of the World," had been destroyed as "heretical" by its owner. Its owner is Keble College, which has neither pronounced the picture heretical nor destroyed it. But, in reference to the general question of the safety of this picture raised in our columns by Mr. W. J. Stillman, we have received an interesting letter from Mr. Whitworth Wallis, Director of the Birmingham Art Gallery. Mr. Wallis considers that Mr. Stillman's disquieting doubts were well founded, and that the "scrupulous care" which several correspondents have assured us is bestowed on the picture at Oxford is of very recent date.

"In fact," says Mr. Wallis, "no such scrupulous care has been shown; on the contrary, the famous picture has been badly treated, so much so that it was nearly destroyed by the heat of a flue over which it was placed. Mr. Hunt then, at his own expense, repaired what he told me was 'terrible damage.' Where the picture hangs now I do not know, but the authorities appear to take a delight in hindering the work from being seen. They have further made away with the artist's well-designed and modest frame in which it was first exhibited, and have substituted a new frame without the original title, 'The Light of the World,' and the text, 'Behold I stand,' &c., &c., but with a new text, 'Knock and it shall be opened.' This and other stupidities, as the talented artist wrote me, 'prove that if they did not of express purpose wish to destroy it, they have a determined prejudice against it.' Mr. Hunt was good enough to send me the above information when I was lecturing at the Royal Institution, Dublin, last year, as I thought it well to point out the treatment the celebrated work had received."

MR. WALLIS adds that if the Keble College authorities fail to appreciate the value and importance of the "Light of the World" he will be glad to receive it at Birmingham, and treat it with the unremitting care bestowed upon Hunt's other works in this institution: "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," "The Finding of the Saviour in the Temple," and "The Triumph of the Innocents."

THE recently published anthology of Canadian verse was, to say the truth, a somewhat weak and premature production; but real importance attaches to the forthcoming American anthology on which Mr. E. C. Stedman has long been at work. This anthology, we learn, will include the entire range of American poetry from 1787 to 1899, and opens with a full and carefully written introduction, which contains a survey of the entire course of American poetry, from its beginnings, in 1787, down to, and including, the closing years of the nineteenth century, with critical comments upon its successive phases. The book will contain short biographical notes on the authors quoted, which should add to the value and usefulness of the work.

THE Northern Counties Magazine is out at last. We like its neat grey covers and unpretentious mien. The price is sixpence. The contents are, of course, interesting chiefly to northerners, but Mr. A. Swinburne's verses, "Northumberland," make a wider appeal. We give ourselves the pleasure of quoting a few stanzas:

Between our eastward and our westward sea
The narrowing strand
Clasps close the noblest shore fame holds in fee
Even here where English birth seals all men free—
Northumberland.

O land beloved, where nought of legend's dream
Outshines the truth,
Where Joyous Gard, closed round with clouds that gleam
For them that know thee not, can scarce but seem Too sweet for sooth,

Thy sons forget not, nor shall fame forget,
The deed there done
Before the walls whose fabled fame is yet
A light too sweet and strong to rise and set
With moon and sun.

Song bright as flash of swords or oars that shine
Through fight or foam
Stirs yet the blood thou hast given thy sons like wine
To hail in each bright ballad hailed as thine
One heart, one home.

Our Collingwood, though Nelson be not ours,
By him shall stand
Immortal, till those waifs of old world hours,
Forgotten, leave uncrowned with bays and flowers
Northumberland.

Not yet is the Editor of the N. C. M., Mr. Howard Pease, represented by one of his racy Northumbrian stories, but Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe's tale, "Dead Lad's Rigg," is sufficient in that line. It is very difficult to see why Sir William Eden is permitted to write at large on "Aspects of Modern Art" in a magazine which should be all racy of the soil that bred it. The Editor's statement to contributors, "North-country subjects preferred," should protect him from the general productions of magazinedom. We have good articles on Elswick, Bewcastle Cross, &c., and a North Country Chronicle which at present fills two pages, but which we hope will expand into ten. Mr. Pease may be congratulated, but we hope he will give to his magazine that "idiosyncrasy all its own," which he claims that it must possess.

WE see with regret that the death is announced of Mr. W. E. Townsend, the brilliant young student-interpreter, whose account of the preparations made by the British Legation at Peking just before the siege made such fine reading in the Times. Mr. Walter Ewen Townsend, the author of this letter, died at Yokohama last Sunday. He was but twenty-one years of age, and passed only last year into the China Consular service. Young Townsend's letter to his friends at home was quite a model of unsophisticated writing—to use a phrase which, though a contradiction in terms, carries our meaning. He wrote, for example:

Great things are certainly in the air, and nobody knows what will happen next. I am so jolly glad that I got out here just when I did, or I would have missed all this fun. I am glad you sent me that revolver when you did—such things are greatly in demand just now, and it is always advisable to take one with you outside now. I lent it to Mrs. — last night and my shot gun to —, a fellow who happens to be up here, and had to arm myself with a beastly Government Martini. My post in case of attack is at a corner of the Legation wall, just outside my bedroom windows. I believe that all the ladies are to be sent off as soon as possible, which will be a relief, as we will then be able to enjoy ourselves freely without having to think of them. I bet some of them will kick like fun at having to go. We had an open-air service to-day in one of the big tinghrs, or arches, in the compound, and a jolly good sermon from Norris, one of the refugee missionaries.

A CEREMONY of some interest was performed the other day at Bath, when in continuation of the Corporation's scheme for marking the historic houses of the city Mr. W. Emerson, President of the Royal Institute of British Architects, unveiled upon houses in Gay-street and Queen-square tablets to the two Woods—father and son—whose combined genius did so much in imparting to modern Bath its architectural dignity. Among the buildings with which they enriched the city during the last century may be mentioned the Royal Crescent (immortalised by Dickens in Pickwick Papers as the scene of Mr. Winkle's midnight escapade with Mrs. Dowler), Queen-square, Gay-street, the famous Assembly Rooms, and the historic mansion of Prior Park on the outskirts of the city, which, during the lifetime of Ralph Allen, its founder, was the resort of the most famous men of letters and distinction of the day. The names of Pope, Mason, Hartley, Richardson, the painters Hoare and Gainsborough, Bishops Hurd, Sherlock, and Warburton, Lord Chatham and the younger Pitt, represent but a few of those who during the latter half of the last century were intimately associated with this classic spot, while Fielding was a regular guest when he lived near, and it is easy to recognise in Ralph Allen, the genial host, the Squire Allworthy in Tom Jones.

A VERY pleasing pocket edition of Cranford is now included in Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library." Mr. E. V. Lucas has supplied an introduction and many notes. In his introduction, which is an excellent blend of biography and criticism, Mr. Lucas disposes of certain doubtful analogies—and himself suggests a very sound one—between Cranford and other works of fiction. He says:

Lord Houghton, in estimating Mrs. Gaskell's work immediately after her death (in a brief notice in the Pall Mall Gazette), remarked of Cranford that it was "the purest piece of humoristic description that has been added to British literature since Charles Lamb"; but this was not very informing criticism. Some of the figures to which Elia gave life might have lived in the Cheshire town, it is true—Captain Jackson, in particular—but the association of Lamb with Mrs. Gaskell is confusing. They worked in different regions. Lamb sought for oddity in human nature; Mrs. Gaskell was far more interested in the norm. There is a writer now living who, if these parallels must be instituted, approaches the method of Cranford more nearly (without imitation or through conscious influence) than any predecessor of Mrs. Gaskell ever did. Those bibliophiles who practise the pleasant habit of ranging their books in sympathetic groups would find that Margaret Ogilvy falls into a place by Cranford very naturally and comfortably.

THE translation of Komensky's Labyrinth of the World, writes a correspondent, which Count Lütgen will probably have ready for the spring, ought to be an interesting book.

Komensky (better known under the Latin form of his name, Comenius) long enjoyed a European reputation for his attempt to give a scientific basis to education, but the Labyrinth, which was the imaginative and romantic work of his youth, is, in spite of a German translation, little known outside Bohemia. In Bohemia it is a national classic, and Komensky is a national hero. Every village has a "Komensky-street." He has been described as the Bunyan of Bohemia, but the Pilgrim's Progress and The Labyrinth of the World, except as regards their religious earnestness, are rather to be contrasted than compared. Komensky was in touch with a far wider world of knowledge than Bunyan's. For instance, he read everything which his great contemporary Bacon wrote. The Lütgen Chateau in Bohemia is only a few miles distant from the vast, lonely woods of Brandys, in which Komensky conceived the Labyrinth while he was hiding from his enemies.

In a recent issue we quoted a new Byron letter which was reproduced in facsimile by "C. K. S." in the Sphere. "C. K. S." now publishes a letter from Mr. Murray, who strongly suggests that this letter, which is now in the possession of Mr. Spencer, of Oxford-street, is a forgery. Mr. Murray says:

I dare say you are aware that a large number of letters were forged by a clever imitator of Byron's handwriting in the early part of the century.

This man also used to purchase books, write Byron's name in them, and make many marginal notes, &c.

Few men were better judges of Byroniana than my father, and even he was taken in once by these forgeries, and purchased a considerable number under the impression that they were genuine. He found out his mistake, and we have kept the books and papers as a warning and a standard to judge by.

I have copied out more of Byron's letters than any man now living, and may claim to have some knowledge of his handwriting. I am convinced that Mr. Spencer's letter is not genuine.

THE humours of examinations never pall, and we welcome a fresh batch, which Mr. E. M. Griffiths sends to the October Longman's under the title "A Study in School Jokes." Mr. Griffiths arranges his jokes under five heads. First, there are mistakes of spelling, multitudinous, and as a rule uninteresting, but yielding such treasures as:

The blood in the body is taken by means of tubs to the heart and there detained.

Stored in some trouser-house of mighty kings.

I came sore and conquered.

The second class is labelled "unsuccessful guessing." It gives us some amusing definitions:

Insulators are: 1. "Islanders." 2. "Machines used to freeze cream and other liquids to make ice." 3. "People who insult other people."

A buffer is: 1. "A thing that buffs." 2. "A hard blow." 3. "A wild animal." 4. "A kind of ox used to plough the fields in some countries."

And the following:

Q. "How did William I. put down the rebellions of the English?"

A. "He put them down in Domesday Book."

The third class is anachronisms, of which Mr. Griffiths remarks that "they show how difficult it is for the child-mind, 'moving about in worlds unrealised,' to grasp the idea that things were not always what they now are." Thus:

The priest of Midian reproved his daughter for not inviting Moses to come in to tea.

David bearded with the Witch of Endor.

When Moses' mother laid him in the ark among the bulrushes she did not forget to give the baby its bottle.

The next class of mistakes is one in which "the right idea . . . suffers some distortion when forced to clothe itself in the hard garb of black and white," as in these sentences:

A diplomat is some one who puts true things in a better light, which changes them and alters their sense.

Fiction is something which is believed in but which is nothing.

Lastly we have "howlers," pure and simple. Mr. Griffiths's collection includes these:

A watershed is a thing that when the soil in part of a river stands straight up on one side and slants tremendously the other side, the water is obliged to go up the soil on one side and come slanting down the other side—that is what they call a watershed.

About this time the Pope turned the bull out of the church.

Roman citizenship was a ship on which the Romans went out fishing free of charge.

The Revival of Learning. Colet came into France and was much surprised to see how the people were all raving on learning; they wanted to learn Greek, so that they could read some more about the ancient Britons.

We are very grateful to Mr. Griffiths, whose good things we have only skimmed.

THE technics of writing are always interesting. A correspondent, whose name must be familiar to all our readers, remarks to us in a private letter:

. . . In that connexion I want to tell you an odd thing which is no concern of yours, but which yet might interest you. I believe there's a sense missing in me. There I give you an opening for a smile anyhow. I read of the literary men whose work I most admire, that it is endlessly polished, pruned, and shapened after the first writing. I have often tried to do this sort of thing myself, but have failed signally. Each of my books, such as they are, I have written once, and once only, with hardly so much as a verbal alteration or amendment. . . . Is it not odd that I should be able to alter no word?

THE next Publishers' International Congress will be held at Leipsic in June of next year. The rights and interests of authors and publishers, as well as the technical questions of the trade, will be discussed. This will be the fourth meeting of the Association.

IN reference to Mr. Omond's paper on "The Art of R. L. Stevenson," which we noticed in these columns last week, Mr. R. Shuddick points out that, notwithstanding the pains which Stevenson took to be accurate, they were often unsuccessful. He holds that Stevenson's errors when dealing with the ordinary affairs of life are often "glaring":

Take, for example, The Wrong Box, written in collaboration with Mr. Osbourne. This work contains many situations arising out of actions that are altogether at variance with law and custom. Here are three:

(1) A box containing a gigantesque statue of Hercules is shipped from Italy to Southampton, from whence it is carried in the guard's van of a L. & S.W.R. train to Waterloo. In the same van is a water-butt containing the dead body of a man.

(2) Joseph Finsbury makes an assignment of his estate, but continues to draw cheques and bills, and receives payment for them across the bank counter.

(3) Finsbury is owing a sum of money to one Rodgers on running a/c. Before it falls due Rodgers assigns the debt to a Mr. Moss, who immediately calls on Finsbury and demands payment. Moss gets a cheque post-dated two months in settlement.

Rodgers says to Finsbury, when explaining the sale of the debt:

"Well, I got cent. for cent. for it, on the nail, in a certified cheque."

"Cent. for cent. for it," cried Morris (Finsbury). "Why, that's—nearly 30 per cent. bonus. A singular thing; who's the party?"

With regard to—(1) A large case ex-ship would be carried by goods and not by passenger train.

(2) When a debtor makes an assignment he hands over everything to the trustee under the deed, who collects and pays all accounts.

(3) No business man in the whole city of London would give a post-dated cheque for an account that was not due for payment, and no business man could clearly follow the dialogue that I've quoted. What Finsbury means by "30 per cent. bonus" is quite a mystery, speaking from a commercial standpoint.

THE death of the Elf ("dead ere his prime") is no sooner chronicled than we receive the prospectus of a new monthly to be called the Herb o' Grace, whose editors dwell at Fairseat, Wrotham, Kent. The Elf was edited at Peartree Cottage, Shorne, Gravesend, Kent. Ah, these pretty men of Kent! Their intentions are delightful, but their productions too often perish in London air. What room is there here for anything frail, delicate, or sweetly-serious? The guffaws of reading-contractors answer "None!" Still the Herb o' Grace will unfold its leaves with the New Year. Its first number is to be dated on "the first Sunday of the first month of the first year of the New Century," and it will "plead, in the whirl and haste of a too complicated hour, for some return to a simpler life." We have heard that pleading so often! If the editors can find sufficient readers to enjoy it (the "pleading" not the "return") they will be fortunate. We shall certainly look at the Herb o' Grace with interest. We are promised "new poems, essays, tales and scenes, reflections and appreciations, reminders of forgotten books, and sundry translations from the works of great thinkers." So welcome the Herb o' Grace to a grimy world!

ALSO there is to be a new weekly, the Onlooker, which is to keep an eye upon politics, science, literature, fashion, and the arts. Hope springs eternal.

Bibliographical.

THE work called Representative English Comedies, which is the product mainly of American hands, but which Messrs. Macmillan & Co. are to publish in this country, will be welcome to many. There is no other book, or series of books, in England, covering the same ground in precisely the same way. Of the five volumes of The British Drama issued in 1894 two were devoted to comedies which might fairly be called representative; but these volumes, of course, are out of print. Hundreds of English comedies are to be obtained in separate form, through either Mr. French or Mr. Dicks. For the student, however, there is at present no such help as Representative English Comedies should give him. There is much information and criticism on the subject in the English Dramatic Literature of Prof. Ward, and there is much sympathetic and illuminating comment in Hazlitt's Comic Writers; but of English comedy, as a whole, there has been, up to now, no systematic and critical history, with illustrative text, such as that which we are now told to look for shortly.

Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie, the American writer whose book on Shakespeare is to appear shortly, ought by this time to be tolerably well-known in this country. More than half-a-dozen volumes from his pen have been put into circulation over here. Copies of his My Study Fire were sent over in 1890, and in 1893 it found a London publisher—a second series appearing in 1894. In the same way, his Under the Trees and Elsewhere could be read in England in 1891, and was formally published here in 1894 also. The years 1892 and 1895 were respectively those of the informal and formal publication here of his Essays in Literary Interpretation; while in 1896 and 1898 his Books and Culture went through the same process. His Essays on Nature and Culture belong to 1898; and his The Life of the Spirit and Other Essays came out last year. All of these should form a useful introduction for the Shakespeare: Poet, Dramatist, and Man.

Mr. Charles G. Harper continues to illustrate with pen and pencil the beauties, curiosities, and associations of our great provincial highways. First came, in 1892, his volume on The Brighton Road; then, in 1895, came The Portsmouth Road and Its Tributaries, and, likewise, The Dorset Road: Annals of an Ancient Turnpike. In addition to these, Mr. Harper has given us From Paddington to Penzance: a Summer Tramp (1893), and The Marches of Wales: Severn See to the Sands o' Dee (1894). Now we are to have from him The Great Northern Road. Let us hope that Mr. Harper will not stop until he has dealt with all the great roads of the kingdom. He has made literary and pictorial topography a pleasant study.

A Don Quixote compressed and simplified for the use of youth—the thing does not, at first blush, seem attractive. The condensation might be pardoned, but why the simplification? Moreover, is Judge Parry, who has subjected Don Quixote to both processes, aware that the great classic has already been "adapted for young readers"? This publication appeared some eighteen years ago. About the same time came a selection from the Wit and Wisdom of Don Quixote; ten years later we were presented with a collection of Sancho Panza's proverbs; and four years ago Don Quixote positively gave its name to a Birthday Book! By this time "young readers" must have become tolerably well acquainted with it.

That we are to have the Collected Poems of T. E. Brown is good news, because it means that there will now be a chance of Brown's verse becoming known beyond the bounds of a limited circle. Brown published in succession Fo'e's'le Yarns (1881), The Doctor, and Other Poems (1887), The Manx Witch, and Other Poems (1889), and Old John, and Other Poems (1893); but by how many people, think you, are these volumes possessed? The Doctor was reprinted by itself in 1891 at half-a-crown: that may have introduced the author to some lovers of the Belles Lettres; and he had, of course, some sort of tribute paid to him in the Leviathan Poets and Poetry of the Nineteenth Century. The Collected Poems need not make a very bulky volume.

It would not be surprising if the promised Day-Book of John Stuart Blackie proved to be the most characteristic product of its author. The Professor published many books, but in none of them was there much of the quaintness and vigour of his public or private speech, in which he most revealed himself. Not even in his book on Self-Culture is there so much of the actual Blackie as was to be found always in his public discourse or his private talk. These were always fresh and racy. When he set to work on a book, Blackie became literary and ceased to be "a character."

I see that Bishop Boyd Carpenter is to give us a volume on The Religious Spirit of the Poets. It will be remembered that about twenty-five years ago Mr. Stopford Brooke produced a book on Theology in the English Poets. "Theology" and "religious spirit" are not precisely synonymous terms; but it will be interesting to note the respect in which the two works differ or agree in treatment.

Announcement is made in the publishers' lists of a volume of Miscellanies by Edward FitzGerald, and of some Stray Papers by Thackeray. I trust that both books are "official"—i.e., countenanced by the "friends of the parties." Usually "stray papers" are best left in the obscurity to which their author consigned them.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

T. E. B.

Letters of Thomas Edward Brown. Edited, with an Introductory Memoir, by Sidney T. Irwin. 2 vols. (A. Constable & Co. 12s.)

WHEN Mr. T. E. Brown died, in the autumn of 1897, we wrote :

His death removes from the slender ranks of modern poets the strongest, cleanest singer of them all. By the few who know and love his verses the loss will be deemed irreparable, so resolute and clear-sighted was he, so straightforward and joyous.

Speaking of him as a critic, we said :

He wrote little, but it was very good. His was the enthusiasm of the keen taster, who writes but seldom. The pity of it is that so many keen tasters have to write so much. He was moved to write by admiration of his subject ; and where criticism in the hands of a wise man has this impulsion, it can be the best reading in the world.

The two volumes of his Letters, which have been edited, with an introductory memoir (this might have been better done) by his friend, Mr. Sidney T. Irwin, are invigorating reading : they have pith and marrow, and they reveal a personality so vigorous, so human, so sympathetic, that this poet-schoolmaster takes his rightful place among the few, intimate, friends of the bookshelf.

Schoolmaster and clergyman, yet he was not a man of affairs : his external life was entirely uneventful. He was born in the Isle of Man in 1830 ; there the latter years of his life were spent ; there among his books, with the heather and the mountains at his door, and the kindly faces of the peasants greeting him on his daily rambles—there were centred his affections. Also he had his friends. For many years during the middle period of his life he held masterships at Gloucester and at Clifton College, but by inclination and practice he was poet and man of letters. He was not of those who repine and grumble at the tasks the world imposes. There was his own interior life to live—and he lived it nobly. Those were no idle words that at the age of sixty-three he wrote to an old Cliftonian :

My plan always was to recognise two lives as necessary—the one the outer kapelistic life of drudgery, the other the inner and cherished life of the spirit. It is true that the one has a tendency to kill the other, but it must not, and you must see that it does not.

To that “inner and cherished life of the spirit” his passion for Nature ministered royally ; while still at Clifton he had told in the stirring lyric called “Clifton” how the natural things stayed with him and stirred in his blood :

I'm here in Clifton, grinding at the mill
My feet for thrice nine barren years have trod,
But there are rocks and waves at Scarlett still,
And gorse runs riot in Glen Chass—thank God !

Pragmatic fibs surround my soul and bate it,
With measured phrase that asks the assenting nod ;
I rise, and say the bitter thing and hate it,
But Wordsworth's castle's still at Peel—thank God !

He was a man of simple tastes and habits ; a great walker (“I have had a very blessed ramble on Slieu Whallian. Seething, reintegrating, restering the moral balance, making me young and lusty as an eagle”) ; a musician ; a life-long learner of poetry by heart ; a preacher of sermons ; but, above all, he was a man of letters, with a fine, scholarly taste, and, rarer still, the gift of literary expression in a marked degree. His style is not for all, with its short, arresting sentences, its classical tags, its pepper of words that have fallen into desuetude, and its thought often packed tight as the cotton on a reel. But it was the man—the style of a lonely man, whose mind fed on itself and on the past, never on its contemporaries. And, like another, he liked the flick of a slang phrase on the top of an heroic period. Unlike Stevenson, however, he rarely, in his letters, analysed his craft or gossiped about the mechanics of it, for he was the amateur to the end. He was always himself ; he looked at books and life through his own eyes—and keen, penetrating eyes they were. It is this that gives such value to his views on books ancient and modern. He approaches a volume as if he were the first man to open the covers. His utterance was direct—“gleg at the uptak,” too, was he. We may not agree, for example, with his denunciation of Mr. Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles ; but his views on this, as on other matters, compel respect and attention. Tess moved him to an explosion of wrath not usual with him ; but in later letters he relents a little : “I don't see power in the book, but I do note considerable beauty in parts.”

I can only account for the latter part of Tess as a deliberate imitation of the cruelty and defiance of the common sentiment which I find so rampant in Maupassant. It is true the satire of this tremendous person is terrific, but so cold-blooded. By-the-bye, can satire be cold-blooded ? That is more like irony. Yes, he uses irony, but for the purposes of satire. Juvenal never cools down to this point of venomous, deadly sting, this cobra of horror. He gives vent to his sacra indignatio. Not so Maupassant : he never turns a hair, and on you go ! I think his Bel Ami one of the most brilliant and annihilating works. A very devil ! But, somewhere behind, there is a God, a God that hisses at his own creation, and spits upon the hurly-burly that has escaped from his hands.

He had his day of “my French hobby.” What could be better than this on Flaubert's Bouvard et Pécuchet ?

After all, do you think Bouvard et Pécuchet was his centre of gravity ? I fancy it was a marvellously happy tentamen in a new direction ; but I must consider the Bovary and the L'Education sentimentale the essential Flaubert. Casting about for the adequate expression, he made two great lives which were not in the line of his proper motion. One was Salammbo, the other Bouvard et Pécuchet. They are both magnificent, both quite at right angles to the true Flaubert who walks straight on in the absolutely real life of the Bovary. He amazes one with his Bouvard et Pécuchet. It is as if a dying man suddenly started up a convulsive athlete, a buffoon of the first rank, and he says, “There ! I can do that too ! You didn't expect it ! No ?” and a shrug and a shiver, and he falls dead.

His friends sent him the works of certain modern writers, and he spoke his mind freely—very freely on occasion. He thought The Prisoner of Zenda “ridiculous rubbish,” and he could speak of “the depth, the reach, the grip, the electric energy, the universal truth” of The Manxman. But when he liked a thing he said so with vigour. He never yawned. Hugo gripped him, and he dashed this off :

Victor Hugo ! I am one of the Hugo-maniacs, absolutely certain that there has been no poet like him since Shakespeare. It is very curious, is it not ? how absolutely certain we Hugonians feel about this. It seems to me quite amazing that it is not universally recognised. I know that I ought not to be amazed ; but I assure you that I am, most unfeignedly.

When he read Petrarch (Rime) “all through, the first time I ever did that,” he bounded into this :

Petrarch has sap in him. How all the generations have sucked the juice ! There can be no mistake about it. Hang the coffin ! apricos ucte flores : and let them be a garland for grey hairs, but not for death ! I believe in the art of medicine rather than in that of surgery as applied to the soul. We must have faith ; put into you good and gracious and salubrious things, and somehow or other they shall sweeten your blood, making it perfumed, ichorian. I could write a prescription. Recip. Petrarchi viii. &c. &c. . . . Cupiat. Fill it up as you will.

Daudet revealed the ambition of this enthusiast of sixty-three:

But I never tire of Daudet's Lettres de mon Moulin. You know the short story called "Les Vieux." Ah, that is exactly what I would fain write! Such a merest trifle, but such ineffable loveliness. Doubtless you have read it: you will at once recollect it, when I quote the phrase, "Bon jour braves gens! je suis l'ami de Maurice." The quality! the quality! Oh, do let us aim at that; it is everything. And to think that it should seem so casual, just a drop amongst a thousand others, when it is really the gutta serena or a priceless pearl that doesn't drop at all. These things delight me, but they also depress me. They don't perplex me at all. I quite see how natural it is for certain minds to energise in this way: but then I can't; and that is settled for ever, and probably was settled some fifty years ago. In your case, it is not settled. Strive, strive to enter in at the strait gate! Even I (madman that I am!) have not yet given up all endeavour, utterly as I have abandoned hope. The endeavour is to write one poor story of about five, nor more than ten pages, that the world will not willingly let die. What say you? Shall we go in for this? Shall we get the little bit of canvas, and stretch it on an easel that shall be slender as les fils de la bonne Vierge, but strong as adamant?

Weir of Hermiston caught his enthusiasm at the flood:

Weir of Hermiston I take to be the most consummate thing that has been written for many years. Don't you agree with me? THAT WOMAN—not Mrs. Weir, though she is marvellously good, but the humble relative who occupies the place of chief and confidential servant!!! No one but a Scot can enter into this character. That I am able so thoroughly to feel it, I consider the strongest proof of my Scottish origin. Such a woman! And yet they said Stevenson couldn't draw a woman. And the passion of love—yes, love; yes, passion—the positive quasi-sexual (or shall I drop the quasi?) longing for the young Hermiston. Good God! what depth! what truth! what purity! what nobility! If the century runs out upon this fugal chord, what more do I want? Let me die with the sigh of it in my ears. It is enough: nunc dimittis, Domine. You will go on to other joys: the coming century will bring them to you. But to me—well, well, all right. In heaven I will bless you, Louis Stevenson.

But modern books were only the sweets of Brown's literary menu. He read the classics as most of us read the newspapers, day by day, browsing on a volume when he had a spare hour. One day it is the Orlando Furioso—"Have you read it? I think the hard enamel of this Italian reprobate pleases me better than Spenser with his soft velvet carpet, on which you walk ankle-deep in the mass of yielding allegory"; another day it is Swift—"The hearty cursing in his Tale of a Tub goes straight to my midriff—so satisfying, the best of tonics"; then Aristophanes—"He has got hold of me. I am reading the Birds. It is simply a portent of vigour and health"; then Dante—"I am at him for the whath (!) time. Few joys are to be compared with this"—and so on, and so on. The years never brought satiety or dulled the palate of this ardent bookman.

But T. E. B. was much more than a bookman. He was a poet—some know that well—and he had the seeing eye and the quick comprehension, the heritage of the few. He could phrase an impression or sketch in a character with the best. His letters are full of such memorabilia. And if they seem more vivid than most prose, remember it was a poet who wrote them. It was a poet who wrote this from Italy:

A girl on the Como boat (Whitsun Monday, festa folk) was a marvel of physical beauty. With her was her lover, not handsome, and a goose. But who would not have been a goose for such a face? Still, of tenderness not one suggestion—all fire, and not celestial fire either. Ah, goose! goose! poor singed goose! onion-stuffed perchance! what fate will be his with that splendid salamander?

An awful climate, isn't it?

A terrible soil that seems to throw out these human pomegranate blooms in a moment. She looked as if she had just been born—bless her—and her goose! nay, a goose must take care of himself. Very different from this fire angel, flame-winged, literally burning coal of beauty, with her pretensions, her mantilla, her ready, prompt meeting of all eyes, was an absolutely celestial creature, that I met the other day, bearing her big basket, containing manure (I think). This girl smiled at me, a distinct good sweet smile—now is it not marvellous? At me. Just like a flower—she saw me before her, no other man—and it was necessary to smile. Derision? Good God! no: like the flowers, Duft, pollen—you know about those things; a natural and most wholesome and lovable expansion. The eyes were of a colour which I cannot determine, and I like such eyes; the fact is, they look at you, they melt down through the whole gamut of colour and leave off with a tongue of the softer fire.

He could paint a scene with a few brush marks. Here is a picture of a congregation from the preacher's point of view:

The church bursting with fire and bright faces: entering at the west door, it looked like a tunnel of flame. The churchyard too was full, a curiously eager "company of witnesses" glowering in upon me. I don't know how to describe it, except by saying that it gave one the idea of a Cyclopaean spiritual smithy, of which I myself was the smith, and the good old parson the bellows-blower. Out flew the sparks, and these blessed old Kelts caught them in their fine raptured faces as children do looking in upon the smitten anvil.

We hope we have said enough to send readers to these stimulating volumes, a purpose which can best be served by quoting from them freely, as we have done. In these times of upheavals, whirling views, chameleon opinions, and counsels of despair, the life of such a man is a beacon: his thought was clear, wholesome, virile, and joyous; he accepted his temperament with a cheer; and he valued above all things nature, books, his friends, and his soul's freedom. He knew himself, and his philosophy stood the test of years. A while before his death he wrote:

In my life I have been so much alone, it cannot be helped. Where is the comrade? I never had one. The absolute self is far within, and no one can reach it. I will not cant, but God reaches it, and He only. I used to envy the surface people, obviously happy, and in their happiness all there, so to speak, the full complete presence of one being to another—no, it is not for men of a certain temperament. Yet we love candour, sincerity, thoroughness, and would fain saturate ourselves with free communication. Poor old Emerson and his over and under soul, he was not far wrong. His friend Carlyle broke down the division habitually—smashed the two souls into one great smudge of discontent. I would not do this. Keep them both going separately. A strong man has strength enough to do this, and all his surroundings benefit thereby. Moreover, in a sweet ancillary way they reflect upon us their sunshine.

An Acting Play.

Savonarola: a Drama. By W. J. Dawson. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

MR. DAWSON, in remarking that he intends this drama as "an acting play," states that "the great figure of Savonarola is one of the most dramatic in history." It may be so; but Mr. Dawson could scarcely have chosen a great figure the incidents of whose career were less suited for theatrical representation. Doubtless the author was captivated by the spiritual intensity, the Apocalyptic flamboyance, the almost hysterical enthusiasm of Savonarola; and it is, of course, very satisfactory to find an author seriously attacking so high and so difficult a theme. Nevertheless Mr. Dawson, who would appear to be quite inexperienced in the technique of the theatre, has been victimised, artistically, by his admiration for the Patriot, Reformer, and Ascetic. And, moreover, from a chance word which he lets fall, we imagine that his attitude towards the stage is somewhat peculiar, for a dramatist. He writes: "I cannot doubt that in the hands of an efficient actor the character of Savonarola might be interpreted after a fashion that should fulfil the best canons of art without in the slightest degree transgressing against the reverence due to the religious aims of Savonarola's career." We seem to catch in that phrase some echo of the polemics of the County Council Licensing Session.

Mr. Dawson's drama is in prose and blank verse, and in four acts; so far as we can discover, it extends over a period of about a quarter of a century, though on the face of it only nine years are accounted for. Feeling instinctively that his theme was lacking in suitable material, Mr. Dawson has provided Savonarola with a love affair. In the first act we find the hero profoundly enamoured of Felice Strozzi, but ignominiously refused by the lady's father. Felice fruitlessly haunts the play to the end, "in a nun's garb." We do not object to a reasonable exercise of the dramatist's licence, but we think that Mr. Dawson has gone much too far in making this disappointment in love the mainspring of Savonarola's religious career. Immediately after his interview with Strozzi, Savonarola talks with his mother:

SAVONAROLA.

[Rising from the lute.] Yes, mother, you are right. We are about to part. All the world has come to an end with me to-day.

HELENA.

Why, what has happened? You went out happy this morning?

SAVONAROLA.

This morning is a long time ago. Mother, have you ever seen the storm-cloud in the Apennines? One moment all is bright, and the next a great black curtain falls over the world, and the thunder calls like a threatening voice among the hills. So the storm-cloud has come upon me. I am alone in the impenetrable darkness. There is a narrow path beneath my feet; it leads up and up, past the Calvary upon the hill, past all the tall crosses on which the pale Christ watches me; up, I know not whither; and yet I know that I must follow this road to the end.

Men of Savonarola's stamp must surely be urged towards their destinies by something more cogent than the inability to obtain a father-in-law.

Mr. Dawson has made fairly good use of the interview between Savonarola and the dying Lorenzo the Magnificent (narrated by Pico de Mirandola, but scarcely a "matter of history"); and the first scene of Act IV., where Savonarola masters a dangerous mob by his eloquence, combined with the happy intervention of a thunder-storm, is also neatly and effectively contrived. We will quote the climax of his speech:

See, the sky is dark,
Already thunder moans along the hills—
Ah, there the lightning flasht—the sword of God!
Thunder of God, behold I challenge thee!
If I have wrought unjustly, if by word
Or deed against this people I have sinned,
Let God's wrath fall upon me in one flame,
Let His bolt smite me, riving me in twain,
As it doth rive the too presumptuous oak
That crowns some proud and heaven-daring hill!

[The thunder rolls louder. The people groan.
Hark, how the brazen wheels of God resound
Along the roads of heaven! He draweth nigh,
Dreadful in power, many-charioted,
With all the thousand thousand of His saints.

[A blaze of lightning.
Now shall the doors eternal be lift up!
As in the far-off Apennines there bursts
The winter-flood, even so the mighty wave,
Crested with tossing helms and wheeling swords
Of angel and archangel, rank on rank
Rolled endless, fills the heavens, and earth dismayed
Shudders with fear thro' all her heart immense.

[A burst of thunder.

That is Mr. Dawson at his best. The remainder of the play is too slight and too episodic. Indeed, scarcely anywhere does the author show a real aptitude for drama. His blank verse is never more than respectable, and his prose has even less distinction. Phrases like "You do but jest," "It cannot be," "Bandy no words with me," "Sir Scholar," "Sir Poet," are utterly effete at this time of day, and when they are juxtaposed with locutions such as "I don't half like it" and "Not in my line," the resulting effect is rather bizarre. Still, to publish a play requires pluck. Mr. Dawson has that.

Wales at Large.

The Welsh People. By John Rhys, M.A., and David Brynmor-Jones, LL.B. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS valuable study, strong alike on the side of actuality and on that of erudition, is an outcome of the Welsh Land Commission. It is a more solid outcome than many Royal Commissions find. The authors were themselves Commissioners, and they conceived the happy idea of working up the historical sections of the Report for which they were primarily responsible into a form at once more popular and more permanent than that of a Blue Book. These sections, together with a valuable chapter on the history of land tenure in Wales, also contributed to the Report by Mr. Frederic Seebohm, LL.D., are the nucleus of the present volume. But they have been considerably altered; much new matter has been added; and the authority of the book is now personal rather than official.

The first three chapters deal mainly with the question of ethnology, and for the treatment of this subject it may be assumed that Prof. Rhys is chiefly responsible. The theory of a pre-Aryan population of these islands, to which he has previously committed himself, is argued at considerable length, and with great learning. On the philological side, at least, it is a most exhaustive statement of the case. The earliest Aryan-speaking dwellers in Britain were undeniably Celts. And of Celtic immigration two successive waves can be traced. The first was probably determined by the great Celtic movements on the Continent during the sixth and fifth centuries B.C. It brought a flood of Celts belonging to the Goidelic branch of the race. The Goidels are sometimes known as Q-Celts, from the fact that in their language, represented by modern Irish and Gaelic, a Qu sound, which another branch labialised, or turned into a P sound, still survived. The second immigration may be dated in about the second century B.C. It consisted of Brythonic or P-Celts. The Brythons drove the Goidels, probably the more civilised, but far less warlike, people, westwards, into Ireland and the rocky fastnesses of North and South Wales. A wedge of Brythons drove itself through Central Wales to the sea, and some tribes even crossed the Irish Channel. Then began, both in Ireland and Wales, a linguistic struggle between the Goidelic and Brythonic dialects. In Ireland the few Brythonic settlers were linguistically submerged, and learnt to speak Irish. In Wales, on the other hand, the Goidelic tongue continued, up to a comparatively recent date, to hold its own in North and South Wales, side by side with the Brythonic Welsh of Central Wales, to which at last it had to give place. It is on the differences between these two branches of the Celtic speech that Prof. Rhys founds his theory of a pre-Aryan population. Goidelic, he believes, is an Aryan tongue, considerably modified, but more in syntax than in vocabulary, by contact with a non-Aryan people. This people he considers to have been a race of aborigines whom the Goidels found here, and with whom they had practically merged during the centuries that intervened before the Brythonic immigration. The Brythons are, therefore, for him pure Aryan Celts, the Goidels a race mixed both as to blood and speech, of which the constituent elements are partly Aryan Celtic and partly non-Aryan. He also thinks that some of the non-Aryan inhabitants survived in Scotland in an un-Celticised state, and that in these are to be found the Piets of history. With the assistance of a careful linguistic essay by Mr. J. Morris Jones, he attempts to show, further, that the non-Aryan tongue which influenced Goidelic was probably one having affinities to Berber, Egyptian, Basque, a group of tongues belonging to the Mediterranean basin. All this philological matter seems to us exceedingly well argued, and a real contribution to one of the vexed questions of European anthropology. We are a little less satisfied with a subsidiary line of argument, in which Prof. Rhys attempts to find the non-Aryan element in some fragments of Goidelic mythology and personal nomenclature, which seem to point to an old custom of reckoning kinship through the mother and not through the father. For, as Mr. Lang pointed out in his recent History of Scotland, it is by no means so certain as Prof. Rhys assumes it to be that kinship through the mother is not a stage through which the Aryan peoples themselves passed. On the other hand, Prof. Rhys might have considerably strengthened his position by correlating his philological results with those arrived at on other than philological grounds by many contemporary anthropologists. He makes no use, for instance, of the evidence from craniology, or of that afforded by the existence of two well-marked physical types in the Celtic-speaking districts of to-day. The small dark Celt and the tall blonde, or, perhaps, more frequently red, Celt surely point in their juxtaposition to a double ancestry. One can hardly hesitate to identify Prof. Rhys's pre-Aryan or Pictish folk with the Homo meridionalis of anthropology, the slight dark man who dwelt on both sides of the Mediterranean and throughout Western Europe in the neolithic age; whose bones fill the "long barrows" of this country; who developed the Aegean and early Italian civilisations; whose speech has been already conjectured to survive in Basque and Berber; and who, though he has learnt the Aryan tongues from the blonde invaders of the North, still forms the substratum of all the populations of Southern Europe.

If the earlier chapters of The Welsh People are principally of interest to the philologist and the ethnologist, those that follow appeal to a more varied class of readers. They include an outline of Welsh history from the beginning of things to the present day, a picture of Welsh civilisation as it stood in the twelfth century, just before the conquest by Edward I., Mr. Seebohm's essay on Welsh land tenure already referred to, and a series of closing monographs on "The Religious Movement," "The Educational Movement," "Language and Literature" and "Rural Wales at the Present Day." The last chapter, in particular, is full of the most interesting details of farm life gathered together from the statements made by witnesses before the Land Commission. Wales is a poor country, and the living even of the farmers is described by witness after witness as very hard. "There are many farmers who cannot afford to get a piece of fresh meat once a year," says one: and another, speaking rather of his childhood than of the present day:

For dinner you will see a small farmer have half a salt herring (very poor food for a working man): his wife and family must content themselves with butter-milk and potatoes, or, perhaps, after the farmer has finished his part herring there will be a scramble amongst the youngsters for the bones to suck as a treat. They sometimes have a little skim-milk cheese with oaten bread, some, better off than others, bacon.

Things have, however, improved, if it is improvement, in this respect, and there are farms where the unmarried hands "insist on meat and tarts and pudding at dinner." Characteristic Welsh dishes are pieus mabi or "shot," a compound of bruised oatmeal cake and butter-milk, flummary, made of oatmeal soaked to sourness, and sucan, which is much the same as flummary. Welsh dress has long been assimilated to that of England. The high-crowned hat of the Welsh peasant woman some half a century ago was but a survival of a type of headgear familiar in the England of the Stuarts. The suggestion is made that originally the Brythons wore bracae or "breeches," and the Goidels a short apron or kilt like that of the Highland clansmen. Such a garment is displayed by figures on sculptured Welsh stones, apparently of Goidelic origin, and it was known to the primitive Goidels of Ireland as well as those of Scotland. Some mediæval sketches of Welsh soldiers show them, singularly enough, with only one shoe, worn on the left foot. The authors think that a modern Welsh woman, in the quarry districts, dresses with "a natural taste, a sense of colour and proportion which may be sometimes looked for in vain in ladies of a higher position in life in England." This is very possible. As in mediæval Europe generally, and in the Verona of "Romeo and Juliet" in particular, courtship is largely carried on by night. The Welsh name for the custom is cnocio or streicio. The lover taps at his mistress's window, and, if he pleases her, is admitted into the house, where the pair sit up together. There is a similar usage in other parts of England, and it seems to be universal among the Boers of South Africa.

Mark's New Way.

The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, &c. By Mark Twain. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

MARK TWAIN, censor and critic, is rapidly taking the place of Mark Twain, fun-maker. But the change need not be deplored, for the new Mark Twain—the Mark Twain of this book in particular—is not a whit less readable than the old, and he is more provocative of thought. And perhaps more than ever is the term humorist applicable; but now meaning one who smilingly understands his kind, rather than of one who merely makes them laugh. But we do not think that it is a good book, all the same, because, like most of Mark Twain's work, it is shapeless and very unequal. Cheek by jowl with such an excellent satire as the title story and such an admirable piece of self-revelation as "My Military Campaign," a valuable reminiscence of the American Civil War fever and its effect on some minds, we have a handful of fugitive scraps from the magazines, little bits of articles not worth reprinting. But Mark Twain is too old an offender in this way for us to scold him now: he has always thrown his wares with both hands, and, after all, there is such a largeness about the man, such a fine, honest independence and so vivid an interest in human nature, that it really matters very little that the gift of self-criticism was, to a large extent, denied him. So much remains to take its place.

The best things in the book we have named. After these the most interesting contributions are the inquiries into Christian Science and into the present state of the Jews. Mark Twain, though he disapproves of Mrs. Eddy with gusto, is yet forced to believe in the future of her creed and, to a large extent, in its efficacy. From "Concerning the Jews" we may quote one passage. "What has become of the Golden Rule?" some one asked Mark Twain, referring to the persecution of the Jews. This is the answer:

It exists, it continues to sparkle, and is well taken care of. It is Exhibit A in the Church's assets, and we pull it out every Sunday and give it an airing. But you are not permitted to try to smuggle it into this discussion, where it is irrelevant and would not feel at home. It is strictly religious furniture, like an acolyte, or a contribution-plate, or any of those things. It has never been intruded into business; and Jewish persecution is not a religious passion, it is a business passion.

Mark Twain, now that he has given up purely funny yarns, remains as the one man (barring Mr. Dooley) who is encouraged or permitted to say things like this. It is well that someone is on hand to do so.

But Mark Twain has a little of the old frivolity left. In this work will be found a pretty piece of fooling called "The Esquimaux Maiden's Romance," a satirical sidelight on the relativeness of wealth; a monstrous invention concerning Millet, the painter of "The Angelus"; and a most diverting translation into literal English of a French translation of "The Jumping Frog."

One grumbling word: it is time that Mark Twain gave the humours of lying a rest. In future let human nature's incapacity or unwillingness to tell the truth be taken as read: we are a little tired of jokes on so threadbare a topic.

Other New Books.

JOHN RUSKIN:

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

BY R. ED. PENGELLY.

THIS little volume is not a rival to that of Mrs. Meynell. Mr. Pengelly does not trouble himself with the inwardness of Ruskin's writings, with the correctness of his æsthetic standpoint, with the philosophical and social ideals implicit or explicit in his work, with the permanent value of his studies in the cause and cure of civilisation. But he has compiled, from Fors Clavigera, from Præterita, and from Mr. Collingwood's biography, a gossipy record of the external circumstances of Ruskin's life, which may possibly find its audience among those who prefer gossip about great men to their works. Mr. Pengelly's original contribution to his subject consists of a few extracts from unpublished letters, apparently written to Mr. Henry Jowett, a member of the firm of Messrs. Hazell, Watson & Viney, who were Ruskin's printers. They are of no very great account, but not uncharacteristic. In one Ruskin complains of "the bestial egoism of the public," who would write to him on business that was not his. Another is a rather pathetic record of distressing infirmities gallantly borne:

MY DEAR J—,—I am getting under sail again—steadily—the chief harm remaining is a sprained wrist, got in fighting one of my men nurses: if the doctor only had had the common sense to get some women nurses, I should have been as quiet as a baby—quieter than most babies I know. But it hurts me in writing still badly. I had the satisfaction of leaving all my keepers rather dilapidated—but it was the worst illness I've had for the pain and sorrow of its fancies.—Ever affectionately yours,
J. R.

On Ruskin's Oxford career Mr. Pengelly rather oddly comments. "Senior Wrangler he knew he could never be; but he felt that he could write poetry, and he meant to achieve what he had set out to do." Naturally Ruskin could never be Senior Wrangler—at Oxford! (Melrose.)

HANDBOOK TO CHRISTIAN AND ECCLESIASTICAL ROME.

BY M. A. R. TUKER AND HOPE MALLESON.

Two parts of this handbook, dealing respectively with "The Christian Monuments in Rome" and "The Liturgy in Rome," have already appeared. The present, and final, instalment, covering "Monasticism in Rome" and "Ecclesiastical Rome," completes the work. Alike to the mere tourist, who desires to be able readily to identify the hundred and eight religious costumes which meet him in the streets of Rome, and to the student puzzled by the intricate ceremonial of the Vatican, or the elaborate divisions and sub-divisions of the great Orders, it may be highly commended. The arrangement is lucid, and the learning is real and based upon the best authorities. In particular, the account of the rise and growth of monasticism is an excellent sketch, quite free from the triteness of an ordinary guide-book. There are some good illustrations, including a score of the more important religious habits, plans of the Vatican and of a typical Carthusian cell, the arms of the Popes, and so forth. Under the head of "Monasticism" the authors give details of the history, costume, and way of life of the various orders of monks, friars, canons, sisters of charity, and clerks regular. Under that of "Ecclesiastical Rome" they describe the organisation of the Vatican and the functions and privileges of the Pope, the Cardinals, and the various ecclesiastical orders. A full account of the Sistine chapel, the library, and the other buildings of the Vatican is included. (Black.)

COLERIDGE'S THE RIME OF THE ANCIENT MARINER.

ILLUSTRATED BY HERBERT COLE.

The critic's business with this presentation of Coleridge's Ancient Mariner is with the illustrations, these being the only addition to the text. We do not think that Mr. Cole's efforts are wholly successful, but then he has essayed a most difficult task. The more important illustrations are etchings, and these are cleanly pieces of work. As interpretations, the Ancient Mariner stopping "one of three," in the frontispiece, seems to us to lack power; he suggests a poor old man desperately demanding a shilling. It surprises us, too, that Mr. Cole elected to illustrate the line, "He holds him with his skinny hand," instead of the line in the next verse, "He holds him with his glittering eye." This surely was the moment to seize; on the power of his eye depended the Ancient Mariner's audience. But Mr. Cole's efforts are obviously careful, and in his etching of Death and the woman playing dice on the spectreship Coleridge's weird imagination seems really to find the assistance of art. The book is very elegantly produced. (Gay & Bird.)

WILD SPORTS OF BURMA AND ASSAM.

BY COLONEL POLLOK AND
W. S. THOM.

Colonel Pollok was the pioneer of big game shooting in Lower Burma, and what he did for Lower Burma was done for Upper by Mr. Thom. Both were busy men, Colonel Pollok being of the Staff Corps, Mr. Thom Assistant District Superintendent of Police; but with that characteristic passion for dangerous sport which Englishmen carry with them, all over the world, as part of their necessary outfit, they succeeded in finding time for an enormous amount of slaying. The spirit of these records, which consist mainly of extracts from diaries, is admirably simple and free, and there is nowhere the smallest attempt either at fine writing or blood-curdling adornment. We have bare statements of facts, no more; there are thrills in plenty, but these are not produced by the art of the writers. It is a compliment to them to say that they have no art of the pen; theirs was the art of resource, of wire nerves, of the steady eye:

I was not twenty-one years old [says Colonel Pollok] when I went to Burma: I possessed the constitution of a buffalo, I had private means of my own, and drew exceptionally good pay from Government, and I was, to all intents and purposes, my own master.

With this happy equipment Colonel Pollok began his career as a big game sportsman, shooting, as a rule, from elephants, which the nature of the country made necessary. The range of sport in Lower Burma is unusually wide; there are tigers, leopards and panthers, the buffalo, rhinoceros, gaur, gayal, and tsine; of the deer tribe some half dozen varieties. Of the rhinoceros Colonel Pollok states that in Assam forty-four fell to his own gun, and that he lost, wounded, as many as he killed. In Upper Burma Mr. Thom was responsible for twenty-two elephants. It is interesting to note that Colonel Pollok altogether discredits the legend that man-eating tigers are old and mangy brutes who take to homicide when they are unable to pull down game or cattle; his experience is that they are often young, sleek, and particularly vicious. There is, we believe, a theory which seeks to account for the manginess on the score of the deleteriousness of human flesh on the tiger's constitution; but this would not manifest itself until the brute had taken a long course of his unholy diet.

There could hardly be a better guide, to those who contemplate a year or two's big game shooting, than this book. The sportsman in Upper and Lower Burma and Assam will find a glut of game hardly, now, to be found elsewhere, and the climate is by no means deadly to men who take reasonable care of themselves. Mr. Thom gives an exhaustive summary of a complete outfit, from servants to meat-saws, from coffee-extract to "battery." So equipped, and with a pliant banking account, let the keen sportsman take ship for Rangoon and thence sail up the Irrawady to Mandalay. (Hurst & Blackett. 16s. net.)

ALTDORFER.

BY P. STURGE MOORE.

This study of the "Little Albrecht" is sympathetic and well informed, though somewhat rambling in manner and marred by digressions. In a volume where narrowness of space should suggest compression we could very well spare such a question as this: "And now can we not reform this demand, that art should seek to improve, by saying that art seeks to reveal beauty, and that contemplation of beauty exhilarates, refines, and elevates?" Of course, one of the objects of art is to reveal beauty; we are not aware that it has ever been seriously disputed. It is as though one should ask, May we not say that bread is intended for food?

Altdorfer was born towards the end of the fifteenth century, probably about 1480, and was registered a burgher of Ratisbon in 1505. His life was lived during a period of noble traditions in art, and his career was happy and successful. Burgher patrons, rich and complacent, swarmed in Ratisbon. Altdorfer's work was wonderfully fresh and buoyant, but we are not quite convinced that it was truly great: its occasional dignity of conception appears fortuitous, almost, one might say, an accident of his theme rather than an essential radiating to its utmost limits. But Altdorfer has his place, and that no low one, in the roll of artists who wrought faithfully and with a sense of beauty serenely confident. (Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

LORD ELGIN'S
SECOND EMBASSY TO CHINA
IN 1860.

BY THE LATE
HENRY BROUGHAM LOCH
(LORD LOCH).

There is a terrible vitality in the story of human suffering, and it is not surprising that Lord Loch's account of his detention in a Chinese criminal prison should have brought the "personal narrative" containing it into the third edition. An advertisement of the first edition appears, by the way, in the third number of the ACADEMY. Lord Loch's work was held, at the time it came out, to afford excellent evidence of the Abbé Huc's representation of Chinese character and manners. It will be remembered that Mr. Loch (as he then was) was taken prisoner in violation of a flag of truce and incarcerated in a gaol in Peking. It was a fearful experience. He had been so tightly bound that on his arrival at the gaol he had lost all sensation in his left hand, and he probably owed the reanimation of the member to a hair of the dog that bit him.

Just as they were about to clasp the irons on my wrist they observed the ring on my finger. . . . It excited the cupidity of one of the gaolers, who, finding in the then swollen state of my hand that it could not be got off, rubbed and sucked my finger in his mouth, munching it gently with his teeth until it was sufficiently softened to get the ring off.

Thus the circulation was restored.

Among its sad traditions the Times can have none sadder than the death of its correspondent Bowlby, who perished in a manner too horrible to set forth here, through his excessive zeal for their readers.

At this date it is not perhaps unfair to suggest that, since the cause of Lord Elgin's second embassy was practically the violation of the treaty of Tien-Tsin in 1858, it was scarcely logical of the authorities to allow Mr. Loch, Mr. Parkes, and their comrades to put their heads into the jaws of a dragon thus proved untrustworthy.

For the rest, this narrative throws into relief the curious irresponsibility of the Chinese. They will kick a prisoner one moment and politely put his hat on his head the next. They will load him with chains and thrust him in an insect-infested den, and then, if he asks for water, they give him a nice cup of tea. They are experts alike in the superciliousness of the Southern planter of the slave-days and the grovelling humility of a convicted Monmouth. They vacillate through fear until they itch with evil intentions. They lie because they believe that to lie is functional. Lord Loch believed in their capacity for "great things if wisely governed"—so his widow tells us. One is tempted to believe he was sorry to see them taught wisdom by the destruction of a palace such as the Yuen-Ming-Yuen, and one fails to understand how they could have learned anything but injustice by the conduct of the Allies at Peh-tang, where the inhabitants were ejected from their homes, with the consequence of "an immense amount of suffering."

The moral of the book is obvious—no European should allow himself to be "bottled up" in Chinese China. Chinese promises are Chinese—which is a drawback. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

Fiction.

The Soft Side. By Henry James.
(Methuen. 6s.)

MR. JAMES'S later manner is more difficult than his earlier, and there are critics in a hurry who find in this a symptom of sheer perversity. But they err—these critics err; rather, to be precise, they intrude. Because such stories are not written for them. First they are written for Mr. James; incidentally a few friends are invited to enjoy them—patient, alert spirits, full of faith. For it is not at the first excursion that you reap the reward of your—yes—labour. The landscape at first view is about as intelligible as to the wandering cockney is one of Turner's water-colour sketches. Too often "she wonderfully answered," "she magnificently said," is the handle of a remark at which we can but glare in vain for a hint of what we have magnificently missed. There are moments when you are tempted to doubt whether perhaps it is not just a game of bluff that the Master is unworthily playing—whether in particular this and that upon which you lay a denunciatory finger does not in fact mean just nothing at all. But if you hang on to it like grim death, as one of Mrs. James's astonishing ladies might say, queer lines and scratches and splashes do focus themselves into a picture. Line by line, interjection by interjection the dialogue comes to life; and just beyond the plane of the print real people suffer and act. And what a queer lot they are! So like the people one knows, yet so altogether different—more definite, more real! And their strange mixed jargon that is neither slang nor literature, but partakes of the qualities of both—the freshness of the one, the felicity of the other.

With regard to the dozen of tales contained in this volume we are unable to say what it is in virtue of their having precisely in common their author has invented for the book the title it bears. Some figure there must be in the carpet, but we decline to commit ourselves to a description of it. Individually "The Great Condition" takes one back to earlier days and "The Siege of London"; so, a little, does "Miss Gunton of Poughkeepsie." "The Given Case" is in manner contemporary with The Awkward Age. "Maud-Evelyn" is of the Two Magies stamp; so is "The Real Right Thing." "John Delavoy" is a singular picture of the perfect magazine-maker: "There was not a thing in the world—with a single exception, on which I shall presently touch—that he valued for itself, and not a scrap he knew about anything save whether or no it would do. To 'do' with Mr. Bostern was to do for The Cynosure. The wonder was that he could know that of things of which he knew nothing else whatever." The restfullest story in the world is "The Great Good Place"; life, as you read it, is tepid and pale-green. It is the creation, by reflex activity, of a brain harassed by the recurring obligation to unloose with tired fingers the little, tight, hard knots of the meshes of professional and social duty:

Oh, the deep, deep bath, the soft cool plash in the stillness!—this, time after time, as if under regular treatment a sublimated German "cure" was the vivid name for his luxury. The inner life woke up again, and it was the inner life, for people of his generation, victims of the modern madness, mere maniacal extension and motion, that was returning health. He had talked of independence and written of it, but what a cold, flat word it had been! This was the wordless fact itself—the uncontested possession of the long, sweet, stupid day. . . . Slowly and blissfully he read into the general wealth of his comfort all the particular absences of which it was composed. One by one he touched, as it were, all the things it was such rapture to be without.

"The Tree of Knowledge" tells of a sculptor who can't, and a loving circle that sacrifices itself to maintain his delusion that he can. The other stories are "The Abasement of the Northmores," "Europe," "Paste." The first treats of the posthumous Nemesis that made merry with the reputation of a pompous Success. "Europe" we are not sure that we have mastered. As to "Paste," if Mr. James had not thought it good to do, we should have doubted whether it was intrinsically worth while. Being done, it becomes its own justification.

The Courtesy Dame. By R. Murray Gilchrist.
(William Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. GILCHRIST'S present fame is that of a short story-writer. If we except The Rue Bargain, which was a novelette in dimensions, the whole of his best work is comprised in some fifty short stories. Now he comes forward with a proper novel. It was decidedly an adventure on his part to write a novel, for his aptitude for the short-story form is so plain that it might well have excluded an aptitude for any other form. The adventure, however, is a success. Considered as a technical achievement, The Courtesy Dame shows few flaws or shortcomings. It is admirably constructed, well wrought, and thoroughly homogeneous. Mr. Gilchrist's theatre is again the Peak district of Derbyshire, but the characters are less simply rustic than he has accustomed us to. In the beginning of the book Lord Bostern, that ailing, but fiercely masculine, peer, puts up at an inn on his travels, and rescues therefrom a beautiful scullery-wench, Anne Witchett. This girl with the singularly pretty name becomes the heroine of the tale. Lord Bostern takes her on the European tour, and arranges her education. She returns with him to his Peakland home, and quite excusably the neighbourhood calls her the courtesy dame; the Bosterns had been addicted to courtesy dames. The relations of these two were, nevertheless, pure, and remained pure, till Lord Bostern expired of his incurable complaint, and she on his breast. He had wished her to marry, first an illegitimate connexion of his own, Stanley Palfreyman (offspring of a previous Bostern's courtesy dame), and then the old lover of her kitchen days, Whittingham. But she would have neither.

Mr. Gilchrist in this book has imposed a drama factually improbable, but full of essential truths, upon a background of rural life and character. That any kitchen-wench could be transformed into the adorable, lightsome, strong-souled creature which the author has drawn we cannot believe; and we cannot believe that any Lord Bostern and any Anne Witchett could behave quite as these behaved. The charm of the book never flowers gaudily in a phrase, for Mr. Gilchrist deals not in phrases. Rather, it dawns quietly on the mind at the end of a chapter or an episode.

There are many country episodes to which we might refer—of harvests, fairs, carol-sings, courtings, and all the broad, simple, communal life of a self-contained district—but space forbids. We will say, in conclusion, that The Courtesy Dame is a notable book.

FitzJames. By Lilian Street.
(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

THIS, which is quite the briefest six-shilling novel that we have seen, appears to have been written for the young woman of eighteen or so with a luscious-passionate temperament and a tendency to French. It is Ouida simplified. French phrases like camaraderie, ce soir, à demain, à demi-voix, ma chère, and éperdument amoureux (for which the English language has, of course, no equivalent) ornament nearly every page. The hero is gorgeous:

Galt FitzJames was in his forties. Known far and wide as a poet, a consummate artist, and critic, he was greatly loved and greatly feared. He had an atmosphere that was unique, electric, stimulating; and the secret lay not so much in his genius power as in his bewildering personality. He was kind and gay, splendid and gallant, fierce and self-mocking. His humorous eyes were dark blue; he was clean-shaven; his features irregular and strong; his big head he carried high; his hair was iron-grey. In figure he was tall and imposing. . . .

Stories were rife of his forty years, and some, when they touched on bitter suffering, passionate struggle, and unconquerable courage, were not far short of the truth. Others, told to prove he was mortal, never by one iota lessened the dignity of his character.

But this was not all. He was a compelling god at the piano:

Ruth, at the window, begged for Chopin. Chopin was a mystery to her, and instinctively she knew this other poet would discover him.

But it was Galt FitzJames that reached her in the music—not FitzJames the genius and hero she had worshipped from girlhood, but FitzJames the man. . . . He drew her, drew her to him . . . and she felt herself going gladly, gladly. . . . There was nothing else possible . . . possible. . . . He stopped, and she clutched at the window-fastening, faint and dizzy.

Subsequently Ruth nursed him through a delirium, and said that another woman had done it—an impossible "Milly" who gambled at Monte Carlo while her husband lay dying. In the end, however, FitzJames discovered the truth, and we are led to believe that Ruth had the ecstasy of matrimonially accepting the hand of the great poet, artist, critic, and musician, with all his dizzying qualities.

The story is ridiculous, but it is ridiculous in a perfectly simple and unaffected manner. Approach it in the proper spirit, and you will enjoy it.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A BREAKER OF LAWS.

BY W. PETT RIDGE.

The cover of Mr. Ridge's new story is adorned with a criminal's coat-of-arms—a shield on which are impaled a dark lantern, a pair of handcuffs, a bunch of skeleton keys, &c.; and the story opens delightfully with a comic burglary at Blackheath by Mr Alfred Bateson—with whose fortunes and with whose "own little Keroline" the book is concerned. (Harper's. 6s.)

THE DEVIL'S HALF-ACRE.

By "ALIEN."

The opening scenes of "Alien's" new novel are laid in the Otago goldfields, where John Jermyn, an unconfessed and unsuspected murderer, has tried to expiate his crime, labouring to save life as an atonement for one taken. He is conducting a camp-meeting, to which the leading characters stray. (Unwin. 6s.)

CYNTHIA IN THE WEST.

BY CHARLES LEE.

A clever story of artist life in Cornwall, by the author of The Widow Woman. We are introduced to a regular colony of artists, and to some capital native types. Old Sampy's views on impressionism are entertaining. "Mr. Gibbs, he painted a picksher last year—picksher av a gate 'twas, and a man standing by. Gate was all right—drawed proper, that gate was—five bars all complete; as pretty a gate as ever I see. But the man! If you'll believe me, that man hadn' got no face!—no nose, no mouth, no eyes, no nothing—just a dollop av yaller paint." (Grant Richards. 6s.)

PHILIP WINWOOD.

BY ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS.

The sub-title of this novel is explanatory in the good old-fashioned way: "A Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence; Embracing Events that Occurred between and during the Years 1763 and 1786, in New York and London: written by His Enemy in War, Herbert Russell, Lieutenant in the Loyalist Forces." There are five good illustrations, a portrait of the hero, and a few notes at the end. (Chatto. 6s.)

IN MALE ATTIRE.

BY JOSEPH HATTON.

The title of this story by the author of that capital piece of melodrama, By Order of the Czar, promises adventure and incident. The first few pages fulfil that promise, for we have Zella Brunnen defending herself in a lonely New York street against a drunken ruffian's bowie knife. This is only the first thrill. Others lurk under such chapter headings as "And Jealousy Winked at Murder," "The Fateful Festival of Blind Man's Drift," "Zella Leaves Prudent's Gulch for London," &c., &c. A stirring story of to-day. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE MARBLE FACE.

BY G. COLMORE.

Creepy was the word for the author's Strange Story of Hester Wynne. Creepy is the word for this story of a blighted life and a marble face, in which mystery broods over all. The story is taken alternately from "The Diary of Darnley Cotterel" and "The Narrative of Laura Lequesnay." (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

KATHLEEN.

BY MRS. G. FORSYTH GRANT.

An immense novel of visits, balls, small talk, diversified by a carriage accident, and culminating in a cricket match. The characters move about in solid blocks: "The Vernon household," "the Wood family," "the Traquair family," "the Cochranes," "the Ainslies." When they are excited they say, "Blow you!" or "Jehoshaphat!" The hero is credited with a mania for quoting Shakespeare, though he seldom does so. "'Frailty, thy name is woman!'" quoted Ronald, his eyes fixed upon Kathleen. "Shakespeare says that, and St. Jerominy! he's jolly well right!" The story is laid in Edinburgh. (Paisley: Alex. Gardner. 6s.)

DAUNAY'S TOWER.

BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

A will story. The will—Stephen Daunay's—of course miscarries, and there is an important and mysterious child, who grows more beautiful every day in the remote Cumberland village where the story is laid. The plot is well worked out. Two of the heroines are named, like Poe's creations, Annabel and Lenore, and there is something Poesque about Daunay's Tower itself, in its heterogeneous vastness, looming in the night and breathing old traditions. (F. V. White. 6s.)

THE VICAR'S ATONEMENT.

BY J. HARWARD PONTING.

The atonements of vicars are popular, we believe, in fiction. This unhappy cleric is married in the second chapter. He does not tell his bride that it is for the second time, nor that his first wife had eloped from him, and was drowned. The acted lie becomes dangerous, even at the altar, where, under the veil of his bride, he sees, by hallucination, the lineaments of Mary Brandon. For his improbable secrecy the vicar pays an improbable price in suffering; the drowned wife turns up; there is a murder; and a theatrical "atonement." (Marshall & Son. 6s.)

A SUBURBAN VENDETTA.

BY JOHN K. LEYS.

"'It will come,' said the General, 'if at all, on the tenth of June.'" The General referred to a peril that had hung over him and his since Mutiny days, when—it goes without saying—he had tried to rob a Hindoo temple of its jewels. Hence the vendetta, and the interest surrounding the Rajah of Nagore when he arrives as guest at Seacombe Towers and promptly proposes to the General's daughter. If "Forewarned" and "Trapped" did not appear as chapter headings in this story we should marvel, but they do. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE DISHONOUR OF FRANK SCOTT.

BY M. HAMILTON.

Frank Scott's dishonour arose out of his absent-minded infatuation for one young woman what time he was engaged to another. It was a bad case, and Frank's cowardice went to the length of concealing from one woman his marriage to the other. The developments are, of course, tragical. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

MAB.

BY HARRY LINDSAY.

Mr. Lindsay's field is Methodist life, with its bigotries and sanctities, upon which some rude breath of the world is usually allowed to play. Thus Mab, a foundling of the sea, is Methodised as long as possible by her foster-parents. She becomes an actress, loses her sight, achieves success as an author, and is re-Methodised, cured of her blindness, and married to a minister amid the gruff p'audits of old bronzed fishermen like Zadok Parrington. A good story of its type. (Horace Marshall & Son. 6s.)

WAGES.

BY L. T. MEADE.

Mrs. Meade's present concern is with the evil of surreptitious drug-taking by neurotic Society women. Morphia and eau-de-cologne, brandy and laudanum, do their fell work in these pages; and the lesson is heightened by the circumstance that the hero, a Harley-street specialist in nerve diseases, is himself a victim. (Nisbet. 6s.)

THE CROSS TRIUMPHANT.

BY FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

This story, by the author of Paul, opens seventeen years after the Crucifixion, and embraces the over-running of Palestine by Vespasian, with its attendant horrors. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery-lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates for Yearly Subscriptions 20s. including postage.

American Agents for the ACADEMY: Brentano's, 31, Union-square, New York.

The Author of "The Master-Christian."

An Enquiry.

SIZE is the quality which most strongly and surely appeals to the imagination of the multitude. Of all modern monuments, the Eiffel Tower and the Big Wheel have aroused the most genuine curiosity and admiration: they are the biggest. As with this monstrous architecture of metals, so with the fabric of ideas and emotions: the attention of the whole crowd can only be caught by an audacious hugeness, an eye-smiting enormity of dimensions so gross as to be nearly physical. The unrivalled vogue of Miss Marie Corelli is partly due to the fact that her inventive faculty has always ranged easily and unafraid amid the largest things. Even in the early days, a single world did not suffice her fancy; she needed two. Then, when humanity had proved too small a field, she dreamt of a divine tragedy, and awoke to conjure up the devil. After the devil, the devil's antithesis: it was bound to come, and it has come. Barabbas, Satan, Christ: who can say that there will not yet be a fourth term to this gigantic proportion sum?

The daring brain which could conceive Jesus making the European tour at the heels of a Cardinal of the Roman Church has used no half-measures in the execution of the idea. If the theme is immense, crude, and obviously staggering, the treatment suits it. Unite the colossal with the gaudy, and you will not achieve the sublime; but, unless you are deterred by humility and a sense of humour, you may persuade yourself that you have done so, and certainly most people will credit you with the genuine feat. Such is the case of Miss Corelli and The Master Christian. From the moment when the good Cardinal Felix Bonpré finds the Divine Child, Manuel, shivering under the barred porch of Rouen Cathedral, to the grand climax of that same Child dialectically withering the Pope in the Vatican, there is no intermission of "big" situations. Manuel works miracles, curing lameness, stopping and annihilating bullets, and even raising the dead. He ascends the tower of Notre Dame, and stretches out his arms toward the city. "What dost thou see?" asks the good Cardinal.

"Paris!" replied the boy in strangely sorrowful accents, his young, wistful face turning towards the Cardinal, his hair blown back in the light wind. "All Paris!"

He was about to see a lecherous priest, worth five millions of francs, all but murdered by his illegitimate son before a churchful of cocottes. Later, Manuel journeys on to Rome. He and the Cardinal discuss the sights:

"St. Peter's!" answered Mannel, with a thrill of passion in his voice as he uttered the name. "St. Peter's—the huge theatre misnamed a church! Oh, dear friend!—do not look at me thus. . . . Surely you must know that there is nothing of the loving God in that vast Cruelty of a place. . . . Oh, what a loneliness is that of Christ in the world! What a second Agony in Gethsemane!"

In the Vatican, Manuel, not stopping at words, proceeds to glances:

"As One having authority—and not as the scribes!" said Mannel, with a swift, flashing glance, which, like a shaft of lightning, seemed to pierce through flesh and bone; for, as he met that radiant and commanding look, the jewel-like eyes of the Pope lost their lustre and became fixed and glassy—he put his hand to his throat with a choking gasp for breath—and, like a dead body which had only been kept in place by some secret mechanical action, he fell back in his chair senseless, his limbs stretching themselves out with a convulsive shudder into stark immovability.

Coming to London, Manuel presided at the heavenly translation of the good Cardinal, and arranged there for "a marvellous vision!—a Dream of Angels."

"Mannel!"

"I am here," answered the clear young voice. "Be not afraid!"

And now the music of the unseen choir of sound seemed to grow deeper and fuller and grander, and Felix Bonpré, caught up, as it were, out of all earthly surroundings . . . saw the bare building around him beginning to wondrously change. . . .

So much for Manuel. As the author says, "The personality of the little fellow was intensely winning." In regard to the human characters, they are sharply divided into two groups—the sheep and the goats. To be a sheep is to possess striking artistic and personal gifts; to be a goat is to have mistresses and bastards: there is no middle course; a middle course leads neither to the colossal nor the gaudy. Angela Sovrani, the heroine, was the greatest (moral) painter of her time, and, "unlike any other woman in the world," "a creature apart," "true, womanly in every delicate sentiment, fancy, and feeling, but with something of the man-hero in her scorn of petty aims." "Her laughter, sweet and low, thrilled the air with a sense of music." She painted a symbolic canvas, entitled "The Coming of Christ," which the United States nation bought, by cable, for a hundred thousand dollars. Her fiancé, an Italian prince, and also a painter (with a paramour), killed her out of artistic jealousy, and Manuel brought her to life again. Aubrey Leigh, the jeune premier, was "a brilliant scholar," and an ardent democrat: he would have become "supreme in histrionic art" had he not been repelled from the theatre by "the painted drabs called 'ladies of the stage.'" He was "the finest shot in England," and could improvise divinely on the organ. He wrote a book, and "found himself—like Byron—famous." He also "flung thunderbolts of splendid defiance at shams, with the manner of a young Ajax defying the lightning." He fell in love with one Sylvie Hermenstein, and Sylvie, "who seemed, by her graceful and mignonne fascinations and elegant toilettes, just a butterfly of fashion and no more, was truly of a dreamy and poetic nature—she had read very deeply, and the griefs and joys of humanity presented an ever-varying problem to her refined and penetrative mind." Mdlle. Hermenstein had a literary friend, the Princesse D'Agramont, and "the Figaro snatched eagerly at everything" written by this lady; while Angela had a literary friend, Cyrillon, "a daring writer who has sent his assumed name of 'Gys Grandit' like a flame through Europe."

The goats of the narrative are, with the exception of Angela's fiancé and a curate, all Roman Catholic priests, the book itself being, inter alia, what the gifted authoress intends for an exposure of the Roman Catholic Church. Angela's fiancé kept a mistress. The curate declined to bury the child of a hapless girl whom he had seduced. The catalogue of sinful priests is a long one. The Abbé Vergniaud was father to the flame-like "Gys Grandit." Claude Cazeau, an Archbishop's secretary, seduced a girl named Marguerite; she went mad of her shame; one night she grappled with him ("he turned a livid white in the moonrays"), and they perished together in the Seine. Monsignor Gherardi, that powerful and august prelate, had a petite maison, "a superb villa, furnished with every modern luxury and convenience, . . . where a beautiful Neapolitan danseuse condescended to live as his mistress." Gherardi also made infamous proposals to Sylvie Hermenstein, "in low, fierce accents"; but, later, when "Gys Grandit" crushed him in argument by referring to his family of bastards, "he reeled back as though he had been dealt a sudden blow, and over his face came a terrible change, like the grey pallor of creeping paralysis."

Perhaps the most wonderful thing about this book is that the author has faith in her work. By a thousand indications we are convinced that she truly believes it to be sublime. The Master Christian is a perfectly honest revelation of a personality. Egotistic, theatrical, vindictive, obtuse, and perhaps vain, that personality is nevertheless not a mean one. It is distinguished by a ferocious hatred of shams and by an earnestness almost terrible. Miss Corelli has the not-ignoble passions of the reformer. She must tilt or she will die. That her tiltings are farcically futile is due neither to lack of energy nor lack of sincerity, nor diffidence in attack, nor doubts, but simply to a complete absence of humour and artistic feeling, and her rhapsodic ignorance of life. Invincibly self-possessed and self-satisfied, conscious of power, and, above all, conscious of rectitude, she revels gorgeously in her lyric mastery of the commonplace, deeming it genius, and finds in the fracas of pamphleteering fiction an outlet and satisfaction for all her desires.

Such a personality could not fail to arouse opposition, and, indeed, the feud which exists between Miss Corelli and those who actively interest themselves in modern literary art may be accounted for without difficulty. It is due not to the appalling and absolute wrongness and badness of Miss Corelli's books considered as works of art, but to the authority and acceptance which she has achieved among the multitude. Try as you may to ignore the multitude you cannot. Numbers will tell, and it is right that they should. There is not a writer living to-day who does not envy Miss Corelli her circulation; and it is just that circulation which the artists of literature cannot understand. Is it possible, they ask in sad and angry amazement, that people can be imposed on by this? And they have an impulse to fling down the pen and take to grocery. But of course it is possible! That the question should be put only shows that in the world of books, as in every other world, one half does not know how the other half lives. In literary matters the literate seldom suspect the extreme simplicity and naïveté of the illiterate. They wilfully blind themselves to it; they are afraid to face it. Let us point out here that the wants of those readers who happen to be without taste are seldom met exactly, for the reason that nearly every writer has some sort of taste, some feeling for the refinements of his art. The readers without taste usually read, therefore, work which is a little beyond their proper grasp. They do the best they can for themselves, but their normal reading condition is one of middle and mystification, more or less acute. When an author comes along who can exercise force, fluency, and sincerity at the bidding of preferences precisely similar to their own, then it is that the illiterate gather together, and by the shoutings of their acclamation make themselves so painfully obvious to the literate. Then it is that the literate, awakened to the realities of the world, cry: Is it possible? Is it possible that Miss Corelli is regarded by tens of thousands of people as a profound philosopher and a beautiful writer? Let them ponder the two following passages:

The toy called the biograph, which reflects pictures for us in a dazzling and moving continuity, so that we can see scenes of human life in action, is merely a hint to us that every scene of every life is reflected in a ceaseless moving panorama Somewhere in the Universe, for the beholding of Someone—yes!—there must be Someone who so elects to look upon everything, or such possibilities of reflected scenes would not be—inasmuch as nothing exists without a Cause for existence.

Angela did not reply—her hands had unconsciously wandered into the mazes of a rich Beethoven voluntary, and the notes, firm, grand, and harmonious, rolled out on the silence with a warm, deep tenderness that thrilled the air as with a rhythmic beat of angels' wings.

Let the literates ponder those two passages, and assimilate the stupendous fact that there are multitudes of persons—you can see them in the streets behaving quite nicely—who will accept the one passage for profound philosophy and the other for beautiful writing. And, perhaps, the fact is not so stupendous after all, but just an ordinary, self-evident fact, one of a series. The very man who is shocked that "people" should be deceived by The Master Christian, may himself be the ignorant victim of a kind of music or a kind of painting not superior to the kind of literature to which The Master Christian belongs.

It has been stated that this huge fiction (it contains a quarter of a million of words—especially such words as sublimity, majesty, radiance, flashing, infinitely, thrilled, indefinite, elfin, Hélas! luminance, grand, exquisite, frightful, overwhelming) has succeeded—in the commercial sense—beyond any other English novel ever published at six shillings or any other price. That success, however, had been reached before the public had read a line of the book, and was due partly to the author's previous works, partly to splendid advertisement, and mainly to the official assertion, some time ago, that Miss Corelli had not written a novel entitled The Sins of Christ. But let us grant that the book has found favour with the majority of its purchasers; let us say that a hundred thousand immortal souls have been truly refreshed by it. This vast army of the simplicities would comprise the following classes:

1. (Overlapping the other classes.) Those who accept the gaudy colossal for the sublime.
2. Those who never miss "disclosures" about the Roman Catholic Church, who attend lectures by escaped nuns, and who say Romish when they mean Roman.
3. Those who only condescend to read fiction which "teaches," and who would doubtless be uplifted by the didactic harangues which the leading characters are made to declaim at every crisis in the story.
4. Those who enjoy witnessing any sort of "attack," even a street-fight.
5. Those neutral and sheepish minds who always contrive to like what a sufficient number of others like.

It remains to say that these persons might have favoured a more contemptible book. The Master Christian is absurd past all telling, but it has homogeneity, and with such a tremendous theme and scene, only a distinctly clever and audacious brain could have achieved that most difficult quality. The thing is serious and sincere; it shows a creditable and rare interest in large affairs; it is no mere weaving of a set pattern in fiction, such as contents many writers of genuine fine talent. It is ridiculous, but it is alive. And if you have no sense of the ridiculous, if you belong to the hundred thousand, you may well regard it as an impressive and magisterial work.

Things Seen.

The English Way.

HE came into the restaurant car on a German railway, let the door slam behind him, smiled, sniffed, said "Oh!" and threw open one of the windows. We stared, for a German railway, where every station-master suggests imminent martial law, is not the place for the flaunting of an independent spirit. We—a little company of various nationalities, united only by a tacit servility to wait patiently till it should please the waiter to attend to our wants—stared. The new-comer, a mere boy, but tall, treated the place as if it were a Duchy and he the Duke of it. He tucked his long legs under a table, and shouted in a high, pleasant voice: “Kellner!” to which, after a few seconds, he added the word schnell! Those were the only two German words he knew, and he used them frequently, with varying degrees of emphasis. Strange to say, the waiter answered the call, and took his leisurely order. He gave him his entire attention, just as if the boy were a duke and we subjects. His dinner was served while we still waited, and while he ate I talked to him. He had been with his “people” at Hom-burg, and now he was on his way back to a public school in England. Later he was going into the Army. This he told me while he ate his dinner, and chirped criticisms of German ways. When he had finished his meal, he threw himself back in his chair and cried: “Kellner, bill! schnell!” The waiter heard, and came to him, down the whole length of the carriage. The bill was presented. “Look here,” said the boy, “the service is bad. I’m going to back this bill.” He wrote his complaint (it was not very well spelt) in a large, round caligraphy, folded it, and dropped the document into the official box attached to the wall. Then he rose, said: “Bring my coffee into the smoking-room,” smiled generally at the company, and strolled to the door. He paused there a moment, said: “Look here, schnell!” and disappeared.

I began my dinner. I ruminated. His behaviour was inexcusable, and yet— Well, he carried it off. It was not underbred—it was English. I ruminated, and thought of the map of Africa and the domination that was spreading down from the North and up from the South. I did not approve, but, as I ate my tardy dinner, I think I understood—the English way.

At Sea.

LAST night a woman in the steerage died, and this afternoon she was to be buried. It was a day of fog and fine rain, with a chill in the air that made one’s bones feel brittle. The sea was a dirty gray, fading at a hundred yards into dull white mist.

The body lay on a hatching, wrapped in a Union Jack, for she was an Englishwoman coming home. There was nothing garish in the broad bands of colour, and down at her feet was a swelling beneath the cloth that we knew was a forty-pound shot. Round the hatching was a ring of sailors, bare-headed men with bronzed faces, the name of the ship written in white across their blue jerseys. Behind them stood a crowd of passengers, the men with their hats in their hands, fingering the brim; the women with shawls over their heads.

Suddenly the engines stopped. A strange stillness ensued. The only sound came from the water washing along the smooth iron side.

Somewhere in the crowd a baby wailed, and I saw a woman whispering to something she held hidden under her red shawl. Then a priest came forward, a black velvet cap on his head, and mumbled some prayers—in Latin, I thought, but his voice was very low. He finished, and stood aside. The sailors stooped, carried the hatching to the side, and tilted it. There was a moment’s pause, and then the bundle shot overboard. It was a great drop to the water. The bundle struck the water flat, with a great splash. There was a sound in the crowd like a sudden drawing in of breath. Suddenly, far overhead, the fog-horn burred, and at the same moment the bell jangled in the engine-room for full speed ahead. I felt the wire rigging in my hand tremble at the first drive of the piston.

An Enthusiasm that Was.

TWENTY-FOUR years ago, being a boy of twelve, I carried sundry coins to Mr. Franklin’s bookshop at the corner of St. Nicholas’s-square, in Newcastle-on-Tyne, and exchanged them for a copy of the Critical and Historical Essays of Lord Macaulay. I could show you the very spot in Neville-street where, walking homeward, I stopped to take a deep draught of rhetoric from that podgy volume in a gamboge binding. Has justice been done to Macaulay as the literary mentor of boys under fourteen? I doubt it, the debt is so large. There is a class of books from which bookish boys draw their first literary nourishment, and although these books are not the same for every boy, yet there are certain books which really form a group of this nature. Washington Irving’s Sketch Book is one, and Macaulay’s Essays is another. From these, and from Lamb, and from Addison’s Spectator, boys draw green knowledge of the moods and capabilities of literature. They learn how sarcasm can gall its victims, or argument crush them; and hugely they enjoy such spectacles. They easily delight themselves with the broad effects of good prose: a flowing style, a richness of allusion, clever antithesis, ingenious similes. Moreover they learn names—nothing haunts a boy like names—and on these they build castles of surmise very pleasant to behold. Great among such writers is Macaulay of the Essays. I could have said this last week, but it was only yesterday that I realised how strong was the spell that Macaulay threw over me in that gamboge volume. Casually I had picked up the new edition of the Essays issued in the “Temple Classics” series, and casually I opened it at a page in the article on Machiavelli. To my no small astonishment I could hardly read it with a dry eye. For I had alighted on a passage which I had roared to the wind on sea-shores, in railway-carriages, and wherever the glory of words could add a joy to life, or relieve some boyish bitterness. The passage was this:

From the oppressions of illiterate masters, and the sufferings of a degraded peasantry, it is delightful to turn to the opulent and enlightened States of Italy, to the vast and magnificent cities, the ports, the arsenals, the villas, the museums, the libraries, the marts filled with every article of comfort or luxury, the factories swarming with artisans, the Apennines covered with rich cultivation up to their very summits, the Po wafting the harvests of Lombardy to the granaries of Venice, and carrying back the silks of Bengal and the furs of Siberia to the palaces of Milan. With peculiar pleasure every cultivated mind must repose on the fair, the happy, the glorious Florence, the halls which rang with the mirth of Pulci, the cell where twinkled the midnight lamp of Politian, the statues on which the young eyes of Michael Angelo glared with the frenzy of a kindred inspiration, the gardens in which Lorenzo meditated some sparkplug song for the May-day dance of the Etrurian virgins. Alas, for the beautiful city! Alas, for the wit and the learning, the genius and the love!

Le donne, e i cavalier, gli affanni, e gli agi,
Che ne’nvogliava amore e cortesia
Là dove i cuor son fatti sì malvagi.

A time was at hand when all the seven vials of the Apocalypse were to be poured forth and shaken out over those pleasant countries, a time of slaughter, famine, beggary, infamy, slavery, despair.

The secret of Macaulay’s hold on the literary boy is plain. A boy with any taste for literature always deals in bombast; he loves the mouth-filling word and the rolling period. Does he glory in stately words and cloth-of-gold phrases? He is your budding writer. Those splashings and revellings in the sea of speech declare the swimmer who one day will cut the waves with a clean stroke and an economy of spray. Macaulay’s style is not bombast, but to many a boy it is the foamy and resonant ont of literature.

The more I dip into the Essays, the more I doubt whether this is not their greatest use and their greatest merit—that they shout so splendidly round the boy, and cast such treasures at his feet. Macaulay's delight in a full world, a thriving society, and an advanced culture; his prodigious knowledge, his memory, his vocabulary, his health—these are elements in a style that lures the young mind by the broad vigour and symmetry of its operations. Of sentiment and subtlety there are just enough in the Essays to please a boy, which is to say that there is very little of either. Macaulay's grand catalogue of the things that are is relieved to just the right extent and in just the right way. A boy had as lief read in Macaulay of the end of London as of the glory of Rome. Hear him take on his lips the famous passage on the permanence of the Roman Catholic Church:

She was great and respected before the Saxon had set foot on Britain, before the Frank had passed the Rhine, when Grecian eloquence still flourished at Antioch, when idols were still worshipped in the temple at Mecca. And she may still exist in undiminished vigour when some traveller from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's.

Macaulay gloated on these vast operations of Time. He wrote, in the essay on Machiavelli:

All the curses denounced against Tyre seemed to have fallen on Venice. Her merchants already stood afar off, lamenting for this great city. The time seemed near when the sea-weed should overgrow her silent Rialto, and the fisherman wash his nets in her deserted arsenal.

And, again, in the "Sir William Temple":

Lewis and Dorothy are alike dust. A cotton-mill stands on the ruins of Marli; and the Osbornes have ceased to dwell under the ancient roof of Chicksands.

Always concrete, rhetorical, and brilliant, always the easy master of his thought—no wonder Macaulay is worshipped by boys. To see him take off his coat to thrash a poet like Montgomery, or a critic like Croker, was sheer ecstasy. So many processes, horizons, relationships, were flashed upon the mind as incidents in the glorious bout; such far glimpses, and such vast suggestions, were opened on every side. You learned by excitement, you grew wise in battle. And then the cult of the "hit," the joy of sarcasm, and—the feelings of Mr. Montgomery!

We would not be understood, however, to say, that Mr. Robert Montgomery cannot make similitudes for himself. A very few lines further on, we find one which has every mark of originality, and on which, we will be bound, none of the poets whom he has plundered will ever think of making reprisals:

"The soul, aspiring, pants its source to mount,
As streams meander level with their fount."

We take this to be, on the whole, the worst similitude in the world. In the first place, no stream meanders, or can possibly meander, level with its fount. In the next place, if streams did meander level with their founts, no two motions can be less like each other than that of meandering level and that of mounting upwards.

To see Mr. Croker pounded in page after page of cumulative muscle, cumulative scorn, and all in a blaze of erudition beyond the dreams of schoolmasters! How one loved even the minutiae of the onslaught.

Mr. Croker states that Mr. Henry Bate, who afterwards assumed the name of Dudley, was proprietor of the Morning Herald, and fought a duel with George Robinson Stoney, in consequence of some attacks on Lady Strathmore which appeared in that paper. Now, Mr. Bate was then connected, not with the Morning Herald, but with the Morning Post; and the dispute took place before the Morning Herald was in existence. The duel was fought in January, 1777. The "Chronicle" of the Annual Register for that year contains an account of the transaction, and distinctly states that Mr. Bate was editor of the Morning Post. The Morning Herald, as any person may see by looking at any number of it, was not established till some years after this affair. For this blunder there is, we must acknowledge, some excuse; for it certainly seems almost incredible to a person living in our time that any human being should ever have stopped to fight with a writer in the Morning Post.

All this does not seem too fair now. And really one blushes for the cruelty of the epigram:

It is not likely that a person who is ignorant of what almost everybody knows can know that of which almost everybody is ignorant.

But a boy enjoys this as he does a knock-down blow with the gloves; and he frankly accepts the Titan's explanation:

We did not open this book with any wish to find blemishes in it. We have made no curious researches. The work itself, and a very common knowledge of literary and political history, have enabled us to detect the mistakes which we have pointed out, and many other mistakes of the same kind. We must say, and we say it with regret, that we do not consider the authority of Mr. Croker, unsupported by other evidence, as sufficient to justify any writer who may follow him in relating a single anecdote or in assigning a date to a single event.

Moved by a memory, I have but touched on Macaulay's attraction for boys. His wealth of proper names and allusion is dazzling. Poor Southey's philosophy might stand or fall, but to see that remote scheme condemned by remoter standards was a treat. "A mere day-dream, a poetical creation, like the Domdaniel cavern, the Swerga, or Pandalon." W.

Correspondence.

"On the Eve."

SIR,—Your reviewer, in his notice of Mrs. Atherton's Senator North is hardly fortunate in choosing On the Eve to bear out his contention that the finest of Turgenev's novels deal but little with love. On the Eve is primarily a poignant love story. In none of his books does Turgenev analyse more minutely the heart of a woman who loves. Had your reviewer pointed to Fathers and Children or Virgin Soil or even Rudin he would have been nearer the mark. Obviously he does not know his Turgenev.—I am, &c., CHRISTOPHER ST. JOHN.

7, Smith-square, Westminster: September 23, 1900.

[Mr. Christopher St. John is, of course, entitled to his views about On the Eve. If, however, he is unable to perceive that the political significance of that novel is paramount over everything else in it he is singularly unfortunate. His concluding remark is a hasty and gratuitous assumption on which I will express no opinion.—YOUR REVIEWER.]

Mr. Eric Mackay.

SIR,—As I am sole possessor of all the letters and legal papers pertaining to the family of the late Dr. Charles Mackay, you will, perhaps, allow me to point out that I am not "wrong in my chronology" with regard to the statement I have made respecting Dr. Mackay's second son, George Eric Mackay. He was born in 1835 (not 1851) and he died in his sixty-fourth year (not at forty-seven). His elder brother is still living and is settled in America with a large family of children and grandchildren, and his own son (living in Italy) is now about forty years of age. And it is quite true that I never made his acquaintance till he returned to his father's house on the failure of his two newspaper ventures, the Roman Times (in Rome) and Il Poliglotta (in Venice). I was then, as I have stated, a child, studying lessons with a daily governess, and he was forty-five. I regret to trouble you with these personal details, but your correspondent's misleading remark seems to make it necessary, though I venture to think that the private affairs of a family are out of the province of polite journalism.—I am, &c.,

September 24, 1900.

MARIE CORELLI.

[We regret that we were misled by our correspondent, who, however, seems to have been, in his turn, misled by a work of reference in which the date of Mr. Eric Mackay's birth was incorrectly given as 1851 instead of 1835.]

"The Minimum of a Decent Personal Library."

SIR,—In all probability it was not Mark Pattison who put the minimum at a thousand volumes, neither was it he who was responsible for the obiter dictum: "No one can be said to have a Library at all unless he has at least ten thousand volumes." But if your correspondent will turn to Augustine Birrell's Essay on "Book-Buying" (Obiter Dicta, Second Series, pages 263-4), he will find the passage he no doubt has in mind: "To be proud of having two thousand books would be absurd. You might as well be proud of having two top-coats. After your first two thousand difficulty begins, but until you have ten thousand volumes the less you say about your Library the better. Then you may begin to speak."

In the same delightful Essay Mark Pattison, who had 16,000 volumes, is quoted as saying: "That he had been informed, and verily believed, that there were men of his own University of Oxford who, being in uncontrolled possession of annual incomes of not less than £500, thought they were doing the thing handsomely if they expended £50 a year upon their libraries."—I am, &c.,

September 24, 1900.

JOHN H. RADFORD.

Our Celtic Fringe.

SIR,—It is possible that you have more readers than one within the "Celtic Fringe" who find themselves shut out from your Literary Competitions. In the place I write from our communication with the rest of the world is maintained by one boat daily. The ACADEMY does not reach me until Monday at mid-day; and, at the very earliest, a letter sent from here on Tuesday could not reach London before Wednesday. Is it possible to give us an even chance sometimes? Can you favour us with an opportunity of the chastening penance of failure?—I am, &c.,

CHAS. SMITH.

Macleau's Land, Tarbert, Lochfyne: Sept. 25, 1900.

"An Inexact Synonym."

SIR,—I think perhaps "plesionym" may meet the requirements of your correspondent who desires a single word to express an inexact synonym.—I am, &c.,

CLEMENT GUTCH.

Holgate Lodge, York: September 26, 1900.

[Another correspondent suggests "nighrede," "skionym," "skialogue," or "paralogue."]

THE NORTHERN COUNTIES MAGAZINE.

A First-Class Magazine-Review on unique lines.

Edited by HOWARD PEASE.

FIRST NUMBER (OCTOBER) NOW READY.

Illustrated.—Price 6d.—CONTENTS.

NORTHUMBERLAND. By Mr. SWINBURNE.
THE HISTORY of ELSWICK ARSENAL. By A. C.
ASPECTS of MODERN ART. By Sir WILLIAM EDEN, Bart.
A TALE of DEAD LAD'S RIGG. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.
NEWCASTLE CROSS. By W. G. COLLINGWOOD.
FROM an ANTIQUARY'S LETTER-CHEST. By the EDITOR.
THE LAST HERMIT of WARKWORTH. By M. C. COLERIDGE.
FROM LONDON TOWN: a Literary Letter. By E. V. LUCAS.
NORTH COUNTY CHRONICLE.
AUTOGRAPH FRONTISPIECE. By Mr. J. L. SARGENT, B.A.

Publishers: { ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.
{ ANDREW REID & CO., Newcastle.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.

NEW and FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

THE LIFE of a CENTURY, 1800-1900. Edited by Edwin HODDER. With numerous Illustrations. To appear in Twelve Monthly Parts. 6d. each net.

FRENCH LIFE in TOWN and COUNTRY. By Miss Hannah LYNCH, Author of "Denys D'Anvillac," "Dr. Vermont's Fantasy," &c. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

DUTCH LIFE in TOWN and COUNTRY. By a Resident at the HAGUE. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

GERMAN LIFE in TOWN and COUNTRY. By W. H. DAWSON, Author of "Germany and the Germans," &c. With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

RUSSIAN LIFE in TOWN and COUNTRY. By Francis H. E. PALMER, sometime Secretary to H.H. Prince Dronskop Loubelsky (Equerry to H.M. the Emperor of Russia). With Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR. GOLDEN DEEDS of the WAR. By A. T. Story. With many Portraits of Heroes. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"There is probably no boy who would not value the book."—Literature. KHAKI in SOUTH AFRICA. An Album of Pictures and Photographs illustrating the chief events of the War under Lord Roberts. 5s.

CHINA of TO-DAY, The Yellow Peril. An Album of Pictures and Photographs illustrating the principal Places, Incidents, and Persons connected with the Crisis in China. 5s.

"A FASCINATING BOOK." A PEEP into "PUNCH." By J. Holt Schooling. With about 450 Pictures from Punch. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE SHAKESPEARE COUNTRY ILLUSTRATED. By John LEYLAND. Illustrated by over 130 Photographs showing every feature of interest connected with the Shakespeare Country and the surrounding Districts, so noted for their wonderful beauty of scenery. 4to, cloth, gilt leaves, 10s. 6d. net.

FOR BEGINNERS AND EXPERTS. THE CENTURY BOOK of GARDENING. Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive work for every lover of the garden. With about 720 Illustrations. Specially designed cover. Large 8vo, gilt leaves, 21s. net.

GARDENS OLD and NEW. The Country House and its Garden Environment. Illustrated. £2 2s. net.

IN NATURE'S WORKSHOP. By Grant Allen. With Illustrations by Frederick Enock. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

WHAT SHALL I BE? A Guide to Occupations for Men and Women, in which Incomes can be made ranging from £100 to £1,000 a year. By E. H. COUMBE, B.A. Lond. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

DADDY'S GIRL. By L. T. Meade. With Illustrations by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

A HANDBOOK for TOURISTS. ENGLISH CATHEDRALS ILLUSTRATED. By Francis Bond, M.A., F.G.S., Hon. A.R.I.B.A. With 180 Illustrations from Photographs. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A practical, sensible, and well-informed book, beautifully illustrated. Its method is clear, rational, and helpful."—Bookman.

THE STORY of THOUGHT and FEELING. By F. Ryland. Cloth, 1s.

THE STORY of ART in the BRITISH ISLES. By J. Ernest PHYTHIAN. With Illustrations of Ancient and Modern Art. Cloth, 1s.

THE STORY of ANIMAL LIFE. By B. Lindsay, Author of "Introduction to Zoology." Cloth, 1s.

EASY FRENCH DISHES for ENGLISH COOKS. By Mrs. PRAGA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

7-12 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

No. 284.—OCTOBER, 1900.

A NATION of AMATEURS. By the Hon. George C. Brodrick (Warden of Merton).

RITUALISM and the GENERAL ELECTION. By Lady WIMBORNE.

CONCERNING PETITIONS and ELECTRIC RAILWAY PLEDGES. By Lady SOPHIA PALMER.

NOTES and IMPRESSIONS from a TOUR in CHINA. By His Excellency SIR HENRY BLAIR, G.C.M.G. (Governor of Hong Kong).

THE RELIGIONS of CHINA.—II. Taoism. By the Right Hon. Professor MAX MÜLLER.

THE WORKING MAN and the WAR CHARGES. By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.

NIETZSCHE: an Appreciation. By OSWALD CRAWFORD.

EXTRAVAGANCE and ECONOMY in the LONDON SCHOOL BOARD. By SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT, K.C.S.I.

AN AMERICAN PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN. By JAMES BOYLE (United States Consul at Liverpool).

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM in the PUBLIC SERVICE: a Reply. By the Right Hon. Sir ALGERNON WEST, K.C.B.

THE DUTCH-BELGIANS at WATERLOO. By C. Oman (Fellow of All Souls).

WANTED—A NEW WAR POET. By Mrs. HENRY BIRCHMOUGH.

FIVE NEW PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY. By M. H. WITT.

THE BREED of MAN. By Dr. HENRY HUTCHINSON ALMOND (Head Master of Loretto).

THE NEWSPAPERS. By SIR WENYUS REID.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LTD.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

THE BIBLE ATLAS of MAPS and PLANS to ILLUSTRATE the GEOGRAPHY and TOPOGRAPHY of the OLD and NEW TESTAMENTS, and the APOCRYPHA. With Explanatory Notes by the late Rev. SAMUEL CLARK, M.A.; also a Complete Index of the Geographical Names in the English Bible, by Sir GEORGE GROVE. Sixth Edition. Revised by Sir CHARLES WILSON, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., F.R.S. Royal 4to, cloth boards, 10s. 6d.

[This work has been almost entirely Rewritten by Sir Charles Wilson, and brought up by this competent authority to date.]

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS.—ST. AUGUSTINE'S TREATISE on the CITY of GOD. By the Rev. F. R. MONTGOMERY HITCHCOCK, M.A., B.D. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

EARLY CHURCH CLASSICS.—THE LITURGY of the EIGHTH BOOK of "THE APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS," commonly called the Clementine Liturgy. Translated into English, with Introduction and Notes, by the Rev. R. H. CRESSWELL, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

TWENTY-FIVE AGRAPHA; or, Extra Canonical Sayings of our Lord. Annotated by the Rev. Prebendary BLOMFIELD JACKSON, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s.

REFLECTED LIGHTS from CHRISTINA ROSSETT'S "THE FACE of the DEEP," Selected and Arranged by W. M. L. JAY. With several Illustrations. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

LEADING IDEAS of KEBLE'S "CHRISTIAN YEAR," By the Rev. CLEMENT PRICE. Imp. 32mo, cloth board, 6d.

THE PRE-CHRISTMAS ANTIPHONS. Beautifully printed in gold and colours. Paper covers, 6d.
[Will serve as an instructive Christmas Card.]

NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS SYSTEMS.—STUDIES of NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS. By ELIOT HOWARD. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

Nine other Volumes have already appeared in this Series.

TOWARDS the LAND of the RISING SUN; or, Four Years in Burma. By Sister KATHERINE. With 4 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

FIFTY YEARS in WESTERN AFRICA. Being a Record of the Work of the West Indian Church on the Banks of the Rio Pongo. By the Rev. A. H. BARROW, M.A. With Map. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

A REVIEW of "CHRISTIAN SCIENCE." By MARGARET BENSON. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 2d.

BRITISH CHRISTIANITY during the ROMAN OCCUPATION. By the Rev. R. V. FRENCH, D.C.L., LL.D., F.S.A. Small post 8vo, cloth, 6d.

REASONS for FAITH. Being the Eighteenth Course of Lectures to Men at St. Paul's Cathedral. By the Right Rev. A. F. WINNINGTON INGRAM, D.D. Small post 8vo, limp cloth, 6d.

HISTORICAL CHURCH ATLAS. Illustrating the History of Eastern and Western Christendom until the Reformation, and that of the Anglican Communion until the Present Day. By EDMUND McCLURE, M.A. Containing 18 Coloured Maps, besides some 50 Sketch Maps in the Text. Ro. cloth boards, leather back, 16s.

"Both the readers of ancient Church history and of modern missionary records will find abundant material in it for their assistance."—Guardian.

"A great deal of labour and sound scholarship has gone to the making of this atlas."—Academy.

THE CHURCH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The following Publications are issued under the auspices of the above Society, of which the President is the Right Rev. M. CREIGHTON, D.D., Lord Bishop of London.

LVII.—THE ENGLISH CHURCH and the MINISTRY of the REFORMED CHURCHES. By the Rev. EDWARD DENNY. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 6d.

LX.—THE ELECTION, CONFIRMATION, and HOMAGE of BISHOPS of the CHURCH of ENGLAND. A Paper read at the Annual Meeting of the Church Historical Society, Dec. 6th, 1899, by the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, D.D., Lord Bishop of Bristol. Small post 8vo, paper cover, 3d.

A Complete List of the Church Historical Society's Publications may be had on application.

THE ROMANCE of SCIENCE.—SOUNDING the OCEAN of AIR. Being Six Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute of Boston in December, 1899, by A. LAWRENCE ROTCH, S.B., A.M. Small post 8vo, with numerous illustrations, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

Twelve other Volumes have already appeared in this Series. List on application.*

MATTER, ETHER, and MOTION: the Factors and Relations of Physical Science. By A. E. DOLBEAR, Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tufts College, U.S.A. English Edition Edited by Professor ALFRED LODGE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

"Every page shows that the author is alive to the far-reaching consequences and implications of modern science. Professor Dolbear's pages are eminently readable, and his presentation of the philosophy of modern physics is lucid, interesting, exhaustive, and for the most part convincing."—Literature.

AMONG the BIRDS. By Florence Anna Fulcher. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

PATRIARCHAL PALESTINE. By the Rev. Professor A. H. SAYCE, Queen's College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, with Map, buckram boards, 4s.

The Book is the first to apply the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, both published and unpublished, towards elucidating the condition of Syria at this period. It also contains a recent and important revision of the Egyptian Geographical Lists bearing on Palestine.

THE "HIGHER CRITICISM" and the VERDICT of the MONUMENTS. By the Rev. Professor A. H. SAYCE, Queen's College, Oxford. Fifth Edition. Demy 8vo, buckram, bevelled boards, 7s. 6d.

"A really valuable and important work; perhaps the best which Professor Sayce has yet written."—Academy.

BUDDHISM in CHINA. By the late Rev. S. Beal. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

CONFUCIANISM and TAOISM. By Professor ROBERT K. DOUGLAS. With Map. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

CHINA. By Professor Robert K. Douglas. Post 8vo, with Map and numerous illustrations, cloth boards, 3s.

THE HISTORY of INDIA, from the EARLIEST TIMES to the PRESENT DAY. By Captain L. J. TROTTER. Revised Edition, brought up to date. With Maps and numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

THE PASSING of the EMPIRES. 850 B.C. to 330 B.C. By Professor MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Professor SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and numerous illustrations. Demy 10 (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Rivière), 50s.

"Scholars, as well as unlearned seekers after unbiased facts, owe M. Maspero and Mrs. McClure a deep debt of gratitude."—St. James's Gazette.

"An interesting book, and one which will give the reader a good general view of a most eventful period in the history of the world."—Nature.

"For some time it must form the standard work upon the subject."—Daily Mail Gazette.

"The work is beautifully produced, and the hundreds of illustrations are in the highest style."—Daily Chronicle.

"As a narrative it reads clearly and often brilliantly, which says much for Mrs. McClure's sympathetic translation. Altogether this is a book to read and re-read; it is the best authority on its wide subject at present."

Saturday Review.

"The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has done good service to scholars and Biblical students in procuring an able translation of this work. The translation of this monumental work has been admirably carried out by Mrs. M. L. McClure, a member of the Committee of the Egyptian Exploration Fund."—Liverpool Courier.

THE HOLY GOSPELS. With Illustrations from the old Masters of the XIVth, XVth, and XVIth Centuries.

More than three hundred works, dealing exclusively with the events of our Lord's life, have been chosen from among the greatest examples of the Italian, German, Flemish, and French schools for the subject of these illustrations. The work contains 384 (imperial 4to) pages and over 350 illustrations, forty-eight of these being separate Plates printed in Two Tints. Half-bound, paste-grain roan, 47s. 6d.; whole-bound, paste-grain roan, 50s.

"No more sumptuous edition of the Gospels has ever been produced in English nor any that approaches this for wealth and beauty of illustrations."—Church Times.

"The pictures are, to all who can appreciate religious art, uncommonly beautiful."—Queen.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.
BRIGHTON: 129, NORTH STREET.

SWINEY LECTURES ON GEOLOGY.

Under the Direction of the TRUSTEES of the BRITISH MUSEUM.

A COURSE of TWELVE LECTURES on "EXTINCT and PERSISTENT TYPES" will be delivered by R. H. TRAQUAIR, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., in the LECTURE THEATRE of the VICTORIA and ALBERT MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON (by permission of the Board of Education), on TUESDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and FRIDAYS, at 5 p.m., beginning TUESDAY, 9th October, and ending Friday, 2nd November. Each Lecture will be illustrated by means of Lantern Slides and Lime Light. Admission to the Course Free.

By order of the Trustees,
E. RAY LANKESTER, Director.
British Museum (Natural History),
Cromwell Road, London, S.W.

UNIVERSITY of MELBOURNE.

ORMOND CHAIR OF MUSIC.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the PROFESSORSHIP of MUSIC and the DIRECTORSHIP of the UNIVERSITY CONSERVATORIUM of MUSIC.

Fixed salary, about £800 per annum.

Duties begin February 25th, 1901.

Applications must be sent to the AGENT-GENERAL for VICTORIA, 15, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, by 20th October, 1900.

Particulars as to salary, duties, and tenure may be obtained from the AGENT-GENERAL for VICTORIA.

ST. ANDREWS UNIVERSITY

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, DUNDEE.

An ASSISTANT LECTURER in MATHEMATICS is REQUIRED IMMEDIATELY. Salary £120.—Applications should be sent to the SECRETARY, University College, Dundee, from whom all further information can be obtained.

R. N. KERR, Secretary.

TABOOED SCIENTIFIC WORKS.—The

Manager of the University Press, Limited, begs to inform the Medical Profession, Clergymen, and Teachers that the Scientific Works indicated at a recent trial and burnt by order of the Court—viz. Dr. Havelock Ellis's "STUDIES in the PSYCHOLOGY of SEX," Professor Kraft-Ebing's "PSYCHOPATHIA SEXUALIS," Dr. Ch. Feré's "THE SEXUAL INSTINCT," and G. Mortimer's "CHAPTERS on HUMAN LOVE," in the future, cannot be stocked by Booksellers in Great Britain, and will only be supplied direct from Leipzig and Paris.—THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Limited, 2, Broad Street Buildings, London, E.C.

GOVERNESSES FOR PRIVATE FAMILIES

—MISS LOUISA BROUGH can RECOMMEND several highly-qualified English and Foreign Governesses for Resident and Daily Engagements.—CENTRAL REGISTRY FOR TEACHERS, 25, Craven Street, Charing Cross, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—Gardiner's History, 2 vols., 1863.—Romney Rye, 2 vols., 1857.—Jesse's Richard III., 1862.—Lorna Doone, 3 vols.—Pre-estimated Copies of Browning, Dickens, Thackeray, and any notable Authors. Rare Books supplied. State wants.—BARR'S Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in literary work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in literary research, or in seeing work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 151, Strand, London, W.C.

TYPE-WRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Samples and references. Multi-Copies.—Address, Miss MESSER, 18, Mortimer Crescent, N.W.

TYPE-WRITING.—LITERARY and DRAMATIC WORK. MS. in bulk, 6d. per 1,000. French, German, Italian. Reliable.—Miss JESSIE LEES, 116, Cambridge Street, S.W.

TYPE-WRITER.—AUTHORS' MSS. COPIED with accuracy and despatch. Carbon Duplicates. Circulars. Examination Papers, &c.—Miss E. TIGAR, 29, Maitland Park Villas, Havestock Hill, N.W.—Established 1884.

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The OCTOBER CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW RE-MAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 156, Strand, London, W.C.

EDWARD HOWELL'S 127th CATALOGUE of ANCIENT and MODERN BOOKS, including many Rare and Curious Works purchased from various Libraries—will be ready on October 10th—posted on receipt of name and address.—83, Church Street, Liverpool.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick St
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BAEDEKER'S & BADDELEY'S
TOURISTS' GUIDE BOOKS.
New fully detailed CATALOGUE sent post free on application.

DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AUTOGRAPH LETTERS of PAINTERS, ENGRAVERS, and LITERARY CELEBRITIES. 24 pp. Catalogue post free on application.—MYERS & ROGERS, 41, Booksellers' Row, Strand, London.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

With 18 Plates and 35 Illustrations in the Text.
8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

SPORT AND TRAVEL, EAST AND WEST.

By FREDERICK COURTENEY SELOUS.

Author of "A Hunter's Wanderings in Africa," &c.

CONTENTS:—A Month in Asia Minor—After Wild Goats on the Maimun Dagh—Travel, Sport, and Ornithology in Asia Minor—Notes on a Latter-Day Hunting Trip in the Rocky Mountains—Second Trip to the Rocky Mountains.

With 9 Photogravure Illustrations from the Original Drawings by Archibald Thorburn.
8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

AUTUMNS IN ARGYLESHIRE WITH ROD AND GUN.

By the Hon. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY.

NEW VOLUME OF "FUR, FEATHER, AND FIN SERIES."

PIKE AND PERCH.

By WILLIAM SENIOR

("Redspinner," Editor of the Field).

With Chapters by "JOHN BICKERDYKE" and W. H. POPE.

COOKERY, by ALEXANDER INNES SHAND.

With 12 Illustrations by George Roller, and from Photographs. Crown 8vo, 5s.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

ON THE BANKS OF THE SEINE.

By A. M. F.

Authoress of "Foreign Courts and Foreign Homes."

With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 8 other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A TRAMP.

By J. H. CRAWFORD.

With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo, 12s. 6d.

JAMES MARTINEAU:

A Biography and Study.

By A. W. JACKSON, A.M.

STONYHURST PHILOSOPHICAL SERIES.

PSYCHOLOGY:

Empirical and Rational.

By MICHAEL MAHER, S.J.,

Professor of Mental Philosophy at Stonyhurst College, Examiner for the Diploma in Teaching of the Royal University of Ireland.

FOURTH EDITION, REWRITTEN and ENLARGED

Crown 8vo, 6s. 6d.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

EDMUND FULLESTON;

Or, the Family Evil Genius.

By B. B. WEST,

Author of "Half-Hour with the Millionaires," &c.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,

London, New York, and Bombay.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW WORKS ON SOUTH AFRICA.

THE SETTLEMENT AFTER THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

By M. J. FARRELLY, LL.D.,

Barrister-at-Law, Advocate of the Supreme Court of Cape Colony.

8vo, 10s. net.

Mr. SPENCER WILKINSON in the Morning Post.—"The author's proposals bear the impress of much knowledge of the countries to be dealt with, and of careful and dispassionate thought. Their publication at the present time is most opportune, and they cannot fail to be of the greatest use to all who propose to take their part in the discussion of the subject."

SOUTH AFRICAN STUDIES.

By ALFRED HILLIER, B.A., M.D.,

Author of "Raid and Reform."

Crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW BOOK BY CHARLES W. WOOD.

THE ROMANCE of SPAIN.

By CHARLES W. WOOD, F.R.G.S. Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. net.

ALSO BY CHARLES W. WOOD.

LETTERS from MAJORCA. Illustrated. 8vo, 14s.

Daily Telegraph.—"Highly entertaining and instructive Beautifully illustrated."

SECOND EDITION. NOW READY.

IN the VALLEY of the RHONE. With 88 Illustrations. 10s. net.

Times.—"A pleasant, handsome book, attractive alike in subject, treatment, and illustration."

POEMS of T. E. BROWN,

Author of "Folc's-le Yarne," "The Manx Witch," &c. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

(Uniform with Tennyson, Wordsworth, Arnold, &c.)

LATEST NOVELS

BY FAVOURITE AUTHORS.

Crown 8vo, gilt tops, 6s. each.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY,

Author of "Nellie's Memories."

RUE WITH A DIFFERENCE.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

FLORENCE MONTGOMERY,

Author of "Misunderstood,"

PREJUDGED.

EGERTON CASTLE,

Author of "The Pride of Jennico."

MARSHFIELD THE OBSERVER.

CHARLOTTE M. YONGE,

Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe," &c.

MODERN BROODS.

VOLUME I. NOW READY.

THE LEATHERSTOCKING NOVELS OF J. FENIMORE COOPER.

In Five Monthly Volumes.

With Illustrations by C. E. BROCK and H. M. BROCK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. each: cloth extra, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. each.

THE LAST of the MOHICANS. With a General Introduction by MOWBRAY MORRIS, and 25 Illustrations by H. M. BROCK.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

T. & T. CLARK'S LIST

The THIRD VOLUME of
DR. HASTINGS'S
DICTIONARY of the BIBLE
IS NOW READY.

The Athenæum says: "It is hardly possible to over-estimate the value of the vast and varied amount of well-digested information contained in these volumes.... We are struck with the fair-mindedness and width of learning displayed almost everywhere in this important work.... The present Dictionary is endowed with the utmost freedom that the human intellect has a right to claim."

Vol. IV. (completion) in active preparation.
Price per vol., in cloth, 38s.; in half-morocco, 34s.

JUST PUBLISHED.—8vo, price 10s. 6d.

THE RELATION of the APOSTOLIC
TEACHING to the TEACHING of CHRIST. By R. J.
PRUMMOND, B.D., Edinburgh.

"THE WORLD'S EPOCH MAKERS."

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON.

In chaste binding, price 3s., each volume.

BUDDHA and BUDDHISM. By ARTHUR LILLIE,
M.A.

LUTHER and the GERMAN REFORMATION.

By Prof. T. M. LINDSAY, D.D.

WESLEY and METHODISM. By F. J. SNELL,
M.A.CRANMER and the ENGLISH REFORMA-
TION. By A. D. INNES, M.A.

"We advise our readers to keep a watch on this most able series. It promises to be a distinct success. The volume before us ('Cranmer') is one of the most satisfactory hooks of the sort we have ever read."—Methodist Times.

THE INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY.

Editors—Dr. DRIVER, Dr. PLUMMER, and Dr. BRIGGS.

The following Volumes now ready:

DEUTERONOMY. Prof. S. R. DRIVER, D.D. 12s.

JUDGES. Prof. G. F. MOORE, D.D. 12s.

I. and II. SAMUEL. Prof. H. P. SMITH, D.D. 12s.

PROVERBS. Prof. C. H. TOY, D.D. 12s.

ST. MARK. Prof. E. P. GOULD, D.D. 10s. 6d.

ST. LUKE. ALFRED PLUMMER, D.D. 12s.

ROMANS. Prof. W. SANDAY, D.D., and A. C.
HEADLAM, B.D. 12s.EPHESIANS and COLOSSIANS. Prof. T. K.
ABBOTT, D.D., Dublin. 10s. 6d.PHILIPPIANS and PHILEMON. Prof. M.
VINCENT, D.D. 8s. 6d.THE INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

Editors—Dr. SALMOND and Dr. BRIGGS.

The following Volumes now ready:

THE THEOLOGY of the NEW TESTAMENT.
By Prof. G. B. STEVENS, D.D. 12s.THE CHRISTIAN PASTOR and the WORK-ING CHURCH. By Prof. W. GLADDEN, D.D., LL.D. 10s. 6d.CHRISTIAN INSTITUTIONS. By Prof. A. V. G.
ALLEN, D.D. 12s.CHRISTIANITY in the APOSTOLIC AGE.
By Prof. A. C. McGILVER, D.D. 12s.HISTORY of CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE. By Prof. G. E. FISHER, D.D. 12s.INTRODUCTION to the LITERATURE of the OLD TESTAMENT. By S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Seventh Edition. 12s.CHRISTIAN ETHICS. By NEWMAN SMYTH, D.D.
Third Edition. 10s. 6d.APOLOGETICS; or, Christianity Defensively Stated. By A. B. BRUCE, D.D. Third Edition. 10s. 6d.

* Prospectuses, giving details of the above Two Series, will be sent post free on application to the Publishers.

THE RITSCHLIAN THEOLOGY,
CRITICAL and CONSTRUCTIVE: an Exposition and an Estimate. By the Rev. A. E. GARVIE, M.A. (Oxon.)
8vo, 9s.

"Ritschlian Literature is permanently enriched by this publication."—British Weekly.

THE SPIRIT and the INCARNATION in the LIGHT of SCRIPTURE, SCIENCE, and PRACTICAL NEED. By the Rev. W. L. WALKER. 8vo, 9s.

"One of the most remarkable and stimulating—intellectually and spiritually stimulating—theological works of the day."
The Speaker.

THE THEOLOGY of MODERN LITERA-TURE. By S. LAW WILSON, M.A., D.D. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"This remarkable work bears evidence on every page of omnivorous reading, and of an intimate, we might almost say exhaustive, acquaintance with modern fiction.... A deeply interesting book."—British Weekly.

Full Catalogue free on application.

Edinburgh: T. & T. CLARK, 38, George Street.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON,
KENT & CO., Ltd.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOTICE.

Mr. J. M. BARRIE'S New Novel,

TOMMY AND GRIZEL,

will be published early this month. Price 6s.

Q's NEW WORK.

Mr. A. T. QUILLER COUCH'S New Volume of Stories will be shortly published under the title of OLD FIRES and PROFITABLE
GHOSTS. Price 6s.

The power, the dramatic art, and the intense reality which pervades nearly every short story Q has written render the perusal of these a veritable feast of good things. A peculiar interest attaches to Q's forthcoming book. The stories deal with the spiritual world or the spiritual side of things, and each contains its own moral.

READY NEXT WEEK.—Price 6s.

WILLIAM LANDELS, D.D. A Memoir.

By his son, the Rev. THOMAS D. LANDELS,
M.A. With Rembrandt Portrait as Frontispiece.

This biography of the well-known Baptist preacher and lecturer has been written by his son, who has gathered together all the available material for the story of a singularly busy and varied career. An introduction to the volume from the pen of Dr. JOHN CLIFFORD bears testimony to the esteem in which the memory of his predecessor in the Presidential Chair of the Baptist Union is held, and contributions from the Rev. CHARLES WILLIAMS, of Accrington, and Mr.
A. H. BAYNES, Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, speak of his work for his brethren and his generation.

NOW READY.—Price 3s. 6d.

IMPORTANT NEW WORK ON CHINA.

THE STORY of the CHINESE CRISIS. By ALEXIS KRAUSSE, Author of "Russia in Asia," "China in Decay," &c.

Among the contents of this important volume are:—

A RÉSUMÉ of RECENT An ACCOUNT of the CHINESE HISTORY. "BOXERS."

A RECORD of the RELA- The STORY of the SIEGE
TIONS between CHINA of the LEGATIONS. and the POWERS. A CHRONICLE of the RELIEF of PEKING.

An ACCOUNT of the A FORECAST of the STRUGGLE for CON- FUTURE of CHINA.
CESSIONS. With TWO APPENDICES and a COMPLETE INDEX.

READY SHORTLY.—Price 9s.

REMINISCENCES of OXFORD. By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. With Sixteen Full-page Illustrations.

This book gives a most interesting insight into Oxford "Varsity" life as it was from the early "Thirties" to the "Fifties." The author, during his career at the University, came in contact with some of the leading men of that time, and the work teems with personal anecdotes of such men as Max Müller, Dr. Pusey, Dr. Jowett, Lewis Carroll, Cardinal Newman, Dr. Arnold, &c.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED.

London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT.

By WILLIAM WESTALL, Author of "With the Red Eagle," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE "PRETTY POLLY": a

Voyage of Incident. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. With 12 Illustrations by G. E. Robertson. Small demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

THE FOURTH GENERATION.

By Sir WALTER BESANT, Author of "The Orange Girl," &c. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"A capital story.... Plot and treatment are alike excellent.
... There is a large number of characters, most of them well done, and one, a returned prodigal with a splendid drinking capacity, really immense. The 'love interest' is very pretty and fresh, and the whole book wholesome entertainment."
The Mail Gazette.

THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED

HADLEYBURG, and other Stories and Sketches. By MARK TWAIN. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"Only Mark Twain would have conceived the idea of 'The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg': only he could have developed it with such quaint and dry humour."—Daily Telegraph.
"It is the old Mark Twain throughout, with that curious extra-keenness of vision which is the sign of all true humourists."—Morning Leader.

PHILIP WINWOOD: a Sketch of the Domestic History of an American Captain in the War of Independence. By R. NEILSON STEPHENS, Author of "A Gentleman Player," &c. With 6 Illustrations by E. W. D. Hamilton. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"The story is exceedingly well told, and will be read with unflinching interest."—Scotsman.

IN a CATHEDRAL CITY. By

BERTHA THOMAS, Author of "The Son of the House."
Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A SUGAR PRINCESS. By Albert

ROSS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

* 1,645,000 copies of ALBERT ROSS'S NOVELS have been sold in America.

THE BAG of DIAMONDS, and

THREE BITS of PASTE. By GEORGE MAXWELL
FENN, Author of "A Crimson Crime," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Oct. 11.]

"AS a WATCH in the NIGHT":

a Drama of Waking and Dream. By Mrs. CAMPBELL
PRAED, Author of "Madame Izan," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Nov. 1.]

THE ADVENTURES of TYLER

TATLOCK. Private Detective. Related by DICK
DONOVAN, Author of "A Detective's Triumphs," &c.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. [Shortly.]

New Three-and-Sixpenny Editions.

AN ADVENTRESS. By L. T. Meade.

A FIGHT with FATE. By Mrs.
ALEXANDER.MARY UNWIN. By Alan St. Aubyn.
With 6 Illustrations by Percy Tarrant.

INFATUATION. By B. M. Croker. [Oct. 11.]

A HISTORY of OUR OWN TIMES, from 1840 to the Diamond Jubilee. By JUSTIN MC CARTHY, M.P. A NEW EDITION. (Vol. V., uniform with the First Four Volumes of the CABINET EDITION.)

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

LONDON MEMORIES: Social,

Historical, and Topographical. By C. W. HECKETHORN, Author of "London Souvenirs," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. [Nov. 1.]

The GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

One Shilling Monthly.

Contents for OCTOBER:—THE TRAGEDY of EMMA COLLINS. By KATHARINE SYLVESTER.—THE LAST ENGLISH
REBELLION. By JOHN HYDE.—IN the WOODS of ROC-CAMONFINA. By L. WOLFELOHN.—A PICTURESQUE ROGUE. By FRANCIS BROCK.—NIGHTS in LAKELAND.
By WILLIAM T. PALMER.—CIPHERS. By G. E. MOSEY.—A WEEK in the WEST COUNTRY. By FRANCIS H. CANDY.—
ARIADNE. By Miss E. M. RUTHERFORD.—THE CHAUCER GARDEN. By W. H. THOMPSON.—THE UNION of POLAND and LITHUANIA. By GABRIELLE FESTING.—CAGED in FRANCE. By Rev. P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A.—WEST-
PYRENEAN MARRIAGES. By A. R. WHITFAY.—TWO SONNETS. By M. PROWER.—"FRUITFULNESS." By SILVANCE URB N.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1483. Established 1869.

6 October, 1900.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

WITH a fine disregard of merit, possible only to a national paper, the Times prints, with easy impartiality, the lucubrations of the Poet Laureate and the stirring verses of Mr. Kipling. In "The Young Queen," which filled two-thirds of a column last Thursday, Mr. Kipling is not at his best; but the verses come at the psychological moment, and, although not to be compared with "The English Flag," have vigour and intuition. The poem takes the form of a dialogue between the new Commonwealth of Australia (the Young Queen) and the Mother Country.

Her hand was still on her sword-bilt—the spur was still on her heel—

She had not cast her harness of grey war-dinted steel:

High on her red-splashed charger, beautiful, bold, and browed,

Bright-eyed out of the battle, the Young Queen rode to be crowned.

The Young Queen came to the Old Queen's presence
"in the Hall of One Thousand Years," crying "Crown me, my mother!"

And the Old Queen raised and kissed her, and the jealous
circlet prest,

Roped with the pearls of the Northland and red with the gold of the West.

When the Young Queen "asked for a mother's blessing on the excellent years to be," the Old Queen apostrophising her as "daughter no more but sister," makes reply:

"I have swayed troublous councils—I am wise in terrible things—

Father and son and grandson I have known the heart of the Kings.

Shall I give thee my sleepless wisdom or the gift all wisdom above?

Ay, we be women together—I give thee thy people's love:

Tempered, august, abiding, reluctant of prayers or vows,

Eager in face of peril as thine for thy mother's house—

God requite thee, my Sister, through the strenuous years to be,

And make thy people to love thee as thou hast loved me!"

To us the poem seems in parts a little too reminiscent of "Dagonet." The Daily Chronicle, a journal not often given to phrases, finds the first stanza we have quoted "crammed with the somewhat hypertrophied muscularity of the uncrowned laureate."

PROFESSOR DOWDEN's proposal that the opening of the twentieth century should be celebrated by an "adequate" history of English literature receives in the Author the approval of Sir Walter Besant. Sir Walter, being a practical man, goes into figures. He believes that the whole expense would amount to less than £2,000 a volume of the size of the Dictionary of National Biography, and suggests that a company should be formed to produce the work.

WRITERS of all shades of political opinion will welcome the election of Mr. Henry Norman for South Wolverhampton. Mr. Norman is author, journalist, traveller, and a good speaker. For some years he was assistant editor of the Daily Chronicle, and director of the literary page of that journal. He is also an active and useful member of the Council of the Society of Authors. Mrs. Norman has also travelled much, and those who know her able and interesting novels regret that she should write so little. The Crook of the Bough was one of the best stories of 1898.

MR. GILBERT PARKER is now Member for Gravesend. We hope his election does not mean that he purposes forsaking fiction, for he writes a good tale in a good style. It would almost seem that his latest book, published on the day following his election, The Lane that Had No Turning, supported the deduction; for it contains no fewer than twenty-six short stories and sketches gleaned from the well-harvested levels of the Pontiac mine.

THE British Weekly, a journal not addicted to wild statements, prints the following: "It is now reported, with a formidable appearance of authority, that the most widely circulated of our newspapers, or rather its proprietors, are to buy our oldest and greatest journal."

Munsey's Magazine, it is said, has the largest circulation of any magazine in America. The editor is not a shy man. On the cover of his October issue he prints the following, on red paper, a fac-simile of his own handwriting: "This number of Munsey's Magazine comes pretty close to my idea of what a modern magazine should be. I regard it, as a whole, as the best number we have ever issued.—FRANK A. MUNSEY."

THE great American nation has gone on reading fiction steadily since we last wrote. We open the American Bookman: we turn to the "best selling books" during the month, and we read:

1. The Reign of Law. Allen.
2. Unleavened Bread. Grant.
3. The Redemption of David Corson. Goss.
4. To Have and to Hold. Johnston.
5. Voice of the People. Glasgow.
5. The Cardinal's Snuff-Box. Harland.
6. Gentleman from Indiana. Tarkington.

Only two out of the six are English—Mr. Harland's and Mrs. Glasgow's.

THE inhabitants of New Haven, Conn., would seem to have a more varied taste. Here is the New Haven, Conn., list:

1. Elizabeth and Her German Garden.
2. Senator North. Atherton.
3. The Cardinal's Snuff-Box. Harland.
4. The Reign of Law. Allen.
5. The Flower of the Flock. Norris.
6. China, the Long-Lived Empire. Seidmore.

A CHELTENHAM correspondent writes: "It is welcome news to T. E. B.-lovers to know of the Life and Letters, and the hope of possessing the poems so long out of print. I met Brown first last year, and was almost intoxicated by his overpowering masculinity. The following lines, written in the first rush of admiration, are in the metre of his poem called 'The Exile'":

To T. E. BROWN.

In hotly rushing gratefulness of soul
I ask you, Poet Brown,
From far Olympian heights look down,
And listen to a mortal,
Still baffled here and barred without Jove's portal,
While you a crown
Of laurel incorruptible are wearing,
And at the gods are staring.
I want to say the gratefulness I feel
For lines like ocean-breezes,
Whose freshness heals the heart's diseases;
For lines you write so strongly,
In spite of shock we cannot take you wrongly—
Their daring pleasures;
Ringing we hear them echoed through the air,
The world is fair! is fair!
And the deep founts of hidden feeling,
Beneath your master-touch
The swelling sorrow stifled over-much
Forth from the darkness breaks,
And blessed tears relieve the heart that aches;
Your power is such,
The rock you strike, like Moses, with your rod,
Yields waters from the wells of God.
We see 'the ephod of the unseen altar,'
Thou standest now confessed,
In priestly raiment dressed;
An 'Exile' now no more. The gates
Of Heaven are passed, and thou hast found thy mates.
The Father's breast
Receives the Son who here did understand
The speech of that great land."

MR. H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON'S new romance, "Chloris of the Island," which has run through the Graphic this year, will be published this month here and in America by Messrs. Harper & Brothers. Owing to an unfortunate accident the American edition has gone to press without correction by the author. It is hoped that the second edition will embody all the necessary alterations.

LAST week we wrote of two amateur Kentish magazines. To-day, also out of Kent, comes a third magazine, called The Tulip. It is published by Martin Klingender, at Shortlands, and it is a large square magazine of poetry, sketches, and wood-engravings, printed on one side of the page only, and "got up" with creditable care. With the contents we are not much struck. Some of the engravings pass our understanding. "A Church Tower" on page 11 is not like a church tower, nor like any other building; it is not beautiful; it is an engraved blot with a few meaningless lines added. The same is true of "The Cathedral," in which two objects, purporting to be spires, rise above a mass of blackness, purporting to be foliage. The coloured engravings are better, but they are only eccentric derivatives of eccentric models. We are not hostile to amateur magazines—they are signs of life; but with the amateur magazine without merit we have small patience.

On the authority of a newspaper, we spoke last week of the Elf as a magazine of the past. We are glad to hear that the Elf is still a magazine of the future. It is not discontinued.

The Dome now appears quarterly, in triple numbers; thus, the new volume contains the numbers for May,

June, and July. It is an interesting budget of esoteric writing and wood-engraving. Mr. W. B. Yeats has an article on "The Philosophy of Shelley's Poetry," in which he claims great things for Shelley that are hidden from ordinary minds: Mr. Yeats believes, for Shelley as for himself, that "the imagination has some way of lighting on the truth that the reason has not, and that its commandments, delivered when the body is still and the reason silent, are the most binding we can ever know." We cannot here summarise Mr. Yeats's conception of Shelley's philosophy of intellectual beauty, but we will quote his concluding paragraph for its own sake.

I have re-read his Prometheus Unbound for the first time for many years, in the woods of Drim-da-rod, among the Ech Tge hills, and sometimes I have looked towards Slieve-nan-Orr, where the country people say the last battle of the world shall be fought till the third day, when a priest shall lift a chalice, and the thousand years of peace begin. And I think this mysterious song utters a faith as simple and as ancient as the faith of those country people, in a form suited to a new age, that will understand, with Blake, that the holy spirit is "an intellectual fountain," and that the kinds and degrees of beauty are the images of its authority.

A WRITER in the October Lippincott tells one or two stories of James Russell Lowell's "faculty of perpetrating puns redeemed from reproach by their impish ingenuity and unexpectedness." The three examples he gives are certainly amusing:

Coming into his class-room one day, he announced to his students that wings were being added to the ugliest house in Cambridge, "and," he continued devoutly, "I hope they will fly away with it."

Again, after exposing the ridiculous blunders of the editor of certain old plays, he concluded with the remark: "In point of fact, we must apply to this gentleman the name of the first King of Sparta." No one remembered, of course, what this was, but when they looked it up they found it was Endamidas.

At the time Prof. Horsford believed he had successfully identified Norumbega—the place where the Norsemen are said to have first landed in America—with Cambridge, and there was much talk regarding his supposed discovery and the monument he erected to signalise it, a club was being started in the town, and two questions concerning it were awakening animated discussion—what the name should be, and whether it should dispense spirituous liquors. "Why not solve both questions at once," said Mr. Lowell, "and call it the 'No rum began!'?"

MR. F. R. BENSON'S company will produce at the "Comedy" the following eight plays, beginning on December 19 next: "Hamlet," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "Richard II.," "Henry IV." (part 2), "The Taming of the Shrew," "Much Ado About Nothing," "The Merchant of Venice," "As You Like It," or "Coriolanus."

IN the Philadelphia Conservator we find the following report of a conversation between Walt Whitman and Joaquin Miller, to which the writer, Mr. Leon Mead, was privileged to listen. The conversation took place in Whitman's rooms at Mrs. Moffit's caravansary, in Bulfinch-place, Boston. There Joaquin Miller and Mr. Mead had called in a casual way, and after the greetings, and the introduction of Mr. Mead to Whitman, the conversation ran as follows:

Whitman: I'm real glad you dropped in, Miller, old fellow. Why, you're looking as fresh as a ruby. Getting fat, too. The waters of the Pierian spring agree with you.

Miller: You old rogue, Whitman, I'd give the planet Jupiter, if I owned it, in exchange for your physique, your white mane and god-like brow. Well, how are you, anyway?

Whitman: You find me in linen fresh this morning, yet wet as water. I'm in a good old-fashioned perspiration—a luxury I was afraid I'd not get in Boston. Do you know, a man who never sweats is generally a hard-fisted, miserable kind of a fellow. I never had any sympathy with a dry-skinned man. He will turn coward if you give him the slightest provocation. By the way, I went out to Concord yesterday to see Emerson.

Miller: Indeed; how is the darling old man?

Whitman: Pretty feeble. Yes, I stayed to luncheon with him and we had a mighty sociable time. He took me for a walk through his garden and grounds. Occasionally a fitful gleam of his former self would creep into his eyes, when some reference was made to his old friends who have passed away. His memory is quite treacherous. He began several stories that he had to leave unfinished—he was sure to forget the salient point.

Miller: That is very sad. By the way, the other day I put in a couple of hours with Longfellow.

Whitman: I want to know!

Miller: We had a square you-tell-me-and-I'll-tell-you talk about American poets and we agree tremendously. Your name was mentioned.

Whitman: Was it?

Miller: And we raked you over the coals for quite a time.

Whitman: Well, now, Miller, candidly, what does Longfellow think of me? Honest Indian?

Miller: He told me he considered you a genius.

Whitman: No!

Miller: Yes, and moreover he said that you are not only a bright particular star but a fixed planet of the first magnitude. He said you are a broader poet than the whole lot. He likes you, Walt.

Whitman: Now, you don't know how that pleases me, Joaquin. I always had an idea that Longfellow didn't care a rap for me. God bless him! [At this point tears were visible in the speaker's eyes.] Do you think he meant it all?

Miller: Most assuredly he did. He referred to your "Song of Myself" as a deep, esoteric gem. He expressed the regret that you are not more generally understood and appreciated.

Whitman: I have tried all my life to write for the masses.

Miller: Old boy, you and I are over the heads of the rabble. We stand on an eminence of our own making, and look down when we wish to see the world. In a word, we know we are great, and if other people don't know it, it is their own fault.

THE Bashkirtseff-Maupassant letters are begun and ended in this week's Gentlewoman, forming the final chapter in the series of Marie Bashkirtseff's diaries and letters which are to be published under the title, The Story of a Woman's Soul. The most interesting thing in this correspondence is Marie Bashkirtseff's frank account to Maupassant of the effect produced on her mind by a re-reading of his works:

I have profited, sir, by the leisure of Holy Week to re-read your complete works. You are a gay dog, incontestably. I had never read you en bloc and right off. The impression is, therefore, fresh, and that impression . . . It is enough to turn all my pupils inside out and to upset all the convents of Christendom. As for myself, who am not at all bashful, I am confounded—yes, sir, confounded—by this intense preoccupation of yours with the sentiment that M. Alexandre Dumas *fil*s named Love. It will become a monomania, and that will be regrettable, for you are richly dowered and your peasant tales are well sketched. I know that you have done a Life, and that this book is stamped with a great feeling of disgust, sadness, and discouragement. This feeling, which leads one to pardon the other thing, appears from time to time in your writings, and leads people to believe that you are a superior being who suffers from life. It is this that cuts me to the heart. But this whining is, I fear, only an echo of Flaubert.

In fact, we are brave simpletons, and you are a good farceur (do you see the advantage of not knowing one another?) with your solitude and your beings with long hair. . . . Love—it is still with that word that one gets hold of the whole world. Oh, la! la! Gil Blas, where art thou? It was after reading one of your articles that I read the Attaque du Moulin. It was like entering a magnificent and fragrant forest where birds sang. "Never did larger peace fall upon a happier spot."

That is very interesting, as is the whole of this brief correspondence. But every sentence sighs for its native French.

MR. JOHN MORLEY'S biography of Oliver Cromwell is brought to an end this month in the Century Magazine. It has been divided into twelve papers and forty-two chapters. Mr. Morley ends on this temperate estimate of Cromwell's personality:

It has been called a common error of our day to ascribe far too much to the designs and the influence of eminent men, of rulers, and of governments. The reproach is just and should impress us. The momentum of past events, the spontaneous impulses of the mass of a nation or a race, the pressure of general hopes and fears, the new things learned in "novel spheres of thought"—all have more to do with the progress of human affairs than the deliberate views of even the most determined and far-sighted of our individual leaders. Thirty years after the death of the Protector a more successful revolution came about. The law was made more just, the tribunals were purified, the press began to enjoy a freedom for which Milton had made a glorious appeal, but which Cromwell had dared not concede, the rights of conscience received at least a partial recognition. Yet the Declaration of Right and the Toleration Act issued from a stream of ideas and maxims, aims and methods, that were not Puritan. New tributaries had already swollen the volume and changed the currents of that broad confluence of manners, morals, government, belief, on whose breast Time guides the voyages of mankind. The age of rationalism, with its bright lights and sobering shadows, had begun. Some ninety years after 1688 another revolution followed in the England across the Atlantic; and the gulf between Cromwell and Jefferson is measure of the vast distance that the minds of men had travelled. With the death of Cromwell the brief life of Puritan theocracy in England expired. It was a phase of a movement that left an inheritance of some noble thoughts, the memory of a brave struggle for human freedom, and a procession of strong and capacious master spirits, with Milton and Cromwell at their head. Political ends miscarry, and the revolutionary leader treads a path of fire. It is our true wisdom to learn how to combine sane and equitable historic verdicts with a just value for those eternal qualities of high endeavour, on which, amid all changes of fashion, formula, direction, the world's best hopes depend.

WE could hardly desire a better account of Fenimore Cooper than that which Mr. Mowbray Morris has prefixed to the new edition of The Last of the Mohicans, which Messrs. Macmillan have just added to their series of standard novels. We will quote two salient passages against and for Cooper's achievement:

What we call style—I do not mean the gibberish which too often goes by that name now, but the art of using the right words in the right places—may come by instinct, or may be laboriously acquired. It certainly did not come by instinct to Cooper, and as certainly he gave no pains to acquire it. Perhaps no writer who has ever made a lasting name for himself wears his faults so plainly on the surface as Cooper. It is idle to look in his pages for any of those qualities which, if the newspapers are to be believed, go to the making of a literary reputation to-day, but which may possibly tend less surely to its preservation; we shall find in them no elaborate analysis of character, no juggling with words, no niceties, and assuredly no nastinesses, or dialogue. And it must be added also that we miss in them many things which they would be the better for; his few attempts to be humorous are woeful; passion is as foreign to him as sentiment, and, to do him justice, though, unfortunately for him and for his readers, he must occasionally try the latter, from the former he rigorously and wisely abstains; his writing is almost always careless, often slovenly, and of his plots he is as careless as of his grammar. But what Cooper could do no man has ever done better.

And now for Cooper's achievement:

In drawing Nature he certainly showed some of the finest qualities of the artist. He never overloads his picture with details; nothing is wasted, and nothing is forgotten. But it is in what he leaves to the imagination even more than what he brings before the eye that the secret of his power lies. The pleasure of the pathless woods, the rapture of the lonely shore, the silence of the starry sky, all the mystery and magic of the primeval world—one has to go to the poets to find fit words for the impression left on the mind by these haunting scenes. What wonder if in the majestic presence of Nature the figure of Man should seem at moments small, his movements ungainly, and his language mean?

The edition, we may add, is capably illustrated by Mr. H. M. Brock.

THE following epigram appears in the American Bookman:

TO JAMES LANE ALLEN.

The "Reign of Law"—
Well, Allen, you're lucky;
It's the first time it ever
Rained law in Kentucky.

Bibliographical.

I SEE an American firm promises the Complete Works of Mr. T. B. Aldrich in seven volumes. They will be complete, of course, up to date. It is only three years since Mr. Aldrich's Complete Works appeared in eight volumes. His Poems and Novels were issued in six volumes in 1885, which year also saw the issue of his Poetical Works. It is always, I think, foolish to advertise the Complete Works of an author who is still alive, and likely to add to the number of his writings. To what extent Mr. Aldrich is known and appreciated in England it is difficult to say. His literary output ought to be familiar here, for during the past twenty years some twenty of his publications (including the collections named above) have been circulated in this country. I suppose we may assume that most reading people have made acquaintance with his Marjorie Daw, his Prudence Palfry, his Stillwater Tragedy, his Story of a Bad Boy, if not with his Sister's Tragedy, his Judith and Holofernes, his Later Lyrics. My first acquaintance with his poetical work was, I remember, due to the good offices of a living English poet, who praised him warmly.

The American firm to which I refer also announce The Complete Works, in seven volumes, of Mr. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, another Transatlantic worthy, who, however, has always stuck to prose. He is known in these islands as the writer of Short Studies of American Authors, of a Young Folks (and a Larger) History of the United States, of monographs on Margaret Ossoli and Wendell Phillips, of a book of Reminiscences of Contemporaries, and of various volumes of essays and tales, of the former of which the most widely-spread, apparently, are Common Sense about Women, Women and Men, Book and Heart, The Procession of the Flowers, Cheerful Yesterdays, and so forth. Only last year three of Mr. Higginson's books were issued in England; yet how many English people can place their hands upon their hearts and assert positively that they ever heard of Mr. Higginson, much less ever came across his publications? And yet, obviously, Mr. Higginson must have his admirers; else why take the trouble to publish him in Great Britain?

We are to have a new volume of poems (The Finding of the Book) from the venerable Archbishop of Armagh, now in his seventy-sixth year. It will be welcome to many. The general level of Dr. Alexander's poetical products is not, perhaps, particularly high, but occasionally he is very felicitous in phrase. I am thinking especially of his elegy on Matthew Arnold, which is admirable both as poetry and as criticism. Dr. Alexander published a volume of verse in 1886, having made his poetical début as far back as 1853 with his "Installation Ode." Curiously enough, he has been followed in the see of Derry and Raphoe by a brother poet, the Right Rev. Dr. Chadwick, who also announces for publication shortly a book of verse, chiefly sacred.

Unless I am very much mistaken, a well-known littérateur has been described as having in preparation, for a certain series of biographical monographs, a little book on Mr. Thomas Hardy. Now we are told that Sir George Douglas has in the press a volume on the same interesting subject. One wonders how Mr. Hardy himself feels about it. It is just six years since two books about him appeared in successive months. The year was 1894, and in October came The Art of Thomas Hardy, by Mr. Lionel Johnson, and in November, the Thomas Hardy of Miss Annie Macdonell (assistant editor of the Bookman, and daughter of the James Macdonell of whom Dr. Robertson Nicoll has been the biographer). Even Mr. George Meredith has not suffered quite so much in this way as Mr. Hardy, though he has had his trials.

Mr. Henry Attwell has always been fond of compiling books of Thoughts by this person and that person, and his latest achievement in that way will have John Ruskin's works for its material. There can be no great objection to this, for the Ruskin Birthday Book dates back to 1883, and the Selections from John Ruskin to 1893. In this particular department Ruskinism seems not to have been overdone. Anyway, one can "enthuse" more over such a compilation than over a "Birthday Book" of thoughts by the author of Isabel Carnaby. This is promised us, and it will contain a concentrated extract of wit and humour derived not only from Isabel but from the other two masterpieces by Miss Fowler.

A correspondent reminds me that I did not include in my last week's list of books on Oliver Cromwell the recent work of Mr. Firth. It was because Mr. Firth's book was so recent, and therefore so obvious, that I did not mention it. I see, by the way, that a forthcoming volume of verse will include Cromwell: a Dramatic Poem. There seems no end or limit to the interest excited by the "Great Protector." Matthew Arnold made him the subject of his Newdigate Prize poem in 1843; and here we are—at it again, in 1900!

Mr. Du Chaillu once wrote a book which he called The Land of the Midnight Sun. He now announces one which he has entitled The Land of the Long Night. It was only the other day that we were reading Mr. Cook's Through the First Antarctic Night. And, all the time, one has been unable to forget that Mrs. Lynn Linton was the authoress of a novel which she christened Through the Long Night. A little bit confusing, is it not?

To his forthcoming book, The Bystander, Mr. Ashby Sterry has given the sub-title of "Leaves for the Lazy." He seems fond of the last-named word—his book of verse is called The Lazy Minstrel. And yet there never was, perhaps, a minstrel less lazy than Mr. Ashby Sterry, who is known to be one of the most industrious of penmen.

Last week a literary contemporary included in its list of current fiction the Non Sequitur of Miss M. E. Coleridge. It so happens that that book is of essays all compact; but then Miss Coleridge's reputation, hitherto, has been that of a novelist: hence the blunder.

Messrs. Gay & Bird are to give us what is likely to be a curiosity in its way—namely, an edition of Walton's Compleat Angler "in modern English" [sic!] This will deserve study.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Still to be Written.

Samuel Richardson: a Biographical and Critical Study. By Clara Linklater Thomson. (Horace Marshall & Son.)

